Popular tales of extraterrestrial abductions aside, we do know that the U.S., Canadian and British governments were conducting flights with saucer-shaped flying craft throughout the latter half of this century, and eyewitness reports and film of unusual aerial maneuvers over government bases suggest that these flights continue to this day. In recent years thousands of people have trekked into the Nevada desert to watch the lights of 'impossible' aircraft dancing in the sky above the U.S. military installation variously called Dreamland, S-4, and Area 51.

An article in the February 1987 issue of Gung-Ho, a magazine about the military, talks about "UnFunded Opportunities" (UFO) currently available:

"As for 'UnFunded Opportunities,' these are programs dealing with technology levels so advanced that one Air Force officer involved in SR-71 development said: 'We are flight testing vehicles that defy description. To compare them conceptually to the SR-71 would be like comparing Leonardo Da Vinci's parachute design to the space shuttle.'

"Other officers are similarly emphatic about the nature of these new systems: 'We have things that are so far beyond the comprehension of the average aviation authority as to be really alien to our way of thinking,' says one retired colonel."

Former NASA technician Bill Kaysing maintains that We Never Went To The Moon in his book of the same title. Having analyzed photos of Lunar landings and reviewed official NASA reports, Kaysing believes that the moon launch and other space ventures were staged and, while decoy rockets were launched, the moon landings were simulated on sound stages at secret installations in Nevada. The information that Kaysing has gathered, however, can be interpreted in a different manner.

Photos of the first Lunar landing show a strange discrepancy. There is no indication that the rocket blast from the Lunar module disturbed the soil to any degree. Footprints of the astronauts are shown in profusion around the module, yet there is no crater beneath it, not even an apparent disturbance of the dust caused by the lander's exhaust.

While this might be interpreted as proof, as Kaysing believes, that the lander was a stationary mock-up on a soundstage in Nevada, it could also be an indication that the module employed another means of propulsion that did not require rockets, such as the gravity or other drives mentioned in the Gung-Ho article.

Research into such propulsion methods has been conducted for many years, and used to be spoken of much more frequently than it is today, with scientists in the 1950s going so far as to suggest that a breakthrough in anti-gravity research was "imminent." Testimony to the House Armed Services Committee hearings on UFOs in 1966 revealed that "six agencies of the federal government are extending themselves in research to uncover the suspected secret of these objects [i.e. UFOs] — that of gravity control or anti-gravity power. Forty-six such projects of research of varying degrees are currently being subsidized, including 33 under Air Force supervision."

Were all those projects unsuccessful?

6

Hot Jobs and Crop Circles

Alternative 3 relates the assassination of scientist “Sir William Ballentine” by laser “hot job.” Quoting Professor Hubert Radwell ...who gave evidence at the Ballentine inquest:

“Ballentine’s body was not merely burned. It was reduced to little more than cinders and scorched bones. His skull had shrunk because of the intense heat to which he had been subjected and yet his clothing was hardly damaged.”

A real parallel to laser hot jobs are other secret plans of the Nazis in the last days of the war.

Albert Speer, in Inside the Third Reich relates that in April, 1945 he was told by Robert Ley, Germany’s Minister for Labor, that Germany possessed a “death ray.” Heinz Schaeffer corroborated Speer in his book U-boat 977, saying that the S.S. had offered to give him a demonstration of a “death ray,” also in April of 1945, but that due to his schedule as a submarine captain he had been unable to attend.

The U.S. government-published America’s Aircraft Year Book provides further information on plans related to a death ray: “Rudolph Herrman... a specialist in supersonics... was a member of the group entrusted with Hitler’s futuristic plans to establish a space-station rocket refuelling base revolving as a satellite about the Earth at a distance of 4,000 miles.” Major Robert Staver, one of Herrman’s interrogators, described plans to equip the space station with a giant focusing reflector. “[It is] a weapon which will enable the first country to achieve this undertaking to rule the world. The focusing of this reflector upon any living persons would kill them immediately. Ocean water would be instantly turned to steam, a forest instantly kindled.”

During World War II the Japanese were also involved in exotic weapons research, as evidenced by a document from the library of the Imperial War Museum in London. Titled "RESTRICTED APPENDIX 1-E, SUBJECT: DEATH RAY" and dated 3 October, 1945, it is a synopsis of interviews with Lieutenant General Shimoda and other Japanese officers, conducted by Doctors Griggs, Moreland, and Stephenson. The document states:

"For five and a half years the Japs have been working on a 'death ray.' This is based on the principle that very short radio waves focused in a beam of high power will cause physiological effects in mammals, resulting in death. The purpose of these researches was to develop a military weapon which would cause paralysis or death to any human being upon whom the beam was focused." The document goes on to describe the device's most suitable military application, "anti-aircraft," and to say that the Japanese had spent the equivalent of two million dollars in its development. Also described are various experiments using the death ray, and the amount of time required to kill animals of differing species, concluding: "With the development of higher-power and shorter-wave length oscillators, which has become possible through the Allied research on radar, it is possible that a death ray might be developed that could kill unshielded human beings at a distance of five to ten miles if these Japanese experiments are reliable indications of the potentialities of the death ray."

How does this relate to current technological capability, or the revealed hints of such? Apparently America does have functional battlefield lasers as part of its weapons arsenal. The Spotlight newspaper described the Pentagon's secret "Project AOC" (Army Optical Countermeasures) and the usage of "A high-frequency laser gun pulsating 10 joules of beam power 100 times per second... [to] incinerate a human eye." A joule is the amount of energy need to accelerate a quarter-pound weight to 100 feet per second. In the article authors Harrer and Dobbs relate their sources had said the weapon was deployed during the Iraqi war.

Another interesting clue to possible covert research are the reports of arson investigators seeking the cause of a large number of forest fires in central California in 1985, as noted by researcher Waves Forest. Research suggests that the burn patterns of the fires were started high in the trees, with the effects of lightning being ruled out. Fantastically, these high level burns could indicate the firing of laser weapons (perhaps part of the government Star Wars program) from some point in the atmosphere or in space.

A strange, although factual case was related in the Society for the Protection of Individual Rights and Liberties (SPIRAL) newsletter of August 21, 1982:

"The... case discussed here... concerns Jack Angel, 66... a successful, healthy clothing salesman who happened to be on the road making a sales trip when it happened. On November 12, 1974, Jack pulled his motorhome into a Ramada Inn parking lot in Savannah, GA and prepared himself for a good night's sleep. However, Jack didn't wake up until four days later, on Nov. 16. He was severely burned.

"As Jack explained it, 'It was just burned, blistered (his hand), and I had this big explosion in my chest. It left a hell of a hole. I was burned down here on my legs and between my groin, down on my ankle and up and down my back. In spots!' But he felt no pain. He showered and changed his clothes (none of which were touched by the burn). He staggered to the lounge (although he had not been drinking) and ordered a scotch to ease the pain. Suddenly Jack got up and staggered to the restroom. The next thing he recalls is being in a hospital. He had a charred hand and a 3 x 4 centimeter burn cavity in his chest. The doctors told him he had been burned internally!

"Jack and his wife checked out the mobile home to see what could have caused these burns, but she found nothing unusual. During this time Jack had to have his hand amputated because of damaged nerves and burns. After recuperating he got in touch with lawyers to see if he could seek damages for a possible malfunction in his motorhome, but the lawyers checked and rechecked every detail of the motorhome — they even checked the power lines above the space where he parked those 4 nights, but no cause could be found and the case was dropped. To this day, Jack does not know how he became so severely burned."

In discussing recent "crop circle" phenomena in the Amargi ecology newsletter, author Otter G'Zell suggests a possible explanation involving military hardware that may be employed in "hot jobs." "A ...mundane and disturbing hypothesis has been proposed [for the crop circles] by Jean-Jacques Velasco, head of GEPAN (Groupe d'Etudes des Phenomenes Aerospatiaux Non-identifies), the official UFO investigative agency of the French government (now renamed SEPRA). Velasco has pointed out the large number of military installations in the area of the phenomena (although a third of Wiltshire is off-limits to the public). The military claims vast tracts of land to which it allows only severely restricted access, including no non-military overflights, and it is significant that the 'crop circles' in Britain, as well as those in the U.S., Canada and New Zealand, are showing up on these very military reservations! Velasco believes that the circles are a result of military tests of advanced Star Wars weaponry, perhaps created by a beam of infrared or microwave energy bounded off mirrors in space to the fields below.

"Velasco's hypothesis would also account for the lack of an uproar among the farmers: perhaps they are being compensated? It would also explain why none of England's professional biologists have taken the trouble to visit the sites, although Oxford, Cambridge and other prestigious universities are an easy drive away.

"In consultation with our own investigators, the ERA is tending to concur with Dr. Velasco. Several significant details have been reported to us which we think may allow a tentative reconstruction of the mechanism involved: First, we have the report of a laboratory analysis of some of the affected wheat stalks. The 90 degree bending at the base is due to the 'explosion' of the lowest node of the stalk, evidently by vaporization of the water contained therein. Deprived of its structural rigidity at the node, the stalk simply falls over. The fibers are not broken in the process, and continue carrying water and nutrients past the collapsed node, so the plant continues living where it has fallen. This effect can most readily be explained by microwaves, which can be tuned to a frequency that will vaporize water. Indeed, microwave lasers, called 'masers' (Microwave Amplification by Stimulated Emission of Radiation), were actually developed some years before the now-familiar visible-light lasers.

"The second relevant report comes from a farmer who claims to have witnessed the formation of a circle. He says that it was as if a giant hand suddenly laid down on the wheat with a rapid rotation, twisting it into a flattened spiral. The image of a collapsing spiral of dominos leaps to mind. This effect would be expected of a rotating maser beam directed from above.

"But the most telling report, and one which offers the most concrete evidence we have so far come across, comes from a recreational glider pilot who drifted with the air currents over restricted military airspace in Wiltshire. He observed a reflection of his glider floating in the air before him, and as he sailed closer he found himself circling a huge but invisible cylindrical reflecting surface suspended vertically in the air.

"I offer this hypothetical reconstruction of a top-secret military device capable not only of creating the mysterious 'crop circles,' but also of being a devastating anti-personnel weapon. Imagine a huge vertical cylinder made of rigid 100% reflective mylar. The top is capped with a slightly bulging disk of flexible reflective mylar, similar to that found in popular helium balloons. The bottom is capped with a transparent mylar disk. Inside, the upper disk is sealed to a clear underdisk. By injecting or removing air into the space between, the parabolic shape of the upper mirror may be increased or decreased to focus a beam reflected off its surface. In the center of the cylinder is a rotating maser projection device. This is aimed upward at the curved top mirror, so the entire apparatus resembles a giant upside-down reflecting telescope.

"A maser altimeter and computer-adjusted air pressure devices adjust the focus of the reflected beam to any configuration desired at ground level. Atmospheric buoyancy is achieved by filling the entire cylinder with hydrogen. Position would be controlled by gas jets. It obviously wouldn't be stable in a high wind, but in still air the device could be maneuvered into position, fired and returned to base with no one the wiser. The exterior surface would reflect only sky and be completely invisible to the eye unless one were directly under it and looking up into the interior, where relatively small mechanisms might be seen. Even these could be cloaked by suspending a reflective cone directly beneath the interior mechanisms. As for the more complex patterns in the affected wheat fields, these could be achieved in the same manner as Batman's 'bat-signal,' by superimposing a cut-out template between the maser beam and the upper parabolic mirror."

If crop circles are the result of military or other advanced weapons testing, they may have two purposes. The initial crop circles were just that, simple round impressions with, at times, outriggers of smaller circles. With time and numerous appearances of the "circles," however, the manifestations have gotten more complex, modified into vast configurations of arcs, triangles, circles and lines, resembling the arcane sigils of any number of occult groups — and certainly not random "whirlwind" or magnetic vortex events. Some investigators have gone so far as to suggest that there are messages in the crop formations, and some claim to have deciphered them.

If the crop circles are being inscribed by the use of laser or microwaves on rural landscapes from the upper atmosphere or outer space, possibly to test focal length and the aim of these advanced weapons, then making them represent mystical patterns might serve a purpose. It would channel public attention into arcane realms (such as UFOs from outer space), and make the circles appear to be extraterrestrial messages — not military test patterns.

7

Missing Scientists and LGIBs

In the book Alternative 3, Watkins and Ambrose develop page-long biographies of three “missing scientists” to flesh out their brief treatment in the television show: Ann Clark, Brian Pendlebury, and Robert Patterson.

“Ann Clark” is presented in a mini-soap opera revealing no details of her professional, scholastic, or community life, but instead going into detail about her being dumped by her fiancee “Malcolm” and the frustration she felt — the upshot being that this makes her want to relocate to Mars.

Another scientist, “Brian Pendlebury,” is reported to have left an undisclosed university with a degree in electronics to take a job with “a major electronics firm in Sydney, Australia.” For five months he stays in touch with his parents, who have a “cozy vision of Brian marrying some nice sensible Lancashire girl and of [his mother] becoming a doting grandmother.” But when they try to locate him in Australia he does not live at the address listed on his letters, and the company he is supposedly working for has never heard of him. Or so they say, nudge, nudge.

“Robert Patterson” a “senior lecturer... at the University of St. Andrews” and “one of the most brilliant mathematicians in Britain” is unhappy about high English taxation and announces that he is going to America. He abruptly vanishes. There is no word whether an LGIB (Lancashire-girl-in-black) is also involved in this disappearance.

These profiles, presented in classic True Confessions style, do not do credit to a serious theme. There was a British “brain drain” in the 1970’s, consisting of large numbers of British scientists leaving the country for employment in other countries, and there have been missing and murdered scientists.

Other missing scientists mentioned in Alternative 3 include:

Richard Tuffley, Swansea, South Wales, January 5, 1976; Gordon Balcombe, Bromley Kent, February 5, 1976; Sidney Dilworth, Reading, Berkshire, April 16, 1976; Andrew Nisbett, Houston, Texas, October 5, 1976; Pavel Germanas, Jerusalem, Israel, July 14, 1977; Marcel Rouffanche, Paris, France, November 16, 1977; and Eric Hillier, Melbourne, Australia, December 29, 1977.

So far as I can determine, these individuals and their disappearances were all invented for Alternative 3. There was, however, what seems to be a concerted effort by unknown individuals to sabotage SDI research by murdering scientists during the same period of time when the Soviets were attempting to achieve the same result by negotiation. This may have been part of an assassination program in existence at the time of the airing of Alternative 3 on television, although the press only takes note of deaths beginning in 1982 — an example of strange prescience in Alternative 3.

A partial list of SDI-connected scientists who committed suicide or died under mysterious circumstances (none, so far as can be determined, by “hot job”) includes:

In March of 1982, Keith Bowden, an expert on supercomputers and computer-controlled aircraft; killed when his car went off an embankment.

March of 1985, Roger Hill, a designer at Marconi Defense Systems, allegedly committed suicide by shotgun blast.

In November of 1985, Jonathan Walsh, a digital communications expert employed by Marconi’s parent firm, GEC, fell from his hotel room. He had expressed fear for his life.

On July 9, 1986, Karl-Heinz Beckurts and his driver were killed by a bomb near Munich. Beckurts was Director of Research at Siemens Company, an SDI contractor allegedly linked to activities of Otto Skorzeny’s Nazi International.

August 1986: Vimal Dajibhai, employed in computer-guidance with Marconi, jumped from a bridge in Bristol England.

On October 10, 1986, Gerrold von Braunmuhl was assassinated outside Bonn, West Germany. Von Braunmuhl had been a chief advisor to West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher during SDI talks.

In October of 1986, Ashad Sharif, another employee of Marconi, apparently tied a rope to his neck, got in his car, and drove off, with fatal results.

On July 30, 1986, Swedish professor Svante Oden disappeared.

Also in 1986, Lando Conti, the head of an electronics company and associate of the Italian defense minister, was killed in an unspecified fashion.

There were at least four deaths or disappearances of scientists in January of 1987. These included:

Aytar Singh-Gida, working on SDI-related technology, who disappeared.

Richard Pugh, who had worked on Defense Ministry contracts, was found dead. The circumstances were not explained.

John Brittan, a computer expert at the Royal Armaments Research and Development Establishment was found dead in his garage of apparently self-inflicted carbon monoxide poisoning.

The Swedish arms inspector Carl Fredrik Algernon supposedly committed suicide.

On February 21, 1987, Peter Peapell, a lecturer at Britain's Royal Military College, died of allegedly self-inflicted carbon monoxide poisoning in his garage.

In February of 1987 Victor Moore, design engineer with Marconi, was found dead of a drug overdose.

Also in February of 1987, Edwin Skeels, an engineer at Marconi, was found dead of carbon monoxide poisoning.

On March 20, 1987, General Licio Giorgieti was shot in Rome. Giorgieri was the Director General of Space and Armaments Procurement for the Italian Defense Ministry. March 30, 1987: David Sands, a computer expert with Easams, an SDI contractor, was killed when his car crashed. The trunk of the car was loaded with containers of gasoline.

In April of 1987, Mark Wisner, a computer specialist with the Royal Air Force weapons-testing base, allegedly committed suicide with a plastic bag over his head.

In April of 1987, Stuart Gooding, a research student at the Royal Military College of Science died in a "mysterious" car wreck.

Also in April of 1987, George Kountis, systems analyst at British Polytechnic, drowned after his car plunged into the Mersey River in Liverpool.

In May of 1987, Richard Greenhalgh, a computer salesman with the Defense Center of ICL, a principal contractor for the Royal Navy, is alleged to have slashed his wrists and leaped off a bridge.

Also in May of 1987, Michael Baker, who had worked in SDI-related areas, died in a car crash.

In June of 1987 Frank Jennings, an electronic weapons engineer, died of a heart attack. No inquest was held.

In February of 1988, Russell Smith, a scientist for the ultra-secret United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, allegedly committed suicide, but the authorities have neglected saying how.

In March of 1988, Trevor Knight, another employee of Marconi, died of carbon monoxide poisoning in his car.

July 19, 1989: George Koopman, a technologist at the American Rocket Company was killed in an auto accident.

In August of 1988: Peter Ferry, marketing director for Marconi, was found dead with electric leads in his mouth.

Also in August of 1988, Alistair Beckham, an engineer with Plessey Defence Systems, was found dead with electric leads to his body and a handkerchief stuffed in his mouth.

In September of 1988, Andrew Hall was found dead in his car of carbon monoxide poisoning, a hose connected to the exhaust.

Lieutenant Colonel Anthony Godley, employed at the Royal Military College of Science, disappeared in 1988.

During this period there were also bombings of companies engaged in SDI research, including Fraunhofer Research, the Dornier Company, the IBM Research Center, and the Research Institute of Optics (all located in West Germany), CSF Thomson in Paris, France, and the AEG Company in Copenhagen, Denmark.

In July of 1986, Kurt Rebmann, Germany's Federal Prosecutor, told the New York Times that he believed the attacks were part of "a coordinated offensive" against the West and SDI.

So who killed the Star Wars scientists? In at least two of the cases, those of Beckurts and von Braunmuhl, the Marxist Red Army Faction (RAF) claimed responsibility. In Italy a note was found at the location of Giorgieri's murder, stating he "was struck down exclusively for his responsibility exercised following the Italian adhesion to the Star Wars project" and attributing the murder to the Italian Red Brigades. Of course notes can be easily faked, and the fact that responsibility was claimed in only three cases is odd if two groups performed all of the murders.

A suggestive link in the chain is the minimum of five scientists who apparently died of carbon monoxide poisoning. As part of its M-K-Search operations in the 1960s, CIA-funded researchers concocted a chemical meant to simulate death by carbon monoxide poisoning. Still, if the CIA was involved, why would they want to kill the scientists?

One possibility is that it was apparent to the Kremlin that SDI, far from being the defensive program that it was presented as by Ronald Reagan, had an offensive capability. Once in place, the Russians may have reasoned, the Cold War race for military supremacy would be over. Using advanced radar imaging capability able to target individuals and missile launch facilities (which might, as the American military has suggested, include the ability to "see" through walls), the West would have a first-and-final strike ability enabling a war to be fought and won. This would make it imperative that everything possible be done to stop SDI research.

It has also occurred to me that if there is a secret disk technology on this planet, withheld for its surprise strike capability from some unknown quarter, then SDI might have been seen as a technology capable of pinpointing and shooting down such craft.

Other information touching upon the missing scientist theme in Alternative 3 is the story related to me by author David Hatcher Childress. Speaking with a University of Colorado professor, Childress had said that he was very doubtful about the book's validity. The professor, however, wasn't so certain. He confided that he personally knew a scientist who had been offered a secret assignment dealing with computer/biological interfacing, and that the scientist had been told he would be going somewhere that "he would never return from." Promised the opportunity to "do great science," and to have all of his needs, both personal and scientific, provided for in a lavish manner for the rest of his life, he agreed. The contract the scientist signed stipulated that he was allowed to bring one other person along to the unspecified project location and, since he was unmarried, he brought his mother. He left on the specified date, and was said to have gone first to Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, from there to his final destination. When the professor later attempted to contact him through one of his colleagues, he was reminded that the man would never be returning, and was told that there were dangers involved in pressing his inquiry any further.

Pure Alternative 3, one might say, but Childress believes that the man was telling the truth.

Another possible confirmation of elements in Alternative 3 is provided in a letter received by the editors of World Watchers International magazine from a "Mr. MJ" in El Paso, Texas:

"Back during 1978 or thereabouts, I happened on a copy of the paperback book Alternative 3, which detailed some of the things my father had told me years earlier, that the military had disc-shaped aircraft. A short time later, on a business trip, I met a woman and tried to impress her by mentioning that I worked as a Congressional liaison to the Pentagon for Nixon's Congressman during the Watergate fiasco, and that my wife had worked as a secretary to Donald Segretti, head of CREEP, in the Naval Annex. She told me she too had worked at the Pentagon, behind the 'Green Door,' as a cryptoanalyst for military intelligence, and personal secretary to an Admiral in the late '50s.

"She was offered an assignment in Pasadena in 1962, at the Jet Propulsion Labs there, and assigned to a classified section as a photo interpreter. She scanned all in-coming photographs of the moon and Mars with 'high resolution' photography. Her husband, who she met there, worked in another department as a designer. His function was to design domed, modular living facilities for 'colonies' on the moon and then Mars! The secret name of this amazing project was 'Adam and Eve.' Her husband designed these domed structures, and all the life-support systems inside and out. One of their local probes had found gale-velocity winds on Mars, and no other structure would hold up.

"Sometime later, her husband and several other key scientists were chosen for an even more secret project, and went off to parts unknown. She never saw him again. When she asked, she was told that his whereabouts were on a need-to-know basis. She got letters from him, but no hint of where he was. One day she was told that he had been killed, but no further information and no body were provided. Then her 'Q' clearance was pulled. When I asked her jokingly if she thought her husband had been drafted to go to Vietnam, she stared at me and replied, 'No, I think he was drafted to Mars!' And she was dead serious."

8

Ice Picks, Electrodes and LSD

If, as Alternative 3 maintains, mass enslavement is the plan (if not part of the public expression) of the secret rulers and shakers of this planet, then means for making the populace controllable as a step towards complete enslavement might be desirable. Although subjugation of his neighbor has been a pet project of humanity since the beginning of recorded history, since the middle of this century the technology for creating zombies has been turned by "scientists" into a fine, if horrifying, art.

Lobotomies began to be used as a technique of social control in the late 1940s. Finally the keepers could interiorize the cumbersome strait jacket. Scheflin and Opton in The Mind Manipulators state that 100,000 people received lobotomies between 1946-1955, with half of the operations occurring in the U.S.

Patricia Derian, during the 1940s a student nurse at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville, described a typical lobotomy, performed in an amphitheater with witnessing doctors:

"As each patient was brought in, Dr. Freeman would shout at him that he was going to do something that would make him feel a lot better. The patients had been given electroshock just before they were brought in; that's probably why he yelled at them. The shock was the only medication they received, he gave nothing for the pain, no anesthesia, no muscle relaxant.

"After the patient was placed on the table, Dr. Freeman would clap his hands and his two assistants would hold up an enormous piece of green felt the color of a pool table. That was the photographic backdrop. Dr. Freeman would direct the placement of lights so that each operation could be photographed, and he checked carefully to be sure that the cameraman was ready, that they had a good angle showing Dr. Freeman with his instrument, that there was no shadow to spoil the picture. His main interest during the entire series of lobotomies seemed to be on getting good photographic angles. He had each operation photographed with the icepick in place.

"When all was ready, he would plunge it in. I suppose that was part of his surgical technique, if there is a technique for such surgery. You probably have to plunge it in to break through the back of the eye socket. He lifted up the eyelid and slid the icepick-like instrument over the eyeball. Then he would stab it in suddenly, check to be sure the pictures were being made, and move the pick from side to side to cut the brain."

By at least the 1940s American clandestine organizations were engaged in on-going secret programs of lobotomy, chemo-psychiatric and other mind manipulation that continues unabated and fine-tuned to this day.

George Estabrooks of Colgate University proposed the use of hypnosis during warfare to the Department of War prior to World War II. Since he burned the diaries relating his activities during these years, we can only speculate as to how his researches were put into practice. During the same period, Nazi psychiatrists were testing the drug mescaline on concentration camp inmates, and the OSS conducted research into behavior modification through experimentation with mescaline, barbituates, peyote, and other drugs.

In 1947 the U.S. Navy instituted Project Chatter (later renamed Project Castigate) at the University of Rochester, continuing their drug experimentation, and the CIA launched Project Bluebird, authorized by Director Roscoe Hillenkoetter (of the probably bogus MJ-12 document fame), both projects run with virtually unlimited "black budget" funding. In 1952 Project Bluebird was renamed Operation Artichoke, reportedly because Allen Dulles was fond of the vegetable.

Television, arguably a form of semi-lobotomization, was introduced to the American public in the late 1940s, providing instant access to the public mind — and access to the media sorcerers and their bosses — the Rockefellers, notably, with controlling shares in all the major networks — have.

In addition to an undeniable agenda of consumerism and prepared politics broadcast by television, there have also been a number of verified applications of subliminal programming that have taken place. These include a patriotic Statue of Liberty emblem inserted into a Saturday morning ALF cartoon, Francois Mitterand re-election slogans injected into television programming in France, and, according to an underground document circulated among anarchists in New Zealand, the “Kiwi Gemstone,” CIA-sponsored Australian television subliminals.

The “Kiwi Gemstone” states that CIA subliminals were aired beginning in 1984, with the following chronology:

“24th May 1984: Four-man CIA team co-ordinated by Ray Cline arrive in Aotearoa [New Zealand] to begin installing equipment for subliminal television advertising at five sites - Waiatarua, Mt. Erin, Kaukau, Sugarloaf, and Obelisk. Sophisticated equipment can be installed within one kilometer of TV relay aerials and all linked to one IDAPS computer bureau in Auckland. Same equipment installed in Australia in August 1985; Japan in September 1986; U.K. in February 1987; New York in 1987.

“17th July 1984: In Aotearoa, subliminal advertising begins on Channel Two between 6 p.m. and midnight - hours later extended to begin at noon. Subliminal messages prepared in the U.S. by the CIA, and with the Kiwi election imminent, tell voters to support the Labour Party, the New Zealand Party, and to buy Mafia company products.

27th February 1987: New subliminal messages appear on Kiwi TV screens - “Hello, Friends. Make More Money. Vote Labour.” Other messages include: “Greetings My Own. Buy Cars. Buy Now,” and the most sinister of all, “Smash. Hate. Rape. Punch. Kill. Use Violence.” These messages were reportedly broadcast on Australian television an average of four times per hour during this period.

A number of sources claim that during the Korean war the American use of germ warfare was concealed by maintaining that prisoners, who had been shown unopened canisters of these agents by their Korean captors, had been “brainwashed.” Three journalists who claimed these chemical agents were used were arrested and put in jail in the United States.

Regardless of the truth of the claims of Korean brainwashing, these reports provided the rationale for instituting a stepped-up program of CIA mind control research dubbed M-K-Ultra, absorbing Project M-K-Delta, which had researched chemical and biological warfare. M-K-Ultra included such varied behavior control approaches as psychoactive drugs (including LSD, beginning in 1952), hypnosis, bio-electrics, radio brain bombardment, brain surgery, electronic destruction of memory, occult and parapsychological research, radiation, microwaves, and ultrasonics. “Expendables,” i.e. persons whose lives could be terminated without concern of investigation, were used in these tests. M-K-Ultra existed outside of usual CIA channels, without “the usual contractual arrangements,” and was “highly compartmented." The program included the participation of Nazi scientists recently imported through Project Paperclip.

CIA director Allen Dulles, speaking of personnel to be employed in administering mind control experiments, said in 1952: "Each person's ethics must be such that he would be completely cooperative in any phase of our program regardless of how revolutionary it may be." Dulles was echoing the dominant psychiatric and medical "think" of our era, as exemplified, for instance, by Edward O. Wilson in Sociobiology: The New Synthesis: "Scientists and humanists should consider together the possibility that the time has come for ethics to be removed temporarily from the hands of the philosophers and biologicized..."

As an indication of how far mind control research had gone, in 1953 John C. Lilly (later famous for his dolphin research and alleged ET contacts) was asked to brief members of the clandestine community on his work involving brain stimulation using electrode brain implants (a technique which had been experimented with as far back as 1898, by J.R. Ewald, professor of physicology at Straussbourg). Lilly refused, but commented: "Dr. Antoine Remond, using our techniques in Paris, has demonstrated that this method of stimulation of the brain can be applied to the human without the help of the neurosurgeon; he is doing it in his office in Paris without neurosurgical supervision. This means that anybody with the proper apparatus can carry this out on a person covertly, with no external signs that electrodes have been used on that person. I feel that if this technique got into the hands of a secret agency, they would have total control over a human being and be able to change his beliefs extremely quickly, leaving little evidence of what had been done."

Some of the medical facilities alleged to have been involved in CIA mind control work are the Mayo Clinic, Detroit Psychopathic Clinic, the National Institute of Health, Mount Sinai, the University of Michigan Medical School, the University of Minnesota Medical School, Boston Psychopathic Hospital, Allen Memorial Institute at McGill University in Montreal, Cornell University Medical School, Valley Forge General Hospital, Columbia University, the University of Oklahoma, the Addiction Research Center at Lexington, Kentucky, the University of Chicago, the University of Rochester, and the University of Illinois Medical School. And this list is far from complete.

Individuals such as Velma Orlikow would seek treatment for depression (in this case from Dr. Ewen Cameron, who was financed by the CIA and later to be President of the American Psychiatric Association, the Canadian Psychiatric Association, and the World Association of Psychiatrists) and instead would receive large doses of desonyn and sodium amytal, months of what Cameron dubbed "psychic driving" (repetition of a command tape loop for 16-24 hours a day in order to break down "psychological barriers"), electroshock, and 16 LSD trips.

Jean Charles Page, seeking treatment for alcoholism, was subjected to LSD and electroshock "depatterning" by Cameron, and placed in "continuous sleep" for 36 days, in the process becoming addicted to barbiturates.

Robert Logie, desiring treatment for leg pains, was "depatterned" with drugs and electroshock treatments, given multiple LSD trips, and placed in drug-induced sleep for 23 days.

These experimental "treatments" were performed in a variety of settings at Cameron's facility in Toronto, including the "Zombie Room," where twenty patients were kept in drugged comas for weeks at a time, the "Grid Room," where experiments in remote telemetry were performed on patients in electrode-monitored restraint, and the "Isolation Chamber," essentially a padded cell where patients could be kept for periods of time up to years in order to remove them from "outside influences."

These are a few examples of a nightmare that was replayed many thousands of times on both soldiers and civilians during the period from 1950 until the present. In the case of Dr. Cameron, who also employed lobotomy in his practice, it was later shown that his test subjects were primarily immigrants from Eastern Europe. Gordon Thomas in Journey into Madness has said of Cameron that, "Clearly, he saw that his tests could be extended to immigration screening."

When concerns were voiced by patients' families that these psychiatric guinea pigs were being reduced to a state of total amnesia, Cameron simply reported that the families would have to "help them build a scaffold of normal events."

In 1963 CIA Deputy Director for Plans Richard Helms related in a memo to the Deputy Director of the CIA: "For over a decade the Clandestine Services has had the mission of maintaining a capability for influencing human behavior... if we are to continue to maintain a capability for influencing human behavior, we are virtually obliged to test on unwitting humans."

Author Martin Cannon has reported that "According to declassified documents in the [John] Marks files, a major difficulty faced by the M-K-Ultra researchers concerned the 'disposal problem.' What to do with the victims of CIA-sponsored electroshock, hypnosis and drug experimentation? The company resorted to distressing, but characteristic, tactics: They disposed of their human guinea pigs by incarcerating them in insane asylums, by performing icepick lobotomies, and by ordering 'executive actions.'"

It seems never to have occurred to anyone that the madmen were running the asylums (not to mention the country), and it also seems to have eluded attention that prosecutions should take place to partially rectify the thousands of criminal acts that continue to be committed under the guise of "scientific research."

In the 1960s Dr. Louis Jolyon "Jolly" West, director of the Neuropsychiatric Institute at UCLA, proposed the utilization of an abandoned Nike missile base in California for the creation of the Center for the Study and Reduction of Violence. West was also the psychiatrist imported from the West Coast to Dallas to analyze the imprisoned Jack Ruby, assassin of Lee Harvey Oswald.

In a letter to Dr. J.M. Stubblebine, Director of Health in the California Office of Health Planning, West said of the violence reduction center that "Comparative studies could be carried out there, in an isolated but convenient location, of experimental or model programs for the alteration of undesirable behavior." West stated that the factors indicating a predisposition to violence were "sex (male), age (youthful), ethnicity (black) and urbanicity" and elaborated on his plans in a secret memo: "...Now by implanting tiny electrodes deep within the brain [it] is even possible to record bioelectrical changes in the brain of freely moving subjects, through the use of remote monitoring techniques. They are not yet feasible for large scale screening that might permit detection of a violent episode. A major task of the center should be to devise such a test..."

Included in these plans were central monitoring stations which would track individuals deemed potentially dangerous by the psychiatrists, and enable intervention with psychotropic drugs at the first spiked graph.

California Governor Ronald Reagan agreed with West that such a "violence reduction center" was a terrific idea and lobbied President Nixon, the Secretary of Defense and various federal agents, making the center a theme in his 1974 State of the State message. Stunned at statements of the California legislature that the subject was a "sensitive" matter with the public, Reagan retained the violence center in his active file until elected President.

In 1970 psychologist James V. McConnell was able to state in Psychology Today:

"The day has come when we can combine sensory deprivation with drugs, hypnosis and astute manipulation of reward and punishment to gain almost absolute control over an individual's behavior. It should be possible then to achieve a very rapid and highly effective type of positive brainwashing that would allow us to make dramatic changes in a person's behavior and personality... We should reshape society so that we all would be trained from birth to want to do what society wants us to do. We have the techniques now to do it.

"...We'd send him [the criminal] to a rehabilitation center where he would undergo positive brainwashing... We'd probably have to restructure his entire personality... No one owns his personality... You had no say about what kind of personality you acquired, and there's no reason to believe you should have the right to refuse to acquire a new personality if your old one is anti-social." Or, McConnell omitted saying, if it doesn't happen to agree with the mindset of the ruling regime.

In the early 1970s Joseph A. Meyer, of the National Security Agency (obtaining, at that time, twice the funding of the CIA), proposed intercerebral implantation for approximately half of all individuals arrested (not convicted) of all crimes in the United States, and the monitoring of tens of millions of American citizens. Meyer used Harlem as a theoretical model for the implementation of his proposed control system.

In 1966 the CIA's Operation Spellbinder, under the direction of Dr. Sydney Gottlieb, conducted research in order to achieve a "sleeper killer," an unknowing control subject who could be turned into an assassin upon receiving a previously implanted code word.

A possible example of this kind of programming was the case of Luis Castillo, a mind-controlled assassin captured during the 70s by the Phillipine National Bureau of Investigation. Castillo was determined to have four different personalities which had been hypnotically installed, including Sgt. Manuel Angel Ramirez of the Strategic Air Tactical Command in South Vietnam (who claimed to be an illegitimate son of Allen Dulles; not altogether impossible, since Dulles was known for his womanizing), while another personality claimed to be one of the assassins of John F. Kennedy.

Another case was that of Candy Jones, the subject of Bains' The Control of Candy Jones. Jones was a star-level model during the 1940s who later started a successful modelling agency. She was contacted by the CIA and induced for "patriotic reasons" to use her agency as a mail drop. Eventually she met with and was hypnotized by CIA psychiatrists (including, Jones said, Dr. William Kroger, who later worked with Louis Jolyon West at UCLA) at a Northern California facility. Jones was subjected to the whole range of CIA mind control techniques, including hypnosis, drugs, and electronic conditioning. During the course of the conditioning she had a duplicate personality installed, was made to forget the programming sessions, had the extra personality of a racial bigot overlaid on her own reportedly tolerant personality, and was programmed to commit suicide after dismissal from the agency. Something apparently went awry in the programming, however. She married radio personality "Long John" Nebel and, with the assistance of hypnotic regression, the truth about her CIA ordeal was uncovered.

Author Martin Cannon points out a possible sub-theme in the case of Candy Jones. Nebel, as a prominent radio personality, had contacts to many personalities in the UFO research community of the day. Could Jones' marriage to him have been part of a program to infiltrate or gain information on that group?

The massive influx of LSD (deemed a "NEW AGENT FOR UNCONVENTIONAL WARFARE" in a DIA memorandum of 1 August 54) into America during the 1960s may not have been an accident. Sandoz Pharmaceuticals, at the time of the discovery of LSD, was a subsidiary of I.G. Farben, and from I.G. linked to legal counsel Allen Dulles. During the '50s and '60s Dulles, as director of the CIA, ordered in excess of one hundred million doses of LSD from Sandoz for mind control projects.

Captain Al Hubbard tells a curious story. He maintains that LSD was discovered years prior to the acknowledged date, concocted as part of a project of Rudolph Steiner's Anthroposophical Society (prior to founding this group, Steiner had been the head of the German section of Blavatsky's Isis-cult Theosophy) to create a "peace pill" to spiritually transform mankind. Regarding the truth of this, I can't say; there is strong evidence, however, that the LSD "conquest" of the world was launched by followers of philosophies derived from similar British Freemasonic channels.

Secret planning sessions were reportedly held in 1952 and 1953 by Dulles, Ford Foundation director Robert Hutchins, and Dr. Humphrey Osmond, personal physician to Aldous Huxley, for Ford-funded mescaline and LSD research.

Huxley has an interesting background. He was the grandson of Thomas Huxley, one of the founders of the Rhodes Round Table group, and Aldous was educated by members of the same elite in the Dionysian "Children of the Sun" group, probably named in honor of the Illuminist Osiris-Isis orientation. Huxley was tutored at Oxford by H.G. Wells, who was in charge of British foreign intelligence during World War I, and the author of The Open Conspiracy: Blue Prints for a World Revolution. Aleister Crowley, "the Beast 666" and founder of the Isis-Urania Temple of Hermetic Students of the Golden Dawn, provided Huxley's initiation into psychedelic substances. It was Huxley's psychedelic/occult groups which in turn provided the launching pad for the entire roster of 60s acid gurus, including Timothy Leary, Alan Watts, Gregory Bateson, Richard Alpert and, through Bateson, Ken Kesey (of Merry Pranksters fame).

In England, the Tavistock Institute, connected to the psychological warfare division of British intelligence, sponsored conferences on such subjects as the “Dialectics of Liberation” hosted by Tavistock staff psychoanalyst R.D. Laing, and attended by Angela Davis and Stokely Carmichael, among others. The Tavistock Institute was funded by the Ford Foundation, the British Defense Ministry, and Harvard University.

As repugnant as it may be for a liberal audience to consider, the ’60s “counter-culture” of LSD may have constituted an action reminiscent of the goals of the earlier British “vitality sapping” assault on China through opium; it may have also provided an Illuminist-derived injection of mysticism into American culture, a “peace pill.”

There is a fine line to be drawn. While mysticism perhaps comprises a vital, higher form of perception, in the matter of the real world that perception needs to be checked with critical analysis. A lack of a practical understanding is one reason that the hippie revolution failed, and this perhaps inherent shortcoming of drugged enlightenment may provide a rationale for the injection of drugs and mystical philosophy into a society. It may, in fact, be a technique for “softening up” populations. Hasn’t religion and mysticism always been used in this manner?

Timothy Leary is an interesting case of a hippie who possibly wasn’t. Leary first obtained LSD from his longtime CIA buddy Frank Barron, a man who was at one time tapped, as Leary mentions, to become “director of psychological personnel at the CIA.” In his biography, Leary seems less than forthcoming about the large number of his friends who are CIA, OSS, and members of the CFR/Eastern Establishment. These include Harry Murray (OSS chief psychologist), Robert Gordon Wasson (Vice President of J.P. Morgan & Co.), Martin Orne (“...a brilliant CIA-funded consciousness researcher... sometimes to be seen in our kitchen drinking coffee and asking intelligent questions about the relationship of drug states to hypnosis”) and socialite Mary Pinchot Meyer, who had been married to top level CIA agent Cord Meyer, Jr., and may have been assassinated because of her knowledge of the JFK hit.

Not a beaded headband among that crowd.

Leary speaks in candid-yet-veiled style when he says, “By this time I felt like I was being initiated into a secret order of Cambridge Illuminati. Frank [Barron, of the CIA] smiled at the idea.” And so is the reader supposed to smile, I imagine.

Leary’s speaking engagements on college campuses in the 80s, engaging in debates with G. Gordon Liddy of Watergate fame, are horribly reminiscent of good cop-bad cop routines, the “cognitive dissonance” mind control technique factually employed by behavioral psychologists in public schools, or even the mocking Freemasonic psychodrama which Michael A. Hoffman II alludes to in his brilliant Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare. It is as if college students were being shown that Leary and Liddy exemplified the entire left-right range of intellectual possibility available to them, much in the same manner that the Republicans and Democrats have long been presented as our only options in the political arena. And so, I suppose, it seemed to us during the '60s. It is even possible that it may seem that way to Leary and Liddy.

For my part, I don't have any evidence that Leary was a witting agent of the CIA or the Tavistock Institute or the Round Table; more likely an unwitting agent, although that "Cambridge Illuminati" crack makes me wonder. Aldous Huxley's disapproval of Leary's psychedelic missionary antics (as reflected in his correspondence) seems to support the idea that Leary was a rogue vector in a trajectory that arguably began in the vicinity of Bavarian Illuminist Adam Weishaupt, yet Leary admits that Huxley encouraged him to "become a cheerleader for evolution" with the infusion of "brain-drugs, mass-produced in the laboratories" into the population. Whether Leary saw puppet masters lurking behind the moving paisley veil, he espoused mystical doctrines identical to those of Huxley and fellow travellers in the uniquely complicated Round Table-British Intelligence-and, yes, Illuminati universe.

Another example of strange currents underlying mind control operations is provided by James Shelby Downard in his article "The Call to Chaos" in Apocalypse Culture, edited by Adam Parfrey. Downard says that:

"The secret society which became the nucleus of the Office of Strategic Services-Central Intelligence Agency octopus was making biotelemetry implants in unsuspecting people as early as 1933. After the operations, the victims were kept drugged for a time and then were brainwashed... I believe the implants were at first activated by touching the skin with a device similar to an electric prod...

"The early implants were made to stimulate the pudendal nerve, when triggered, so that the sexually excited and amnesiac-drugged victims could be used in the sex circuses of the OSS-CIA secret order. Those victims were not infrequently operated on while anesthetized by morphine and scopolamine, which produce analgesia and amnesia (twilight sleep, to esotericists). They too were brainwashed after healing. This evil program, supposedly for the sake of national security, was oriented to the [Freemasonic] Cult of GAOTU [Grand Architect of the Universe]... A woman I know performed in those rites some years ago, representing such deities as Artemis (Diana or Hecate), Aphrodite Pome (Dirty Venus), Bastet, Selket, and the White Goddess described by Robert Graves in his famous book. I do believe that these sex circuses were part of a greater Call to Chaos working...” Herein is a confirmation of the existence of a Freemasonic Mother Goddess cult within intelligence circles.

If the preceding theory seems fanciful, one has only to look to the ritual nature of the Jack the Ripper murders, performed by high ranking Freemasons in the British government and described by Stephen Knight in Jack the Ripper: The Final Solution, to the Freemasonic ritual murder of the P2’s Licio Gelli, or to the Crowleyan ritual magic(k) worked in the ’40s by Jack Parsons and reputed Naval Intelligence agent L. Ron Hubbard (who was to later found the Church of Scientology, based upon initiatory grades not unlike Freemasonry, and a cosmology highly reminiscent of Theosophy). Interesting leads may be provided by Hubbard’s choice of names for his precursor mental therapy, Dianetics. Although he maintained it was a derivative of the Greek dianous, “through thought,” it is difficult to determine why he would name his eldest daughter Diana in similar commemoration. The Scientology crucifix is virtually a copy of the Crowley emblem depicted in The Book of Thoth, while Hubbard is reported to have maintained that he was the reincarnation of Cecil Rhodes.

In recent years Dr. Michael A. Aquino, a colonel in U.S. Army intelligence and leader of a Church of Satan offshoot named the Temple of Set, has been investigated by military and civilian authorities on claims of child molestation at San Francisco’s Presidio military base. Although charges against Aquino have been dismissed, reporter Linda Goldston investigated the military intelligence unit in person and reported evidence of cultic activity having taken place there, including concrete bunkers converted to “ritual chambers” and examples of what appear to be the symbolic accompaniments to Satanic rites, including painted pentagrams, black and white candle drippings, and a large drawing of Satan (or Set) emblazoned on the wall of a building which had been locked.

Aquino, aside from his status as a Satanic high priest, is an expert on military mind control and has expounded on what he terms LBM, Lesser Black Magic used in the control of civilian populaces, the techniques of which include PSYOP (psychological operations) as well as conventional forms of terrorism. Aquino has written on his theories of mind control in an article which he submitted to the Washington Military Review, titled “From PSYOP to MindWar: The Psychology of Victory.” The cover page of the article states the article originates from “HEADQUARTERS, IMPERIAL STORMTROOPER FORCE/Office of the Chief of Staff/MindWar Center/Hub Four” and it is essentially a peptalk on the usage of “psychotronic” (psychological-electronic) techniques, citing in particular the usage of air ionization (“Detonation of nuclear weapons...

will alter atmospheric ionization levels") and the broadcasting of Extremely Low Frequency (ELF) waves for the manipulation of human behavior.

And then there is the black magic research the CIA funded in the 1970s. Dubbed Operation Often, CIA agents contacted the monsignor in charge of exorcisms for the Catholic Archdiocese of New York. When he refused to cooperate with them, they next approached Sybil Leek, who provided a thumbnail estimate of the Black Magic growth industry in the U.S., reportedly consisting at the time of four hundred regularly operating covens and untold thousands of freelance spell-casters. The CIA covertly funded a course in sorcery at the University of South Carolina, and Operation Often closely monitored these classes, reportedly devoted to fertility and initiation rites as well as techniques for raising the dead.

And all on your tax dollar.

9

Electronic Wars

1959 is the first mention of radio-controlled electronic stimulation of the brain (ESB) in M-K-Ultra documents. Although little has been intentionally revealed about this research, Martin Cannon has indicated that an anonymous informant told him, “beginning in 1963, the CIA and military’s mind control efforts strongly emphasized electronics.” Dr. Jose Delgado, well known for his early experimentation with intercerebral implants, has supposedly abandoned this area and gone onto research into the effects of electromagnetic fields on the human brain.

It is reported that experimentation was done by the CIA in the 1960s on RHIC-EDOM, “Radio Hypnotic Intracerebral Control” and “Electronic Dissolution of Memory.” This is the use of remote induction of hypnotic trance and post-hypnotic suggestion, with an erasure of memory after the subject performs the desired acts.

Project Pandora in the 1970s researched the biological effects of Extremely Low Frequency radio emissions (ELF), including microwave and radio waves. This experimentation was reportedly done in response to the beaming of microwaves at the U.S. embassy in Moscow by the Soviets. Dr. Milton Zarat, who searched Soviet scientific literature for a clue as to the purpose of the microwave bombardment, found that, “For non-thermal irradiations, they believe that the electromagnetic field induced by the microwave environment affects the cell membrane, and this results in an increase of excitability or an increase in the level of excitation of nerve cells.”

A statistically high number of illnesses were noted among Moscow embassy employees, and U.S. ambassador Walter Stoessel developed a rare blood disease similar to leukemia, suffering from headaches and bleeding from the eyes. Stoessel reported to his staff that microwaves could cause leukemia, skin cancer, cataracts and various forms of emotional problems. Chromosomal damage was noted in a high percentage of the embassy staff, while white blood cell counts were abnormally high in one third of the staff.

The Army Medical and Information Agency document "Biological Effects of Electromagnetic Radiation — Eurasian Communist Countries," released in 1974 provides a good idea of research conducted during this period. In the document the researches are attributed to "Soviet scientists," but according to Dr. Allen Frey, the experiments reported as being performed by the Soviets were in fact his. The paper states:

"...Soviet scientists are fully aware of the biological effects of low-level microwave radiation which might have offensive weapons application. Their internal sound perception research has great potential for development into a system for disorienting or disrupting the behavior patterns of military or diplomatic personnel; it could equally be used as an interrogation tool. The Soviets have also studied the psychophysiological and metabolic changes and the alterations of brain functions resulting from exposures to mixed frequencies of electromagnetic radiation... another possibility is alteration of the permeability of the blood-brain barrier. This could allow neurotoxins in the blood to cross. As a result, an individual could develop severe neuropathological symptoms and either die or become seriously impaired neurologically. ...The potential for the development of a number of anti-personnel applications suggested by the research published in the USSR, Eastern Europe, and the West... sounds and possibly even words which appear to be originating intercranially [i.e., in the brain] can be induced by signal modulation at very low average power densities..."

In 1974, J.F. Schapitz proposed a project which was later funded for the Department of Defense: "In this investigation it will be shown that the spoken word of the hypnotist may be conveyed by modulate electromagnetic energy directly into the subconscious parts of the human brain — i.e., without employing any technical devices for receiving or transcoding the messages and without the person exposed to such influence having a chance to control the information input consciously."

In his book Microwave Auditory Effects and Applications, Dr. James Lin elaborates on the above technique of the direct electronic communication of words to the brain, and says, "The capability of communicating directly with humans by pulsed microwaves is obviously not limited to the field of therapeutic medicine."

Microwave transmissions have other possible applications, including the conditioning of behavioral responses. According to Anna Keeler in Full Disclosure magazine:

"Richard Helms wrote of such a system in the mid-1960s while he was CIA Plans Director. He spoke of 'sophisticated approaches to the coding of information for transmittal to population targets' in the 'battle for the minds of men.'.. and of 'an approach integrating biological, social and physical-mathematical research in attempts to control human behavior.' He found particularly notable, 'use of modern information theory, automata theory, and feedback concepts... for a technology of controlling behavior-using information inputs as causative agents.'"

Navy Captain Paul Tyler prepared an assessment of electromagnetic weaponry for Maxwell Air Force Base in 1986, suggesting:

"Some of these potential uses include dealing with terrorist groups, crowd control, controlling breeches of security at military installations, and anti-personnel techniques in tactical warfare. In all these cases the EM [electromagnetic] systems could be used to produce mild to severe physiological disruption or perceptual disorientation."

An instance of the probable use of ELF weapons on civilians took place in January of 1985, when women protesting nuclear weapons at the U.S. Air Force base at Greenham Common in England began experiencing strange symptoms, coincident with the changing of the security system at the base from primarily human to primarily electronic. Guards patrolling the base's perimeter were reduced in number, and antennae were installed at intervals. The women experienced an assortment of symptoms characteristic of ELF exposure, including headaches, earaches, pressure behind the eyes, bleeding from nose and gums, nausea, fatigue, hearing clicks and buzzes, and heart palpitations. Electronic testing performed by a Canadian scientist and a British electronics activist group revealed distinct areas of electromagnetic activity around the women's camps.

In 1989 Microwave News said that Boris Yeltsin, "...has told a reporter that the KGB has an ELF device that can stop a human heart from beating. In an interview with Radio Liberty, a U.S.-backed shortwave radio station in West Germany, Yeltsin said that KGB agents told him that they have a device which emits a powerful 7-11 Hz signal which can stop the heart. According to Yeltsin, the KGB agents said that, 'If emergency medical aid isn't close at hand, it's all over.'"

This story is interesting in light of the number of witnesses connected to the JFK assassination dying from heart attacks, as noted in my book, The Gemstone File.

The U.S. government is in possession of a technology similar to the one of which Yeltsin has spoken, coded Project Black Beauty. Utilizing a refrigerator-sized broadcasting unit, emotional and physical effects, including heart attack, can be induced upon living targets. This technology was apparently employed on Manuel Noriega while he was hiding in the Vatican embassy in Panama after the invasion by the U.S. The compound was ringed with large speakers and blaring "heavy metal" rock music was broadcast night and day (very likely a cover for the actual purpose of the units), reportedly to "depress" Noriega. It is also reported that the Black Beauty units were used during the Iraqi war, again under the cover of broadcasting rock music at the enemy.

A report to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1984 admitted that a large number of stores in America use ultrasonic commands broadcast to "discourage shoplifting," and a report from a medical engineer in the DOD states that microwaves and other conditioning methods have been regularly used by the Israelis against the Palestinians.

Operation Pique was an American program which included experiments bouncing electromagnetic waves off the ionosphere to disrupt the mental functions of people in Eastern Europe, particularly those employed at Soviet nuclear installations. Similar experimentation by the Soviets is recounted in an article in Leading Edge magazine. The article may rely on speculation, yet can be substantiated in many details. I include an excerpt in the interests of research. It is titled "Electronic Warfare Still Rages":

"On July 4, 1976, the USSR commenced the regular use of giant Tesla Magnifying Transmitters aimed against the United States. The monstrous 40 million watt signals, created by three transmitters, jammed radio waves around the world and became known to ham radio operators as the 'Russian Woodpecker.' The Soviet signal was described in the November 8, 1976 issue of Aviation Week and Space Technology: 'The FCC has sent several protests to the USSR over interference caused by the powerful pulsed high-frequency radio signals... the pulsed signals have a repetition rate of 10/sec (10 Hz — ELF), but the bandwidth, which is extremely wide, changes from time to time... from 30kc to more than 300kc.' The DOD publication Soviet Military Power describes the Soviet Tesla magnifying transmitters as being 'over the horizon radar' (which is only one of the many different functions of the Tesla transmitters). This publication does openly admit that the Soviet Tesla transmitters have created an electromagnetic disturbance and an interference grid over the United States. Unfortunately, there is a big cover-up about the effects of that electromagnetic grid.

"As of 1985, the Soviets have maintained seven transmitters. There is massive evidence that the signals are deliberately being transmitted at biologically harmful frequencies. The 1986 book The Truth about AIDS — Evolution of an Epidemic, written by Fettner and Check, provides documentation on the origins of AIDS and its relation to the biomedical evidence regarding ELF and the destruction of the human immune system. The immune system disease was not seen until 1978 (the Soviet ELF Woodpecker signals started in July 1976 and the actual ELF grid was expanded in the fall of 1976 and in 1977). The general feeling among scientists is that 'there had to be something new to account for the illness.' None of these individual diseases is new. Most are caused by infectious agents, long present in the human population and against which most adult Americans have developed resistance. The several diseases designated AIDS are in fact old cohabitants of the body. Fettner and Check stated, 'no known virus has ever before attacked specific cells of the immune system.'"

The information we have dealt with in the preceding two chapters is based in the main (although not entirely) upon declassified, "sanitized" accounts, information that the government considers safe for dissemination to the public. It without doubt comprises the tip of an iceberg of mind control and assassination projects and policy. Can there now be any doubt that the technology for turning humans into the zombies of Alternative 3 now exists?

10

Batch Consignments

Other dark avenues sparking the imagination for decades, if not centuries, of those creating systems of worldwide slavery reminiscent of Alternative 3 are those of depopulation and the concentrating of populations into slave camps. Camps whose factual existence can be documented are not located on Mars or the moon, but then, who knows what can be expected in the fullness of time?

During the early 1940s Freemasonic President Franklin Roosevelt commissioned a "master geopolitical plan" on migration ("M") and settlement to propose solutions for the predicted 30,000,000 people who would be displaced by World War II. Roosevelt considered this as much of a military as a humanitarian concern, indicating that displaced "discontented can and will cause trouble, serious trouble." 666 studies were produced for the "M" Project until the final memorandum presented to President Truman in 1945. Among the notables associated with the project were General William J. Donovan of the OSS and Knights of Malta, Nelson Rockefeller, and Sripati Chandsekhar, lifetime fellow of the British Eugenics Society.

In a 1962 book discussing the "M" Project, chairman Henry Field revealed that the study was centered around "world population increase and the future relationship to food and resources," and was also "...concerned with overpopulation on Earth, interstellar migration and the quest for living organisms on other planets." Retaining an uncanny similarity to Alternative 3, one possibility suggested was that "temporary quarters may eventually be established on Venus or Mars," this in a chapter titled "Interstellar Migration." The study was extensively concerned with extraterrestrial possibilities and maintained that "human population will approach infinity if it grows as it has grown in the last two millennia." While Fields plays down the extraterrestrial aspect in his book, it is obvious that it was a major focus of the study, which included the construction of two radio stations that attempted extraterrestrial communication.

Speaking of the radio experiments, Fields said: "...there were certain signals which did not come in on other wave bands. These were totally illegible as far as the Morse code was concerned. I spent many hours listening to these sounds from outer space. A British ex-Naval operator was employed to attempt to decipher these signals. Nothing intelligible resulted. Finally I recorded on a series of electrical transcription or phonograph records a selection of these mysterious radio signals.

"Now, almost forty years later, I wonder, as I did then, if those signals from outer space were attempts at radio communication between rational beings and ourselves. Certainly during the next forty years we shall know the answer." Fields coyly concludes his study of the "M" Project with the dying words of Round Tabler Cecil Rhodes: "So much to do, so little done."

The Nazis, during the 1940s, were thinking along similar, if possibly less humanitarian lines for population control and disposal. As detailed in Gehlen: Spy of the Century by E.H. Cookridge, the Germans had plans to turn the Soviet Union into a vast slave camp after the war.

"Byelorussia (with a population of five and a half million, including the cities of Minsk, Mogilev and Vitebsk) was to be incorporated into East Prussia and resettled by Germans; a large area of western Russia was to be annexed to the Third Reich, 'colonized' under a top layer of German settlers and administered by German officials; this area, with a total population of over fifty million, was to extend to Moscow and include the Ukraine, the Crimea, the black-earth region and part of the Caucasus, including its oil-fields. The Russians and Ukrainians within this German colony were to be treated, in accordance with Aryan racial principles, as Untermenschen (sub-humans); they would receive only basic education and agricultural training with a view to turning them into a nation of slaves... some forty million Soviet citizens would need to be eliminated in the proposed 'colonial' regions; this would be achieved by 'natural means,' namely famine."

German and American concentration camps during World War II have been so extensively documented as to require little comment here, except to say that one aspect of the Jewish Holocaust has been little spoken of: Allied culpability. Quoting Aarons and Loftus in Unholy Trinity: The Vatican, the Nazis, and Soviet Intelligence:

"In April 1943, a conference of British and American officials formally decided that nothing should be done about the Holocaust, and 'ruled out all plans for mass rescue.' The Foreign Office and the State Department were both afraid that the Third Reich would be quite willing, indeed eager, to stop the gas chambers, empty the concentration camps, and let hundreds of thousands (if not millions) of Jewish survivors emigrate to freedom in the West. As late as 1943 the British Foreign Office 'revealed in confidence' to the State Department their fear that if approaches to Germany were 'pressed too much that is exactly what might happen.'

"The bigoted reality behind the Secret Report of the Easter 1943 Bermuda Conference was that not a single Allied nation wanted to let the Jews settle in their country. The unspoken consensus was that it was better to let Hitler handle them than arrange a mass evacuation to America, Britain, or Canada. In short, the Jews were expendable to the war effort."

Allied abuse of German prisoners after the conclusion of the war has been little spoken of and is another instance that puts the lie to the lily-white image that the Allies, as victors and authors of most of the history books, were able to promote.

James Bacque, researching a book about war resistance, delved into records of the American prisoner of war camps located in Germany after World War H. While official records state that the casualty rate in American camps was under two percent, in researching original records Bacque found that there had been a deliberate cover-up. Using the statistics listed in the Army's weekly Prisoner of War and Disarmed Enemy Forces ledger, Bacque was able to determine that the annual death rate of German prisoners in American camps was 33%. Records showed that General (later President) Eisenhower had also intentionally redesignated German "prisoners of war" (protected by the Geneva Convention) to "disarmed enemy forces" (with unprotected status). The story is detailed in his book, Other Losses, only recently released in America.

A parallel to the genocidal themes of Alternative 3 is the King Alfred Plan, a "contingency plan" and "final solution" for the black population of America. The Plan, comprising part of the 1967 novel The Man Who Cried I Am by John Williams, has for years circulated among conspiracy researchers. Jim Jones, it is said, insisted it was a factual secret document.

The King Alfred Plan begins, "In the event of widespread and continuing and coordinated racial disturbances in the United States, King Alfred, at the discretion of the President, is to be put into action immediately," with participating agencies being the National Security Council, the Department of Justice, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Department of Defense, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the Department of the Interior, along with National Guard units, state police, city police and county police participating.

Under the plan, the United States is divided into ten national regions and, in the case of national emergency, minorities "will be evacuated from the cities by federalized national guard units, local and state police and, if necessary, by units of the Regular Armed Forces..."

The plan concludes in a grim, science fictional manner highly reminiscent of Alternative 3: "'O' Committee Report: Survey shows that, during a six-year period, Production created 9,000,000 objects, or 1,5000,000 each year. Production could not dispose of the containers, which proved a bottleneck. However, that was almost 20 years ago. We suggest that vaporization techniques be employed to overcome the Production problems inherent in KING ALFRED. - Secretary of Defense."

While in all probability a fictional document, there is no doubt that John Williams was responding to and protesting the genocidal mentality of the rulers of this country and this world in a book perhaps not different in purpose than Alternative 3.

U.S. government document H.R. 4079 cannot be defended as fictional. Introduced in the House of Representatives in 1990, this bill may give some idea of what the Powers That Be have in store for those of us not fortunate enough to belong to such select cliques as the Round Table or Skull and Bones.

Introduced by Congressman Newt Gingrich and Senator Phil Gramm, H.R. 4079 reads:

"Guided by the principles that energized and sustained the mobilization of World War II, and in order to remove violent criminals from the streets and meet the extraordinary threat that is posed to the nation by the trafficking of illegal drugs, the Congress declares the existence of a National Drug and Crime Emergency beginning on the date of enactment of the act and ending on the date that is five years after the date of enactment of this bill."

The bill goes on for 96 pages to propose draconian repression in the name of the War on Drugs, although we must remember that they are referring here only to certain drugs such as marijuana and cocaine, whose manufacturers are not the beneficiaries of visible government subsidies such as those given to the far more lethal tobacco industry.

In complete disregard for the niceties of the U.S. Constitution and the Bill of Rights, the bill provides for the arrest of large numbers of people merely suspected of drug usage or drug dealing, and once arrested the suspected individuals would be incarcerated in one of many forced labor camps, including tent cities. All Constitutional rights would be suspended upon arrest and there would be no provisions for humane housing and treatment Those convicted of drug usage or trafficking would receive harsh mandatory sentences, without possibility of parole, up to and including the death penalty. The assets of those convicted of dealing would be forfeited, and the people who turned them in would receive a portion of those assets as a bounty.

The bill stipulates that the usual laws regarding search warrants, illegally obtained evidence and coerced confessions would be suspended, in the name of this “War.” In addition, all federal limitations on drug testing of individuals would be removed.

As well as “drug traffickers” the bill explicitly targets all “violent criminals,” defining such as “Every person who is convicted in a federal court of a crime of violence against a person or a drug trafficking felony, other than simple possession.” The bill describes the term “crime of violence against a person” as “a federal offense that is a felony and has as an element the use, attempted use or threatened use of physical force against the person of another.”

The effect of a bill such as H.R. 4079 (and similar ones crop up frequently in Congress) would be to create a Metropolis-like sub-society of criminalized worker drones — Alternative 3 sans the Martian landscape. If the government and its masters are currently addicted to sucking the lifeblood of the “masses” via income taxation and other means, think of the expanse of their greed when legally permitted to incarcerate large segments (I mean larger segments) of the populace into profitable slave labor camps.

While viewed almost universally as an example of a power-crazed religious nut leading his followers to mass suicide, there is much about Jim Jones and Jonestown that suggests this was not the entirety of the story — that the “mass suicide” at Jonestown was not the accident it has been portrayed as. John Judge’s research has provided the primary source for the information about Jonestown which follows.

Tent evangelist Jim Jones migrated to Brazil in 1961, ostensibly on a mission to minister to the downtrodden. During Jones’ stay, transportion and food were provided by the U.S. embassy, for unspecified reasons, and at the time Jones confided to local residents that he was working for Naval Intelligence. Dan Mitrione, a lifetime friend of Jones who worked with the CIA providing interrogation and torture techniques to Third World police forces, accompanied him at that time.

Returning to the United States after the completion of his mission in Brazil, Jones established the People’s Temple in Ukiah, California, with electric fences, armed guards and guard dogs. While in Ukiah, Jones made connections with many influential people, including some who were involved in the military and clandestine agencies. During this period journalist Kathy Hunter reported seven deaths of Temple members who had tried to leave the compound; Hunter was to die later under unusual circumstances. Jones mobilized his followers to help elect Moscone as Mayor of San Francisco, and the Mayor reciprocated by appointing Jones head of the San Francisco Housing Commission — one of the darker bits of humor I've run across lately. Many of Jones' followers were hired by the San Francisco Welfare Department, where it was easy to recruit large numbers of the poor and homeless for Jones' "church."

Throughout his career, many of Jones' top associates and contributors had connections to the spy community. Richard Dwyer, CIA operative and Deputy Chief of Mission for the U.S. Embassy in Guyana, was present at Jonestown — apparently in a friendly capacity — immediately prior to the grisly end. On tapes that record the massacre, Jones can be heard shouting, "Get Dwyer out of here!" By his own admission Dwyer was observed "stripping the dead" of wallets and other effects. John Burke, who Philip Agee indicates has worked for the CIA since 1963, attempted to prevent Congressman Ryan from investigating Jonestown. In addition to obstructing Ryan in his investigation of human rights violations at Jonestown, the American embassy in Guyana routinely provided Jones with copies of all Congressional inquiries about Jonestown filed under the Freedom of Information Act.

Lawrence Layton and his family were major financial backers of Jones, furnishing him with hundreds of thousands of dollars. Layton was Chief of Chemical and Ecological Warfare Research at Dugway Proving Grounds in Utah and was later Director of Missile and Satellite Development at the Navy Propellant Division at Indian Head, Maryland. Dugway Proving Grounds, interestingly enough, has been circumstantially connected to cattle mutilations, disease biowarfare, and genetics experimentation. Layton's wife's fortune came in part from I.G. Farben, the key Nazi cartel, and the Laytons' daughter was married to George Phillip Blakey, who had extensive holdings in Solvay Drugs, a division of I.G. Blakey contributed financing to Jones and was reported to have participated in other shadowy schemes, such as moving mercenaries from Jonestown to CIA-supported UNITAS forces in Angola.

The Guyana site for Jonestown has several unusual characteristics. It is a rich location for a variety of minerals, and has been the site of much mining activity. Plans to populate the area with cheap labor go back to at least 1919. Charles Garry, a lawyer for Peoples Temple (along with Mark Lane) said that Jones and Jonestown were "literally sitting on a gold mine," and mineralogical reports confirm the statement.

It may be illuminating to recall that Jonestown was built during the time of the CIA program M-K-Ultra and that the "target populaces" of this program, including blacks, prisoners, and women, are a precise statement of the population mix at Jonestown — excluding the white male overseers.

When black members of the Temple arrived in Guyana they were bound and gagged and taken to the compound. While local inhabitants were aware of the whites living in the area and saw them in the course of their daily activities, they never saw the majority black population.

Once locked in the compound, the blacks were worked 16-18 hours per day, with rations consisting of rice, bread and on occasion, it is said, tainted meat. All of the camp overseers were white (whereas 80% of Jonestown's populace was black), and most were male. They were armed and enforced work and prevented escape. These overseers, according to researcher John Judge, were not among the dead, and no attempt has been made to locate or to prosecute them.

Although the camp doctor at Jonestown kept meticulous notes and records of drugs administered, all of his records disappeared. After the massacre enough drugs were found in the compound to have drugged 200,000 individuals for a year, this supposedly having been stockpiled as medication for a population of 1,100 persons. 11,000 doses of Thorazine were found in camp stores, as well as sodium pentathol, chloral hydrate, thalium, haliopparael and largatil, these being tranquilizers or other psychoactive drugs.

$500,000 was moved out of Jonestown shortly before the mass murder or suicide, whatever it was. Michael Prokes, who carried the money, later shot himself at a press conference, where he claimed that he was an FBI agent.

The initial news coverage issued from the scene of the tragedy said that 400 people had died in a mass suicide, and that 700 had escaped into the jungle. Later reports said that 913 had died. During the first press conference it was claimed that the reason for the discrepancy was that the Guyanese who had done the initial investigation "could not count."

The cause of the deaths reported by Dr. Mootoo, a Guyanese pathologist, was not cyanide, as the American press had reported. The victims showed none of the signs of cyanide poisoning, such as the "cyanide rictus." Mootoo found needle marks on the necks of 80-90% of the victims, and came to the conclusion that all but two of the victims had been murdered, and had not, as the press reported, committed suicide.

The Jonestown bodies were delivered to the United States after excessive delay and in states of decomposition that made autopsy impossible. All identification had been stripped from the bodies (by order of the CFR's Zbigniew Brezezinsky, the order communicated by Lt. Col. Gordon Dum-ner, later the Deputy Director of the CIA) and there were official complaints that military coroners were performing illegal cremations.

There are questions as to whether Jim Jones really died at Jonestown, although none of these have surfaced in the mainstream press. Identifying chest tattoos do not show up on morgue photos of Jones, and the face of the corpse is unrecognizable due to the degree of decomposition. The FBI checked the corpse's fingerprints twice in the course of their investigation, although they did not consult dental records. At the time of the massacre, Jones' finances were enormous, with estimates running from $26 million to $2 billion. He had also been known to employ doubles.

Joyce Shaw, a Temple director, described Jonestown as "some kind of horrible government experiments, or some sort of sick racial thing, a plan like that of the Germans to exterminate the blacks." Joseph Holsinger, an aide to Leo Ryan, was even more explicit: "[The] possibility is that Jonestown was a mass mind-control experiment by the CIA as part of its M-K-Ultra program."

The question is obvious: were the people of Jonestown a 'batch consignment'?

11

The Depopulation Bomb

There is a solution other than cyanide to what the elite consider excess population. Why not prevent the poor — for the sake of argument, let us venture a conservative 99% of the world's population — from having children altogether, or if that isn't possible, at least vastly slow their birth rates?

"Eugenics" is a term coined in the latter part of the 19th century by Englishman Francis Galton to describe the "science" of bettering human stock and the elimination of unwanted characteristics... and individuals. Galton proposed societal intervention for the furtherance of "racial quality," maintaining that "Jews are specialized for a parasitical existence upon other nations" and that "except by sterilization I cannot yet see any way of checking the produce of the unfit who are allowed their liberty and are below the reach of moral control."

A survey of eugenics in action begins with isolated incidents such as the sterilization of mentally ill by American health officials in the late 1800s and the castration of children at the Pennsylvania Training School for Feebleminded Children in 1889. The movement quickly picked up momentum.

Formally established as a study at University College in London in 1904, the first laboratory for the study of subject was constructed by Charles B. Davenport at Cold Springs Harbor on Long Island (which, perhaps significantly, was also the location of the estates of both the Dulles brothers, as well as being the current headquarters of the Human Genome Organization for DNA mapping). The institution was funded in excess of $11 million by the Harrimans and Rockefellers.

Supported in America by the Eastern Establishment, eugenics was nurtured in the hotbeds of Round Table-influenced philosophy, at Harvard, Columbia, and Cornell. The subject was popularized in Germany by Ernst Haeckel, who linked romantic German nature mysticism and the unity of the Volk with clinical bio-policies later instituted by Hitler.

Haeckel believed that there was no unity among the species of mankind, since "the morphological differences between two generally recognized species — for example sheep and goats — are much less important than those... between a Hottentot and a man of the Teutonic race." In the Aryan race Haeckel saw a "symmetry of all parts, and that equal development, which we call the type of perfect human beauty." He also believed the "wooly-haired" peoples "incapable of a true inner culture or of a higher mental development... no wooly-haired nation has ever had an important history."

Haeckel felt the purpose of the nation state was to enforce selective breeding, praising the practices of the Spartans who killed all but "perfectly healthy and strong children" and thus were "continually in excellent strength and vigor."

In 1906 a group of Haeckel's academic followers formed the influential Monist League, agitating for a German government patterned along social Darwinian lines.

By 1907 in America, Indiana passed compulsory sterilization for the mentally ill and other "undesirables," while 475 males received vasectomies at the Indiana State Reformatory.

In 1912 the First International Congress of Eugenics was held in London, including among its directors Winston Churchill, Alexander Graham Bell, Charles Elliot (President emeritus of Harvard University), and David Starr Jordan (President of Stanford University).

The National Conference on Race Betterment was convened in the United States in 1914, while by 1917 fifteen American states had eugenics laws on the books, almost all of them legalizing the sterilization of habitual criminals, epileptics, the insane, and the retarded.

H.H. Laughlin, the Expert Eugenics Agent of the U.S. House of Representatives Committee on Immigration and Naturalization presented a Model Eugenical Sterilization Law in 1922. This was to provide the basis for many state eugenics laws, as well as for eugenics law in Nazi Germany.

In 1928 the American Eugenics Society sponsored a contest for essays on the causes of decline in Nordic fertility, while Dr. Robie, at the Third International Congress of Eugenics, called for the sterilization of 14,000,000 Americans with low intelligence scores.

The Nazi party in Germany passed in 1933 the "Law for the Prevention of Hereditary Diseases in Posterity," also known as the "Sterilization Law," written by Professor Ernst Rudin, one of the country's leading psychiatrists. "Hereditary Health Courts" were formed, and within three years two hundred and twenty-five thousand German "undesirables" had been sterilized.

Hitler's policies have been characterized as "a rather straightforward form of German social Darwinism." Far from being original with him, his policies were expansions upon already-extant political and scientific culture.

By 1939 German policies had evolved to include euthanasia upon asylum inmates while eugenics concepts were implemented to the fullest in Nazi concentration camps during World War II.

In 1942, U.S. psychiatrist Foster Kennedy recommended the killing of retarded children. During the three-year period between 1941-1943 over 42,000 people were sterilized in America.

After World War II the idea of "eugenics" was tainted in the public mind by its association with Nazism. The term was discarded and a facelift was performed on its parent study psychiatry, which resulted in the establishment of the World Federation of Mental Health (WFMH). Since then, this group has continued to support electroshock, lobotomization, mind control and other activities already detailed, as well as employing within its ranks many German practitioners who had been happy to further Hitlerian goals during the Second World War.

What this brief survey shows is something the popular press has chosen to ignore: that eugenics programs were not the invention of mad Nazi scientists, but that the political climate of Germany allowed a full implementation of programs part and parcel of international psychiatry and medicine. Eugenics, from its beginning, was encouraged and financed by the rich, self-styled "aristocrats" of the day.

Recent programs aimed at abortion and other methods of depopulation can be traced to essentially the same Freemasonic/Round Table/Rothschild-spawned crowd; to the studies of the Club of Rome, the Trilateral Commission, and to the CFR. These groups influenced a change in U.S. policies specifically during 1966-67, when population control was adopted by the State Department as a stated goal.

The recent world depopulation push retains the flavor of eugenics biopolicy of the first half of this century in the statements of advocates such as the Eastern Establishment's Sargent Shriver, speaking before the Congressional Select Committee on Population in 1978: "...this Committee's interest [is] in improving the quality of life and enhancing the biological product of this society; rather than just controlling or limiting births."

Jaffe and Dryfoos of the federally-funded Guttmacher Institute have stated that, “With the overall decline in fertility in the United States, concern has shifted from numbers of births to insuring that those children being born have fewer physical, social, and economic handicaps.”

It is odd that little mention of “the overall decline in fertility” finds its way into the Rockefeller-subsidized literature of depopulation activists. Nor was the fact that teenage pregnancy was at its lowest ebb in forty years brought up when federally mandated family planning and sex education in schools was enacted in 1978.

Studies have shown that sex education classes increase early sexual experimentation while doing nothing to reduce adolescent pregnancy. It has also been demonstrated that when such classes are discontinued, as in Utah in 1980, the incidence of teenage pregnancy decreases. Still, officials insist sex classes should extend from “kindergarten throughout a person’s entire educational career.” Why? Originators and administrators of the programs candidly admit that their agenda includes depopulation and eugenics.

Lester Kirkendall, a founder of the Sex Information and Education Council, wrote in 1965 that, “sex education is... clearly tied in a socially significant way to family planning and population limitation and policy...” Dr. Jane Hodgson, at the National Abortion Federation conference in 1980, was even more forthright, calling for compulsory abortion for pregnant teenagers.

The methods of sex education programs in public schools vary, but uniformly emphasize the huge expense and drawbacks of having kids, providing summaries of methods of contraception, sterilization, and abortion. Students are often taken on tours of birth control clinics, where they meet the staff, fill out patients’ forms, and are assured of the confidentiality of services. Children are also recruited as depopulation activists with pitches informing them, as in the widely-used text Meeting Yourself Halfway:

“The population problem is very serious and involves every country on this planet. What steps would you encourage to help resolve the problem?

“...volunteer to organize birth-control information centers throughout the country;

“...join a pro-abortion lobbying group;

“...encourage the limitation of two children per family and have the parents sterilized to prevent future births.”

Much of sex education literature portrays the nuclear family — long a cohesive political and social glue among the populace - as obsolete and statistically insignificant, while the normalcy of homosexuality and bachelorism (“Playboyism”) is stressed. Children are encouraged to report in detail on conditions at home, to report parental shortcomings, and to divulge disagreements they have with their parents, opening the door to intervention by "social services."

Davis in Economic Development and Cultural Change says that an effective strategy in lowering the birth rate is to "lessen... the identity of children with parents, or lessen... the likelihood that this identity will be satisfying," adding that certain trends that might bring population levels down are "very high divorce rates, homosexuality, pornography and free sexual unions..." Davis sees a positive note in "the child welfare services, which have increasingly tended to displace the father as a necessary member of the family, and the health services which have increasingly flouted parental authority with respect to contraception and abortion." This "flouting of parental authority" is a familiar theme in sex education classes, which repeatedly emphasize the child's independence from their parents and their ability to make decisions for themselves.

The message to children, provided by proponents of sex education without the courtesy of having the parents agree upon it, is obvious: the world is awash in excess poor population, and something has to be done about it in a hurry, starting at the nearest abortion clinic.

Educator John Taylor Gatto, voted New York's Top Teacher of 1991, further comments on the mechanism:

"Social machinery to suppress proliferation of systematic families... has two components: one, a campaign aimed at family-formation before it commences, employing such tactics as encouragement of personal greed (best enjoyed in bachelor style, of course), public pornographic celebrations of the body parts of nubile young women, effortless divorce, mass adoption, tolerance of sexual ambiguity, and many similar tactics. The second component aims at producing pseudo-families: small households (whether biologic or synthetic) without any overriding loyalty to the common family cause. Instead, these are associations of expedience wearing the costume of affection and concern, but always on the lookout for a better deal... During the childhood phase, parents in pseudo-families are made use of by the state to transmit certain values, to maintain and discipline a new serf class composed of their own children, and to report radical cases of deviance to medical, police and re-training authorities... It is a system infused in many places with such black genius in understanding crowd control it is hard not to stand in awe of its unseen architects."

Target populations for sterilization in the United States bear noting. According to Michael Garrity in Trilateralism, edited by Holly Sklar, American Indian women are being sterilized unbeknownst to them or against their wishes in public health clinics nationwide. Garrity also maintains, "Full blooded Indian women are the special target of the doctors."

Ruthann Evanoff, in "Reproductive Rights and Occupational Health" in WIN, has said that, "Overall, at least 25 percent of the Native women of childbearing age have been sterilized, although the total population numbers less than one million. Recent reports estimate that the percentage sterilized in one tribe alone, the Northern Cheyenne, is close to 80 percent."

The secret (now declassified) paper NSSM 200, "Implications of Worldwide Population Growth For U.S. Security and Overseas Interests," also known as the Scowcroft Document (authored by the CFR's Brent Scowcroft), gives insight into U.S. government plans for population reduction internationally, linking these plans to goals that have very little to do with alleviating human suffering, and everything to do with the maximization of profit.

Prepared in 1974 for the National Security Council (and remember, this is a government document, although one not likely to be offered for free in late night Public Service Announcements) NSSM 200 proposes means for the reduction of worldwide population by "concentration on key [i.e. Third World] countries," with the stated goal of reduction of population growth rate from an annual 2 percent growth to 1.7 percent.

While this might sound like an altruistic goal proposed by clear-sighted social stewards, intended to reduce suffering in countries with marginal standards of living, the study makes it clear that government interest in depopulation has nothing to do with concern for living standards in developing countries. It is because "The United States has become increasingly dependent on mineral imports from developing countries" and "endemic famine, food riots, and breakdown of social order... are scarcely conducive to systematic exploration for mineral deposits or the long-term investments necessary for their exploitation." Note that the breakdown of "social order" referred to consists of the populace revolting against their living conditions.

One of the conclusions of the study is that "mandatory [emphasis added] population control measures" may be "appropriate."

Speaking of depopulation programs currently being implemented in the Third World, former Brazilian health minister Carlos Santana said, "The World Bank, through the reports of its Presidents, has always made its proselytizing for a rigid birth control policy explicit." Santana reported that included in World Bank credit packages and investment in Third World countries is an implicit agenda of depopulation, and questioned why Brazil was targeted for birth reduction, with approximately forty per cent of Brazilian women having been already sterilized.

What the depopulators omit saying is that in Brazil most of the depopulation programs are being directed toward the native population, and that they are implementing an alternative program to the pistoleiros hired to attack small landowning families, appropriating the land for the use of large cash-croppers and the international conglomerates that are stripping the country bare.

Depopulation programs run worldwide are directed and funded by major international money interests, including McGeorge Bundy of the CFR, the architect of nuclear Mutual Assured Destruction policy; Warren E. Buffett, the second wealthiest man in the United States; and, ubiquitous when it comes to eugenics funding, the Rockefellers.

Planned Parenthood Federation of America and International Planned Parenthood Federation are Buffett-funded and run a huge abortion and sterilization network worldwide, with one subsidiary, the Brazilian Society for Family Welfare, having over 2,500 outlets in that country.

While, at first glance depopulation programs may seem like a good idea to promote the reduction of mouths-to-feed worldwide, what they ignore are the root causes of overpopulation. High birth rates are the direct result of poor living standards of the areas, and in countries where malnutrition has been reduced and the incidence of child-death lowered, birth rates have also lessened. The Third World (in particular) is being forcefully relieved of natural resources and exploited for cheap labor, and is in fact no doubt seen by elite landowners and major corporations as only maintaining maximum profitability as long as it is kept in abject poverty.

“The strategy of underdevelopment” is the term used by agricultural economist Harry Cleaver. Rather than offering the people in countries such as Brazil, in actuality one of the richest countries in the world, an equitable portion of profits made through the use of their resources, they are manipulated (when not killed outright) and kept at the razor edge between starvation and profitability.

Depopulation organizations propagandize that we are experiencing a crisis of epic proportions; that the world is reaching the point where it can no longer support the number of people living on it. In many instances economists, however, doubt this conclusion, suggesting that an increase in population may in fact be economically beneficial, and tending to a long-term increase of arable land and per capita (rather than per corporation) income. Also noted is a current usage of approximately three-tenths of one percent of the planet’s surface for human habitation, an amount sustainable with no limit to growth in sight.

United Nations and U.S. Department of Agriculture statistics show that world food production has increased more rapidly than population growth in recent years, while Colin Clark, former director of the Agricultural Economic Institute of Oxford University has stated that farmers could currently support seven times the current population of the Earth, or twenty-one times the current population at Japanese standards of food consumption.

Roger Revelle, former director of the Harvard Center for Population Studies estimates that current agricultural resources could provide an adequate diet for eight times the current populace, i.e. forty billion individuals, and has estimated that Africa is capable of feeding ten times its current population. Revelle quotes Dr. David Hopper, another agricultural expert:

"The world's food problem does not arise from any physical limitation on potential output or any danger of unduly stressing the environment. The limitations on abundance are to be found in the social and political structures of nations and in the economic relations among them. The unexploited global food resource is there, between Cancer and Capricorn. The successful husbandry of that resource depends on the will and actions of men." Hopper pronounces "world fascism" very politely.

Francis Moore Lappe of the Institute for Food and Development Policy maintains:

"If the cause of hunger is neither scarcity of food, nor scarcity of land, we've come to see that it's a scarcity of democracy. That may sound rather contrived, because in the West we tend to think of democracy as a political concept and not as an economic concept. But democracy is really a principle of accountability; in other words, those making the decisions must be accountable to those who are affected by them. Once we understand hunger as a scarcity of democracy, what we are saying is that from the village level to the level of international commerce, fewer and fewer people are making decisions, and more and more anti-democratic structures are being entrenched. This is the cause of hunger." And, it should be repeated, the cause of overpopulation.

12

A Modest Proposal

The early and highly influential eugenicist and Round Tabler George Bernard Shaw offered a modest proposal in 1951:

"If a Black Death could spread throughout the world once in every generation, survivors could procreate freely without making the world too full... The state of affairs might be somewhat unpleasant, but what of it?"

Substantial evidence exists that AIDS was created as a custom-tailored Black Death, although nary a word of such a suspicion appears in the mainstream press.

In 1969, in testimony before the House Appropriations Committee of the U.S. Congress, the Department of Defense's Biological Warfare Division requested $10 million to produce organisms that would selectively destroy the immune system. Quoting from the Committee's minutes, "Within the next 5 to 10 years it would probably be possible to make a new infective microorganism which could differ in certain important respects from any known disease-causing organisms. Most important of these is that it might be refractory to the immunological and therapeutic processes upon which we depend to maintain our relative freedom from infectious disease."

The requested funds were appropriated.

Also in 1969, a portion of the Army's Fort Detrick Biological Warfare Laboratory was transformed into the Frederick Cancer Research Facility and given to, supposedly, the National Cancer Institute for civilian research. "Within two years of its foundation," according to Coven Action Information Bulletin, "the Institute's staff and budget had trebled."

In 1972, in volume 47 of the Bulletin of the World Health Organization, there was a request by members of that group to make a virus that would selectively destroy the T cell system. “An attempt should be made to ascertain whether viruses can in fact exert selective effects on immune function, e.g. by... affecting T cell function as opposed to B cell function. The possibility should also be looked into that the immune response to the virus itself may be impaired if the infecting virus damages more or less selectively the cells responding to the viral antigens.”

In Federation Proceedings of the WHO that same year, it was remarked that “we would test these agents that we make by putting it in our vaccines and see what kind of effects they have.”

A disease corresponding to the requested characteristics, which we know today as AIDS, did appear within the stipulated period of time. Dr. Robert Strecker reports that the disease appeared in Africa in precisely the same locales that the WHO group said they planned to administer vaccines, and this is supported by an article in the London Times for May 11, 1987.

Researcher Waves Forest, in his article “Designer Diseases: AIDS as Biological and Psychological Warfare” writes that, “The AIDS epidemic emerged full-blown in the three U.S cities with ‘organized gay communities’ before being reported elsewhere, including Haiti or Africa, so it is epidemiologically impossible for either of those countries to be the origin point for the U.S. infections.

“Another indication that AIDS had multiple origin points is that the 14-month doubling time of the disease cannot nearly account for the current number of cases if we assume only a small number of initial infections starting in the late 1970s.”

Dr. Strecker relates that AIDS experts have written that “the AIDS virus consists of genes that are related to two known retro-viruses of animals. One is a virus named bovine leukemia, another is a virus named visna.” Yet, he points out, these same specialists claim there is no way that these two viruses could have been spliced together.

Dr. Strecker and Dr. Allan Cantwell, testing the claim, went to a medical library and asked the computer to show any available articles on a virus named — taking a wild guess: bovine visna — and, “bang!,” they said, “out came articles describing a virus identical to the AIDS virus.”

“It had the same morphology (shape), the same molecular weight, the same magnesium dependency, it has the same ability to kill cells, it has the same T cell tropism (it attacks T cells), it has the same exact characteristics in cattle that AIDS does in humans. It produced a disease in cows, characterized by initial lymphomamphy within a few weeks of initial infection, followed by the production of antibodies against that virus, and subsequently, 5-7 years later, the cows died of a wasting disease — and immune deficiency.”

Quoting Waves Forest again, “Apparently, homosexuals were an initial target in the U.S. because their sexual practices would help in the rapid spread of the disease, and because it was correctly assumed that very few non-homosexual citizens would pay much attention during the early years of the epidemic. Also, the stigma of ‘homosexual disease’ would interfere with a rational analysis and discussion of AIDS.”

A chilling development in the continuing AIDS controversy was reported in The Santa Monica Outlook for December 14, 1989. The RAND Corporation, a CIA-funded organization which will be mentioned again in these pages, issued a warning about the nastiest computer ‘virus’ yet unleashed upon computer users. The virus had been incorporated, by persons unknown, into a computer disk providing a database for AIDS information. Once let loose in a computer system, it erased every file on AIDS.

Ann Shohen of RAND said workers in AIDS research might have their databases totally destroyed by the virus, and it could infect any computer system networking with such researchers.

John McAfee, chairman of Computer Virus Association, a Santa Monica firm developing anti-virus programs, described the contaminated AIDS disk as part of “a well-orchestrated and undeniably well-financed terrorist act.”

Regardless of whether the AIDS epidemic is man-made, regardless of whether the RAND Corporation is covering its own tracks in the interest of plausible denial, this computer virus seems to fit the agendas of certain elitist interests and could well be evidence of continuing efforts to keep AIDS on target in plans for world depopulation.

13

Veins and Tributaries

Another method of genocide and mind control currently being practiced is chemical warfare — by drugs — upon the population of the world. The picture is not the simple "good cops vs. evil heroin pushers in the schoolyard" equation that the mainstream media would have us believe.

Drug dealing is no new thing, although historical precedents are rarely examined in understanding the problem.

In 1601 the Jesuits established a mission in Beijing, China, providing contacts for the Portuguese and later the Dutch to native drug trading routes in the East, with the Dutch negotiating an opium monopoly for the northern part of the Indian subcontinent. The British East India Company established trade in opium and slaves after opening an office in Canton, China, and when Bengal was made a Crown Colony in 1757 "John Company" expanded its trade in close collaboration with the British crown and Rothschild bankers. In the 1860 siege of Beijing the British (under the direction of Prime Minister Lord Palmerston, at the time the world head of the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry) forced the opening of the drug trade. Britain's admitted policy of "sapping the vitality" of China via opium trafficking to its population provides an early example of chemical-psychological warfare.

After the opening of Chinese ports, the British-owned Hong Kong and Shanghai Corporation was established, in a policy of breaking British East India interests into individual and difficult-to-trace assets. The Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank to this day remains connected to the laundering and internal flow of international drug monies, with the management of much of drug financing and shipment allegedly supervised from on high by denizens of the Royal Institute of International Affairs (a front for the Round Table group) and the British Secret Service. The historical policy of British overlords using drugs to decimate the Chinese culture oddly hearkens to the realities of today.

In America, John Jacob Astor was the first to exploit the lucrative possibilities of Chinese opium, with other Anglophile "Boston Brahmin" families following suit. Prohibition was also planned by these interests, with the Temperance movement financially sponsored by the Astors, Vanderbilts, Rockefellers, and Warburgs, the latter linked to the Rothschilds by marriage.

Prohibition vastly increased the profitability of alcohol and drugs, supplied through British networks with distilleries in Scotland and Canada and opium refineries in Shanghai and Hong Kong. During Prohibition, liquor and drug shipments were supplied by British interests and transported to America via the Canadian Bronfman gang (who have since attained respectability as the owners of Seagrams, America's largest liquor distributor, and by membership in the Knights of Malta) with American distribution performed by the networks of mobsters Arnold Rothstein, Meyer Lansky and Lucky Luciano. The United Fruit Company, owned jointly by the Lansky Mafia and Boston Brahmins, has been identified by American intelligence as historically one of the major transporters of drugs into the United States.

Alfred McCoy in his The Politics of Heroin states that at the end of World War II "with American consumer demand reduced to its lowest point in fifty years and the international syndicates in disarray, the U.S. government had a unique opportunity to eliminate heroin addiction as a major American social problem. However, instead of delivering the deathblow to these criminal syndicates, the U.S. Government — through the Central Intelligence Agency and its wartime predecessor, the OSS — created a situation that made it possible for the Sicilian-American Mafia and the Corsican underworld to revive the international narcotics traffic."

What assisted the revival of the heroin traffic in this century was a secret Franklin Roosevelt alliance with the Mafia's Meyer Lansky, providing immunity for Lansky's smuggling operations in exchange for protection of the Eastern seaboard during World War II and, later, in the wresting of control of the French docks from Socialist unions. As part of the deal, Lucky Luciano was released from prison after World War II, and quickly proceeded to set up a base of operations for heroin smuggling in Cuba, later turning over the reins to Santos Trafficante, in Miami.

Elsewhere, in the CIA's support for "Nationalist" China, they supplied Chaiang Kai-Shek's Kuomintang (KMT) with arms and supplies for their stronghold in Burma. There CIA-allied General Phao built up the opium trade as a source of funding the KMT, with arms flown into Burma and opium flown out by the CIA's Air America. In a Congressional investigation of the heroin trade, Joe Nellis stated: "The CIA did help bring some very powerful cheap heroin into Vietnam out of the Shan States, the northern states of Burma... for radio communications, intelligence. In return for that intelligence, the CIA winked at what went in its airplanes."

Air America has hardly been the CIA's only involvement in fostering the international drug trade. The Nugan-Hand Bank was started by CIA agent Michael Jon Hand and employed Dulles colleague General Edwin F. Black, retired CIA Director William Colby, former deputy CIA Director Walter McDonald, and Kissinger and Brzezinski advisor Guy Pauker on its payroll. Nugan-Hand seems to have largely existed through the laundering of drug monies, as a tributary flowing into a central drug laundering connection, the British-owned Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank. Nugan-Hand even had an office located in Chaiang Mai, a rural town in Thailand known as the last outpost for travellers into the "Golden Triangle." Conveniently, the Nugan-Hand office was located in the same office, in the same suite, as the Chaiang Mai branch of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency.

The Nugan-Hand Bank was involved in a number of unusual deals, including the financing of the Rhodesian government of Ian Smith, in which 250,000 whites ruled millions of vote-less blacks, and a similar situation in the Portuguese colonial government in Angola. Nugan-Hand also worked with the CIA in the overthrowing by coup d'etat of Australian Prime Minister Gough Whitlam in 1975 — reported by the Australian press to have been done on the instructions of Henry Kissinger.

Although the flow of drugs and drug monies at the retail level is labyrinthine, it proceeds to central hubs. Drug trade is absolutely integrated into and props up international banking, government and secret societies, with clandestine agencies and police forces providing the enforcement and sometimes transportation arms of these operations.

Chase Manhattan's International Advisory Board Chairman Kissinger was the author of the plan to raise international interest rates to 20% in 1979, putting the screws to Ibero American debtors to the International Monetary Fund and encouraging them to change over to a drug economy. The former foreign minister of Guyana, Frederick Wills, described it this way:

"The countries hope that by getting the IMF seal of approval, this will open the gates for credit from other countries and private banks. But the IMF seal of approval requires successful acceptance of the IMF program. And since you didn't succeed, the flow of funds from money markets and banks is dried up. This means that, first of all, the government ministers started to think that, 'What export could we have which could realize quick cash flow, to stem this balance of payments gap?' There is only one commodity that satisfies that requirement: dope, heroin, marijuana."

One discernible link of the drug trade with the U.S. government is the illegal Contra supply operations run by then-Vice President George Bush under National Security Decision Directive 3 during the 1980s. Shipments of guns for the Contras were smuggled by known drug traffickers, who in turn (known or unknown to Bush) brought back thousands of kilos of cocaine to the United States, some of them transported through Homestead Air Force Base near Miami, Florida. If the principals in the operation, people like then-V.P. Bush, Colonel North, Admiral Poindexter, and Major General Secord (also a player in Nugan-Hand) were not receiving a portion of the profits, then it must have been a case of the government "winking at what went into its airplanes."

Notified in many instances of drug trafficking, the Reagan and Bush administrations often acted to block investigations and prosecution. The invasion of Panama, presented to the public as an intervention intended to stop the drug trafficking of world-class outlaw Manuel Noriega, takes on the complexion of a turf war when one learns that George Bush quickly installed Guillermo "Porky" Endara in the Panamanian presidency after Noriega was dethroned. Endara was co-owner, with drug lord Rodriguez Gacha, of the money-laundering Banco Interoceanico, as well as the owner of the ship Sea Point, caught twice in shipments of cocaine and Israeli arms. Installed as President, Attorney General, President of the Supreme Court, and Minister of the Treasury were members on the board of First Interamericas Bank, earlier closed by Noriega after he had received proof that the bank was owned by the Cali Cartel.

The Washington Post has characterized American government actions in Panama as an alliance with the Cali Cartel against the Medellin Cartel. Not as improbable as it might seem when one discovers that the director of the Office of International Affairs of the U.S. Justice Department, Michael Abbell, is reported to be a registered Washington lobbyist for the Cali Cartel.

And since the overthrow and silencing of Noriega, drug trafficking in Panama has only increased.

One will never understand the significance of international drug trafficking unless it is seen for what it is: a major world industry. Drugs are currently the second largest international trading commodity after oil, with an estimated $500 billion dollars in yearly worldwide sales. The necessity of laundering huge amounts of currency at wholesale level makes it highly doubtful that the business is conducted by illiterate Golden Triangle and Columbian warlords. Billions of dollars in loans to men in drug-growing regions, and the amount of drug monies being laundered through worldwide banking are so large that it is not possible, especially with the availability of modern electronic scanning methods, that the banks involved are unaware of the sources of their funding.

I do not include a list of national banks used as international drug tributaries because it would literally require pages, but these smaller channels pour funds into the monetary oceans of the unregulated "Group of 10" offshore banks, large Bangkok banks (alleged to be the financiers of Golden Triangle operations), expatriate Chinese banks, Rothschild banks, and British banks and trading companies, including the previously-mentioned Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank (overseeing approximately 350 financial institutions in Hong Kong).

The Hong Kong and Shanghai bank is governed by the elite London Committee, with two of its directors former senior officials in Britain's Ministry of Economic Warfare, with other members linked to the Royal Institute of International Affairs. London's part in the concealment of international drug monies can be confirmed by the March 1984 study "Crime and Secrecy: The Use of Offshore Banks and Companies," of the Permanent Investigations Subcommittee of the U.S. Senate, which charges London banking with being the international center for the concealment of drug money.

"And there are other rationales for traffic in drugs," Lanny Sinkin of the Christie Institute has said. "In analyzing the evidence available, the Institute and others concluded that the War on Drugs was not what it appeared. In essence, the United States government facilitated the entry of drugs into this country as part of a larger program. The two major elements of this program are: (1) a real war in Central and South America using the influx of drugs into this country as the rationale and (2) the suppression of domestic populations with the use of drugs and the attendant violence and crime as the rationale."

To paraphrase, there is a war going on worldwide which at one level has nothing to do with drugs, although it can be sold to the public, particularly the American public, on the basis of suppression of drugs. By simultaneously creating anti-drug legislation and fostering drug trade (mirroring the operation that took place in America during Prohibition), international manipulators obtain both a rationalization for that war and for the increased police penetration of society and suppression of political freedoms.

The fundamental game is not traffic in drugs, but the traffic in human lives and energy, the buying, selling and herding of cattle-resources. It boils down to the ultimate master/slave relationship with the masters in a continual struggle for profits and to keep the people uninformed, sated, mindless, utilized. The “host,” be it animal, human or planet, is anesthetized, then drained by its parasitic self-styled masters. And then the ravaged hulk is discarded.

14

Emergency Action

It does not take an extensive study of the action of the masters of any age, the pharaohs, the kings, the popes, the Rothschilds, the Rockefellers, to verify their existence or to determine their modus operandi. This ruling class (in its darkest and sometimes hidden manifestations) is unfettered by such insignificant things as ethical or moral qualms. They uniformly view themselves as pure-blooded aristocrats and the minions beneath them in the same way that most people view cattle — as animals to be harvested. This harvesting is usually done by the men ostensibly hired to protect us.

Although the Soviet threat, we are led to believe, has been banished and blown to the winds, there seems to be little likelihood that "our protectors," the American Spy State, will soon wither away and die.

The CIA, since its inception, has run an estimated 3,000 major operations and 10,000 minor operations. Ex-CIA agent John Stockwell has estimated a minimum death toll of six million individuals in the Third World from these operations. Even during the current economic depression (I mean, recession) and amid the crumbling of our cities, American spy and paramilitary operations continue to drain 35 billion documented dollars per year while employing 25,000 individuals in America and untold thousands worldwide through subsidiary networks, companies, and organizational cutouts.

Russ Baker, in the Village Voice, has termed the spy establishment "little more than the private army of the Fortune 500," and it is an apt, if limited, description of this enormous, mostly-invisible security force which works with a huge network of ex-spooks and collaborators in actions often designed to violate international law and to trample human rights.

There are more than a dozen government agencies which are in the business of gathering intelligence and covert action, and they are in part funded through "black budget" allocations whose nature is not made available to the Congress, much less the public, but which is currently estimated to be in the same range as their above-board funding. More money is spent on the CIA, the NSA, and their brother agencies than is spent on education in America — and the money is spent on spies.

The Congressional watchdogs seem variously not to care about the actions of the intelligence community, or to be cheering them on and collaborating in the attempts of the wolves to batter down the gates of Constitutional safeguards, and the continued overthrow of constitutional democracies worldwide.

Former aide to the Director of Central Intelligence Victor Marchetti described the process of infiltration of Congress: "They sent up top guns... like John Clark — who had been head of Planning, Programming, and Budgeting in the CIA on the director's staff. The whole idea was to snow these guys, con these guys, win these guys over, convert 'em, get 'em on the team. That's what has happened. It's now institutionalized."

Another reason why Congress and the public are not able to see into the double dealing of the security state is that they are not allowed to glimpse the lion's share of its activities. "We'd go down and lie to them consistently," Ex-CIA man Ralph McGee said of his experiences with Congress. "In my 25 years, I have never seen the agency tell the truth to a congressional committee."

With the Soviet Union gone, there is little doubt that new threats will crop up to replace the KGB and to justify the existence of the spy establishment. The odds-on favorites are terrorism, the drug war, and the shooing into line of whatever Third World (and most likely previously American-sponsored) dictator the press chooses to characterize this week as a latter-day Hitler. Already the CIA has put forth feelers to Congress suggesting that a new threat looms large on the post-USSR horizon: industrial and economic sabotage by competing countries.

Many of the underlying theoretical threads of Alternative 3 come together when we examine one room among many in the "mansion" of U.S. intelligence, the Federal Emergency Management Agency. The first inklings of FEMA surfaced in 1969, when California governor Ronald Reagan instituted a special training project at the National Guard Camp in San Luis Obispo, California. The purpose of the seminar was to train leaders in population control. A fictional town of "San Luisa" was mapped and broken into ethnic and income zones, and plans for infiltration of groups and methods for crowd control were formulated. By 1979 the Associated Press reported that 14,000 persons had been trained in this population control seminar.

FEMA proper was created by Jimmy Carter. Housed in one of the government's tightest security installations and located in Fort Meade, Maryland, FEMA is currently computerizing records on millions of Americans, preparing a database for CAPs, Crisis Action Programs to be utilized in the event of whatever the Executive Department might term a national crisis.

Incorporating the disaster and emergency functions of a dozen different federal agencies, FEMA has concentrated on such activities as plans for setting up mass emergency detention centers in case anything might threaten the "continuity of government" (COG). As Dr. Henry Kleinmann, a political scientist at Boston University, said: "It was understood that they [FEMA]... would one day be in charge of the country. As these bureaucrats saw it, FEMA's real mission was to wait, prepare and then take over when some 'situation' seemed serious enough to turn the United States into a police state."

The intervention of FEMA on a national scale would not require a massive ecological disaster, but, in the words of Executive Order 11921, it could be utilized "whenever necessary for assuring the continuity of the federal government in any national emergency type situation." A congressional investigation in 1991 showed that less than 10 percent of FEMA's staff of 2,600 bureaucrats are preparing for a cataclysmic natural event. So what is FEMA preparing for?

One answer can be read in Presidential Executive Order EO 12656 issued by President Ronald Reagan on November 18, 1988, which defined a National Emergency (such as would activate FEMA) as "any occurrence, including natural disaster, military attack, technological emergency or other emergency, that seriously degrades or seriously threatens the national security of the United States." That pretty well covers all possible bases. Any event, then, which can be construed as threatening to the government can be used to set a host of repressive Executive Orders into action, including:

- EO 10995, authorizing the suspension of the freedom of speech and the commandeering of all of the communications media.
- EO 10997, authorizing the takeover of electrical systems and other fuel sources.
- EO 10998, providing for the government control of food sources, including farms.
- EO 10999, which authorizes the control or confiscation of the nation's transportation sources, public and private.

- EO 11000, which gives government the right to form work brigades of citizens.

- EO 11001, providing for the takeover of all health, education, and welfare functions and facilities.

- EO 11002, authorizing a national registering of the populace.

- EO 11003, authorizing the takeover of all airplanes and airports.

- EO 11004, which gives government the mandate to relocate populations from one area to another.

- EO 11005, which provides for government to take over railways, waterways, and public storage facilities.

- EO 12148, authorizing FEMA to take over the executive functions of the government.

These Executive Orders have all been recorded in the Federal Register, and accepted by Congress as law. They can be put into effect any time an emergency is declared. The above EOs were incorporated into one Executive Order (EO 11490) by President Richard Nixon and, further, Jimmy Carter's 1979 Executive Orders creating FEMA delegated to it the power to act for the President.

These orders are a few of the legal justifications available to the unelected bureaucrats at FEMA and their masters, which can be used for widespread repression and the complete suspension of Constitutional rights in the event of anything deemed a national emergency.

During the Iran-Contra hearings of 1987, there was a telling exchange between Representative Jack Brooks and Senator Daniel Inouye:

"Brooks: Colonel North, in your work at the N.S.C. [National Security Council, which is also the location of FEMA], were you not assigned, at one time, to work on plans for the continuity of government in the event of a major disaster?

Brendan Sullivan (North's counsel): Mr. Chairman?

Senator Daniel Inouye: I believe that question touches upon a highly sensitive and classified area so may I request that you not touch upon that?

Representative Brooks: I was particularly concerned, Mr. Chairman, because I read in the Miami papers, and several others, that there had been a plan developed, by that same agency, a contingency plan in the event of emergency, that would suspend the American Constitution. And I was deeply concerned about it and wondered if that was the area in which he had worked. I believe that it was and I wanted to get his confirmation.

Senator Inouye: May I most respectfully request that matter not be touched upon, at this stage. If we wish to get into this, I'm certain arrangements can be made for an executive session."

With the rampant excesses of the American intelligence community and agencies such as FEMA, the means for the implementation of Alternative 3 or similar plans are in place, and whether EO 11004 is invoked to usher us off to the moon, Mars, or merely to an American Gulag, it seems quite irrelevant.

15

Demonstration Project

In Oracle, Arizona exists what has been touted as a self-contained Earth: Biosphere II, a huge three-acre, ten-story geodesic structure supporting 40,000 plants and eight "crew members" who plan to exist isolated from the outside world for two years. After six years of planning and an investment of $100 million dollars, Discover magazine has called Biosphere II "the most exciting scientific project to be undertaken in the U.S. since President Kennedy launched us toward the moon."

Among the collaborators on Biosphere II are the Smithsonian Institute, the National Center for Atmospheric Research, the Yale School of Forestry and Ecological Science, The New York Botanical Gardens, the University of Arizona's Environmental Research Laboratory, the U.S. Geological Society, and NASA.

Biosphere has been portrayed in glowing terms on all the major television networks, in the New York Times, the Los Angeles Times, The Boston Globe, The Washington Post, Omni, and National Geographic World Hosting an hour-long show from the Arizona site, Phil Donahue called it "one of the most ambitious man-made projects ever." In other words, establishment science and the media have bought wholeheartedly (if that is the correct term) into the project. But the veneer of scientific and media respectability do more to reinforce our understanding of science as the whore of the controllers than it does to assuage our doubts about the validity or purpose of Biosphere II.

The Biosphere project was founded in the 1980s by John P. Allen (aka "Johnny Dolphin"), and funded by Allen follower and Texas millionaire, Edward P. Bass. Bass' money enabled Allen to transform a small apocalyptic religious group living in a desert commune in Santa Fe, New Mexico into the darlings of the media and scientific establishment. Among properties owned by Allen and his group are a Katmandu hotel, a ranch in Australia of several thousand acres, a conference center in France, and a theater-cultural center in Fort Worth, Texas.

University of California professor Laurence Vesey spent five weeks researching John Allen's commune, known as Synergia Ranch, in the early 70s. His observations, published in a book called The Communal Experience, provide a somewhat different image than the scientific jargon and coral-red jumpsuits that the members of Allen's group affect today.

Veysey found an experiment in progress that was, according to him, "Jonestown-like," and geared to Allen's vision of a dying Earth that could only be saved by founding a new civilization... on Mars.

Allen told Vesey: "Western civilization isn't simply dying. It's dead." Synergia, he said, was "poking among the ruins of the dying civilization in order to snatch whatever is currently of service to the new."

Vesey described Allen as having "total hold and domination" over his group of followers. "The others all look to him constantly for their cues, for the subtle signals which tell them what to do and what not to do... His chanting rhythm they imitate with their own voices, his instructions they seek to apply in the theater [they employ], his timetable they follow for planetary outreach... [Allen's] domination over the group is open and for the most part undisguised... This entire societal order is the tangible enactment of his own vision."

Vesey said that Allen's warnings of ecological and atomic destruction were continually ranted at the members of the commune, and that Geiger counters had been purchased for his followers, presumably for use during the event of atomic war.

Speaking of nightly group psychological confrontations, Vesey said that Allen would ask: "Any confessions?" If there were no volunteers, Allen "will explode into wrath, usually directed at one person. Calmly in control of himself one minute, in the next he will be shouting the most hurtful words conceivable in a furious assault upon the ego of some trapped individual... He will seize upon what appear to be innocent failures to follow precise instructions and transform them into calculated acts of sabotage... He reiterates his accusations until no possible response is left. Then, all at once, his tirade comes to an end and everyone continues as if nothing had happened."

Vesey recently spoke of Biosphere II, saying that it "has all kinds of implications... the Biosphere is a demonstration project that fits in with the political thinking of the right wing. A more liberal kind of person might wonder why you should sink all that money into something for the survival of only a few people." Vesey says that Allen believes that he is gathering together a new "elite" for the purpose of constructing a "new civilization," yet is "masking it" from the uninitiated.

Researcher Wade Davis recently spent time with the Biosphere group. He described the project as having an atmosphere of "oppressive... almost totalitarian... hippie fascism. Most importantly they seem to have no knowledge nor interest in botany," which research is one of the expressed purposes of Biosphere II.

Television producer Ed Fitzgerald said of his time at Biosphere II, "The whole experience was marked by a feel of paranoia. The critics we talked to demanded meetings in open places, public parks. We had to ask ourselves several times if we just felt we were being followed or if we were."

An account published in the Village Voice described a visit to Biosphere II: "Once a visit to the dome has been secured, you might as well be in Baghdad. All interviews are conducted in the presence of a PR 'minder,' who, with watch and walkie-talkie in hand, makes sure no chat becomes too intimate, or probes too closely about who these people are in their off hours. In fact, all questions about the personal lives of the Biospherians are taboo. It is no accident that of the dozens of published accounts on the project — all sympathetic — not one describes the family, friends, or homes of the Biosphere crew or management. The few who are authorized to speak to the press are almost all core group members. With no attempt at exaggeration or interpretation, let it be said they are almost uniformly humorless. As cold as the fish in their artificial ocean. Not a crack of human frailty or emotion is revealed. The answers that are given are rote and flat in tone, worlds away from the hyperpoetry of their promotional brochures."

Describing the tenets in the group's major promotional tract, the Voice author said, "And it is a dark religion. In its introductory chapter, the pamphlet openly declares: 'the major motivation behind creating Biosphere II and developing the capacity to create other microscale viable biospheric systems is to assist the Biosphere [i.e. the lifeforms of Earth] to evolve off planet Earth into potential life regions of our solar system.'"

The last third of the book emphasizes the "historic imperative" of colonizing Mars, given the "inevitable doom" of the Earth, which is described as a "local blind alley" and estimates that work on the Mars project will begin in approximately four years. A book of Allen's poetry on sale in the Biosphere gift shop includes a poem, titled (in perhaps telling fashion)

"Lebensraum," about his plot to escape this planetary "cell."

As to whether Allen read Alternative 3 and thought it was a bright idea, or whether he happens to be a front-man for a group using Biosphere II as a test tube for social experimentation (which may have been the case in Jonestown), I have no idea. Regardless, there can hardly be a better clue than these gleaming geodesic structures in the Arizona desert that there exist men proposing to abandon Earth, forging new schemes of mind control off-planet.

16

Lunar Base Alpha One

Deceased conspiracy researcher Dr. Peter Beter is known for his wild speculations (including the insistence that Jimmy Carter, Henry Kissinger, David Rockefeller and Leonid Brezhnev were replaced by “organic robotoids” — would that it were so). Beter believed Alternative 3 was about “85 to 90 percent accurate.”

Acknowledging a blur between fiction and fact in Alternative 3, I present Beter’s story of the Battle of Harvest Moon, knowing full well that it is probably fictional in most details, but interesting in the parallels it presents with Alternative 3 — and Alternative 3 is nothing if not a study in parallels.

In Beter’s Audio Letter for September 1977, in his inimitable “Criswell Predicts” style, he relates the American and Russian space programs’ true objectives. According to Beter, these programs have always been militaristic in purpose and secretly intended for conquest of the world, with then-key components being the development of laser and particle beam weapons.

The Rockefellers, the true power behind American politics according to Beter, had early realized that a moon base equipped with laser could strike any spot on Earth and be virtually immune to counterattack. A secret American space program was initiated, and work on U.S. beam weapons proceeded at locations such as a CIA installation in Spain. Meanwhile, the USSR concentrated on its own particle beam program instead of moon flight. In 1972 the Russian civil defense program was stepped up and much of the Soviet Union, including strategic command centers, went underground in order to withstand ICBMs and particle beams.

In 1973, according to Beter, the Americans relocated all native inhabitants from Diego Garcia, an island in the Indian Ocean, and built a new space port from which secret missions to the moon were launched in order to build a base there. Diego Garcia is very isolated, and craft launched eastward pass over a nearly unbroken expanse of water, with the only means of monitoring such launches being from shipboard. Jimmy Carter gave a speech about demilitarizing the Indian Ocean, with the implicit message to the Russians, according to Beter, to stay out.

Meanwhile, the CIA was busy planting supermissiles using Howard Hughes' submarine Glomar Explorer. With this episode, also reported by Bruce Roberts in his underground Gemstone File, Beter may be correct. In "The Secret Alliances of the CIA from World War II to Watergate" by Howard Kohn, published in Rolling Stone magazine, Kohn says: "Many CIA experts believe the Russian sub story [using the Glomar Explorer to retrieve the sunken submarine] to be a cover since the codes were outdated and the value of the other information was negligible. One possibility is that the CIA, worried about the growing trend of Third World cartels demanding higher prices for minerals, awarded Hughes the $350 million to develop an advanced technology for underwater mining — thereby giving Hughes a head start toward a bonanza with more potential than oil while helping protect U.S. hegemony over the world's mineral trade. Another theory is that the CIA, in conjunction with the U.S. Navy, used the Glomar to set up undetected missile sites on the ocean floor as a way of cheating any arms limitation treaty with the Soviet Union."

The race for an operational particle beam continued, so Beter says, with the Russian Salyud spacecraft carrying out beam tests in space. On July 17, 1973, the Russian Cosmos 929 was launched, consisting of a twin satellite, command module, and a particle beam module. All communications between the Cosmos 929 and Earth were carried on by undetectable modulated laser beams. Meanwhile, in the Copernicus crater base on the moon, the Americans were working toward operational status for their beam weapons.

Cosmos 929 began test firing into open space. On September 20, 1977 the Cosmos fired on an American spy satellite east of southern Finland. The satellite erupted into a fireball witnessed, according to Beter, as far away as Helsinki but dismissed as a UFO in the U.S. British and French trawlers were expelled from the Bering Sea by the Russians and on September 26th, 1977 the Soviets attacked the moon base with particle beams. Bombarded by beam weapons through the night and all day of the 27th, by evening America had lost the battle.

The moon base, in the Beter scenario, had been integral to the Rockefeller plot to control the world. Their plan was to start a limited nuclear war, most of the destruction to take place on American soil. The plan was to denude America of war capability while building up the Soviets. With half of America incinerated by bombs the Rockefellers would step in with the moon base's particle beam weapons and destroy the U.S.S.R., then, as the only remaining major power, the Rockefellers would be enthroned as dictators.

After the Battle of the Harvest Moon, Gromyko gave, according to Beter, an ultimatum in a United Nations speech... as the Bering Sea filled up with Soviet subs. The Soviet's North Atlantic and Pacific fleets were massing and six more particle beam satellites were readied for launch, with two in orbit already.

Gromyko denounced the deterioration of East/West relations and demanded a new agreement for the limitation of nuclear weapons. In a meeting with Carter and Vance, Gromyko informed them of the outcome of Harvest Moon, saying that the U.S.S.R. had destroyed the American moon base and was now in command. "We will oblige you with the war you have worked to bring about."

The following day Soviet submarine fleets armed with neutron bombs converged from positions worldwide, and the Soviets placed sixty cobalt bombs at undersea fracture zones worldwide, able to set off earthquakes at will. In a news conference Carter blurted out something about the "imminent" crises.

Within days an American Atlas Centaur rocket carrying an important communications satellite exploded. Salyud 6 was launched and the Soviets went to work on their own moon base, with the intention of putting a particle beam weapon on the moon. Houston NASA moon base activities shut down.

Dr. Beter concluded his message of September 1977 by stating that war was virtually upon us.

While Beter's story seems highly unlikely given the events of the breakup of the Soviet Union, I note that many elements closely parallel Alternative 3 and that Beter came to the same conclusion I had reached in regard to the death of the SDI scientists: that the Russians would have seen the program's offensive capabilities and would have been forced into a strategy to prevent its completion. As far as his insistence that the Americans had a base on the moon, I can only state that the base does exist — but perhaps only in terms of plans.

Beter's scenario might also explain the otherwise odd initial emphasis of the American space program on reaching the moon. If the moon flight was accomplished in the manner that NASA made public, it would have would have resulted in only a PR triumph, with the Soviets at the same time "content" to emphasize in their own programs rockets capable of carrying huge cargos and orbiting stations with unknown payloads.

In March 1965 General Thomas M. Power warned of the possibility of attack by orbiting Russian nuclear stations. He said that Americans "may wake up one morning" and find nuclear-armed satellites "floating in stationary orbits over every part of the United States."

In 1981 Aviation Week and CBS News reported that there were permanent Russian space platforms armed with killer satellites orbiting the Earth. The Pentagon chose not to comment on the reports.

Space Age Review for November 1981 reported that the United States had developed a "U.S. Space Command" to "meet the needs of the Pentagon's war preparations," also stating that the U.S. was knowingly breaking the 1967 Russian-American space treaty, which prohibits "placing in orbit around the Earth any objects carrying nuclear weapons or other weapons of mass destruction."

Another echo of Beter's scenario is information I received from an anonymous intelligence source in 1991, later confirmed through an independent source in the military. I am not suggesting that the report is absolutely true, only that independent confirmation makes it more likely to be so.

My informant said: "I do know that the U.S. has had an orbiting nuclear weapons platform for at least the past twenty years; enough straight nukes to do all the damage necessary, plus two that are cobalt-jacketed. One of these, dropped on Peking, would spread fallout as far east as Utah. These were part of the old Standard Integrated Operational Plan (SIOP) coded 'Endgame'; the straight nukes were part of the SIOP coded 'Mainchance.' I also know that the first military-run shuttle mission was sent up to service the platform and upgrade the on-board computers. The platform's capabilities were most likely enhanced by this upgrading, though I don't think the weapons were changed at all. There may actually be more than one platform by now, but one is all they need — especially since it could just as easily be used on domestic targets... Add that to the spate of new surveillance satellites they've put up, entirely too many in geo-synchronous orbit over the U.S. and its territories, and it's no surprise that people like myself are paranoid..."

Bill Kaysing, former employee of NASA, also backs up Beter's scenario in a number of details, but believes the moon base was eventually phased out: "...As most aerospace insiders know, the Apollo project was actually a military mission to determine the feasibility of using the moon as a military base of operations against foreign powers. Furthermore, almost 75 percent of all NASA effort was basically military — not space!

"When the capability of controlling orbiting H-bombs became a reality, the moon became far less important to the Pentagon's planners. Who needs a moon base when it's possible to destroy any or all of the planet with bombs disguised as communications satellites that orbit the Earth 24 hours a day, they reasoned."

The make-or-break point on a moon base or a "black" space race is ultimately financial, it would seem, and it is really a question of whether there was a sufficient military black budget to finance such activities — which, however, could have been done on the relative cheap by utilizing the researches and perhaps diverting some of the money allocated to NASA. The objection that a project of such a magnitude could not go on without information leaking to the press is probably false. The Manhattan Project, for instance, employed more than 300,000 persons, and yet no significant leaks appeared in the press at the time.

In an interview conducted by researcher Thomas Lyttle, agricultural expert Richard Miller spoke of his employment in an outer space hydroponics research project from 1968-72 under the administration of Dr. Arthur Pilgrim. Funded by a major aeronautics company in the Northwest, the researches were "for use on the moon. This project was called Lunar Base Alpha One Project... We were part of a study at one point on zero gravity. McCormick Foods [a company connected to the Rockefellers] had an overrun of something like seventeen million dollars that they needed to reinvest, so they formed what was called McCor/Shill or McCormick's/Shilling Platform. These were the people who did experiments with orbiting space platforms - orbiting satellites, etc. These were all secret biological experiments." Note that Miller uses the same terminology used in the account of the anonymous informant: "platform."

Brian O'Leary, the first astronaut to resign from NASA, also spoke about a secret space program in his book The Making of an Ex-Astronaut:

"The Air Force also has a center at Cape Kennedy, fending independently from NASA with its own gantries and its own... VIB, the Vehicle Installation Building. These facilities sit on landfill adjacent to Merritt Island, isolated from the NASA structures. We toured the Air Force center but learned little about their highly secret space program. Many people do not realize that the world has three ambitious manned space programs: the U.S. (NASA), Russia, and the U.S. Air Force. The Air Force space program operates under the protection of secrecy offered by the military, in contrast to NASA's exposure to public scrutiny. We probably know less about our Air Force space program than we do about the Soviet space program. We do know a few things, though. They have the Titan III (very difficult to hide), a big tricylinder rocket which looks like a multiple firecracker. The two extra cylinders were strapped on as an afterthought, and the three together deliver a strong thrust which is intermediate between those of the Saturn IB and Saturn V.

"Our tour of the Air Force facility seemed like a broken record: the computers, the consoles, and the rockets were similar to NASA's and it struck me that the whole thing was an unnecessary duplication. Imagine — two independent but similar programs going on at the same site. The Air Force space program seemed like a foreign space program, except we were spending dearly for it."

O'Leary also refers to future space prospects, in a comment that makes me wonder if he is indulging an arch humor: "A manned Mars landing may be in prospect for the 1980s or 1990s. President Nixon's appointed Space Task Group outlined three alternatives [emphasis added], all of which would involve the Mars landing before the end of the century..."

What if, as Alternative 3 suggests, there is a moon or Mars base already in operation? Then there may have been indications of its existence. Curious lights, clouds, and unexplainable moving objects on the surface of the moon have been observed by both professional and amateur astronomers, and Fred Steckling's Alien Bases on the Moon offers a remarkable assortment of photographs of inexplicable Lunar features. These include large objects which seem to have travelled across the Lunar landscape, leaving miles of stitch-like paths; what appear to be Arabic numerals and other symbols carved into the lunar surface in conjunction with dome-like objects; and multiple triangular pond-like constructions which utterly defy any explanation as natural formations.

An AP news story featured an interview with Michael Carr, a member of the team interpreting photographs of Mars sent back to Earth from the Viking 2 orbiter. Carr said: "We are getting some strange things. It is very puzzling." Carr explained that some of the photographs of the Martian surface showed features resembling agricultural strip plowing. "The stripes are too regular to be of natural causes." As to what the research team thought the striped area was, Carr said: "I really can't tell you all of the possibilities that were suggested. But many suggestions were that it was MAN MADE." Note that Carr doesn't term the features "alien made."

There are reports that the astronauts encountered strange things on the moon whose existence was never revealed to the public. The book Alternative 3 repeats author Otto Binder's assertion that during the Apollo 11 mission this exchange took place over the radio:

Mission Control: “What’s there?... malfunction (garble)... Mission Control calling Apollo 11...”

Apollo 11: “These babies were huge, sir... enormous... Oh, God you wouldn’t believe it!... I’m telling you there are other space-craft out there... lined up on the far side of the crater edge... they’re on the Moon watching us...”

My initial impulse was to discount this alleged bit of radio communication, based as it is solely on the word of Otto Binder (who, in collaboration with his brother Edward, was half of the science fiction writing team Eando Binder). I might also have been negatively influenced by the numerous patently fake transcripts of other secret conversations between “conspirators” in the book Alternative 3. Timothy Good, however, relates a tale told to him by “a certain professor (whose name is known to me)... who served in British military intelligence.” Good says that the professor recollects a conversation with Neil Armstrong which took place during a NASA symposium:

PROFESSOR: “What really happened out there with Apollo 11?”

ARMSTRONG: “It was incredible... of course, we had always known there was a possibility... the fact is, we were warned off. There was never any question then of a space station or a moon city.”

PROFESSOR: “What do you mean ‘warned off?’

ARMSTRONG: “I can’t go into details, except to say that their ships were far superior to ours both in size and technology — Boy, they were big!... and menacing... No, there is no question of a space station.”

PROFESSOR: “But NASA had other missions after Apollo 11?”

ARMSTRONG: “Naturally — NASA was committed at that time, and couldn’t risk a panic on Earth... But it really was a quick scoop and back again.”

Armstrong, not surprisingly, denies the story.

An incredible objectification of Alternative 3 exists in the book Space Settlements, A Design Study, edited by Johnson and Holbrow (NASA document SP-413). Authored by participants in the 1975 Summer faculty fellowship program in engineering systems design of Ames Research Center and Stanford University, and sponsored by NASA, the book analyzes from an engineering perspective the requirements necessary to launch and maintain extraterrestrial colonies, but oddly presents much of its text in present tense, as if the reader was a participant in an already-existing program.

Viewed from the perspective of the Alternative 3 allegations numerous portions of the book will provoke a sense of recognition, if not dread. From a section titled “Tour of the Colony.”

"Preparation for your trip is a difficult period; it eliminates those who are not serious about their intention of going to the space colony. You undergo weeks of quarantine, exhaustive physical examinations, stringent decontamination, and interminable tests to make sure that you do not carry insects, bacteria, fungi, or mental problems to L5 [space station]. Only then are you permitted to board a personnel module of a heavy-lift launch vehicle which everyone refers to as the HLLV, along with 99 prospective colonists who have gone through even more rigorous tests than you have as a mere visitor.

"...During the construction phase of the colony, the staging area handled replacement supplies at the rate of 1000t a year. The growth and increasing loading of the colony required trans-shipment of an average of 50 people per week together with their personal belongings and the additional carbon, nitrogen, and hydrogen needed to sustain them in space. Oxygen, and other elements, are obtained from the Moon. Later the big demand was for lightweight, complex components fabricated for satellite solar power stations. Initially the resupply of the lunar base also came from Earth. The 150 people on the Moon require 250t of supplies and rotation of 75 people from Earth each year. Furthermore, there is traffic from the colony to Earth. Studies of past colonizations on Earth have shown that discontent with frontier life is usually such that many colonists wish to return home." The study admits, "it might be necessary to devise ways to discourage commuting."

The book describes the approach to the space station, situated in neutral gravity between the Earth and moon, and supplied from the moon base:

"The space colony appears as a giant wheel in space. Still you cannot comprehend its size, but you know it must be huge. One of the other passengers who has been on the trip before tells you it is 1800m in diameter... He points to the hub of the wheel and tells you that is where your transport is heading to dock with the space colony, explaining that local custom has named the docking area the North Pole." [emphasis added].

Might this be a code explaining the clandestine meetings of the conspirators, "beneath ice of Arctic"? My guess is that it is merely an interesting coincidence as are, in all probability, the following paragraphs from Section 4, titled "Choosing Among Alternatives" [emphasis added]. Again, it almost seems as if we are witnessing the mocking cant of conspirators daring us to try and do something about their schemes:

"Moreover, again because time was short, many of the comparisons among alternative subsystems were more qualitative than study group members would have liked.

“Effort devoted to alternatives depended upon the particular subject A great deal of time was spent considering different forms for the habitat, how to handle the shielding and how to process lunar material. Less time was given to considering alternative patterns of siting the colony and its parts, of different ways to achieve life support, or of various possible transportation systems. In some cases much effort was expended but few alternatives were generated; an example is the system for moving large amounts of matter cheaply from the moon to the colony. No alternative at all was found to the manufacture of solar satellite power plants as the major commercial enterprise of the colony.

“It is important to realize that the alternatives described in this chapter constitute a major resource for improving the proposed design and for constructing new designs that meet other criteria. Rejection of any concept for the current baseline system does not mean that concept is fundamentally flawed. Some alternatives were rejected because they failed to meet the criteria, which were deliberately chosen conservatively and might well be changed on the basis of future experience or under different assumptions. Others were rejected simply because information about them was incomplete. Yet others were not chosen because their virtues were recognized too late in the study to incorporate them into a unified overall picture.

“The alternatives might also be useful for designing systems with other goals than permanent human settlement in space; for example, space factories with temporary crews, or laboratories. Alternatively, new knowledge or advances in technology, such as the advent of laser propulsion or active shielding against ionizing radiation, might make rejected subsystems very desirable.” [emphases added]

Information reminiscent of the possible origin of crop circles suggested in chapter 6 of this book, “Hot Jobs and Crop Circles,” is provided in subsections “Satellite Solar Power Stations: No Alternatives” and “Still Other Alternatives” [emphases added], describing the microwave transmission from space of solar-generated power, and the production of that power being a potential economic justification for space colonization.

Alternative 3 is correct in reporting that a number of astronauts had psychological difficulties after their missions in space, but that is fairly common knowledge. Comments that Buzz Aldrin made in his book Return to Earth particularly suggest that, as Alternative 3 maintains, something was going on that the public wasn’t being told about:

“We were to become public relations men for space exploration — in a sense, salesmen. The word made me terribly uncomfortable and self-conscious when it was first used.” Speaking of his wife, Aldrin said, “I was incredulous... she had really believed all that crap that she had read about me — about her — about all of us? Suddenly all my life... became tinged with a crazy unreality.”

Aldrin also described a meeting of the Lancaster, California Chamber of Commerce where he was one of the guest speakers. Roy Neal, an NBC newscaster asked Aldrin a question that Aldrin was not comfortable with: “Now that almost two years have gone by, why not tell us how it really felt to be on the moon?”

Aldrin’s reaction, as described by him, was very strange. “If any one question was anathema to me, that was it. Roy, I suppose, felt he had no choice. Yet it has always been almost impossible for me to answer that question with any sort of decent response.

“My throat went dry and I became dizzy. Carefully I picked my way through a reply, thinking that all of the test pilots in the audience would burst out in laughter.

“I remember little more of the interview... I signed a few [autographs] and when the shaking became uncontrollable, I grabbed Joan and ran for the door... In the privacy of an alley near the auditorium, I choked back my emotions and quietly wept.”

17

Disinfo

The possibility exists that Alternative 3 was created as "grey" disinformation, calculated to confuse and defuse the issues of elitist control, mind control, genocide, and secret space programs, by revealing yet concealing these truths. The purpose would be to discredit these subjects and shunt debate into conclaves of UFO True Believers, who could be counted on to hallucinate, embroider and heavily merchandise the information, thus continuing the work of the disinformers. It wouldn't be the first instance of the government (in either its overt or covert manifestation) using disinformation vectors to confuse, pacify, or stampede the populace in directions of their choosing.

Along this line, Leslie Watkins' background as a writer is interesting. His books, in order of publication, are The Sleepwalk Killers, "a non-fiction study of somnambulistic violence," The Killing of Idi-Amin, about Watkins' experiences when imprisoned by the Amin regime, The Unexploded Man, characterized as "a thriller," although the title sounds as if it might be on the Manchurian Candidate theme, Alternative 3, The Real Exorcists, a nonfiction book about exorcism, Private Opinions, nonfiction about public opinion polls, Billion Dollar Miracle, a book about the New Zealand travel industry, and The Story of Money, commissioned by Barclays Bank.

Altogether an interesting mix of subjects, with a predominant theme that might be termed manipulative psychology. Watkins relates in a letter that during the writing of The Killing of Idi-Amin he was "imprisoned and threatened with death by the Amin regime in Uganda (they suspected me, falsely, of being a British spy, when I went there to cover a war for the Daily Mail."

As to whether the authors of Alternative 3 fell upon their theme through coincidence, happenstance, or enemy action, I have no idea. Watkins maintains that it was an accident, although it can be easily seen that the accident cannot have been complete. A hoax book or television show like Alternative 3 betrays a disdain for easily-duped "commoners" only too prevalent in the attitudes of British media hacks and, especially, the upper crust owners of same.

There is much evidence to suggest that the UFO field itself, the primary forum for the discussion of Alternative 3, is itself largely a blind, a maze of fun house mirrors generated to twist facts, to conceal and not to reveal them. Many UFO personalities, back to the earliest days of UFO research, have had connections to military intelligence. These have been the supposed experts and opinion leaders in the field, and some have had concealed loyalties.

Todd Zechel, interviewed by Timothy Good in Above Top Secret, has alleged that several CIA agents infiltrated and held high positions in the early UFO organization NICAP. Zechel cites Count Nicholas de Rochefort, a member of the CIA's Psychological Warfare Staff, who was vice-Chairman of NICAP in 1956. He also names as CIA agents Bernard J. Carvalho, Chairman of NICAP's membership subcommittee, Karl Pflock, Chairman of the Washington, DC subcommittee, and G. Stuart Nixon, former assistant to NICAP's president.

Stating that Donald Keyhoe was deliberately ousted from NICAP by the CIA, Zechel says: "Maybe it's a coincidence that the founder of the CIA's Psychological Warfare Staff has been on the board [of NICAP] for nearly twenty years. Maybe it's another coincidence that Charles Lombard, a former CIA covert employee (according to himself) would seek out a retired CIA executive to run the organization (i.e. after Jack Acuff was replaced by a retired CIA agent, Alan N. Hall in 1979!)... Or maybe we're all paranoid... Perhaps Keyhoe deserved to be fired from the organization he built with his own sweat, blood, and sacrifice. The timing couldn't have been better, in any case. Keyhoe, after all, was beginning to focus on the CIA in 1969, instead of his tunnel-visioned attacks on the Air Force... if they wanted to destroy the leading anti-secrecy organization of the 1960s, they couldn't have done a better job if they'd tried."

Former CIA intelligence officer Miles Copeland, also interviewed by Timothy Good, told of a disinformation program headed by Desmond Fitzgerald of the organization's Special Affairs Staff. False press reports about UFOs were released from a number of different areas of the globe, in order to "keep the Chinese off balance and make them think we were doing things we weren't. The project got the desired results, as I remember, except that it somehow got picked up by a lot of religious nuts in Iowa and Nebraska or somewhere who took it seriously enough to add an extra chapter to their version of the New Testament!"

Ufologists William Cooper and John Lear can both be cited as having connections to the clandestine community (Cooper claiming to have been in military intelligence, Lear as a CIA operative), although they are both fond of accusing other researchers of being agents of the "Secret Government." Lear and Cooper tell essentially the same convoluted tale of U.S. government long-term collaboration with the extraterrestrial "greys," the big-headed, spindly-bodied aliens figuring prominently in current abductee tales. They maintain that the government is involved in an active process of concealing the existence of extraterrestrial invaders, a peace treaty between the aliens and the government, and the existence of collaborative alien/human bases in such places as Dulce, New Mexico. Due to the government treaty, the aliens have a degree of freedom to do their dirty work, which apparently includes cattle mutilations, the abduction of a certain number of humans per year for use in genetic experimentation, and the implantation of humans with tiny brain control devices.

An examination of Cooper's writings frankly reveals a character which, to me, bears little resemblance to Reilly, Ace of Spies. Lear, however, has long maintained contacts in the intelligence community, and there is a framed photo in his home of Watergate spook G. Gordon Liddy, inscribed: "To John, I told em fuckin nothin."

Lear admits to having recently spent time with Gordon Novel, a man implicated in the Kennedy assassination by New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison and others, and alleged by his wife to have been one of the Oswald impersonators prior to the Kennedy killing. Novel himself has admitted that he was hired by Lyndon Johnson to sabotage the Garrison investigation.

Of his encounter, Lear said that Novel and another man, an "electronics expert" working for Federal Technologies Corporation, had come up with "an advanced device" for the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "During their research," Lear stated, "they had come across information the UFOs may exist, and both of them wanted to come down here and get a briefing." During the visit Novel spoke at length with Lear about UFOs and the government/alien collaboration which Lear touts.

Lear suggests: "Maybe he was sent here to disinform me. Maybe he was sent to find out how much I knew. Maybe he was sent to divert my attention from Dulce [the town near the underground New Mexico alien base Lear maintains exists, and which area is in fact a reported center for cattle mutilations in the Southwest]." Martin Cannon, writing in UFO Uni- verse magazine, proposes a more likely possibility: that Novel was sent to draw attention to Lear.

Another case, that of Paul Bennewitz, is instructive. In 1979 prominent UFO field personality William Moore became interested in researcher Bennewitz' contact with a woman who had an abduction experience and maintained that she had witnessed cattle mutilations and the use of animal parts in vat experimentation. Bennewitz concluded the woman had been implanted with an alien-manufactured brain receiver and, with experience as a physicist, sought to determine the source of the electromagnetic signals he felt must be used to influence the woman.

Moore says that at the same time he was approached "by a well-placed individual within the intelligence community who claimed to be directly connected to a high-level project dealing with UFOs. This individual told me that he spoke for a small group of similar individuals who were uncomfortable with the government's continuing cover-up of the truth and indicated that he and his group would like to help me with my research into the subject in the hope and expectation that I might be able to help them find a way to change the prevailing policy and get the facts to the public without breaking any laws in the process. The man who acted as liaison between this group and myself was an Air Force Office of Special Investigations agent named Richard Doty. I knew I was being recruited, but at that point I had no idea for what."

Moore exchanged information about Bennewitz and the APRO research group he was director of for what he thought was classified information about UFOs. At the same time that Bennewitz was receiving supposed classified information, according to Moore, "Paul was gathering data from a variety of sources and amalgamating it with information being fed to him by a number of government people in whom, for some reason, he seemed to have an implicit and abiding faith. The story that emerged from this melange of fact, fiction, fantasy, hearsay, hard data and government disinformation was absolutely incredible! Yet somehow, Paul believed in it and set out on a one-man crusade to tell the world that malevolent aliens from space were in league with our government to take over the planet. What had begun in 1979 as an effort to learn whether the behavior of a woman who claimed she had been abducted by UFO aliens was being influenced by some sort of radio remote control had, in the space of less than three years, blossomed into a tale which rivaled the wildest science fiction scenario anyone could possibly imagine."

Moore says that the government's investigation of Bennewitz involved wiretaps and break-ins, and by 1982, Bennewitz had become convinced of a scenario of alien collaboration with the government, control devices, and a secret underground base at Dulce, New Mexico. This is essentially the same story circulated by John Lear, William Cooper, and others of the alien-govemment collaboration school.

"I know that this whole body of information is false, because I was in a position to observe much of the disinformation as it unfolded. And I can tell you that it was effective, because I watched Paul become systematically more paranoid and more emotionally unstable as he tried to assimilate what was happening to him. He had guns and knives all over his house, had installed extra locks on the doors, and he swore that 'they' (meaning the aliens) were coming through his walls at night and injecting him with hideous chemicals which would knock him out for long periods of time. He began to suffer increasing bouts of insomnia. I knew at that time that he was not far from an inevitable nervous collapse. His health had deteriorated, he had lost considerable weight, his hands shook as if from palsy, and he looked terrible. I tried to counsel him to drop the entire UFO thing before his health was completely destroyed. Not long afterward I heard he had been hospitalized and was under psychiatric care."

Summing up the experience, Moore says: "Disinformation is a strange and bizarre game. Those who play it are completely aware that an operation's success is dependent upon dropping false information upon a target or 'mark,' in such a way that the person will accept it as truth and will repeat, and even defend it to others as if it were true. One of the key factors in any successful disinformation scheme is that it must contain some elements of truth [emphasis added] in order to be credible. Once the information is believed, the work of counterintelligence specialists is complete. They can simply withdraw in the confidence that the dirty work of spreading their poisonous seeds will be done by others."

Other UFO cases provide clues to a manipulation that may or may not be extraterrestrial in origin. Martin Cannon in The Controllers: A New Hypothesis of Alien Abductions discusses the famous Betty and Barney Hill UFO abduction case as a possible case of government, not alien intervention. In 1961 the Hills were returning from a vacation trip. Passing through Groveton, New Hampshire they spotted an unusual star-like object in the night sky, and initially thought that it was a "falling star," or perhaps an airplane or satellite. Performing unusual aerial maneuvers, the "star" drew closer until they could see that it was a disk-shaped craft. The craft stopped in front of the car at a height of "eight to ten stories," and Barney Hill brought the car to a stop. The Hills were able to see humanoid figures through the windows of the saucer, and Barney Hill, afraid that he and his wife were going to be "captured," jumped back into the car and fled down the highway, leaving the UFO behind.

Within a few days Betty Hill began having nightmares about the encounter, but it was two years before the Hills sought help from Boston psychiatrist Dr. Benjamin Simon. Six months of hypnotic therapy brought out details of "missing time" and a supposed abduction aboard the saucer craft, including physical examination conducted on both of the Hills by the humanoid occupants of the UFO.

While the account of the Hills' alleged alien encounter is familiar to most individuals interested in the subject of UFOs, there are several details which are not widely-discussed, and which may point to other than the usual suppositions about contact from outer space.

The Hills' background is interesting, and perhaps made them desirable for "abduction" and mind-tampering. An interracial couple, they held prominent positions in a number of civil rights organizations (this during a time when such organizations were under surveillance and sometimes attack by the FBI and the CIA). The Hills would have been perfect subjects for the covert implantation of electronic bugs for surveillance of these organizations. Cannon points out that Barney Hill was acquainted with the head of Air Force intelligence at Pease Air Force Base, and suggests that this may have been the relationship which brought the couple to the attention of the intelligence community, not their saucer contact.

Other details of the Hills' abduction are not mentioned by Cannon, yet I believe may be significant. Betty Hill described the inhabitants of the flying saucer as wearing uniforms and billed caps ("similar to Air Force"), and speaking with a "foreign" accent. On several occasions, when Betty Hill became upset during the abduction and examination, the leader of the abductors rubbed his hand in front of her face in the familiar gesture of a hypnotist.

Barney Hill's first impression of the leader of his abductors was, "He looks like a German Nazi. He's a Nazi..." One of them, he said, was a "military pilot." During hypnosis Barney Hill said: "I thought of the Navy and the submarine, and I thought the men that moved back were just dressed in blue denims. But this other man was dressed in a black shiny coat, with a cap on."

This suggests a somewhat different event than the one portrayed on television, with standard big-headed aliens abducting and making free with the Hills. Extraterrestrials in blue denim?

Another UFO close encounter that does not seem to fit into the standard mold, is that of William "Eddie" Laxton. Researcher John Keel relates that on March 23, 1966 Laxton, an aircraft electronics instructor, was driving to Sheppard Air Force Base where he worked, approaching an intersection on Highway 70 near the Texas-Oklahoma border. A huge "fish-shaped" craft suddenly loomed in front of his car, blocking the road. Laxton estimated the object to be about 75 feet long and 8 feet deep.

Laxton said that the object "had a plastic bubble in front which was about three feet in diameter, and you could see light through it." He also remembers that the craft had numbers and letters painted vertically in black on the fuselage, either TL4768 or TL4168. Laxton noticed a man examining the craft with a flashlight, and later described him as wearing a mechanic's cap with the bill turned up — apparently a popular mode of alien dress if we take the Hill encounter into consideration.

"I got the impression due to his stooped shoulders he was about thirty to thirty-five years old. He wore either coveralls or a two-piece suit that looked like green-colored fatigues. I got the idea that he had three stripes above and three below [on his sleeve]. The above stripes were in an arch and the below stripes were in a wide V shape."

The "mechanic," on spotting Laxton, climbed a ladder and entered the craft, and the UFO soon departed. "In about five seconds," Laxton said, "it was a mile away."

Another UFO encounter linked in conclusive manner to military operations is the famous Cash-Landrum case, which took place in Dayton, Texas in 1980. Betty Cash, her friend Vickie Landrum, and Landrum's seven year old grandson were driving outside Dayton when they saw the descent of a huge UFO, flames shooting downward from the craft. The object hovered at a height of approximately 135 feet, and Cash saw it as a bright light while Landrum described a rounded top and a pointed lower portion. The car became so hot that Cash was unable to touch its outside surface.

Following the object in the car, they were surprised to see twenty-three large twin-rotor helicopters escorting it at distances no closer than three quarters of a mile. Stopping the car a number of times to observe the object, they then drove home.

It was after they had returned home that symptoms of what seemed to be radiation exposure appeared. Betty Cash's eyes swelled shut, nodules appeared on her scalp, and she suffered from nausea and vomiting. Four days after the incident she was admitted to the hospital as a burn victim. Cash had left the car to observe the object, while the other two witnesses had remained inside, and her exposure seems to have been the worst. Vickie Landrum suffered from eye inflammation and hair loss, while the child had eye inflammation and "sunburn."

Timothy Good offers clues to the nature of the object observed by Cash and Landrum, citing anonymous but, according to him, reliable sources. He says that the object has been described as an experimental nuclear powered space shuttle (just the thing to shuttle Alternative 3 'batch consignments' to the moon, one might say).

Cash and Landrum sued the government for their injuries, but the case was dismissed on the basis of the military's protestation that they possessed no such craft.

A strange "abduction" incident which may link to laser 'hot jobs' is related in the SPIRAL newsletter for April 21, 1982:

"It occurred on Dec. 11, 1979 and involved Melvin and Naomi (last name not given), a healthy couple in their early 60s. Melvin is a retired aerospace engineer 'who had received honors in the Apollo program,' according to the MUFON UFO Journal of March 1982. They were both at home that night, watching TV and having cheese and wine when they both simultaneously and instantly lost consciousness for no apparent reason. Afterwards they both took a 'trip' which could be described as hell. Neither could remember consciously what happened during the next two days, but after the incident both Naomi and Melvin were hospitalized — Naomi for treatment of "depressive reaction and dehydration" and Melvin for "psychotic reaction, dehydration and renal failure." Both had burns — Naomi had them on her hip and thigh, Melvin with a more serious burn on his hip which indented the bone, a burn on the top of his head, on both heels and a very severe one on his back. One of the physicians told Melvin he had "third degree high radiation burns."

"When they were finally able to recall at least parts of what happened during the two-day 'trip,' they described separate experiences of what might be considered a very bad LSD experience. The only thing is, when Naomi and Melvin were in the hospital (they were brought in reluctantly by Naomi's son) thorough examinations were given — including blood tests for possible traces of a drug, but none were found. Yet both obviously had some pretty wild hallucinations. They both remember being in a different room other than in their mobile home. Naomi felt as if she were in an "operating room" being examined, while Melvin was in a "cubicle" during the ordeal, with a girl who had "no features" and spoke in a "foreign" language. They both heard a continuous sound like a helicopter engine [emphasis added] during the first part of the experience. After that, their memories became distorted and they had individual bizarre experiences in their mobile home. They both thought someone or something was trying to get them. When Naomi's son came to get her, he found the furnace door was off and the thermocouple torn out despite the fact that it was below freezing that day...

"Two more pieces of the puzzle have to do with a 'black sooty film' on the TV screen, the windows of their mobile home, as well as on a macrame ornament and the drapes. They didn't find all this out until two months later when they finally returned home... To this day, none of the freakish experience has any explanation — the 'cubicle' hallucinations, the two-day blackout, the burns, the furnace, the black soot... all remains a complete mystery.

"The fact that Melvin worked on the Apollo space program would seem to tie in very neatly with the Alternative 3 theme..."

A paragraph in the previously noted "Japanese Death Ray" document from 1945 strikes a familiar note relating to UFO contact. Describing the experiments by the Japanese to perfect an electromagnetic death ray, the document reports "Throughout this programme experiments were tried on the effectiveness of short-wave radiation in stopping engines by causing pre-ignition. It was found that the radiation was effective in this respect only when the engine was unshielded and it was sometimes necessary to tune the ignition system to the frequency by varying the length of the ignition cable." This is reminiscent of the reports of automobiles stalling in the vicinity of UFOs, opening other avenues of speculation when one thinks that some UFOs might be equipped with just this sort of electromagnetic weaponry.

Another possibly sinister note is provided by an abductee interviewed by Martin Cannon. She claimed that, while being abducted by apparent aliens, she was given a gun in a ziplock baggy. This was not a laser or a zap gun, but a standard gunpowder and bullet-firing model. The woman said her abductors told her in true Manchurian Candidate fashion: "When you see the light, you will do it tonight. Execute." The abductee also reports that, after her capture and examination, she developed urges to be around guns, feelings she had never experienced before.

Mark Chapman, the assassin of John Lennon, unpleasantly leaps to mind. Recounting the experience of the final seconds prior to shooting Lennon, Chapman said: "He walked past me and then I heard in my head said, 'Do it, do it, do it, do it,' like that. I pulled the gun out of my pocket, I handed over to my left hand, I don't remember aiming. I must have done, but I don't remember drawing the bead or whatever you call it. And I just pulled the trigger steady five times."

Chapman has been circumstantially linked with CIA assassination programs and neo-Nazi groups, and, according to a number of researchers, may have been programmed to murder Lennon. It is also interesting to note that the same psychiatrist, Bernard Diamond, was used for the evaluation of Chapman and Sirhan Sirhan, the alleged assassin of Robert F. Kennedy.

Another woman interviewed by Martin Cannon said that during the course of being examined by the creatures who had abducted her she heard a very strange aside made by one “alien” abductor to another. “They will think it’s flying saucers,” the “alien” said in English.

18

To Serve Man

When evaluating suspected disinformation, we can proceed on the basis that the content of a cover-up or disinformation story can possibly offer an idea of what is being hidden, since in order to create an effective, self-perpetuating ruse, there must be a mix of truth and falsehood. This practice confuses and discredits past and future factual reports, linking them in the public mind with whatever incredible elements the disinformers may inject.

An analysis of current UFO stories, including those of flying saucers and the recent element of "underground alien bases," suggests that they may be cooked up to conceal actual realms of experimentation and manipulation by the government or other control factors. It is possible that UFO abductions are in fact the operation of secret mind control research, their terrestrial origins concealed through the use of advanced craft, with experimentation on unwitting subjects masked through hypnosis, RHIC-EDOM memory erasure corresponding to the familiar abductee experience of "missing time," or other means of mind control. What better way to conceal secret technology and human experimentation than to wrap the events in extraterrestrial trappings — perhaps using hallucinogens, alien masks, electronic effects, unusual craft, and even computerized "virtual reality" technology — and to keep issuing statements insisting that "alien abduction" is the product of someone's crazed imagination?

Conspiracy researcher Mae Brussell, in her radio show of 22 June, 1979 may have been the first to speculate on a possible core secret of UFO disinformation: the concealment of genetic experimentation, which may or may not be conducted in underground bases housing vats and utilizing bovine blood from cattle mutilations, and the connection of this experimentation to UFO coverup. Referring to the "aliens" encountered in UFO abduction experiences, Brussell said:

"My worst fear is, what if these people are genetically mutilated? What if they are humanoids that have been tampered with, and are being used for purpose of terror or development of outer space? What if that were happening? Or is it happening? I began to hear the description of the people in black [i.e. Men in Black] that follow up these sightings, and the physical descriptions and similarities of people that are seen — short humanoids, short arms, short necks, pointed ears, tight skin, holes for eyes — and I began to think of the psychiatrists that see the people afterwards, that hypnotize them and recount the stories, and wonder: who are the cast of characters that would be involved in the UFO situation if they're man-made? Like Mr. [Jacque] Vallee was saying, if they're not [from] outer space, if they're Nazi space scientists, if they're Nazi doctors...

"Where is Dr. Mengele? He's been working on genetics for forty years. There's a new book out about the thalidomide drug made by Merrill Richardson, given to women who were pregnant. It's interesting that pregnant women suffered from the deformities genetically, and their children were born without arms or legs — what they described as 'fins.' And I'm wondering if some of these experiments [have been performed] on these people, because that's been hushed up; we haven't seen photographs of these people since they've grown up. There were thousands of them in communities in Germany and England with the thalidomide children, and we haven't had any follow-up on that, or if it's been used since. Are we now meeting our own genetically refabricated children?"

There are in fact at least six federally-funded scientific teams working on what is termed the Human Genome Project, whose stated purpose is to map the molecular sequence of the 50,000 to 100,000 genes determining the structure and development of the human body, and whose unstated purposes may include eugenics goals. Certainly it is interesting that the center for Genome research in this country is located at Cold Springs Harbor, New York, historically the locale where eugenics research was launched.

The Genome Project has been referred to as "biology's moon shot," and, it is (no doubt under-) estimated, will take fifteen years and three billion dollars to accomplish. Salvador Luria, the scientific mentor of James Watson, discoverer of the structure of DNA, has criticized the project, saying that it is run by a "small coterie of power-seeking enthusiasts" leading us into a "kinder, gentler program to 'perfect' human individuals by 'correcting' their genomes..."

The truth may be even more sinister, and the scientists engaged in the project may or may not realize the full contents of the genetic Pandora's box they are opening. Project head James Watson, at least, has privately expressed concern about the dangers inherent in the project. At the International Conference on Recombinant DNA Molecules he whispered to a colleague (not intending that a nearby reporter should overhear), "We can't even measure the flicking risks."

Although the leadership of the Genome Project understandably emphasizes in public statements the acquisition of knowledge that may lead to the curing of disease and the elimination of genetic defects, there are many ethical questions being asked. Where will the line be drawn in restricting what those in power will decide what unborn generations should be? And will the mapping of the human genome herald a return to traditional elitist eugenics programming, unchallenged by a public with a short memory?

The Genome Project synchronizes perfectly with the social control purposes of the psychiatric and social control establishments. Until now they have had to accomplish their purposes by crude means such as drugs, electroshock, brain implants and electronic mind control, but with research into genetic determination and alteration, it may be possible to intervene prior to a person's birth. They may be able to breed out revolt, and to turn subjects into docile workers never questioning their living — or dying — conditions.

Marine Major Donald E. Keyhoe, in Aliens from Space, one of numerous popular UFO books he wrote trumpeting the idea of space invaders and pooh-poohing the possibility of any connection to advanced military projects, is surprisingly forthright in talking about NASA cyborg programs:

"Cyborg (cybernetic organism) is the goal of a program under NASA contract. Using chemical 'mind changers' and surgery, some future astronauts would be transformed into semi-robots... Such 'closed cycle' astronauts would be a mating of man with machine. Artificial units would replace their hearts and most other main organs. They would need no food or water — they would have built-in energy suppliers. Eventually even their brains might be replaced.

"Cyborg, the emotionless semi-robot, would be used on long journeys which could break down a normal astronaut. There is no question that it can be done — by us or an alien race."

Keyhoe quotes Dr. Toby Freedman of North American Aviation as saying, "This surgical tempering would produce a weird being who accomplishes his space mission by trading most of his physiological systems for electronic ones, whose mouth is sealed, lungs collapsed, body wastes recycled through himself, neural pathways partly severed and all his emotional feelings dissected out. He would be so fantastically changed he could never rejoin the human race."

Does the cyborg that Keyhoe and Freedman describe seem reminiscent of the "grey aliens" that so many abductees describe?

According to David Paul in Apocalypse Culture, "Naval Research Laboratories, the Japanese Ministry of International Trade and Industry, the U.S. Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency and other investors like Sharp and Sanyo-Denki are funding research into what is known as the Molecular Electronic Device (MED) or 'biochip.' There are several designs for these organic microprocessors, but the essential idea is to use protein molecules or synthetic organic molecules as computing elements to store information or act as switches with the application of voltage. Signal flow in this case would be by sodium or calcium ions. Others feel that artificial proteins can be constructed to carry signals by electron flow. Still another idea is to 'metalize' dead neuronal tissue to produce processing devices."

Paul quotes geneticist Kevin Ullmer, of Genex Corporation, as saying: "The ultimate scenario is to develop a complete genetic code for the computer that would function as a virus does, but instead of producing more virus, it would assemble a fully operational computer inside a cell."

Other theoretical possibilities are noted in the anonymous document "Alien and Government Secret Genetic Project Directives," which makes much of the collaboration of the U.S. government with space aliens (making it a probable candidate for disinformation, in my evaluation), but at the same time listing other possibilities I find more credible. These include researches into the production of synthetic biological organisms, experimental learning programs, and sub-race development (perhaps genetically bred for living under hostile other-planetary conditions). Other possibilities listed in the document are food-source development and functional skill specializations, by which human bodies would be altered or grown to perform certain functions, again suggesting abilities that might be desirable in a space colony.

I consider the document "Orion Based Technology, Mind Control and Other Secret Projects," which has circulated widely in the UFO community, to be highly suspect and probably another product of a government hack, although there may be some truth in it along with a disinformational spin. Regarding biological experimentation, the interviewed O.H. Krill (an alleged extraterrestrial left on Earth as an ambassador after the signing of a US/alien treaty) says:

"Human cloning was developed at the University of Utah at Salt Lake City in 1977. They first aired this on TV as part of a series. They had an alleged human clone on TV that they were interviewing. It didn't talk very well. They showed the original human and the clone. The clone was not all that successful. It took 14 months to generate a fully adult human clone in a tank. It was a two part series. The second part of the series never aired, for obvious reasons. CIA sources have confirmed that it started at the University of Utah. The government has a facility for clones. The first one was built in the Mount Hood area, about sixty miles east of Portland, Oregon. They have other facilities in other locations. Locations must have stable geomagnetic fields and other special characteristics or the cloning process does not work properly. They can replicate them faster now."

Science fiction? Quite probably, but in 1967 Cambridge physiologist Lord Rothschild, of all people, told scientists at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel that he considered the cloning of people would be a reality in the near future. That statement was made 25 years ago. Might cloning be a "suppressed technology" that it would be better for the public not to find out about?

The FBI keeps DNA files on those they define as "criminals," and DNA "dogtags" have now been instituted by the Army, supposedly as aid to body identification. Alan Westin of the Columbia University Department of Political Sciences has said that "there is already a dangerous call from some government individuals to extend DNA testing to broad investigative data bank collections from... the general populace."

The implementation of plans involving genetic (or even cyborg) manipulation should be made vastly easier by using a DNA "wand" that Cornell University admits to having perfected. The wand is hand-held and shoots ten million DNA-coated pellets into living flesh. There is no visible effect on the skin, and the pellets are so small that virtually no sensation is felt. This DNA wand is highly reminiscent of the reports of the hardware used on some UFO abductees by "aliens."

Stories of human vat experimentation and the frequent observation of unmarked or military helicopters in the vicinity of cattle mutilations provide a suggestion that the military or some other organization are doing experimentation requiring large quantities of blood for its accomplishment.

In the classic mutilation scenario the cow appears to have been completely drained of blood, while still living, in some unknown quick procedure. Using advanced surgical techniques, blood and organs are removed; usually one ear, one eye, the tongue and the anus. The animal is left behind, often in a highly unnatural position: flat on its back with legs sticking into the air, with no blood in the carcass or on the ground around it, and no foot or hoofprints surrounding it, not even those of the dead animal. Many of the carcasses also appear to have been dropped from a height, as if from a hovering aircraft.

The first official reports of mutilated livestock came from Colorado in the early 1960s where, in two counties, there were combined reports of 169 mutilated cows. Since that time the mutilation of more than 70,000 head of cattle, horses and other domestic and wild animals has been reported across the U.S. as well as in Canada, England, Brazil and even Kenya. Yet there has not been a single arrest, nor a single perpetrator caught in the act. Certainly, if there had been 70,000 cars or televisions stolen there would have been arrests and people doing jail time.

One possible clue to cattle mutilation is that the removing of the cow's blood may be the prime focus of the operation, this because of the similarity of bovine and human blood. Insight magazine for September 18, 1989 announced that a supplement to human blood made from cow's blood was about to be clinically tested. The magazine related that scientists were working on a blood supplement called Hemopure I, and that it could be used in short term situations, such as emergency replacement of blood lost through car accidents and shootings. Cow hemoglobin, it was reported, is similar in its amino acid and oxygen content to human hemoglobin, contains 40 times more red blood cells than an equal amount of human blood, and can be stored indefinitely.

There are additional clues that are not often mentioned in the popular media. Many "mutes" have been found to have been marked with fluorescent paint, probably as an aid to identification in the dark. A large percentage of mutilated cattle have also been found to have been injected with strains of harmful Clostridium bacteria (of which blackleg and malignant adema are members of the genus). In an investigation of bacteriological warfare in 1970, Senator Frank Church's Senate Select Committee on Intelligence determined that the CIA had stockpiled canisters of this same bacteria.

One persistent rumor has been that cattle are used in biological testing due to the similarity of the membrane of the eye with that of a certain ethnic group. Researcher Ed Sanders interviewed G.C. Errianne, a former member of an unspecified intelligence agency, who admitted that secret bacterial research was being conducted in the United States and that these researches were targeted "in regard to Oriental warfare." Sanders also interviewed reporter Bill Hendrix of KTVX-TV in Salt Lake City, who confirmed that Dugway Proving Ground in Utah had done research on a specifically anti-Oriental biological weapon.

The anonymous COM-12 intelligence briefing provides another link between government testing and UFO disinformation. Citing the Wackenhut organization as being in charge of a number of covert operations around the world, the COM-12 document places the group under the umbrella of a secret government project termed "Yellow Lodge":

"The 'Yellow Lodge' project involves the infiltration and covert operations of advanced chemical, biological and, in some cases, weapons development. These activities, due to the sovereign status of Indian lands [where they are conducted], can be carried out by private and covert operations without answering to the legitimate arm of the U.S. government. This scenario is especially true of the Jicarilla Apache lands, as well as many other reservations in the American Southwest — the largest of these being the umbra-classification base known as D6 (Dulce) in the state of New Mexico."

It is interesting to note that the alleged underground base at Dulce figures as the most popular locale for government-alien collaboration in the writings of the extraterrestrial invasion school of UFO writing, as, for instance, in the probable hoax Dulce File.

There has been a good deal of speculation about the cattle mutilations being performed by Satanists or other occultists during ritual activity, but it is extremely odd that none of the perpetrators have been caught in the act, or arrested later. A possibility exists that these crimes are being committed by someone above the law. As to whether it is the government using unmarked helicopters, Satanists, or aliens in their UFOs, I think the first possibility most likely.

There have been other mutilations that the media are not telling you about. A media blackout has been enforced on the subject of traffic in human organs, sold almost entirely to the wealthy, and the farming of these organs in Central America.

In the article "Loathsome Sale of Human Flesh" in the virtually underground Athens, Georgia Observer, researcher Joe Ionno states:

"According to a Resolution of the European Parliament on the Trafficking of Central American Children, 'human farms' complete with 'fattening houses' have been discovered in Honduras and Guatamala.

"In San Pedro Sula, Honduras, it was reported that near one such farm, corpses of infants were discovered that 'had been stripped of a number of organs.'

"In Guatamala, at another 'human farm' babies ranging from 11 days old to four months old were discovered. They 'were sold to wealthy American or Israeli families whose children needed organ transplants at the cost of $75,000 per child,' according to the director of the farm who made this claim during his arrest.

"Though extremely reputable newspapers such as Le Monde (France), the Guardian (England) and the Honduran journal El Tiempo have carried stories of such atrocities, none, to my knowledge, have appeared in any major U.S. publications...

"The July 22, 1990 issue of La Prensa Dominical (Honduras)... reported that police in El Salvador had uncovered a smuggling ring headed by (what else?) a lawyer which was buying children for resale in the U.S., noting that 20,000 children disappear every year in Mexico.

"The report states, 'The most gory fact, however, is that many little ones are used for transplant or organs to children in the United States,' and further suggests that this may be the reason that the highest rate of kidnapping of children from infants to 18 year olds is in those regions of Mexico which border on the U.S.

"El Tiempo reports that an appeals court judge in Honduras ordered 'a meticulous investigation into the sale of Honduran children for the purpose of using their organs for transplant operations.'

"The Honduran Secretary of the National Council of Social Services (the agency in charge of adoptions) reported that children 'were being sold to the body traffic industry' for organ transplants.

Ionno quotes as sources Le Monde, September 21, 1988; the Guardian Weekly, October 2, 1990; El Tiempo, August 10, August 17 and September 21, 1988, and Noam Chomsky's book Deterring Democracy.

A question arises. When genes can be tinkered with and, as is the case now, copyrighted, when biological forms can be altered and meshed, dissected with ease and without the slightest compunction, where will the line be drawn between humans and veal cutlets? Will the "lower classes" then no longer be the "useless eaters," as they were termed by the Nazis and by former CIA director William Colby, but the "useful eaten"?

I am reminded of the classic Twilight Zone episode in which 'friendly' aliens come to Earth to invite humans to return with them to see their world. Human reporters acquire a book written by the aliens entitled To Serve Man. As the hero of the tale is stepping into the aliens' saucer his secretary rushes up with the news that they have translated the book — and that it is a gourmet cookbook.

I received an unexpected and startling reality check after writing the above in an unattributed magazine clipping reprinted in Michael A. Hoffman's Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare. Titled "Eating Raoul... and Others," the article wonders, "How would you like to bite into a part-human bacon cheeseburger?" asks Michael Colgan, Ph.D., in the journal Nutrition and Fitness (Vol. 10, No. 1 & 2). In five years they'll be at a burger stand near you, predicts the author. The U.S. Department of Agriculture's research center in Beltsville, Md., has been inserting human genes into fertilized swine eggs, and a herd of "hupigs" now resides at the center. One goal of such research is to manufacture "spare parts for humans," that is, genetically engineered organs to replace diseased human organs; another goal is to “design” animals for more efficient meat production.

“The USDA creatures reportedly suffer from coordination so poor that they can barely walk. They also are subject to arthritis and lung and gut diseases. State and federal laws severely restrict access by journalists and the public, and photographs of the ‘hunimals’ are forbidden.”

Pondering the possible motives of government and para-govemment genetic and cyborg projects, I can see that ultimately they may be intended to violate and destroy the last barrier to world totalitarian control: humanness itself.

Gone, long gone, is the consideration of human life as having an inherent personality and value. These “imaginative” scientists in the employ of super-capitalists seem to have lost sight of everything but the power inherent in their vision (“Power is the great aphrodisiac,” so sayeth Henry Kissinger). They may see life as raw material and the ultimate energy-utilization extension, as a remote control web for augmenting control intention. Life, intelligence, may be viewed by them as a malleable, virtually unlimited sub-control mechanism that can be linked, even atomically, with such technologies as molecular robotics and nanotech (ie. molecular manufacturing, controlling the structure of matter) to mold universe energies into instantaneously-crystallized realities, Xanadus for the gratification of these would-be immortals. Beyond mind control, this would be tantamount to “soul control.”

Is life viewed by these “scientists” and their bosses as slave-energy that can be shaped and replicated at will, formed into “bodies” and “body-corporations” of protoplasm, as submissive genii for manifesting the whims of the elite?

19

Other Alternatives

Alternatives 1 and 2, according to the book, were also considered as possible solutions for the deteriorating conditions on Earth. These consisted of, respectively, a plan to atomically blow holes in the atmosphere to release pollution into space, and a plan to create subterranean dwellings for the world's elite to escape to when things on the surface get too bad.

There was, in fact, a program of upper atmosphere detonation of nuclear weapons that took place in the fifties and sixties. According to The Leading Edge magazine, in the article "Project Argus and the Rainbow Bombs: United States Nuclear Detonations in Space":

"Around 1958, the significant implications of the Earth's magnetic fields and radiation belts for future military activities were what drew the attention of government physicists. Nicholas Christofilos, a physicist working at the University of California's Livermore Radiation laboratory, developed techniques to harness and control the energy released in hydrogen fusion reactions. Christofilos used magnetic confinement fields. When the Soviets launched Sputnik I, Christofilos decided that the Earth's magnetic field could be used to contain an artificial band of relativistic electrons. He speculated that this artificial radiation belt could be made intense enough to destroy satellites in orbit. The belt would produce worldwide radio noise on the HF and VHF radio bands that carried the bulk of military communications. By accurately calculating the site for an explosion of a nuclear device, its effects could be made to occur over a specific target area. Christofilos urged that the government test his postulates by exploding a nuclear device in space. Christofilos' superiors at Livermore placed his papers under top security control and advised the President's Science Advisory group of the matter. The resulting program became Project Argus."

Project Argus tests took place, the anonymous article states, in the South Atlantic, August 27, 1958, with a one kiloton bomb exploded at two hundred kilometer altitude; in the South Atlantic on August 30, 1958, a one kiloton bomb exploded at 250 kilometer altitude; and in the South Atlantic on September 6, 1958, a one kiloton bomb exploded at an altitude of 500 kilometers. Post Argus testing included a 1.4 megaton bomb launched from Johnston Island on July 9, 1962 and exploded at an altitude of 400 kilometers. Along with the American testing, there have been several Soviet nuclear explosions in space. All were launched from Siberia and included the October 22, 1962 launch of a 200 kiloton bomb; the October 28, 1962 launch of an 800 kiloton weapon; and the November 1, 1962 launch of a 1 plus megaton weapon.

The result of all this "testing" has been quite different from the proposed solution of Alternative 1, to wit: the tests created two intense belts of radiation around the Earth. These radiation belts have, at the very least, cost the space programs of all nations billions of dollars. The only effective radiation shielding from these radiation belts is lead, and as it is too heavy to be used, this has forced craft with cargos sensitive to radiation (like living things) to be launched in steeper and vastly more expensive trajectories than would have been needed in order to get through the Van Allen belts. The dubious scientific triumph of upper atmosphere testing was decried by some scientists at the time, but their protests have long since been forgotten.

In what may be only coincidence with the Alternative 2 proposals, as reported in "The Effects of Atomic Weapons" from the Los Alamos laboratory, as early as September, 1950 the Defense Department had its eyes on underground base construction, calling such construction "desirable," and reporting that "There are apparently no fundamental difficulties in constructing and operating underground various types of important facilities."

In the proceedings of the Second Protective Construction Symposium on Deep Underground Construction in 1959, sponsored by the U.S. Air Force and carried out by the Rand Corporation think tank (a CIA-funded group that have plunged their thumbs deep into many a secretive pie-graph), it was stated,

"We have just prepared cost estimates on using a continuous shaft-sinking device for a contractor bidding on an Air Force Titan installation in Colorado. This one machine would bore tunnels varying in diameter from 10 ft. to 45 ft. Just as airplanes, ships and automobiles have given man mastery of the surface of the Earth, tunnel-boring machines and shaft-sinkers will give him access to the subterranean world. It is our aim to provide machines which will supply the ever-increasing demand in mind and construction of underground facilities."

The RAND Corporation also investigated the use of atomic bombs to blast underground cavities for habitation.

Russell Miller, of the Colorado School of Mines, and director of the Center for Space Mining in Boulder, Colorado, has worked on studies for underground cities on the moon and Mars. One method which has been proposed by him for the building of underground extraterrestrial colonies would be to use missiles to drive holes fifty feet beneath the Lunar or Martian soil, and then to use atomic bombs to blast out huge cavities. Igloos would be constructed over the holes, and plastic bags would be inserted into the cavities and then inflated. Workers could then construct livable habitats underground.

In the late 1970s it was revealed that an underground city in Bluemont, Virginia, dubbed "Mount Weather," was operated by the previously discussed government agency FEMA and staffed with one thousand mostly civilian workers. Mount Weather is part of FEMA's COG (Continuity of Government) plans, providing for the escape of the President and four thousand other government officials in event of unstipulated catastrophe; nuclear, revolutionary, or otherwise. Built at a cost of over one billion dollars and costing $42 million per year to operate, Mount Weather is a city of offices which includes a dining hall, sleeping quarters, and situation rooms with electronic map displays for the proper Dr. Strangelove ambiance.

Another facility, the Alternate National Military Command, also known as Raven Rock or Site R, is located five miles north of Camp David, under 650 feet of granite. Known as the "Underground Pentagon," the 265,000 square foot bunker was built in 1949 on the orders of Harry Truman, and has a staff of 350.

Up to fifty other underground military installations are located in the United States, and are funded by huge "black budget" allocations. Tim Weiner, Pulitzer prize-winning author of Blank Check, has stated that more black budget money goes into these underground projects than into any other kind of project. This gives rise to the speculation that the "current crop of disinformation," as William Moore puts it, about government collaboration with evil aliens in underground bases, is very likely aimed to confuse the purposes of underground facilities in the public mind.

There is a possibility that some of these underground facilities are utilized for the purposes Louis Jolyon West suggested for a converted Nike base in California in the 1960s: populace control by the implantation of brain control devices. These electronic brain implants do exist (and have been shown in x-rays of both abductees and mental patients), and it may be significant that in alien abduction stories the devices are often said to be inserted in precisely the same way that psycho-surgeons implant them: nasally. Indeed, the activities of “aliens” described by “UFO abductees” are strikingly reminiscent of the programming operations that the CIA and other organizations have been shown to perform — at least sometimes without the benefit of flying saucers.

The bases may serve other purposes, including COG (as it is termed), and what is essentially an infrastructure for conducting secret military research projects. What is not often mentioned in discussions of the purposes of the underground bases is that one of the threats that they are meant to protect against is an uprising by the American people. From the safety of the underground installations the current American dictator can hole-up with his military and exterminate any possible threat from above ground.

I consider it highly unlikely that the underground bases have anything to do with outer space aliens (I don’t reject the possibility out of hand, it is just that I have seen no plausible evidence substantiating a government-alien collaboration, and much evidence to suggest that this story is cooked up by and serves the government by confusing the issue).

Researcher Michael Lindemann, in a lecture given in San Diego in 1991, talked about his beliefs about the underground bases:

“There is indeed another government operating, and that government... operates primarily behind the scenes. Other researchers have called it ‘The Secret Government’ and others have called it ‘The High Cabal,’ and it is a group of people, a very elite group of non-elected, self-appointed people who guide the evolution of policy from behind the scene. These are people who transcend partisan politics, indeed who transcend the rule of law, with no thought whatsoever for the dictates of the Constitution. These are people who regard themselves as the only true guardians and crafters of geopolitical reality, and they regard us, indeed they regard our elected officials, as mere mortals. These people are the self-appointed Olympians. They have done many things in the name of an agenda which is their own, which we would consider appalling and reprehensible. Indeed, these things are criminal, but they are more than criminal, because they have sapped and usurped the rights and privileges and possibilities for our future. These people are running a kind of ‘Endgame’ right now. They are trying to determine how they will survive the End Time. Whether that End Time comes as a kind of Biblical Apocalypse, or more likely comes as the catastrophic collapse of the environment, coupled with the catastrophic population bomb, and all the other things that may indeed ‘get our goat,’ whether it comes as the collapse of the banking system which looks to be only days away, or the collapse of the world economy, there are many things that could get us, and these people, in effect, are building their own version of Noah's ark. And that Noah's ark they are building is underground: underground bases, indeed all over the world, but particularly in the United States. Huge underground bases which actually festoon the underground geography of our continent in a way that would probably stun and shock you. ...These are places that are capable of supporting on an on-going basis some tens of thousands of people, so across the country it may be possible to save an elect remnant of some hundreds of thousands of people who will be the cream of the civilization that is meant to survive the Apocalypse, or the downfall, or... whatever it is that is out there getting us. Mere mortals will have to fend for themselves."

Better, the nation's clandestine agencies seem to think, that we should believe that Earth has been invaded by murderous grey aliens in disk craft than realize that preparations are being made for the total, rather than partial suspension of the Constitution and the inauguration of an American dictatorship, possibly in the configuration of the much-touted New World Order.

An instructive study funded by the Trilateral Commission (a highly influential global organization whose origin can be traced back to the Rockefellers and the Rhodes' Round Table) is titled The Crisis of Democracy: Report on the Governability of Democracies to the Trilateral Commission. The paper was authored by Samuel Huntington in 1975 and provides insight into attitudes of the international controllers and goals guiding the government.

The study diagnoses the problems of the world as stemming, since "the democratic surge of the 1960s," from too much "democracy," and that "arenas where democratic procedures are appropriate are limited." Prescribed for this malady is a strengthening of elitist control, including the lowering of expectations among the poor and middle class, and a marshalling of power in the executive branch of U.S. government.

"The trend of the last decade toward the steady diminution of the power of the President should be stopped and reversed," the study states. "The President clearly has the responsibility for insuring national action on critical matters of economic and foreign policy. He cannot discharge that responsibility if he is fettered by a chain of picayune legislative restrictions and prohibitions."

The study proposes further linkages of government and business in economic planning, the pacification of labor, and increased press "self-regulation," i.e. self-censorship ("But there is also the need to assure to the government the right and the ability to withhold information at the source.") Also mentioned in the study is the need for education to be geared to "the constructive discharge of the responsibilities of citizenship," and that "a program is necessary to lower the job expectations of those who receive a college education."

Lest you think I exaggerate... Huntington feels that many of the problems facing our society are due to too much participation by the populace, since a functional system requires "some measure of apathy and noninvolvement." He goes on to say, "Previously passive or unorganized groups in the population, blacks, Indians, Chicanos, white ethnic groups, students, and women now embarked on concerted efforts to establish their claims to opportunities, positions, rewards, and privileges, which they had not considered themselves entitled [sic] before... Some of the problems of governance in the United States today stem from an excess of democracy... Needed, instead, is a greater degree of moderation in democracy... For a quarter-century the United States was the hegemonic power in a system of world order. The manifestations of the democratic distemper, [emphasis added] however have already stimulated uncertainty among allies..."

Confirming dictatorial plans of our leaders, elected and otherwise, are other statements about the planned New World Order. The CFR's Zbigniew Brzezinski in his book Between Two Ages: America's Role in the Technetronic Era gave a particularly explicit rendering. Brzezinski, a major theorist in One World circles, postulates a multiple stage evolution in man's history, beginning with a poverty-ridden 'religious' existence evolving into nationalism. The next stage, according to Zbig, is Marxism, leading into a final 'Technetronic' era. In the Technetronic era "the nation state as a fundamental unit of man's organized life has ceased to be the principal creative force: International banks and multinational corporations are acting and planning in terms that are far in advance of the political concepts of the nation-state." Reassuring vision, what?

An article which contains a kind of "Alternative 4" is the Byzantine "Franciscan Document," sent anonymously to me in 1991, and published in my anthology Secret and Suppressed. It purports to be a synthesis of secret information discovered in the Vatican Library by an unnamed Franciscan monk, and the inked imprint of a Vatican library entry chit at the end of the document lends it a degree of credibility. The document goes into an extensive revisionist history of the Roman Catholic Church, the Western world, and the actions of secret elitist cliques in controlling and disposing of humanity in properly sinister ways. The section that may relate to Alternative 4 follows:

"Current policies of the elite regarding the general estate of the commoners, as I myself have seen and read, is telling. While a policy of division, factionalism and antagonism is the order of the day (particularly in the United States, where what must be the most diversified population on Earth is kept in a state of turmoil by divisive legislation intended to provoke interracial strife and social stratification), there are two primary schools of thought regarding the actual use to which the subjects are to be put. While there is general agreement across the board with the notion that the commoners must be downbred, in order to reduce their intelligence and make them less apt to rise up in rebellion, a large faction - who appear to be holding sway - counsel a massive slaughter of the majority of the 'useless eaters.' ...The plan appears to be to reduce the world population overall to more manageable numbers; these survivors may then be limited as to reproduction, numbers maintained at just the level necessary to insure a force of slaves. The reason behind this reduction is among the most frightening revelations I feel I shall make: according to the best estimates of clique-employed climatologists, the world - contrary to the current 'Greenhouse Effect' story - is drawing inexorably toward another glaciation. The 'Ice Ages' are always spoken of in the past tense, always treated as occurances in prehistory, never to be repeated; however, glaciation has been the norm for this world since roughly two million years ago; alternating cycles of glaciation and warm interstadial, following an approximate one-hundred-thousand year cycle (ninety thousand years of glaciation, followed by ten thousand of interstadial, plus or minus as much as two thousand years) are the normal climate of our Earth, since the end of the Pliocene era (or perhaps slightly earlier). When the icesheets once again advance, it is the plan of the elite to move the trappings of civilization south, a forced march of laden slaves to the southern hemisphere (the glaciers cover only the northern climes), and to this end, 'housecleaning' has already begun. AIDS ravages primarily (though not exclusively) third-world populations, hence the southern lands will be defenseless; massive tracts are already being cleared and prepared for construction in South America and North America - expected to be covered, by the middle of the twenty-second century, with a two-mile thick blanket of ice - is being treated as a garbage bin, industrial effluvia of the most noxious varieties being poured out all over the land; it will cease to be of use to the elite, ergo it must be rendered useless to anyone else. Even the most dangerous of the industrial wastes will break down and be reassimilated by the soil in ninety thousand years, hence when the ice clears, a trek back to the north will be possible, if desired. In the interim, the commoners are kept palliated, entertained, too busy to investigate the world around them - and reduced, by slow attrition of incurable disease, to a desired size."

It is true that, until the middle 70s, the popular and scientific press did not talk about global warming but instead about a looming Ice Age. During the International Geophysical Year of 1958-59 scientists took thousands of core samples of Antarctic and Greenland ice, and throughout the sixties paleoclimatologists attempted to construct a history of this planet's prehistoric weather. The scientists concluded that Ice Ages occurred with far greater frequency than had previously been thought, and that we are now well into a pre-glacial cooling trend. Current warmer weather was explained by positing cycles within cycles in weather patterns, and that while the overall trend was toward an inevitable Ice Age, with perhaps 2,000 to 6,000 years to reach full glaciation, there would be recurrent periods of brief warming.

The CIA got in on the action with the August 1974 report, "A Study of Climatological Research as it Pertains to Intelligence Problems," providing a survey of then-current research, all of it seeming to say that an Ice Age was in fact due. The document lists "significant" research projects (including one being conducted by the RAND Corporation), and concludes:

"Leaders in climatology and economics are in agreement that a climatic change is taking place and that it has already caused major economic problems throughout the world. As it becomes more apparent to the nations around the world that the current trend is indeed a long-term reality, new alignments will be made among nations to insure a secure supply of food resources. Assessing the impact of climatic change on major nations will, in the future, occupy a major portion of the Intelligence Community's assets." Really?

"It is increasingly evident," the study continues, "that the Intelligence Community must understand the magnitude of international threats which occurs as a function of climatic change. These methodologies are necessary to forewarn us of the economic and political collapse of nations caused by a worldwide failure in food production. In addition, methodologies are also necessary to project and assess a nation's propensity to initiate militarily large-scale migrations of their people as has been the case for the last 4,000 years."

Another CIA study released in the same year, "Potential Implications of Trends in World Population, Food Production and Climate," indicates that, "In the worst case if climate change caused grave shortages of food despite U.S. exports, the potential risks to the U.S. would also rise. There would be increasingly desperate attempts on the part of powerful but hungry nations to get grain any way they could. Massive migrations, sometimes backed by force, [emphasis added] would become a live issue and political and economic instability would be widespread. In the poor and powerless areas, population would have to drop to levels that could be supported. The population 'problem' would have solved itself in the most unpleasant fashion."

So how did the current Greenhouse scenarios evolve? Although the evidence that we are experiencing global warming is persuasive, there is a possibility that this might comprise a glitch within a longer overall tendency toward another Ice Age, in support of the "Franciscan Document" and the CIA studies. It is not impossible, even, that studies of glacial cooling have been suppressed since the 1980s, or even the mid-70s, when Alternative 3 appeared. Why?

Humans have never been very good at taking action in advance of disaster, and 'closing the barn door after the horse escapes' fairly well summarizes the populace's handling of problems, or so it seems to me. If an impending Ice Age is thousands of years ahead of us, why bother doing anything now? On the other hand, if global warming and the Greenhouse Effect could kill us all in the next thirty years, it should be obvious that we had better do something, and pretty damned fast.

With global warming we have a clear warning that, given enough propagandizing, might even be heeded. It has been widely professed that it will take an international effort to alleviate the Greenhouse Effect, requiring that the peoples of Earth drastically alter their lifestyles toward austerity (as foreshadowed by the propaganda of the Carter administration), which in addition will require some sort of planetary governing organization and police force to ensure compliance to its edicts. Global warming, factual or not, is tailor-made to the creation of a One World Government, and it seems likely that if there was no Greenhouse Effect it would be in the One Worlders' best interests to create one.

20

Das Marsprojekt

One of the difficulties in researching Alternative 3 was that the evidence kept leading me in a direction that I wasn't particularly happy to go in: toward the Nazis. Again and again the Nazi connections kept cropping up in association with Alternative 3 themes, but it was a connection which for obvious reasons I was reluctant to make.

Frankly, the Nazis are 'old hat,' almost a joke amongst the politically correct of today. I was reluctant to raise the specter of latter-day Nazism for fear of a dismissal as off-handed as my own reactions to Alternative 3 on first reading. And yet, in researching the shape of totalitarian control during this century I saw that the plans of the Nazis manifestly did not die with the German loss of World War II. The ideology and many of the principal players survived and flourished after the war, and have had a profound impact on postwar history, and on events taking place today.

A possibility, which I admit is wild speculation, yet at the same time comprises a startling alignment of facts, is that Alternative 3 is an expression of Nazi occult doctrine and that there is a long term elitist program to abandon Earth and to implement another step in Hitler's "Final Solution."

Adolf Hitler's occult orientation apparently began when, at ten years of age, he attended the Lambach Abbey School in Lambach am Traum, Austria. The abbot of the school was steeped in metaphysical doctrine, including astrology and 13th century Catharism, which had much in common with the Templar-styled occultism that Hitler would later delve into. Upon return from his travels in the East where he had engaged in Sufi studies, the abbot directed that a swastika be engraved over the entrance to the abbey, in addition to having them engraved on all the religious icons of the school and in the four comers of the building. Obviously, there was something about the power of the swastika that impressed him.

It was at Lambach Abbey that Hitler met Benedictine monk Adolf Joseph Lanz, who was later to introduce him to Vienna's occultist-racialist orders. Lanz, after doffing his monk's habit, formed the Order of the New Temple in 1905, and was the publisher of the Order's Ostara magazine. Ostara's emblem was the swastika, and the organization promoted Aryan Templarism and a war with worldwide Jewry, who were seen to be the secret masters behind the manipulation of world political and financial systems. Qualifications for joining the New Templars included having blonde hair and blue eyes, slender hands and feet, and an elongated cranium. Lanz also proposed that there should be colonies of New Templars founded away from what he saw to be the negative influence of towns and cities, and he compiled a handbook for those wishing to be future colonists.

While Hitler maintained that his National Socialism began when he joined the German Workers' Party and found a young political group with whose principals he could identify, this explanation ignores the group's existence as a front for the occultist, espionage and assassination network of the Thule Society, of which Hitler held membership as a "Visiting Brother." Freemasonic-inspired and associated with the Vril Society, the origin of both groups can be traced through English occult Fascist influences to the writings of Edward Bulwer-Lytton, author of Vril: The Power of the Coming Race, the godfather of the British Round Table group.

Thule and Vril proposed the extermination of "inferior" races and the creation of an Aryan race of supermen, in what was essentially a radical eugenic outlook. Thule was led by Baron von Sebottendorf, an expert in Sufism and Eastern affairs, astrologer and occultist, and it was in this group that Hitler met Karl Haushofer, reportedly the author of the geopolitical section of Mein Kampf, the manuscript of which is said to have been passed by Rudolf Hess to Hitler while he was imprisoned in Landsberg Fortress after the Munich putsch. Haushofer was an expert in Oriental and Sufi mysticism and a leading member of Vril, in close contact with British Viceroy Lord Kitchener, the Isis-Urania Temple of Hermetic Students of the Golden Dawn, as well other English mystics and mystical groups. Haushofer believed in a philosophy of "blood and soil"; that a race's survival depends upon lebensraum (translation: living space, incidentally the title of the Johnny Dolphin poem referred to in the chapter on Biosphere II), and that a vital race, to remain so, must continually expand and conquer "inferior races." He is reported to have said to a group of students which included Rudolf Hess that, "Space is not only the vehicle of power; it is power."

Hitler seems to have seen himself as, among other things, a latter-day leader of the historic Teutonic Knights, whose history includes their origin as kindred to the mysterious Knights Templar. The Teutonic Knights clad themselves in the familiar white mantle of the Templars, which was emblazoned with a black, rather than a red Eastern cross, and were the historical possessors of the Ordenstaat or Ordensland principality, a territory extending from Prussia and including Finland and portions of Russia. Their legendry identifies them as the guardians of the Holy Grail, the magical cup reputed to have held Jesus' blood or, in an alternate version, an engraved tablet of stone which contained the secrets of ancient Aryan magic.

Hitler may have best explained his beliefs about the Grail when he stated: "We shall form an Order, the Brotherhood of the Templars, around this Holy Grail of the pure blood." Is it possible that Hitler saw through the metaphorical-initiatory nature of the Jesus Christ legend, and believed this cup of blood to be an ancient metaphor (and perhaps simultaneously an historic, even magical physical relic) symbolizing Aryan racial purity?

Another influence on the Hitlerian occult cosmology was Wel (for Welteislehre, "the doctrine of eternal ice"), first expressed in the book Glazialkosmogonie (1912) by Hans Hörbiger, a man whom Hitler met on several occasions and whom he is said to have equated in importance with Copernicus. It occurs to me that Wel may have been the inspiration for Immanuel Velikovsky's famous Worlds in Collision, although Velikovsky understandably didn't go out of his way to emphasize this connection.

Wel supposes that the nature of the universe is an eternal attraction-repulsion between cosmic ice and fire, and that this principle governs everything, including man's destiny. Star systems in the cosmos of Wel were caused by blocks of cosmic ice plunging into stars, creating vast explosions. Hörbiger believed the history of the Earth to be one of successive cataclysms and the resultant rise and fall of races of giants, demi-gods, and other mutations, a concept echoing Aryan mythology and Thule doctrine. He also maintained that the moon was the third satellite that the Earth had captured, 12,000 years in the past, and that one of the laws of eternal ice was that the planets are subject to a continual spiralling motion into the maw of the central Sun (a possible symbolism of the swastika?). Hörbiger predicted that another Earthly cataclysm was inevitable. He believed that as the moon approached the Earth it would explode due to gravitational forces, and that this would probably destroy all life on the planet.

In Hitler Speaks, Hitler is quoted as having said to Danzig Mayor Rauschning: "Just as, at the dawning of a new geological era, the whole world collapses in a gigantic crack, new mountains rise up while gaping abysses open up, and new plains and seas take shape, so will the present structure of Europe be capsized in an immense cataclysm... The only chance for Germany to resist this pressure will be to seize the initiative and take control of the inevitable upheaval from which will come a new dawning of history."

Since Hitler did believe Hörbiger's cosmological theories, then his Thule-inspired racialist philosophy might have compelled him to look far afield for a new Fatherland, away from the doomed Earth. He may also have seen the non-Aryan "sub-human" races as the labor necessary to achieve this cosmic destiny, minions of army ants laboring in underground factories in the construction of the ultimate V-2.

Hitler revealed his greater ambitions when he said, "I had to encourage 'national' feelings for reasons of expediency; but I was already aware that the 'nation' idea could only have a temporary value. The day will come when even here in Germany what is known as 'nationalism' will practically have ceased to exist. What will take its place in the world will be a universal society of masters and overlords." In retrospect, this is a particularly modern vision.

Again in Hitler Speaks, Hitler is quoted as having said that humanity was evolving into two types, a new age man and a class of undermen. "I might call the two varieties the god-man and the mass animal... Man is becoming God — that is the simple fact. Man is God in the making."

Hitler, interestingly enough, had his own "alternatives," numbering four, which are outlined in Mein Kampf (the title a kind of pun, mirroring the Darwinian emphasis on evolutionary "struggle"). Like Alternative 3, Hitler foresaw a coming world of scarcity, and emphasized that there were limits to the "carrying capacity" of German resources. He proposed four possible solutions.

The first would be birth control for the Germans, to achieve population growth limits that could be sustained.

The second solution would be the use of modern technologies to increase resource yield in the Fatherland. Hitler pointed to the underlying problems with both of these options, arguing that a people whose numbers remained the same while living in an inevitably shrinking environment or natural resource base would eventually have to deal with "culturally inferior but more brutal and more natural peoples."

Hitler's third option was German interdependence with other nations. This he rejected because of the need to entrust the survival of the Aryan race to the whims of other nation states and their puppet masters.

The fourth option was war. Hitler summed up this option by saying, "We must, therefore, cooly and objectively adopt the standpoint that it is certainly not the intention of Heaven to give one people fifty times as much land and soil in this world as another... we must not let political boundaries obscure the boundaries of eternal justice... The law of self-preservation goes into effect."

In summation Hitler said that, "The folkish philosophy finds the importance of mankind in its basic racial elements. In the state it sees on principle only a means to an end and it construes its end as the preservation of the racial existence of man... And so the folkish philosophy of life corresponds to the innermost will of nature, since it restores the free play of forces which must lead to a continuous mutual higher breeding, until at last the best of humanity, having achieved possession of this Earth, will have a free path for activity in domains which will lie partly above it and partly outside it." [emphasis added]

Relating to what may have been Hitler's cosmic ambitions, American educator John Taylor Gatto has commented upon the unexamined agenda of a West based upon what he sees as a European hereditary elite of primarily Aryan descent. Gatto states in "The Dying American Family and the Viking Mind" that, "Institutions would be created — adoption — compulsion-schools — vast hierarchical corporations — gigantic standing armies and navies — a government comprising 10% of the total population! — these and more would turn American social life into a scientific hive, a place where everybody's values, clothing, eating habits would be reflections of the clean mechanical style of a Viking elite... Upon the success of this plan depended salvation of the Homeland far from home..."

In an observation in which Gatto links the motives of warlike ancient Vikings with their longships to generations of transplanted sons and daughters in America, he comments:

"Is it so surprising that a cult of ships arose? Whatever pushed those beautiful craft night after night through mountainous seas to bloody wealth and fame became ideas and behaviors to revere. A man surviving and prospering by following the code of the longship would want his own sons to learn that code; others would speak of it in awe. When longships sailed no more the code was still taught: strength, youth, self-reliance, courage, exhilaration in the face of danger, contempt for weakness, keen watchfulness, mercilessness toward enemies, joy in treasure, boredom with old planets, an appetite for new ones." [emphasis added]

Summing up ideas that seem to add up to a Junker Alternative 3, we are familiar with the advanced disk aircraft designs perfected by the Nazis during World War II, and also know that the American space program was run by prominent Nazis, or at least ex-Nazis. Nazi interests have also been entwined, since the emergence of the philosophy, with other totalitarian control mechanisms of the world, with the intelligence, police, and psychiatric establishments, with eugenics and genetic research, as well as with the plans of monied elites whose philosophies might better be defined in para-political, rather than political terms.

My belief is that the Nazis have been major, but far from the only players in the game of world domination since the end of World War II: one among many heads of the Hydra. Influential Nazis (possibly including Hitler) have been behind the scenes since the end of the war, creating and implementing schemes for the ultimate triumph of Die Neuordnung. Almost all of Hitler's cohorts survived Nuremberg and many have been involved in manipulations including international terrorism and the establishment of worldwide drug and arms markets, as well as in collaboration with other more "respectable" networks of world influence.

While I cannot state with certainty that Nazis are creating the "real" domination of Alternative 3, that they have constructed or are constructing bases on Mars or the moon to carry the ancient Grail of Aryan racial purity away from what they conceive as a cataclysm-doomed Earth, I do have to wonder at the logic and symmetry of detail.

21

Control

What is ultimately important about Alternative 3 is not that it sets much of its grim script on the moon or Mars, or beneath "ice of Arctic" as Leslie Watkins says; those are merely locales that humans currently inhabit or will probably soon be erecting Golden Arches in. What is important is the explicit pointing to government and ruling class atrocity and human subjugation, and the warning it contains. Alternative 3 is a scenario of the victimization of humankind — which I presume includes you — by power hungry men who have abandoned any consideration of morality or what is "right" and have replaced it with a mad "scientific" or philosophic lust for power. If you haven't gotten the idea that this world is run by a criminal elite lacking the slightest concern for the welfare of mankind, then you haven't been paying attention.

Alternative 3 points to, if in a clumsy and unbelievable fashion, the deadly alignment of technology and elitist control, and by exposing and calling attention to this collaboration, even in unintentional fashion as Watkins maintains happened, it is right on the mark.

I do not know whether all of the specific plans, the contingencies for 'batch consignments,' slave de-sexing, and interplanetary work camps exist in some policy letter, in the drawer of some Louis Quatorze desk in Geneva, or among some group of intelligence drones or clench of ruling elite. Alternative 3 may not even be "true" at all, in the sense of the revealed scripture of some dark cabal, but only as a persuasive metaphor for totalitarian control in the manner of Orwell's 1984.

I do know that, given the accelerating progression into dehumanizing and enslaving scientific technology and application that we have seen over the last one hundred years, given the move for greater police control and the speedy erosion of our Constitutional, even human rights by governments elected and un-elected, that Alternative 3, in its worst and most gruesome vision, is absolutely inevitable.

I have sifted clues in order to determine who the ultimate world conspirators are, and I believe that I have reached a workable plateau of understanding. While I am not saying that there might not exist one unifying control structure overseeing secret societies and visible nation-states, that there might not be a unifying capstone to the "pyramid" whose members are pulling strings (and garottes) from behind the scenes, it is not necessary to know the absolute identity of control in order to see how it works and to recognize many of the leading players.

The summit of the pyramid consists of relatively tiny groups of aristocratic controlling families, exemplified by the powerful European and American nodes of influence, the Rothschilds and the Rockefellers. Many more of the most powerful "aristocratic" and "royal" families cluster around these controllers, their members and influence richly deserving continued in-depth investigation. These families control and work in conjunction with secret societies such as the Knights of Malta, Freemasonry, the Round Table, the Council on Foreign Relations, the Trilateral Commission, the Bilderbergers, Skull and Bones and, judging from the prevalence of New World Order themes in political manipulation, perhaps even the Illuminati. Everything goes in shades, and some of the luminaries of these societies have more knowledge and power than others. Other controlling agencies include world intelligence organizations such as the CIA, KGB, and British Intelligence, as well as international drug and terrorist networks such as the Mafia and the extremely influential Nazi International, now under a new generation of leadership that eschews swastika armbands. The controllers, in their great wisdom, have displayed absolutely no qualms in employing paid murderers, even genocide, to further their aims and to maintain the structure of the pyramid.

Beneath the cloak of the prime conspirators are larger groups of rich peasantry and landlords dominating a huge mass of poor serfs and less-than-serfs whose labor and lives are sucked to provide the lifeblood to nourish the upper portions of the pyramid. This ancient structure is perfectly visible to anyone with the eyes to be appalled. It is also obvious that the ruling class cabals and spy organizations which we do know about are pointed in roughly the same direction: the total control and "utilization" of the mass of mankind by whatever means it takes.

Control is the shared goal of these numerous conspiring individuals, groups, and governments, and in that sense they work together, collaborating here, working individually there, creating an evolving noose of murderous technological expertise that swiftly tightens around humanity's throat. With this goal in place, with money and the tools of advanced technology in hand, the overall program of accomplishment crystallizes. It is sobering to note that with the advent of such technical innovations as DNA programming, mind control, robotics, and computer-biological interfacing, the statistically huge mass of "worker bees" are not only in danger, but also may be on the verge of becoming obsolete.

Researcher Hawthorne Abendsen has stimulated my thinking by suggesting that historical control may include a classified science of economic prediction that has been in operation for centuries. Prediction has long been the vocation of occultists and court astrologers who, far more likely than being engaged in creating individual sun sign charts, as Abendsen quips, were probably involved in the observance and anticipation of cyclic behavior in areas such as the weather, plagues and famines, war and market activity. I'm also reminded that as far back as the 1600s the Freemasons were reputed to possess "second sight," or the powers of ESP.

What we may be dealing with (at the level of the postulated masters of our masters) is an ancient system of hereditary wealth used in the financing of long term empirical observation, and the use of this wealth in accord with cyclic and social indicators, in promotion of the wars, the usurious credit systems, the technologies, and the pop-cultures, all ultimately engaged in the concentration of wealth into fewer and fewer hands.

In clear reflection of Alternative 3, this level of predictive technology might foresee environmental catastrophes far in advance of any science that we are familiar with, and have been preparing for such eventualities for far longer, even for centuries. The individuals utilizing this predictive technology may be promoting processes not unlike those described in Alternative 3, rendering humanity more and more tractable, more and more cattle-like, orchestrating the impersonal and harmonious dance of the hive in anticipation of their final flight from the planet.

It is possible that all of the generally accepted and cherished beliefs of mankind, the culture icons, the history, morals, religions, philosophies and even concepts are the carefully rehearsed theater of a cold-blooded ruling elite; illusory stage props in continual motion, and the means to parasitic ends. Trapping mankind in a haze of linguistic illusions and colored lights, in the Hollywood-like baffles of art, culture, patriotism, "lone nut" assassination, cataclysm and other spectacular gimmickry, these may be the means by which mankind's energies are manipulated and drained. Pondering the activities of mankind, including such relatively recent developments as mind control, fortified underground bases, genetic programming, and the invention of the means for space migration, I am chillingly reminded of the hive-programming of insects where masses of expendable and ignorant slave ‘cells’ are used for the pleasure and purposes of bloated kings, queens and their court.

Following a clue provided by Michael Hoffman II, I now see that any number of “insect” metaphors reside in the lore of governments and secret societies, with an emphasis on bees, according to Ordo Templi Orientis head Kenneth Grant a symbolic representation of a group mind proceeding from the “Queen” goddess Isis, beloved of the Freemasons and many another a mystical sect. Recalling the name of Illuminist Adam Weishaupt’s secret society, the Beenan Orden (Order of the Bees), recalling the beehive emblem of the Freemasons and the Masonic offshoot Mormon Church’s hive symbolism, I have to think that this must be a clue to the philosophy of these mystic Machiavellians.

A native/German sect in Colombia uses a swastika as icon and calls their compound “Hormiga,” in honor of the ant, while the Sarmoung sect of the Sufis, reputed to have an unbroken lineage stretching back 2,000 years, call themselves “the Brotherhood of the Bee.” This sect, interestingly enough, avows that their purpose is to halt the evolution of mankind, reserving the emergence of higher spiritual faculties and powers for an elect few.

Ernst Haeckel, Hitler’s mentor in social Darwinism, thought that each cell of a living creature, “though autonomous, is subordinated to the body as a whole; in the same way in the societies of bees, ants, and termites, in the vertebrate herds, and in the human state, each individual is subordinate to the social body of which he is a member.”

British author (and friend of Aldous Huxley) Gerald Heard in Is Another World Watching?, written in 1950, postulated at great length his “bee” theory of UFOs, suggesting these objects may represent the outward manifestation of an impersonal insectoid order run by a greater Overmind. And might there be humans who believe they represent this Overmind? Perhaps Heard is offering a clue when he muses about the Sphex wasp, “true mason wasp that it is.”

Nesta Webster in Secret Societies and Subversive Movements wondered in 1924: “Has not the system of the ant-heap or the beehive proved... the model on which these modern Anarchists, from Proudhon onwards, have formed their schemes for the reorganization of human life? Has not the idea of the World State and The Universal Republic become the war-cry of the International Socialists, the Grand Orient Masons, Theosophists, and the world-revolutionaries of our own day?”

While I frankly don’t believe that anarchists are the ones we need to fear, I take Webster’s point and note that she is pointing to the forces that crystallized into the Round Table/Wall Street axis and the Nazis, among other groups. In short, the hive is the essence of the New World Order.

The insect metaphor resident in mystical literature is reminiscent of the basic elitist, anti-human theme of aristocratic "bluebloods" sustaining the hive through reproductive processes and blood lineage. It is even possible that the basic programming that controls mankind, both king and commoner, might be an instinctual ordering, an initiative encoded in DNA that captures us in designated castes, rather than plans written in some secret scroll and hidden in some secret vault.

And there may be a final secret to Alternative 3.

Scientists are currently engaged in research which may provide a powerful impetus for the elite of the world to plan ahead for off-world migration; that is the cracking of the code of aging. Michael West of the University of Texas Southwestern Medical Center in Dallas is only one among many researchers seeking answers to the reasons for aging. West, however, claims to have found those answers.

"We believe that cellular aging is the underlying mechanism of aging in the whole body," West says. "We have identified some of the genes activated during cellular aging, and we know the master switches that turn these genes on and off. We're making old cells young again in the laboratory. We're also able to change cells from a senescent state, in which they are no longer dividing, into an immortal one, in which they divide forever. And then we can reverse the process again, turning the dividing cells 'off.'"

West estimates that rejuvenation drugs based upon his research will be marketed in five to seven years, although he specifically disclaims that they will be "immortality drugs."

Is this the final vision of Alternative 5? Are we poised at the edge of the final sundering that Hitler envisioned, where immortal controllers assume complete control over the "bees of the hive"? Is that the ultimate rationale for the Alternative 3 plan or a surrogate of it, that for the game to continue, everyone can't be a god?

It seems to me that, in order for complete control of mankind to be obtained by an elite or elites, be it military, political, philosophical, financial, or bloodline-based, then roughly the same reality-programs must be instituted.

It is necessary that any program of world domination to achieve total control must include broad psychological mastery over populations through propaganda, drugs, television, religion, or other mind control means. Physical control (consisting of hives, concentration camps, or contingency programs for same) must also be in place so that mass labor may be utilized in an economical fashion.

The control group should also have military strike capabilities for both offense and defense, preferably also possessing secret technology in advance of that of rival control factors.

Finally, plans for the preservation of the elite in the event of war, social upheaval, sudden recognition by the masses, or other catastrophe should be in place.

This broad outline of controls is a repetition, in almost all specifics, of the details of Alternative 3. It may also be an accurate reflection of the schemes of the shadow masters, judging historical events and ominous current indicators.

Ultimately the details hardly matter, because of the single conclusion which must be drawn. To the men who control this world (and their well-paid and smiling front men), we are all ultimately part of a 'batch consignment,' nothing more. And unless society is transformed from the inhuman control state we live in, unless the history of world domination is exposed and strategies for its elimination implemented, then the human race is doomed to live out this real world of Alternative 3.

Selected Bibliography

Allen, Gary. None Dare Call It Conspiracy. Concord Press, 1972

_____ . The Rockefeller File. '76 Press, 1976

Anonymous. Report From Iron Mountain on the Possibility and Desirability of Peace.. Dial Press, 1967

Baigent, Leigh and Lincoln. Holy Blood, Holy Grail. Dell Publishing Company, 1982

Baigent, Michael and Richard Leigh. The Temple and the Lodge. Arcade Publishing, 1989

Bamford, James. The Puzzle Palace, A Report on America's Most Secret Agency. Houghton Mifflin, 1982

Bower, Tom. The Paperclip Conspiracy. Little, Brown and Co., 1987

Brussel, Mae. The Mae Brussell Reader. Prevailing Winds, 1991

Garrison, Jim. On the Trail of the Assassins. Sheridan Square Press, 1988

Good, Timothy. Above Top Secret: The Worldwide UFO Cover Up. William Morrow & Company, 1988

Howard, Michael. The Occult Conspiracy. Destiny Books, 1989

Hunt, Linda. Secret Agenda. St. Martin's Press, 1991

Impact Team, The. The Weather Conspiracy: The Coming of the New Ice Age. Heron House Publishing International Ltd., 1977

Judge, John. Judge For Yourself. Prevailing Winds, 1991

Kasun, Jacqueline. The War Against Population. Ignatius Press, 1988

Kaysing, Bill. We Never Went to the Moon. Desert Publications, 1981

Kevles, Daniel J. In the Name of Eugenics. Alfred A. Knopf, 1985

Leary, Timothy. Flashbacks. J.P. Tarcher, Inc., 1983

McCoy, Alfred W. The Politics of Heroin: CIA Complicity in the Global Drug Trade. Harper & Row, 1991

Oppenheimer and Boyle. Dead Heat, The Race Against the Greenhouse Effect. Basic Books, Inc. 1990

Parfrey, Adam, ed. Apocalypse Culture. Feral House, 1991

Perloff, James. The Shadows of Power: The Council on Foreign Relations and the American Decline. Western Islands, 1988

Pool, James & Suzanne. Who Financed Hitler, The Secret Funding of Hitler's Rise to Power 1919-1933. Dial Press, 1978

Rifkin, Jeremy. Biosphere Politics. Crown Publishers, 1991

Sklar, Holly, ed. Trilateralism. South End Press, 1980

Skousen, W. Cleon. The Naked Capitalist, self published, 1970

Steckling, Fred. We Discovered Alien Bases on the Moon. GAF International Publishers, 1981

Stevenson, William. The Bormann Brotherhood. Harcouit, Brace, Jovanovich Inc., 1973

Sutton and Wood. Trilaterals Over Washington. The August Corporation, 1978

Sutton, Anthony. Two Faces of George Bush. Veritas Publishing Company Pty. Ltd., 1988

Tetens, T.H. The New Germany and the Old Nazis. Random House, 1961

Thomas, Gordon. Journey into Madness, The True Story of Secret CIA Mind Control and Medical Abuse. Bantam Books, 1989

Vankin, Jonathan. Conspiracies, Cover-ups and Crimes. Paragon House, 1992

Watkins, Leslie and David Ambrose. Alternative 003 (in later editions Alternative 3). Sphere Books Ltd., 1978

Webster, Nesta. Secret Societies and Subversive Movements. Christian Book Club of America (first published in 1924)

Casebook on Alternative 3

UFOs, Secret Societies and World Control

Jim Keith

In 1975, the normally conservative television program Science Report broadcast the most shocking investigative story ever shown on British television: an international conspiracy of monumental proportions with the code name Alternative 3.

AMONG THE STARTLING ALLEGATIONS OF ALTERNATIVE 3:

- The rich elite of the world have initiated a secret program of space migration to escape the environmental pollution and overpopulation destroying the earth.
- A secret joint USA-Russian space program has established bases on the moon and Mars.
- UFOs are actually secret government aircraft with capabilities far beyond what we are being told.
- Top space scientists from around the world are being abducted to provide personnel for the space bases.
- Citizens are being kidnapped and subjected to mind control to serve as slave labor at the secret space colonies.

Since its initial airing, the startling claims of Alternative 3 have been debated and decried as a hoax, while others claim that there is truth to this terrifying plan of our secret rulers!

Drawing on his diverse research and a wide variety of sources, Jim Keith, editor of The Gemstone File (IllumiNet Press, 1992) and Secret And Suppressed (Feral House, 1993) delves into the bizarre story behind Alternative 3.

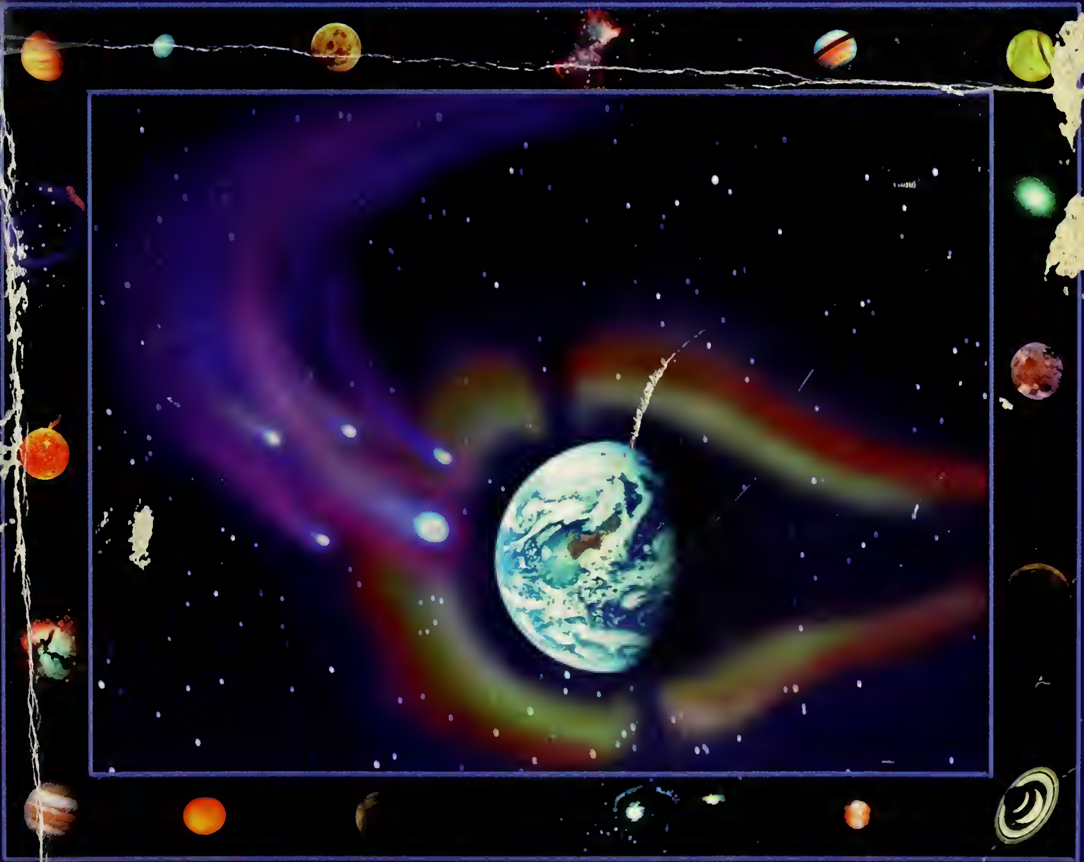
IllumiNet Press
P.O. Box 2808
Lilburn, Georgia 30226

ISBN 0-9626534-9-7
51295
9 780962 653490

$12.95

CATACLYSM!

Compelling Evidence of a Cosmic Catastrophe in 9500 B.C.



Introduced by Rand Flem-Ath, Co-author of When the Sky Fell

D.S. Allan & J.B. Delair

BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY
Copley Square

CATACLYSM!

Compelling Evidence of a Cosmic Catastrophe in 9500 B.C.

D. S. ALLAN & J.B. DELAIR

BEAR & COMPANY
Santa Fe, New Mexico

QE506
.A45
1997

Published 1997 in the United States & Canada by BEAR & COMPANY,
PO Box 2860,
Santa Fe, N.M. 87504.2860

© 1995 & 1997 by D. S. Allan & J. B. Delair

First published in 1995 as When the Earth Nearly Died
by GATEWAY BOOKS, of Bath, UK

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying or any information retrieval system, without permission in writing from the Publishers.

Printed and bound by BookCrafters of Chelsea, Michigan.

Set in Palatino 9 on 11pt.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Allan, D. S. 1917–
Cataclysm: compelling evidence of a cosmic catastrophe in 9500 B. C./D. S. Allan and J. B. Delair
p. cm.
Originally published: When the earth nearly died. Bath. England: Gateway Books, © 1995.
Including bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 1-879181-42-8 (pbk.)
1. Catastrophes (Geology) 2. Deluge. 3. Glacial climates. I. Delair, J. B., 1932- . II. Allan, D. S., 1917– When the earth nearly died. III. Title.
QE506.A45 1997
930– – DC1 97-20219
CIP

CONTENTS

List of Illustrations v
Acknowledgements vii
Foreword viii
Introduction x

Part One:
A LOST BEGINNING

1. The age of the Earth 3
2. Debris of a Broken World 5
3. Enigmas in Stone 9
4. World Ages – World Suns 12
5. A Displaced Axis? 14
6. The Paradox 17
7. Perspectives – a Question of Scale 18
8. The Birth of the Glacial Theory 21
9. Upheaval 25
10. Collapse 31
11. Shatter 35
12. An Icy Chimera 38
13. Inescapable Evidence 44
14. Turmoil Unleashed 56
15. Evidence from the Arctic 60
16. An Interim Summary 65

Part Two:
PREMATURE EXTINCTION

1. The Testimony of Biology 83
2. A Lost Euro-American Flora 84
3. The Saga in the Atlantic 87
4. A Sunken Southern Continent? 89
5. The Buried Forests of North America 91
6. Dislocated Faunas: the Atlantic Basin 95
7. Dislocated Faunas: Eurasia, Oceania and the Southern Hemisphere 99
8. A Vanished Prehistoric Ocean 103
9. Mediterranean Graveyards 105
10. Subterranean Charnelhouses 111
11. Illusory Faunas 119
12. Abnormal Burials 121
13. Incompatible Bedfellows 130
14. A Revised Geological Chronology? 135

Part Three:
THE ENDURING MEMORY

1. Traditions and Legends 149
2. Conflagration 151
3. Flood 152
4. Celestial Disorder 153
5. Terrestrial Chaos 155
6. Darkness 159
7. Hail and fire 160
8. Ice-bound 160
9. The traditions assessed 161

Part Four
COSMIC CONFLICT

1. An 11,500 years old Trail 169
2. An Unknown Assailant 174
3. Earth Structure 175
4. Geomagnetism 180
5. Reversed Polarity 182
6. The Thermal Factor 185
7. Instability 189
8. Pole Shift 191
9. Crustal slippage 193
10. The Solar System 195
11. The Mavericks 198
12. Signposts to a Cosmic Battle 204
13. The Candidates 207
14. Phaeton – an Exception to the Rule 211
15. The Mesopotamian Connection 214
16. War in Heaven 218
17. Phaeton's Wrath 225
18 Phaeton's significance 231

Part Five
ANATOMY OF A DISASTER

1. The Antediluvian World 241
2. Confrontation 250
3. Collapsed Sky 256
4. Earth Fracture 262
5. Fire-storm 269
6. Hurricane 276
7. Bombardment 281
8. Hell on Earth 289

9. Iron bound 294
10. The Rains of Death 297
11. The 'Water Mountain' 301
12. The Torrent from Heaven 303
13. Deluge 304
14. Scour 308
15. The 'Wood Hills' of the North 309
16. Refrigeration 313

Part Six
PHAETON'S LEGACY

1. Aftermath 327
2. The Survivors 328
3. An Uncertain Future 330
4. The Stone Age arrives 333
5. A New Beginning 339

Appendix A: Refrigerated Mammoths 343
Appendix B: Dating of finds from the catastrophe period 345
Appendix C: Remnants of the Celestial Battle? 349
Appendix D: Phaeton's Source? 356
Appendix E: The Seven Suns 357
Appendix F: Notes 359
Appendix G: List of Bibliographic contractions 362

Index 364

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

Part One

MAPS

1A The Arctic Today 2
1B The Landmasses of Appalachia, Beringia and Fennoscandia 33
1C World fracture complex 36
1D The British Isles showing supposed maximum ice limits 41
1E Alleged maximum Pleistocene ice Northern Hemisphere 43

TABLES

1A Geological eras, periods and epochs 10
1B Conventional Euro-American Quaternary subdivisions 54
1C Major global Pleistocene geophysical changes 69–71

FIGURES

1.1 Precession of the Polar Axis 16
1.2a The Hairy Mammoth 21
1.2b The Woolly Rhinoceros 21
1.3 Hairy Mammoths 22
1.4 Youthful mountains in southern Chile 29
1.5 Fault grooves in the Peruvian Andes 30
1.6 Striated rock at Appley Bridge nr Wigan 46
1.7 Sand-blasted rock at Mont Pelée 47
1.8 Nuée ardente striations at Mont Pelée 47
1.9 Wind striations, Wyoming 48
1.10 Alleged glacial rock grooves at Val Camonica 48
1.11 Giant boulder transported 3 miles 49
1.12 Madison Boulder giant erratic at Conway, NH 50
1.13 Two erratic boulders on beach at Greyabbey, Co Down 51
1.14 Erratic boulder near Nairn, Scottish Highlands 52
1.15 Exposure of 'Alaskan Muck' 57

Part Two

MAPS

2A Reconstruction of pre-catastrophic 'Pleistocene' world 82

TABLES

2A Distribution of geographically isolated plants 88
2B Animals found in cave deposits, Devon 112
2C Revised 'Phaeton' chronology for Tertiary and Quaternary 136

FIGURES

2.1 Buried log in soil section, Shelby County, Ohio 92
2.2 Carcharodon shark jaws 108
2.3 Bone breccia from Genitsa Cave, Gibraltar 110
2.4 Section of cave at Gailenreuth, Franconia 117
2.5 Prominent 'late Pleistocene' animals of N. America 117
2.6 The American mastodon 122
2.7 Frozen mammoth of Berezkova 126
2.8 Trunk head & forelimbs of baby woolly mammoth 128
2.9 Part of mammoth tusk 129
2.10 Accumulation of bones at Rancho La Brea tar pits 131
2.11 The Calaveras skull 132
2.12 Deinotherium 134

Part Three

TABLES

3A Traditions of the Deluge and the Great Catastrophe 150
3B Traditions specifying particular catastrophic effects 162–164

Part Four

TABLES

4A Statistics of the Planets 197
4B Identification of objects on Babylonian cylinder seal 219

FIGURES

4.1 Schematic diagram of the solar system 176

4.2 Earth's inclination to the Sun 177
4.3 Tilt of the polar axis 177
4.4 Space charge sheet and magnetosphere of the Earth 181
4.5 Folding and overthrusting in Peruvian mountains 188
4.6 Eccentricities of orbits of inner planets 196
4.7 Eccentricities of orbits of outer planets 196
4.8 Diagram of typical path of comet round the Sun 199
4.9 Comet Morehouse 202
4.10a, b & c Cup-and-ring marks at Ardmarnoch, Scotland 213
4.11a & b Akkadian cylinder seal 216
4.12 Identification of objects on Babylonian cylinder seal 220
4.13 Path apparently taken by Phaeton through solar system 228

Part Five

MAPS

5A Zeno map of the North 243
5B Extent of ash fallout from Mt St Helens eruption 259
5C Areas of abundant meteorites and 'bays' in Eastern USA 283
5D Oriented lakes near Pt Barrow, Alaska 286
5E Possible flight paths of aerial object creating 'bays' 288
5F Ocean floor areas of ferromagnesium nodules 300

TABLES

5A Volcanic activity usually regarded as 'Pleistocene' 261
5B Comparison of Alaskan lakes, Carolina bays & Beni Basin 287
5C Phaeton's record: geological, astrophysical, traditional 316

FIGURES

5.1 Zeno map plotted on reconstructed polar projection 245
5.2a, b, c, d & e Comparison of maps of Greenland 246
5.3a, b, c, d, e & f Phaeton's path close to the Earth 251
5.4 The head of a comet, August 1862 252
5.5a, b, c & d Conjectural interpretation of Tistya's shapes 253
5.6 Buildings partially buried by volcanic ash 1914 260
5.7 The San Andreas fault in California 266
5.8 The Lake Mobutu Sese Seko fault in Uganda 266
5.9 Major tectonic plates of the Earth 267
5.10 A fire fountain 271
5.11 St Pierre, Martinique after a fire hurricane, 1902 273
5.12 Alleged moraine at Bear-den, Maine 274
5.13 Large coral rock blown over a cliff by a hurricane 278
5.14 Aerial view of oriented lakes nr Pt Barrow, Alaska 284

Part Six

FIGURES

6.1 Mortar and pestle found in gravels in California 335
6.2 Prehistoric inscribed bowl, California 336
6.3 Prehistoric iron chain 336
6.4 Copper coin, found buried 114ft underground, Illinois 337

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The authors wish to record their sincere appreciation for the assistance, recommendations and guidance received from the undermentioned institutions, libraries and individuals during the researching and writing of this book. Without the thoughtful cooperation of these, many noteworthy facts and aspects would either have escaped attention or have been accorded erroneous significance. For these and numerous other kindnesses the authors are truly grateful.

INSTITUTIONS

Geological Society of America, Boulder, Colorado, USA.
Institute of Geological Sciences, London.
NASA, California Institute of Technology, USA.
National Geographic Society, Washington DC, USA.
Royal Observatory, Edinburgh.
Salisbury and South Wilts Museum.
Scott Polar Institute, University of Cambridge.
Western Speleological Survey, Seattle, Washington, USA.
University of Southampton (Geology Dept).

LIBRARIES

Ashmolean Library, University of Oxford.
Balfour Library, Pitt Rivers Museum, University of Oxford.
Birmingham City Library.
Bodleian Library, University of Oxford.
Bodleian Library Maps Dept, University of Oxford.
British Museum, London.
British Museum, Natural History (General), London.
British Museum, Natural History (Palaeontology), London.
Dept of Astrophysics, University of Oxford.
Geological Survey Museum, London.
Institute of Geological Sciences, London.
Library of Congress, Washington DC, USA.
Linnaean Society, London.
Manchester City Library.
Oriental Institute, University of Oxford.
Radcliffe Science Library, University of Oxford.
Rhodes House Trust Library, Oxford.
Royal Geographical Society, London.
School of Geography Library, University of Oxford.
Science Library, London.
University of Cambridge Library.
University of Glasgow Library.

INDIVIDUALS

Dr G R Brackenridge, Tucson, Arizona, USA.
Prof J C Brindley, Dept of Geology, University College, Dublin, Eire.
Dr P Cates, Jet Propulsion Laboratory, California Institute of Technology, USA.
Dr V Clube, Royal Observatory, Edinburgh, Scotland.
W R Corliss, Glen Arm, Maryland, USA.
Prof D Dean, Dept of Humanities, University of Wisconsin, USA.
Dr P Doughty, Dept of Geology, Ulster Museum, Belfast, Ulster.
Dr R Goldthwait, University of Ohio, USA.
Prof R D Guthrie, Dept of Zoology, University of Alaska, Fairbanks, Alaska, USA.
The late Prof C H Hapgood, Greenfield Massachusetts, USA.
The late Frederick G Hehr, San Mateo, California, USA.
Dr G A Kellaway, Lewes, East Sussex, England.
Col W H Lovell-Johns (ret), Abbots Ripton, Huntingdon, England.
Prof H de Lumley, Institut de Paléontologie Humaine, Paris, France.
Dr P J Michael, Dept of Geological Sciences, University of British Columbia, Canada.
Dr S Muessig, Vice President, Getty Mining Co, Los Angeles, USA.
Dr L Pales, Musée National Histoire Naturelle, Paris, France.
Mrs V L Perry, Huron, Ohio, USA.
Prof A Prous, Museu de Historia Natural, Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais, Brazil.
Dr G Quinlan, Dept of Oceanography, Dalhousie University, Halifax, Canada.
Dr D J Rudkin, Director, Fishbourne Roman Palace, West Sussex, England.
Dr H A Sandford, Plymouth, Devon, England.
Dr A J Sutcliffe, British Museum (Natural History), London, England.
Dr W P Warren, Geological Survey of Ireland, Dublin, Eire.
Dr I West, Dept of Geology, University of Southampton, England.
R West, Worthing, West Sussex, England.

FOREWORD

BY RAND FLEM-ATH

(CO-AUTHOR OF WHEN THE SKY FELL, ST. MARTIN'S PRESS, 1995)

The evidence that we have managed to salvage about the Earth's lost past is shattered, torn and decayed. There remains only fragments: traces of physical evidence and occasional pieces of oral history. How can we piece together the secrets of our vanished heritage? An integrated approach, one that draws upon many sources and clues, is our best hope. Myth and science can converge to offer us the widest possible lens to study this enduring mystery. And it is precisely such a bold scope encompassed by this fascinating new book.

D.S. Allan and J.B Delair have assembled a mountain of evidence pointing directly to a worldwide catastrophe around 9500 B.C. They draw upon a vast range of sciences and disciplines to weave their story. And it is a compelling account that begins beyond our solar system, about 13,000 years ago, with the explosion of the Vela Supernova.

A large fragment of this star, christened "Phaeton" by the classical Greeks, blasted across interstellar space and sped through the void. Then around 9500 B.C., it careened into our solar system like a drunken driver. Phaeton, composed of pure stellar-matter must have been very dense and atomic, (almost certainly sub-lunar in size) and different from a comet or asteroid, to wreak the kind of havoc that ensued. Neptune wandered across its path and Phaeton, pulled sunwards, wrenched one of Neptune's moons from its orbit, sending it spinning through space like a celestial hubcap. This moon became the eccentric outer planet we know as Pluto.

Phaeton continued on its chaotic journey. Hurling past Uranus, its gravitational pull dislocated the moons of Uranus. As the deadly foreign invader drew near Saturn, one of the ringed planet's moons, Chiron, was also forced out of orbit. Chiron bounced into a new path circling the Sun to become the solar system's smallest planet. Jupiter and Mercury avoided the chaos because their orbits had carried them to the other side of the Sun and thus far from Phaeton's destructive course. It was at this point on its reckless journey that Phaeton electromagnetically demolished a planet that existed between Jupiter and Mars.

The idea of a fifth planet at this location has been around since 1766 when J. D. Titius von Wittenberg noticed that the solar system seemed to comprise an almost perfect mathematical web, minus one of its strands. Titius von Wittenberg explained this anomaly by postulating that there was a "vacant orbit" between Mars and Jupiter where mathematical probabilities indicated that there should be a planet. In 1772, Johann Bode popularized this discovery and the notion came to be known as the "Titius-Bode Law of Planetary Distances". Astronomers now had a mathematical tool with which to hunt for distant planets within our solar system because the new "law" predicted where to look. Telescopes from around the world focused on the "vacant orbit" between Jupiter and Mars and were rewarded in 1801 with the discovery of the asteroid belt. Was the asteroid belt the remnants of a lost planet? And if so, what was that planet like? Allan and Delair use the ancient Akkadian (Akkad was the northern half of Babylonia, Sumer the southern) name "Tiamat" for the missing planet of which the asteroid belt is a remnant. Three more planets still stood in Phaeton's reckless path: Mars, Earth, and Venus.

As the stellar marauder, dragging the remnants of the shattered Tiamat and its moon, Kingu, with it, catapulted past Mars; the red planet's rotation was slowed by their combined gravitational pull. Mars' two rapidly spinning moons may well be fragments of Tiamat it acquired then. After leaving its mark on Mars, Phaeton was now on a collision course with Earth charging through the emptiness between Earth and the Moon. Phaeton's pull stretched the Moon's orbit and the Earth's tilt was altered, condemning Earth to a worldwide catastrophe.

The swarm of planetary debris accompanying Phaeton were veritable time bombs. Circling the Earth, they exploded one by one upon entering Earth's Roche Zone, showering our planet with a celestial blizzard of rocks, stones, and dust. Atmospheric blast effects, ignition, and pollution were prodigious. The Earth's crust shifted and plunged it into upheaval. This was the day that "Earth nearly died."

Phaeton continued its unstoppable flight. Venus "flipped" over, sending it into a rotation opposite that of the other planets. Finally, Phaeton disappeared into the inferno of the Sun.

In 1976, through the writings of the Greek philosopher Plato, I became interested in the historical period between 9500 to 9600 B.C. In Plato's dialogue, a learned Egyptian priest tells Plato's ancestor, Solon, the legend of Atlantis. He relates that Atlantis had been destroyed in earthquakes and floods of extraordinary violence. This great catastrophe occurred 9000 years before his time. We know that Solon's visit to Egypt took place sometime between 594 and 559 B.C. This places the destruction of Atlantis some time between 9559 B.C. and 9594 B.C. Allan and Delair reviewed hundreds of radiocarbon dates from around the world in an attempt to date the Phaeton catastrophe. They found that a great concentration of dates averaged 9577 B.C., exactly amidst the time frame allowed by Plato's "story" of Atlantis!

This is the key period of our solar system's trauma. Before then, the authors argue, the planets revolved undisturbed around the Sun during what we might call a time of celestial harmony, a golden age that was suddenly disturbed by an intruder from beyond our solar system. The massive destruction visited on the Earth was an extremely rare event which could recur but such a catastrophe is unlikely to happen soon. Allan and Delair are not doomsdaysayers, nor am I. Catastrophes happen. But catastrophes triggered by celestial violence occur independently of human activity. Nor do they have anything to do with such an arbitrary date as the year 2000. This is not to deny the very real need our planet has for a shield against asteroids and/or comets. Where we can act we should, but for the times we live in, it is perhaps more productive for us to spend our energy trying to heal the wounds that humans have inflicted upon our planet than to worry about another out-of-control Phaeton.

Allan and Delair do a brilliant job in revealing that researchers have barely touched the tip of the iceberg of events that shook the Earth around 9577 B.C. The questions go on and on. Finally, with Cataclysm! Compelling Evidence of a Cosmic Catastrophe in 9500 B.C., answers are beginning to come, one by one. As each lost fragment falls into place we can once again listen with respect to the "stories" of the ancient ones who always knew that we live in a universe which can erupt in violence. This book is an essential handbook to our ancient past: a brave multidisciplinary approach that should be applauded. With Cataclysm!, science, at last, catches up with mythology.

May 1997
Ladysmith, B.C.
Canada.

INTRODUCTION

This book is about the greatest single disaster known to have befallen Earth. The event was actually part of a still larger catastrophe which, commencing in interstellar space, eventually embraced most of the solar system. In terms of geological time it occurred extremely recently, although science has been decidedly reluctant to admit the fact, and modern humanity has largely forgotten it.

Among other things, the calamity profoundly affected all forms of terrestrial life, early Man included, who considered it to be a never-to-be-forgotten experience. Accordingly, almost every nation of antiquity perpetuated the memory of it in tradition, ceremony, religio-social attitudes, art and epic literature, and all regarded it as a major historical datum. Today, if it is remembered at all, it is known as the Great Flood or the Noachian Deluge.

The relatively familiar story of Noah, his Ark and the Deluge is, however, very incomplete, and when equivalent traditions from other sources are examined we find the Deluge itself to have been but one aspect of an awesome event as multi-faceted as a fine-cut diamond. These other sources refer to frightful natural convulsions simultaneously on land and sea and in the air, and to the greater part of life on Earth being violently extinguished by a wide variety of horrific processes, accompanied by extraordinary concomitant phenomena in the heavens. The overall picture is one of disaster of the very first magnitude.

For these reasons, the present essay encompasses what may at first glance seem many unrelated fields of enquiry, but which, as the panorama unfolds, are found to be intimately connected. In a sense, therefore, this book is really many books in one – although to satisfactorily explore all the salient features and evidence of what is an immense canvas inevitably incurs a degree of incompleteness. Such an interdisciplinary study inevitably necessitates a rational and comprehensive correlation of the material discussed, and with that objective in view each major theme is fully documented throughout. Cited references include several which are unfortunately rare or difficult to procure. Irrespective of their rarity or otherwise, all references have been consulted by the authors.

In this book we set out to demonstrate that the history of human culture is far richer and more complex than standard history is usually prepared to admit, and that the true record of human experience is infinitely more dramatic than that conventionally documented. As will be shown, a very great deal of this ampler past was the outcome of a single traumatic event.

Science has accumulated a body of factual observations which, in view of the relative stability of Earth's contemporary physical environment, so puzzled scholars that they felt obliged to postulate a series of devastating glacial ages to account for them – though the genesis of this assumed 'Ice Age' is in turn no less puzzling. Yet, other scientific findings have accumulated which do not fit easily with this glacial scenario. Such data often remains accessible only to specialist audiences. More significantly, when considered together, they seriously strain orthodox explanations beyond reasonable credulity.

On the whole, it is sensible to support or retain a theory only if it 'works', provided that, in drawing diverse fragments of knowledge into defensible patterns, it enables useful predictions to be made about the shape of further discoveries. Conventional glacial theory, however, fails to meet this criterion. In the face of mounting evidence militating against this likelihood, it repeatedly disintegrates under the constraints imposed upon it by that evidence. On the other hand, research into an entirely different domain – ancient traditions, folklore and classical writings – is providing us with an increasingly persuasive body of evidence from a wide variety of cultures. These bear remarkable similarities, despite the fact that the names given to the characters in the dramas bear superficially little relation to one another.

Some anthropologists have understood this to be a consequence of fundamental human characteristics which have shaped human cultures and have caused the invention of similar myths by apparently diverse cultures. Others, such as C G Jung, have given an essentially psychological explanation to this, in terms of a shared unconscious psychological disposition, which gives rise to such stories. Though we would not necessarily want to challenge such assumptions generally, we nevertheless suggest that certain of these stories originated from a real live experience of early humanity, and have evolved in an attempt to comprehend and pass on to posterity the experience gained.

Alongside Glacial Theory, this book traces the successive rival theories and interpretations which characterised the formative years of modern geological science, showing that, at one extreme were 'Catastrophists' who sought to reconcile traditional recollections of a global catastrophe with the known geological data. 'Catastrophists' for long emphasised the fact that numerous Deluge traditions mention one or more celestial agents as having assailed Earth and caused that calamity, and that prolific evidence is available which can be reasonably interpreted as having originated from genuine experience of such an event. At the other extreme, 'Uniformitarians' have argued that disasters of such magnitude are completely contrary to the normal workings of Nature on Earth. They know of no self-inducing mechanism capable of generating a terrestrial catastrophe on such a scale – and since they discern no physical proof of a conflict between this planet and some other celestial body, categorically dismiss all such claims as spurious. They insist that the factual data used to support most 'Catastrophist' claims is explicable – at least in principle – in terms of the widespread but slow action of ice rather than of fast or violently moving water.

It is thus paradoxical that worldwide memory of an appalling flood disaster has survived traditionally as a major event in the early history of mankind, whilst science, having assembled a veritable library of facts dealing with the very same period, interprets the same evidence as due to quite another cause.

Charles Lyell's nineteenth century formulation of an alternative theory to 'Catastrophism', bringing in the fewest possible assumptions in order to explain the natural phenomena, was admirable. However, wholesale adoption of his 'Principle of Uniformitarianism', rather than continual investigation of alternative interpretations actually serves us only if it can adequately explain every relevant phenomenon. Since the inception of Lyell's hypothesis and the present, much contrary evidence has accumulated, which, were Lyell alive today, even he would find difficult satisfactorily to account for by uniformitarian concepts.

If we widen our perspective beyond the specialist discipline of geology, we are left with the problem of the extraordinary testimony of innumerable living animal and plant species, as well as the great corpus of curiously consistent world tradition. Even were we left with no option but to anthropologise or psychologise the traditional material, no such solution can apply to the zoological and botanical evidence. Some other all-embracing unifying explanation is clearly required.

We attempt this by examining the range of huge phenomena for which Catastrophism does have explanatory value, and for which Uniformitarian solutions fail. At the same time we shall try to order this great body of data into what, we submit, is its proper perspective.

This perspective will not, however, be found in conventional Establishment geological histories, for although the overwhelming number of sources cited are Establishment sources, standard college texts on the subjects discussed are, like those in nearly all scientific disciplines (and for many reasons), notoriously slow to modernise. Indeed, many orthodox textbooks lag more than a decade behind the current frontiers of the subjects with which they profess to deal. Several of the conclusions paraded in this book will therefore be found to be diametrically opposed to many normally featured in orthodox texts. These deviations have not, however, been reached lightly, but are solidly grounded on the testimony of abundant and varied field evidence often either ignored, dismissed, or forced by many conventionalists to fit various notions that, although well-entrenched and frequently treated as fact, are actually hypothetical or even demonstrably untenable, or so recently discovered that they still await incorporation into standard histories.

Some readers may recoil at the abundance of references and might even regard them as irksome or intrusive. In a work of this genre precise documentation is essential, and in point of fact the references used actually constitute a rather small but representative fraction of the total available on the themes reviewed. There may also be disapproval of the use of a comparatively high percentage of 'old' sources. Such objections will speedily dissipate when it is realised that many of the most singular events and discoveries referred to – particular local terrestrial cataclysms, certain Arctic and Siberian explorations, specific cave excavations and finds – occurred long ago and were essentially unrepeatable. In such cases these are the only references that can be cited. But whether 'old' or recent, it is significant that the character of the drama thus documented remains persistently consistent. Furthermore, the physical events and effects described in many traditional accounts are precisely those advocated by modern theoreticians considering essentially similar themes.

Every effort has been made to keep technical terms to a minimum, but where usage of these has proved unavoidable, concise explanations are contained either in the text or in the glossary.

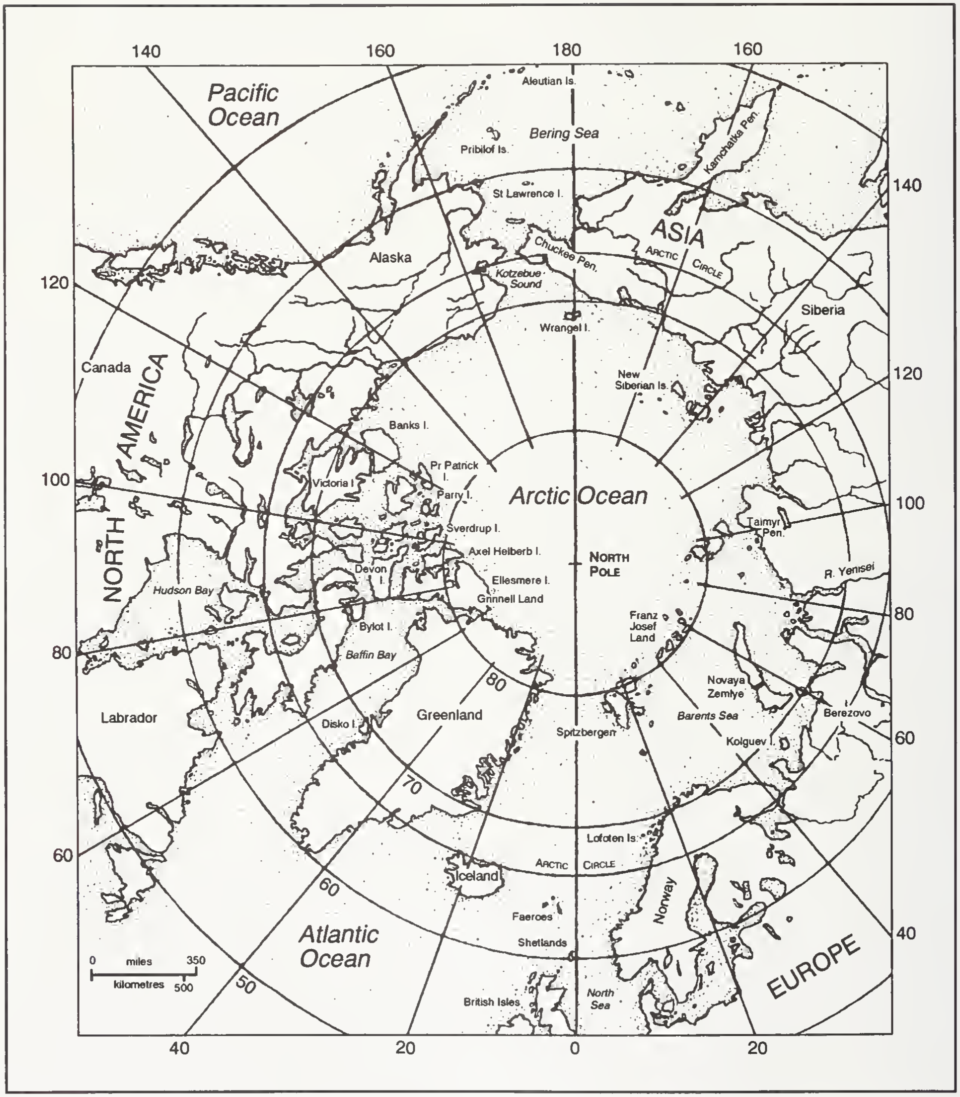
In dating specific evidence we have used the convention of expressing dates in years BP (before the present). Current processes for estimating the age of fossil remains, rock strata and so on all have certain limitations, so that the time-scales used by geologists, palaeontologists, anthropologists and others inevitably contain a degree of uncertainty. Our chronological estimates derive from averaging out from a wide range of documented radiocarbon dates and other accredited methods. We are therefore as confident as it is presently possible to be in their general reliability. Appendix B summarises the relevant dating procedure and cites a selection of the abundant data now available.

Readers must perforce judge for themselves whether the facts genuinely support the conclusions here offered. What cannot be denied however is that real facts, howsoever interpreted, are inescapable, actual and immutable, and the testimony they represent cannot be altered.

If the conclusions arrived at in this book prove to be valid, then recent Earth history as we know it urgently needs extensive revision. In effect they provide a new key to that segment of world history occupying approximately the last 15,000 years. The genesis of much of present world topography merits fundamental reassessment, prehistoric archaeology an equal adjustment, and the scientific concepts of uniformitarianism and catastrophism, with their bearing on organic evolution, very substantial modification. Perhaps with this new key, we now stand at a threshold of new and exciting historical perspectives.

PART ONE

A LOST BEGINNING



Pacific Ocean
Aleutian Is.
Bering Sea
Pribilof Is.
Kamchatka Pen.
St Lawrence I.
ASIA
Arctic Circle
Chuckee Pen.
Alaska
Kotzebue Sound
Wrangel I.
Siberia
Canada
NORTH AMERICA
New Siberian Is.
Banks I.
Pr Patrick I.
Victoria I
Parry I.
Arctic Ocean
Sverdrup I.
Axel Heiberb I.
North Pole
Devon I.
Ellesmere I.
Grinnell Land
Taimyr Pen.
R. Yenisei
Hudson Bay
Bylot I.
Baffin Bay
Franz Josef Land
Novaya Zemlye
Labrador
Disko I.
Greenland
Spitzbergen
Barents Sea
Kolguev I.
Berezovo Lofoten Is.
Arctic Circle
Iceland
Faeroes
Shetlands
Norway
Atlantic Ocean
EUROPE
British Isles
North Sea
0 miles 350
kilometres 500
140
160
180
160
140
120
100
80
60
40
120
100
80
60
40
20
0
20
80
70
60
50

Map 1A. The Arctic regions today. A major key for unlocking the Phaeton question.

1

THE AGE OF THE EARTH

Today, educated society is fully aware that, compared to the average human life-span of three score years and ten, the age of the Earth, which modern geology has divided into successive eras and periods each millions of years in duration, is absolutely immense. Yet this concept was not always so, and was not in fact seriously developed until the first half of the nineteenth century.

Before then, researchers had tried to establish the age of the Earth by studying ancient calendars[1], and various assertions about 'time' in classical, Near Eastern and Norse literature[2], or by working out and totalling the recorded generations of Biblical figures between the traditional 'first man', Adam, and the birth of Christ[3]. Regarding this last mentioned method, the existence of different translations of scriptural sources only served to compound the difficulties. Some authorities, for example Isaac Vossius of Leiden, contended that the most authentic biblical genealogies are to be found in the original Greek translation of the Old Testament, the Septuagint, rather than in the Masoretic Hebrew texts[4]. Others disagreed. Thus, the age of the world calculated from Patriarchal genealogy as recorded in the Septuagint produced a date of 2,342 years, whereas that based on the Masoretic texts gave a date of 1,656 years[5].

That no really precise date for the age of the Earth was forthcoming from varying sources like these quickly became transparently obvious.

Early scholars everywhere recognised that, so far as it was known to them, a great break had occurred in Earth's history, or at least in the human portion of it. The break had been caused by a vast flood, which for Christian and Jewish historians was the Deluge of Genesis, and for classical writers the Great Flood of Deucalion. To all these authors this inundation became a highly important marker event[6].

Not only Christian and Jewish savants, but others of the pagan pre-classical and oriental worlds, agreed that the Deluge had terminated an earlier Golden Age, itself conceived of in many quarters as one of a succession of former world ages individually characterised symbolically by metals (bronze, iron, etc), elements (fire, water, etc), or by astronomical motifs (solar, lunar, etc). Moreover, ancient traditions collected much later from lands such as the Americas and Australia, certainly unknown to most early European, Near Eastern and Oriental writers, also preserved closely similar beliefs in which 'suns' were sometimes substituted for 'ages' as vague measures of spans of time long past. Tantalisingly, the actual durations of such 'ages' or 'suns' were seldom if ever stipulated.

Other early thinkers, especially those of pre-Hellenic and early classical Greece, devised the concept of cyclical world history, which, because it postulated a succession of different ages, again involved the idea of great spans of time. These, though of vague durations, were usually stated in terms indicating an antiquity far greater than the 1,656 and 2,342 year dates obtained by biblical studies. This doctrine was followed by, and probably led to the development of, that of the cyclical Great Year, championed by Empedocles and the Pythagorean philosophers of ancient Greece. The doctrine itself was apparently based upon earlier Chaldean teachings which advocated that the Universe, though eternal, undergoes cyclical destruction from either fire or water at lengthy but irregular intervals. The Deluge was held by them to be the most recent of these destructions. Popularised by Berosus, a Babylonian scribe of the 3rd century BC, the doctrine of the Great Year became very influential and was subscribed to by many famous cosmologists and philosophers of the day, including Chrysippus, Zeno and Plato. It survived in modified form down to at least the beginning of the 19th century.

An especially noteworthy aspect of the above topic is that all accounts of the Deluge shared the notion that, in addition to it having been a very destructive event, it was somehow connected with celestial changes. In some narratives, these are ascribed to heavenly displeasure or divine wrath at a reportedly iniquitous mankind. This factor, and the ancient concepts of bygone World Ages and a lost Golden Era, will be considered again more fully later.

Thus, irrespective of their literary or traditional sources, their advocated religious significance, or their alleged social connotations, all these accounts were as one in agreeing that a tremendous watery cataclysm had indeed occurred long ago and drowned the greater part of Creation. As one of the most widely remembered and enduring of all human traditions, the Deluge became a critical datum in virtually every early chronology, it being customary then for historians to term everything preceding it as antediluvian (before the Flood) and everything following it as post-diluvian. It was not until 525 AD that the now standard method of dating events BC and AD was introduced.

Even in the days of the earliest known writers, dates were proposed for the Deluge – another pointer to the great importance it then held for historians. These dates were, like so many later ones, usually calculated in relation to dates worked out for the Creation itself. Of these we may briefly mention that, in the 2nd century, Theophilus of Antioch calculated that Creation had occurred in 5529 BC, and that Jerome, in AD 381, thought it had erupted in 5502 BC. Some datings attempted extraordinary precision. One Jewish scholar in the 2nd century AD averred that Creation had taken place at 11.11pm on Sunday, October 6th, 3761 BC[7].

Many of these early datings, as well as many later medieval ones, were commonly set to accord with the six days of Creation described in Genesis, and to generally conform to Julius Africanus's combination, in the 3rd century AD, of the 'six days of Creation' and the 'Millennium'. Relying upon the authority of Psalms 90:4, and the virtually sacrosanct assurance of the Christian apostle Peter that for God one day is as a thousand years, Africanus reasoned that the six 'creational' days really meant six thousand Earth years. It was not long, therefore, before scholars like Augustine, Lactantius, Isadore of Seville and the Venerable Bede began dividing up human history into Six Ages totalling six thousand years, although not necessarily of one thousand years each. As remarked by Prof Dennis Dean, who undertook a special study of this theme:

> Eventually, schemes involving seven 'days' (with present time the sixth) became popular. These related conceptions of the Earth's history endured well into the seventeenth century, where we find them influencing geological theories by Descartes, Kircher, Steno, Burnet, and Whiston. Few erroneous historical assumptions have ever remained credible for so long[8].

A great up-welling of scholastic interest in the age of the Earth occurred during Renaissance times, and in England alone over one hundred different authors, working along different lines of enquiry, proposed dates for the Creation. Even those utilising solely Hebrew sources managed to differ alarmingly, their datings ranging from 3928 to 4103 BC[9].

Inevitably, by Renaissance times there were those who doubted the validity of biblical chronology as a whole, and those who redoubled their efforts to discover the real date of Creation. Among the latter was James Ussher whose monumental study of the problem, first published in Latin[10], appeared four years later in the English language version of 1658 – The Annals of the World, Deduced from the Origin of Time (London). Ussher convincingly argued for Creation having occurred in 4004

BC, a date subsequently affixed to the Lloyd Bible of 1701, by which it quickly came to be regarded as practically a part of scriptural authority itself[11].

Among the doubters were those who, even as early as the 1500s, argued that the Biblical 'days' were merely figurative. Others, like Isaac Peyrerius, postulated that, far from representing world history, biblical history represented only Jewish history and that Adam was not the first man but the first Jew. Like Friedrich Stoss in Germany, Charles Blount in Britain, and other Europeans, Pierre Bayle in Holland[12] voiced further criticisms about that time and proposed different chronological schemes of surprisingly lengthy duration, not on geological but on varied oriental cultural evidence. Some of these required Creation to have taken place far earlier than Ussher's 4004 BC. Indeed, by 1588, so much scholastic confusion and contradiction had been achieved that John Harvey found himself obliged to write with regard to all chronological compilations thitherto produced that they were:

> ...ambiguous, uncertaine, fallible, erroneous, deceitful.[13]

Earlier, none other than the great Roger Bacon had concluded that the disputes between authoritative versions of the Bible respecting the age of the world would be resolved only by astronomical evidence[14].

Almost 300 years were to elapse before any serious attempts were made to develop that avenue of approach. Meanwhile, like practically everything else in the Old Testament before the Exodus, the Deluge was still not precisely datable, yet continued to be the only graspable world datum since, as mentioned previously, everything before it was indisputably antediluvian and everything after it obviously post-diluvian. For that reason it became an increasingly critical historical marker event.

2

DEBRIS OF A BROKEN WORLD

During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries efforts were made to explore connections between Mosaic chronology and the then fast developing sciences of astronomy and primitive archaeology[15], very much as forecast by Roger Bacon 300 years earlier. Many of these studies embraced the previously-noted older doctrine of successive world ages and laid special emphasis upon the ending of individual ages by terrible floods and conflagrations. Inevitably the Biblical Deluge received particular attention, although whereas nearly all early speculations about it had concluded that it was the result of divine anger, these new investigations sought rational physical causes for its occurrence. Thus, in the opinion of the late seventeenth century English mathematician and physicist William Whiston, the Deluge had probably been caused by the close approach to Earth of a giant comet[16].

Whiston was Isaac Newton's laboratory assistant, and, like Newton, was a friend of the astronomer Edmund Halley, who may be said to have been the discoverer of the periodicity of comets (a subject returned to in Part Four of this book). Whiston was also well versed in ancient history, classical literature and the Latin, Greek and Hebrew languages. His invocation of a cosmic agent as the cause of the Deluge thus not only accommodated the aforementioned 'astronomical' elements associated with that event in many early histories and ancient traditions, but also used what at that time were some of the very latest findings on astronomy, physics, and mathematics, including Newton's then recently announced Law of Gravity. Little wonder Whiston's theory was well-received in nearly all quarters, and significantly influenced historians over the next 130 years or so.

No 'geological' chronology had been formulated in Whiston's day of course, and fossils, though well enough known[17], were still commonly interpreted as the relics of creatures (Earth's afore-cited iniquitous antediluvians) destroyed by Noah's Flood. Nor did any proper conception exist that, as an organism, man was significantly younger than the fossilised creatures found at innumerable localities, or of any vast pre-human period of Earth history.

Nevertheless, we would be at fault here if we omitted to add that as early as 1671 the naturalist John Ray may have had an inkling of reality when he opined that the world might well be "a great deal older than is imagined", and that humans were late arrivals on the terrestrial stage when, in a letter written in 1695 to the Oxford antiquarian Edward Lhwyd, he ventured:

> ...whatever may be said for ye Antiquity of the Earth itself & bodies lodged in it, yet ye race of mankind is new upon the Earth, & not older than the Scripture makes it, may I think by many arguments be almost demonstratively proved[18].

Ray, however, was apparently not the first to reach such conclusions, for Thomas Nashe, in 1592, had complained in a pamphlet about "Mathematitions abroad that will prooue men before Adam"[19]. Regrettably, Nashe did not name the mathematicians concerned.

About the time that Nashe was voicing his complaints another notable observation was put on record. The French potter Bernard Palissy recorded that, when collecting suitable clays preparatory to manufacturing his wares, he:

> ...found many species of shell fish, petrified in the earth, which are not modern kinds living in the ocean... a sort which is unknown to us, and are not found at all, except lapidified" (fossilised).[20]

These were vestiges of some prior creation. The question to be answered was: did these shellfish belong to a creation destroyed by the Deluge? The Deluge continued to be a central point in the problem of the age of the Earth.

We may also mention that, in 1655, shortly before John Ray's remarks, Isaac de la Peyère had pursued the same theme of humans before Adam[21], in the process distinguishing two Creations, that of things and that of humans. Observations like Palissy's may have contributed to the formulation of such conclusions and undoubtedly underlay the arguments of the early eighteenth century French savant René de Reaumur, who, in 1720, stated that the fossil record attested to a duration long preceding the Deluge[22].

Certainly by the mid-eighteenth century many writers, including Diderot[23], Buffon[24], and Maillet[25], were beginning to propose chronologies far longer than that apparently permissible from orthodox analyses of world history summarised in Genesis. Maillet, for example, argued for an indefinitely ancient Earth and a human existence of 400,000 years, while Diderot went even further in stating that the world was "hundreds of millions of years" old[26].

Like James Howell, all these authors were aware that, long before, Apollonius the Egyptian had claimed that the world was 153,075 years old, and that the classical Greek writer Diodorus Siculus had stated that pharaonic history spanned more than 18,000 years[27] – plenty of time, even in his day, for two Creations, and for humans to become sufficiently sinful to invoke divine displeasure culminating in a universal Deluge.

Now, while modern archaeologists have since shown 18,000 years to be grossly inflated as a date for pharaonic history, they have also discovered that, like many classical Greek thinkers[28], and unbeknown to seventeenth and eighteenth century scholars, both the ancient Egyptians[29] and the Babylonians[30] took a deep interest in fossils and the problem of 'time'. Apollonius's apparently wild claim of a world 153,075 years old, while actually much too short, was perhaps formed, or partly based, on long-forgotten palaeontological investigations, and that a great deal of seventeenth and eighteenth century discussion respecting the age of the Earth had, in essence, already occurred more than 1,500 years earlier.

Although Robert Hooke in 1688 had suggested that it might be possible to "raise a chronology" from fossils "and to state the intervalls of the times wherein such, or such catastrophies and mutations have happened"[31], subsequent studies showed that fossils were capable of several almost equally plausible interpretations insofar as the age of the world was concerned, and that the utilisation of other less uncertain methods was preferable.

Even as far back as the late seventeenth century these were being sought by men like Edward Lhwyd of Oxford. He believed that the seemingly slow accumulation of boulders in two north Welsh valleys was evidence that the age of the Earth must be far greater than then generally envisaged[32]. Lhwyd evidently omitted to consider that accelerated rates of boulder-accumulation could occur through sudden flooding, ice action, earthquakes or persistently torrential rains causing landslides.

Then, in 1715, Edmund Halley of cometary fame proposed the determination of the world's true age by extrapolating from the sea's supposedly regular increase in salinity[33]. This method also proved to have only limited application. Later, Buffon's associate, J T Needham tried to calculate the age of the Earth from sedimentation rates, but found the results so staggering that he could not accept them[34]. In any case, sedimentation rates vary widely in different latitudes and under differing conditions.

Later still, in 1779, the rate of advance by glaciers was advocated as another method[35], but that too was illusory. At the time it was unfortunately not appreciated that glaciers sometimes retreated, modern research showing that some do on a cyclical basis in response to various environmental factors.

During the mid-eighteenth century it was widely assumed that land-forms (mountains, valleys, deserts etc) and the rocks comprising them had been created at different times. This led one writer, Johann Lehmann, to distinguish three kinds of mountains, created respectively before, during and after the ubiquitous Deluge[36]. But although the Deluge continued to dominate the thoughts of many naturalists during this period, there were others, such as Baron de Holbach and Montesquieu, who argued for sequential destructive upheavals at largely irregular intervals, each apparently devoid of design or purpose[37]. These ideas reached a head in the writings of G H Toulmin, a medical doctor, who concluded:

> ...convulsions and revolutions violent beyond our experience or conception, yet unequal to the destruction of the globe, or the whole of the human species, have both existed and will again exist... [terminating] ...an astonishing succession of ages.[38]

The Catastrophist school of geology, to which we will return shortly, was truly born through the writings of these authors.

Contemporaneously with the activities and published opinions of the afore-named scholars were the conclusions reached by Jean Guettard, now justly acclaimed as the discoverer of the natural evolution of land-forms[39]. His discoveries were to have far reaching effects on geology (the study of the composition, structure and origin of rocks) in general and, over a century later, in the development of geomorphology (the study of surface physical features and their relation to structures and land-building and land-eroding processes), another important topic to which we will return later in this book.

The eighteenth century, with its ever-mounting fascination with the age and structure of the Earth, closed with two highly important geological turning-points, and with several singular discoveries. Of the former the first was the publication in 1785 of James Hutton's Theory of the Earth[40], in which the immensity of geological time, altogether dwarfing Ussher's earlier 4004 BC date, was forcefully stressed, as also the Earth's essential stability. For Hutton, "it is the little causes, long continued, which are considered as bringing about the greatest changes of the earth". He emphasised the thousands of separate details which, operating over a "long succession of ages", refute "the hypothesis of violent causes" that a truncated chronology would require. In these statements, Hutton launched what was later to become known as the Uniformitarian school of geological thought, a perspective central to the main theme of this book to which we shall repeatedly refer.

The second of these turning-points was the discovery in 1797 by a talented land surveyor, William Smith, that Earth's crust is composed of a definite sequence of fossil-bearing deposits in which individual strata (levels) are characterised by distinctive suites of fossils (bygone faunas and floras) each peculiar to the stratum yielding it. Once again it was obvious that long periods and eras had been necessary for the development of each of these successive organic assemblages – very much as Hutton and Diderot had independently postulated. Though well known in geological circles by 1800, Smith's discovery (which earned him the amusing nickname of 'Strata Smith') was not published until 1816[41], by which time much further evidence supporting it had come to light elsewhere.

The singular discoveries concerned the finding in 1772 of a deeply frozen carcass of a woolly rhinoceros near Vilui in northern Siberia, and, in 1787, of a large portion of a hairy mammoth in the Yakutsk region of Siberia. Like some earlier poorly-documented similar finds in the Siberian Tungus, both these specimens retained flesh, hides and hair[42].

Such discoveries greatly influenced the deliberations of many late eighteenth and early nineteenth century naturalists, for it was clear that, since these northern animals had been frozen instantly and had remained so until found, their demise must have been extremely sudden. Such suddenness betokened a catastrophically swift event, yet men like Hutton and Smith were discovering indisputable evidence that such catastrophes were rare. Just as clear was the fact that, for the ice and frozen ground enclosing these carcasses to have remained unmelted for the vast periods of time implied by 'Huttonian' theories, the destruction of these Siberian animals must, geologically speaking, have been very recent.

The Siberian finds increased naturalists' interest in the numerous mammoth and woolly rhinoceros bones which had long been known from, and were indeed still being met with in, more southern European latitudes. These, it was quickly realised, generally occurred either in caves or rock fissures or in superficial surface deposits like sands, gravels, clays or marls. Usually unconsolidated (loosely held together), these deposits were also largely unstratified (unlayered) and often of very irregular linear extent and thickness, exhibiting every sign of having accumulated under agitated conditions which had apparently affected huge areas of the globe more or less simultaneously. Due to the exceptional nature of these surface deposits special names were coined to distinguish them, eg, 'Boulder Clay', 'Hard Pan' and 'Till'. Researches showed that the lowest of these deposits, the 'Till', usually lay directly upon solid bedrock, the upper surface of which, irrespective of the kind of rock involved, had frequently been smashed, fissured, striated (marked with linear ridges, furrows or scores), polished or pulverised into countless fragments. This phenomenon not only extended surprising lateral and vertical distances, but had affected a great variety of extremely hard rocks.

To most naturalists at the time it was perfectly obvious that some tremendous event had occurred which, among other effects, had fractured hard rocks over immense distances, and had deposited the resultant debris equally extensively as gravels, sands, clays and muds. The bony remains of the hordes of animals which had been destroyed by the event now lay within these deposits, which, in northern Siberia, had become permanently frozen. All these interrelated remains thus represented the debris of a former but now-broken world.

Clearly any agency capable of venting so much devastation must have been not only awesomely powerful but must, from the evidence, have affected the entire world. Late eighteenth and early nineteenth century scholars rapidly expanded their concepts of terrestrial chronology from thousands or tens of thousands of years to spans of time stretching to many millions of years, and to the notion that for a large part of these immense periods quiet and equable conditions had prevailed[43]. On the other hand they were being confronted with mounting evidence that something traumatic, something catastrophic, had affected the whole Earth, geologically extremely recently.

Men were not long in concluding that this event had been the Deluge of Genesis and widespread tradition, and that perhaps the scriptural record and the accumulating geological record could, after all, be reconciled. Many books appeared on this theme during the first thirty years of the nineteenth century. Three examples only need be cited here[44]. Were the ancient traditions right after all? Had a long-lost Golden Age been suddenly and disastrously terminated by a frightful global Flood? The growing evidence suggested to many that this may indeed have been the case, and efforts were redoubled to investigate these possibilities.

The results were interesting and to some extent completely unexpected.

3

ENIGMAS IN STONE

The first quarter of the nineteenth century, when geological science grew apace, saw much attention given to rock striations and polished rock surfaces, and to the vast number of boulders which, because they were usually foreign to the districts in which they reposed, were accordingly called 'erratics'.

The rock striations were generally found to be aligned north-west to south-east, both north and south of the equator. At many places either side of the Atlantic the striations occur only on the summits of high hills or only on the northern or north-western slopes of mountains. Locally, however, other striations cross the predominating examples at all sorts of angles or even at right-angles to their long axes. Such evidence suggests that whatever produced them proceeded from a general northern or north-western direction and totally ignored pre-existing topography.

At many localities these rock striations furrow extraordinarily smooth rock surfaces, in some instances exhibiting a glass-like polish. Such surfaces are of irregular extent, but occur with or near striated rocks so frequently that little doubt exists that the striating and polishing of these surfaces had a common origin, both in cause and time.

Many of the 'erratic' boulders are of immense size and weight, the very largest being literally miles long[45]. In some districts they abound in almost unbelievable numbers, perch precariously in long lines along mountain crests, or lie singly upon the very summits of lofty eminences. At other places they choke valleys and gorges or repose in splendid isolation on the surfaces of plains and deserts. Sometimes the boulders are visible in their entirety – elsewhere they are buried almost out of sight by surrounding surface deposits. 'Erratics' are often reported as sharply angular and "fresh-looking"[46], rounded and polished, or as sometimes scored by "well-marked parallel striae"[47], and

Table 1A

Geological Eras, Periods and Epochs

Geological Eras and Periods

The sequence of eras and periods which comprise Earth history, with their estimated durations given in parentheses.
Not to scale.

Millions of years	ERA	PERIOD
2	CAENOZOIC (Recent life)	QUATERNARY
12 29 41 51 60		TERTIARY (58,000,000 years)
130	MESOZOIC (Middle life)	CRETACEOUS (70,000,000 years)
160		JURASSIC (30,000,000 years)
185		TRIASSIC (25,000,000 years)
210	PALAEOZOIC (Ancient life)	PERMIAN (25,000,000 years)
265		CARBONIFEROUS (55,000,000 years)
about 320		DEVONIAN (50-55,000,000 years)
360		SILURIAN (40,000,000 years)
440		ORDOVICIAN (80,000,000 years)
540		CAMBRIAN (100,000,000 years)
at least 840	PROTEROZOIC (Primitive life)	Somtimes divided into 300,000,000 years or longer unknown	ARCHAEOZOIC (Beginning of life)	Duration unknown

The Tertiary and Quaternary Periods

The conventional subdivisions of the Tertiary and Quaternary periods with their estimated durations shown in parentheses.
Not to scale.

PERIOD	EPOCH			Millions of years
QUATERNARY	HOLOCENE			.011
	PLEISTOCENE	Upper	Ice Ages	2
		Middle Lower
TERTIARY	PLIOCENE (10,000,000 years)			12
	MIOCENE (17,000,000 years)			29
	OLIGOCENE (12,000,000 years)			41
	EOCENE (10,000,000 years)			51
	PALAEOCENE (9,000,000 years)			60

in every case as having travelled considerable distances to their present locations – their points of origin often remaining obscure. Their angular and "fresh-looking" condition, however, suggests that their transportation was rapid and of short duration, a startling conclusion respecting the largest 'erratics'.

Like the rock striations mentioned above, these boulders were evidently dispersed by an agency operating oblivious to older geographical barriers and sometimes obliquely to the long axes of pre-existing ground features[48]. Repeating associations of polished rock surfaces, striations and erratics are known from many widely-sundered localities, such as Montana[49], Brazil[50], and Finland[51]. Clearly these phenomena are different expressions of a singular event which occurred on a hemispheric scale.

The superficial sands and gravels which contain the bony remains of woolly rhinoceroses, mammoths and other large contemporary mammals, also lie unusually to adjacent local topographical features. They are often banked up against northern or north-western mountain or valley slopes only. At other places they mantle only the summits of high mountains, sometimes to depths of several thousand feet or metres. Elsewhere they bury the lower flanks of whole mountain ranges or even fill up entire valleys. They also frequently contain large quantities of geologically recent plant remains, at some places so profusely that, in company with coeval (same age) animal bones, they completely fill caves and rock fissures. Yet, even in such apparently chaotic evidence a curiously consistent theme emerges, for at many sites – those around Muggendorf in Germany for instance[52] – only the caves and fissures facing northwards or north-westwards have been so filled.

Almost all early geologists attributed these clearly linked phenomena to the action of powerful water currents flowing in a general north-to-south direction. The first scientific explanations purporting to account for these phenomena included vast river floods, 'waves of translation' generated by hypothetical giant submarine earthquakes, and the equator-wards drift of huge numbers of silt and stone-laden icebergs of northern origin, which deposited their stony cargoes in warmer latitudes. These explanations invoked essentially catastrophic causes, and the irregular character of the relevant deposits, due to their supposed transportation by water or ice from one place to another, were soon widely referred to as 'drift'. In turn, the advocates of such explanations were grouped with those who, like Whiston, had long postulated recurrent violent episodes in Earth history, and were regarded as 'Catastrophists'.

For many older naturalists the 'drift' deposits and the pulverised and fissured bedrock upon which it frequently rested represented the stony remnants of a former but now badly scarred world, destroyed by an agency which, in the geological scale of things, had operated remarkably recently. Recognising the modernity of this material, present geologists assign most of it to the Pleistocene period which, ending approximately 11,000 years ago, immediately preceded the Holocene (our own) period (see table 1A).

4

WORLD AGES – WORLD SUNS

One of classical Greece's most celebrated philosophers, Plato, citing even older Egyptian records, stated that in addition to world disasters resulting from fire, there had been not one but many great floods which had terminated several earlier successive ages[53]. The pre-Columbian Mexicans possessed generally similar beliefs in which various past ages, which they referred to as 'suns', were brought to violent ends by tremendous natural upheavals, floods, furious winds and rampant fire[54]. Numerous other Amerindian recollections, particularly those from western North America, mention 'ages' as 'suns', the number of which varies from three to five in different accounts[55], and traditionally attribute their ends to a disastrous "falling of the sky". As the mythographer Alexander remarked:

> The notion of cataclysmic destructions of the world by flood or fire, often with a concomitant falling of the sky, is frequent in West Coast myth...[56]

Even the remote tribes of the Amazon basin possess these beliefs, many of which embody the idea of terrible disasters involving fire and prolonged darkness and, above all, an immense world-drowning flood analogous to that mentioned in Genesis[57].

On the other side of the world, the Dusan tribe of western Borneo (Kalimantan) preserve a similar idea which they link to seven 'suns' thus:

> The sky, originally low, retreated when six of the original seven suns were killed.[58]

We shall meet these seven suns again later. A belief in recurrent world disasters terminating successive earlier ages was formerly extremely widespread, both in time and geographically. The Voguls of Siberia, for instance, believed in recurrent conflagrations attended by fearful thunder[59]; the Welsh Triads, compiled from more ancient sources during the middle ages, refer to three great cataclysms, one involving a deluge, another a fire and a third a drought[60]; in the 6th century BC both Anaximenes and Anaximander assumed periodic world destruction with subsequent re-creation, as did Diogenes of Apollonia in the 5th century BC; Aristarchus, who flourished at Samos in the 3rd century BC, taught that the Earth undergoes destruction by fire and water every 2,484 years[61]. The Chinese entertained similar ideas[62], as did nations as far apart as Hawaii[63], the shores of the Bengal Sea[64], the early Icelanders[65], and the Jews[66]. The ancient sacred book of the Buddhists, the Visuddhi-Magga, mentions a still more ancient work called Discourse on the Seven Suns[67], indicating that the same notion had long existed on the Indian subcontinent, while in Mexico, the old Mayan Annals of Cuauhtitlan, written about AD 1570 on the basis of still earlier sources, mentions seven 'sun' epochs known as the Chicon-Tonatiuh[68].

Many early memories of these world-shaking events specifically link them with the abrupt destruction of a primeval earthly paradise widely known to classical writers as a Golden Age. The Roman writer Ovid stated that during the reign of the legendary king Kronos (Saturn of the Romans, and the alleged ancestor of the Olympian gods of both ancient Greece and Rome) springtime was perennial[69]. Virtually every commentator of antiquity on this topic agreed that this lost age was a golden one and the Earth a veritable paradise. It was, as Lenormant once noted, traceable

> ...among all people of the Aryan or Japhetic race.[70]

Ver perpetuum, or perpetual spring, was its alleged climate[71]. Various remarkable and often quite unbelievable characteristics were attributed to it, such as it being a place "...where the human inhabitants are in the prime of life, with no aging or senility"[72].

The early Egyptians preserved similar memories, for:

> In Egyptian mythology, the reign of Râ was like the primeval reign of Kronos; the myth of it was a reminiscence of the sinless Golden Age.[73]

Classical writers like Strabo and Pherecydes discussed the location of the seat of Kronos' empire, and concluded that it was a northern one:

> Pherecydes described Kronos as dwelling in that part of heaven 'nearest the earth', ie, the North; Strabo places him in the 'home of Boreas'. These all agree in essence with Sanchoniathon, as preserved in the Greek version by Philo of Byblos, who said that the seat of Kronos' power was 'in the middle of the lands... in a place near springs and rivers'.[74]

Most mythographers agree that Boreas, in whose home Kronos dwelt, equates with the Norse Bör, known to the ancient Greeks as the demiurge Ophion, who, under various guises, lies at the very root of most of the world's mythologies. Thus, in the Norse epics, it is the sons of Bör who build Asgård, the abode of the gods and their kin, from which they reputedly wrought many wondrous deeds both on Earth and in the heavens[75]. Odin, the principal Norse deity, lived there, as did his Finnish counterpart Ukko, who resided at Tätela or the Place of Tähti[76]. Very interestingly, Täht in the Estonian language means 'Pole Star' – so, again, we are directed to a northern location for this ancient paradise.

Early Greek authors like Apollodorus and Theopompus expressly called this traditional lost land Meropia and its inhabitants the Meropes. The latter were sometimes anciently identified with the Hyperboreans, a near-mythical people alleged to have dwelt either in the extreme west or in the far north. Dominating all was a lofty mountain named Meru. Meru also features in ancient Indian epic literature, not so much as a particular peak but as a generally elevated region[77]. It was evidently the centre from which a long-forgotten empire was ruled, for we find that Deva-Nahusha, one of the Vedic deities of old India and whose greatness was extolled in glowing terms, for a time had:

> ...sovereign control of the affairs of Meru... he led his armies through all... the world; by means of matchless wisdom and miraculous heroism he made his empire universal[78].

Ancient Chinese traditions likewise speak of a highly elevated region wherein dwelt gods and other wonderful personages. The principal Chinese deity, Lao-T'ien-Yeh, known as the 'Heavenly Master of the First Origin', and credited with creating the first humans, reputedly lived with his consort, Queen Wang – who reappears in the ancient Chinese romance of the Emperor of Mu – in the K'un-Lun mountains[79]. Variant Chinese traditions refer to the supreme deity as Shang-Te, whose palace was located in a "celestial space about the North Pole"[80]. Likewise the western Mongolians placed the abode of their gods on a 'Golden Mountain', the apex of which they considered identical with the celestial Pole[81]. Presumably for these reasons the Japanese, who held essentially similar beliefs, addressed their principal god as the 'Lord of the Centre of Heaven'[82].

Probably the best known of all recollections of this idyllic land (shared by Moslem, Jew, and Christian alike) is the 'Garden of Eden'. Unmistakable variants of it occur in early Persian, Arabian and Sanskrit (Indian) literature; it is mentioned as Atlan by the Aztecs and as Xibalba by the Quiché Maya of Yucatan. The Polynesians remember it as the 'lost home of Kane', and Plato apparently left us a comparatively detailed account of it in his description of the legendary sunken island of Atlantis[83], although suspicion exists that much of his version is somewhat idealised.

Several widely-scattered traditions describe the catastrophic termination of this wonderful primordial age. The inception of terrible unaccustomed cold was a special feature of that event. Thus Iranian tradition asserts:

> The first of the good lands and countries which I, Ahura Mazda, created was Airyana Vaejo (Iran the Ancient)... There are ten winter months there (now), two summer months, and these are cold for the waters, cold for the earth and cold for the trees[84].

Other traditions about a disastrous refrigeration of the former abode of the gods and the cradle of mankind have been ably reviewed by Pietremont[85] who, among other things, mentioned Lactantius's assertion that prolonged darkness accompanied a dreadful winter at the time[86], and that the Delaware Indians remember closely similar details in their account of the event[87]. This icy calamity was almost certainly identical with the appalling Fimbul winter of Norse mythology, of which more anon.

Also remembered among the cataclysmic agencies which destroyed this primeval age was a gigantic destructive flood, in which:

> ...trees, flowers, fruits, birds, vanished in an instant, amid terrific clamour.[88]

The significance of these memories will become all too clear as this book unfolds.

5

A DISPLACED AXIS?

Very interestingly, life-forms like those just listed are biologically-compatible organisms inasmuch as, despite its traditional northern or polar location, the paradisical Eden, Asgård, Meru or Airyana Vaejo enjoyed a perennial spring-like climate. As shown later, these details are supported by a great deal of factual evidence.

It is also clear that the loss of this ancestral paradise involved a rearrangement of the seasons. Indeed, describing the "World Before the Present", the Navajo Indians of North America insist that:

> ...The seasons were much shorter than they are now. A year then was but a month of our time.[89]

The statement contained in Zad Sparan's paraphrase of chapters 1 – 5 of the Persian Bundahish texts agrees with the above in describing how, when Airyana Vaejo was lost, the whole sky and sea became deranged – and lends support to Frederick Klee's contention that certain ancient Egyptian hieroglyphs refer to a displacement of the heavens at the time of the Deluge[90]. We have just noted that a tremendous flood was allegedly one of the features of the end of the idyllic primeval age said to have preceded our own.

The above, and other similar recollections of a celestial derangement accompanying the Deluge indicate that before the onset of that calamity the celestial bodies moved differently relative to viewers on Earth. The illustrious Greek astronomer Anaxagoras taught that during the Golden Age the stars revolved in a tholiform manner (when stars revolve in the sky in a horizontal plane), a belief shared by another Greek astronomer, Anaximenes, who, however, preferred to say that the stars revolved in a horizontal plane. Diogenes Laertius, who recorded these opinions, added:

> At first the Pole Star, which is continually visible, always appeared in the zenith, but afterwards it acquired a certain declination.[91].

Ancient Japanese cosmogony (theory of the origin of the universe) refers to virtually the same condition, thus:

> ...the father of our present sun and moon is represented as beginning his activities in the newly-created world by repeatedly performing in a horizontal plane... Chinese traditions also refer to this.[92]

Additional confirmation of this earlier celestial arrangement (and of some later alteration to it) was given by the respected Victorian astronomer Richard Proctor, who concluded that, from the position of the aquatic constellations (given watery associations) in the most ancient astronomical systems, celestial rotation at the time of their invention must have been "...in a horizontal position"[93].* The date when these constellations were first devised is still unknown, but all authorities agree that it must have been a remotely ancient one. Certainly by 5100 BC alpha (a) Ursae Majoris or Dubhe in the constellation of the Great Bear (Ursa Major) had already long been viewed as a polar star, for it appears engraved upon the walls of the temple of Hathor at Denderah in Egypt, and formed the original orientation-point of that structure[94]. At that date the stars of the constellation of the Dragon (Draco) were circumpolar. It was not until 2000 BC that the stars of Ursa Major – now the principal constellation in the northern sky – became circumpolar too[95].

In this connection it is significant that for latitudes below 51°N today, the stars of Ursa Major 'set' and 'rise', and that at the latitude of the old Egyptian capital Memphis only Dubhe always remains above the horizon by some 5°. Nonetheless, within historical times Ursa Major was wholly invisible to residents of the Nile Valley south of Memphis[96] yet the ancient Egyptians knew that the polar axis lay in that constellation during historical times[97]. That they should have been aware of this is not, however, so very surprising when we recall that one of their leading historians, Manetho, asserted that his race possessed records of events dating back as far as 11,542 BC, or, as previously noted, Apollonius thought that by his day 153,075 years of history had passed by.

These formerly different positions of the above-mentioned constellations actually relate to the well-known astronomical phenomenon of the precession of the celestial North Pole which is, of course, matched by an equivalent effect at the celestial South Pole. Concerning these, Sir James Jeans once remarked:

> ...our ancestors of 5,000 years ago saw the heavens turning round a point in the constellation of the Dragon. For the same reasons, our posterity of 5,000 years hence will see the heavens turning round a point in the constellation of Cepheus.[98]

Recent research, however, suggests that something more profound than just a celestial precession has occurred. The precession itself is merely an effect of a more fundamental change.

Studies have shown that at 10,178 BC, or over 12,000 years ago, the celestial pole was inclined at an angle of 30° from its present position[99]. This in turn strongly suggests that the terrestrial axis was then oriented differently from today. If true, that imparts an entirely new significance to the afore-cited statements of Anaxagoras, Anaximenes, Diogenes Laertius and Proctor, and the assertions of the previously mentioned traditions. It also suggests that at the time of the Deluge which allegedly terminated the Golden Age there must have been a change to the tilt of the Earth's axis.

Any axial changes of the type just suggested would, of course, have been attended by various other major natural adjustments on quite literally a global basis. There are now

---

* See Note 1.

Cassiopeia
Ursa Major
Pole Star
Ursa Minor
Cepheus
Draco
Pole of the Ecliptic
Cygnus
Vega
Lyra
Hercules
2,000
1,000 A.D.
0 A.D.
1,000 B.C.
2,000 B.C.
3,000 B.C.
4,000 B.C.
5,000 B.C.
20,000 A.D.
19,000
18,000
17,000
16,000
15,000
13,000
12,000
11,000
10,000
9,000
8,000
7,000
6,000
5,000
4,000
3,000

Fig 1.1. Precession of the Polar Axis. After Sir James Jeans.

plenty of these on record from different parts of the world, clustered around the date of 10,178 BC, calculated as that when Earth's celestial pole lay at an angle of 30° from its present position.

According to standard Ice Age chronology (see table 1A), the final icy episode of any magnitude was the so-called Younger Dryas which brought the Pleistocene epoch to a close. This occurred between 10,000 and 11,000 years ago when the waters of the North Atlantic warmed by as much as 7°C within a mere 50 years[100], and ended a period of cold dry conditions on Greenland, slightly later at 10,700 years, in as little as 20 years – an estimate lately reduced to an "astonishingly quick 3–5 years"[101] – concomitantly with a rapid retreat of sea-ice in northern waters and a 50% increase in precipitation and snowfall[102].

Recently obtained ice-cores from Greenland reveal even quicker changes. Snowfall there, for example, "doubled rapidly... possibly in one to three years" at the close of Younger Dryas times in response "...to some kind of threshold or trigger in the North Atlantic climatic system"[103]. The effects of these climate changes, described by some recent investigators as brief and dramatic, were felt all round the North Atlantic basin[104], in Alaska, where they took place between 11,000 and 10,000 years ago[105], and, as in Europe[106], involved marked vegetational changes[107].

Essentially comparable changes also occurred then about the same time much more distantly. Space limitations here preclude the recitation of many details, although we may highlight those from Tibet and China, where climate changes seriously affected Tibetan lake levels and led to long-term aridity across much of the Tibetan plateau, a process commencing "suddenly" about 10,000 years ago[108], and where Chinese climatic conditions and plant life were enormously affected by a northerly displacement of a greatly enhanced monsoonal system which did not occupy its present, more southerly, sphere of operations until about 6,000 years ago[109].

All such data are indicative of seriously, and suddenly, disturbed atmospheric and oceanic circulatory systems of the kind that could be expected to naturally attend an alteration to the angle of Earth's axis – assuming that such a change is possible or actually occurred in the geologically recent past. As later pages show, such a change almost certainly did occur, and, not unexpectedly, involved many other factors in addition to those just mentioned. Before we can consider these, however, it will be necessary to review some further aspects of the general scenario which has unfolded so far.

6

THE PARADOX

It was precisely the kind of traditional backdrop which we have outlined on preceding pages that, confronting the emerging discipline of geology some 170 years ago, clearly indicated to the pioneer geologists that, together with 'drift', 'erratic' boulders and fresh-looking land-surface phenomena, a major physical disturbance had afflicted Earth within geologically very recent times. This perspective remained popular until about 1830, when Charles Lyell, then a young lawyer, published an alternative interpretation, his celebrated 'principles of uniformity'[110].

Like Hutton before him, Lyell argued that no past geological processes radically differed from those operating today. Deposits have accumulated slowly over periods individually lasting many thousands, even millions, of years. Wind, rain and frost had inexorably denuded landscapes just as surely as oceans had sculpted shorelines. The temporal and geographical extent of any former natural upheavals such as earthquakes and volcanic eruptions must of necessity been brief; they were not global events. The world-embracing cataclysms of the 'Catastrophists' were ruled out; 'gradualism' was said to have been the overriding norm. If it had occurred at all, the Deluge was considered to have been a relatively modest event confined to a limited geographical region. The term 'Pleistocene' was coined specifically to embrace the various 'diluvial' (flood-borne) formations – the sands, gravels, muds, silts, etc – of the 'Catastrophists', and as a distinctive name for the period when these had been deposited.

Lyell's views, having the special merit of giving a terrestrial rather than a cosmic cause for the present panorama of a debris-strewn world, were quickly held to signify 'uniformitarianism' (as opposed to the until then popular 'catastrophism') and soon came to be accorded a respect only slightly lower than that usually reserved for Holy Writ.

Thus, supporters of Lyell's ideas became known as 'Uniformitarians', and 'uniformitarianism' became a pillar of conventional geological dogma. How the acceptance of 'uniformitarianism' soon afterwards led to the formulation of the Glacial Theory and the idea of an Ice Age will be presented shortly.

In one geological camp we thus have 'Catastrophists' who have long sought to use scientific data to prove the former reality of terrible world disasters – particularly the Deluge of global recollection. They have emphasised that numerous Deluge traditions mention one or more celestial agents as having assailed Earth and having caused that watery calamity, and that prolific evidence capable of being reasonably interpreted as having originated in just such circumstances is available for study. In effect their argument is essentially identical to that presently urged by the proponents of the recently advanced theory of an asteroidal or cometary termination of the Mesozoic Era during late Cretaceous times.

In the opposite camp, 'Uniformitarians' have argued that, despite the evidence of the frozen Siberian carcasses (apparent examples of a catastrophic event which we consider again in greater detail later), recurrent disasters of such magnitude are completely at variance with the normal workings of Nature on Earth. They discern no terrestrial mechanism capable of generating of its own volition a cataclysm as allegedly gigantic as the Deluge, despite the fact that leading Catastrophists like Whiston[111], Donnelly[112], Beaumont[113], Patten[114] and others specifically invoked external (cosmic) causes for that calamity. Since 'uniformitarians' perceive or admit of no physical proof of a conflict between this planet and some other celestial agent, they regard as spurious all claims advocating such an idea. Furthermore, they contend that the factual data regularly used to support 'catastrophist' arguments relates mostly to the widespread action of ice, not water.

It is, therefore, paradoxical that a worldwide traditional memory of an appalling watery disaster during the infancy of mankind, involving one or more cosmic visitors, has persisted from earliest historical times. Further, that science, having assembled a veritable library of facts dealing with the very same period, interprets the same evidence as due to quite another cause. The 'catastrophist' and 'uniformitarian' schools of thought are thus apparently diametrically opposed.

As we now shall see, this is not necessarily the case at all.

7

PERSPECTIVES – A QUESTION OF SCALE

In actuality 'uniformitarianism' is 'catastrophism', but on an insignificant and hugely broadened-out scale. There is no hard dividing line separating the two extremes represented by these terms. The word 'scale', however, is the key to this whole scenario: it permits the development of accurate perspectives. Such perspectives, however, are scarcely attainable if the apparently diametrically opposed concepts of 'uniformitarianism' and 'catastrophism' are rigorously compartmentalised and continue to be regarded as incompatible.

Dictionaries define the word 'scale' as the ratio between given sizes or intensities of events and things (both animate and inanimate), and denotes relative magnitude. Compared to an ant, for example, a human being is a very large entity, and the ant is enormous compared to a microbe. The same human being is quite small alongside the largest tree or whale, and is almost insignificant compared to a mountain or an ocean. Even the mightiest mountain is no more than a pimple on Earth's crust, and any one of the oceans but a puddle on the planet's uneven surface. Yet even the largest mountain is dwarfed by the smallest ocean.

Although colossal by human standards, Earth itself is a rather modestly-sized planet and, as with all the other planets forming the solar system, is a very small object relative to the Sun around which it orbits. Viewed astronomically, however, the Sun and the solar system is almost invisibly tiny compared to the immensity of the galaxy (to earthbound observers best known as the Milky Way) of which it is a member. The unimaginably vast distances separating the Sun from its orbiting planets, the planets from each other, and the solar system generally from the nearest stars, immediately put into clear spatial perspectives the great event discussed in this book.

Nature itself operates essentially as a series of disasters. These, relative to the organisms and environmental conditions involved at any given moment of time, are no less catastrophic than the frightful disaster described on following pages. For example, natural marine and river erosion constantly destroy, through undercutting, stream banks and coastal cliffs. For organisms inhabiting such places, such physical alterations are frequently lethal and at best decimatory. Again, unseasonably wet weather can rot seeds, fruits and flowers before they can germinate or pollinate successfully. Similarly, prolonged drought can shrivel vegetation or generate fires every bit as calamitous as high winds can remove blossom before it can 'set', or cause chronic 'windburn' to plants at vital youthful stages of their development – in the process stultifying harvests and crops. Moreover, particular combinations of climatic factors can and often do encourage abnormal increases in insect and rodent populations preparatory to insect and vermin plagues.

Viewed locally, and irrespective of whether they occur suddenly, violently or intensely, or operate slowly over many weeks or months (such as the 'Dutch Elm Disease' episode of the 1970s), all these and many other analogous events are catastrophic. They are apparently the underlying cause for the 'survival of the fittest' as defined by Darwin and other evolutionists.

When such episodes are small-scale, or fail to affect human beings significantly, they either pass unnoticed or are generally regarded by irritated farmers, meteorologists and naturalists as normal quirks of Nature. Yet, despite representing miniature catastrophes, they continue to be regarded as natural expressions of 'uniformitarianism'.

If such events manifest as landslides, floods, volcanic eruptions, earthquakes or tsunamis[115] and happen suddenly, violently or with great intensity, or when they occasion appreciable loss of property or 'valued' life (ie people, owned livestock, etc), they are noticed and bracketed as cataclysms, and the regions they worst affect as 'disaster areas'. It seems to be commonly accepted that such events naturally but sporadically punctuate the uniformitarian norm (as defined by Lyellian dogma), which thus extends to include even such dreadful events as the Krakatau explosion of 1883[116].

Yet none of these 'catastrophes' is individually large or intense enough to terminate a whole geological era or period, or to usher in a new one along the lines postulated by many past 'catastrophist' authors.

Compartmentalisation of traumas like those outlined above, though perhaps convenient for insurance purposes, is demonstrably unstable scientifically. 'Natural disasters' like those just enumerated are relatively no more and no less 'natural' or 'disastrous' than the aforementioned and comparatively innocuous cliff falls, plagues and crop failures. The only difference separating all these events is the intensity and extent of their occurrence. This difference is purely one of scale.

Thus, as long as portions of the Earth's crust do not collapse or get up-heaved into mountain ranges, and oceans are not displaced or drained, man seems content to treat all lesser disasters as normal expressions of 'uniformitarianism' – which, of course, they are. Nevertheless, he is quick to categorise anything larger or more severe, such as terrestrial convulsions induced by, say, celestial agencies (which at present we can merely envisage theoretically), as pure 'catastrophism', and places it outside 'uniformitarianism' as we usually conceive it.

Astronomers and astrophysicists, familiar with the near-endless succession of paroxysmal events occurring naturally throughout the universe during the birth, evolution and demise of galaxies, stars and sundry other cosmic bodies, concede that such events are part of the astronomical norm. As such, despite their inherent catastrophic character, they represent 'astronomical uniformitarianism'.

Again, the question of scale is once more the overriding factor here.

When, as established by modern astronomical research, cosmic events like supernovae explosions occur comparatively close to the solar system, we are still dealing with 'astronomical uniformitarianism'. Though fortunately infrequent in our sector of the galaxy, it is inevitable that such events will occur sooner or later in the vicinity of the solar system and, in the larger scheme of things, must actually be expected to do so. Thus, because Earth is a celestial body, it would, in the event of an encounter with some intrusive celestial object, react according to natural planetary 'laws' which, as we have just indicated, must themselves be a part of 'uniformitarianism' in its widest (cosmic) sense.

It is only when an event of that kind occurs, however, that these more violent aspects of 'uniformitarianism' can manifest themselves on Earth, for they do not and cannot arise of their own volition without external (cosmic) stimuli. Thus, if appropriate circumstances were to occur, the operation of such 'laws' on a watery planet like Earth could, among other things, be expected to cause oceanic displacement on a scale which might well approach the traditional proportions of the Deluge. Such disturbances would be lethal for all pre-existing topography and biota, and would rapidly result in the development of conditions where the doctrine of 'survival of the fittest' – so typical of Lyellian 'uniformitarianism' – would be supplanted by that of 'survival of the luckiest'. That, most interestingly, is exactly what so many Deluge traditions around the world expressly state.

Cosmically induced upheavals like these not only differ from conventional uniformitarian disturbances by their enormously greater magnitude, violence and intensity, but from the fact that, in one form or another, they perforce encompass practically the entire globe[117]. However one wants to regard the collective testimony of the world's Flood traditions, there is no escaping its almost monotonously recurrent assertion that the Deluge was a worldwide event – precisely what a catastrophe generated by cosmic agencies could be expected to induce. In that connection it is hardly necessary to stress that the juxtaposition in numerous traditions of huge terrestrial convulsions and certain celestial bodies at the very time of the Deluge can scarcely be a coincidence or the happy product of traditional imagination.

The reality is, of course, 'uniformitarianism' and 'catastrophism' are merely opposite extremes of an essentially ongoing chain of essentially calamitous natural episodes spanning the observable universe and ranging, as far as we humans are concerned, from the almost-insignificant to the virtually world-shattering. Once this problem of scale is overcome psychologically, comprehension of what follows in this book should grow progressively clearer.

To what extent, then, are the perspectives of the 'catastrophists' and the 'uniformitarians' actually correct? Are the former woefully wrong and the latter right, or is the reverse true? Could the arguments and contentions of both schools of thought be simultaneously partially valid and partially erroneous? Is there, in fact, any possibility at all of effectively reconciling such basically different points of view? Believing that there is, we devote the remainder of this book to resolving this seemingly intractable problem.

8

THE BIRTH OF THE GLACIAL THEORY

One of the most puzzling facts of Nature confronting late eighteenth and early nineteenth century scholars was the occurrence of the aforementioned frozen animal carcasses of Siberia. Not surprisingly, several earlier authorities, including Pallas[118], Cuvier[119], Erman[120] and D'Archiac[121], who subscribed to the (catastrophist) Diluvial Theory, concluded that a colossal mass of moving water had overwhelmed those creatures.

It was, and still is, widely contended that the preserved hairy coats of these frozen animals served as natural protection against severe cold, and that their owners were former denizens of Arctic latitudes now hosting their remains. This view is still often reflected in artists' reconstructions of these bygone mammals. As modern researches have shown, however, such conclusions have proved to be no more than assumptions (see appendix A) and, as we shall see in Part Five, most of the animals now found as frozen carcasses were corpses before they were refrigerated.

Nevertheless, it was the coupling of these assumptions with Lyell's then new and superficially attractive theory of 'uniformity' that led early nineteenth century geologists to reconsider the origin of polished and striated rocks, the singular distribution of 'erratic' boulders and the conditions under which the immense 'drift' deposits had accumulated. All these had clearly been produced by an agency or process evidently operating contemporaneously with the deep-freezing of animals in northern Siberia. If, it was reasoned, these latter were animals specially equipped to withstand great cold – as must also have been the same species known further south only from unfrozen bones – then had not all this vast corpus of associated phenomena – in particular the striated and polished rocks – resulted from intense and widespread glaciation? Such glaciation, though now largely melted everywhere except in Arctic Siberia, had a priori affected all territories yielding remains of animals assumed to have been adapted biologically to icy conditions.

Left: Fig 1.2a. The Hairy Mammoth (Mammuthus primigenius). After Erwin C Christman.

Right: Fig 1.2b. The Woolly Rhinoceros (Coelodonta tichorhinus). After Erwin C Christman.

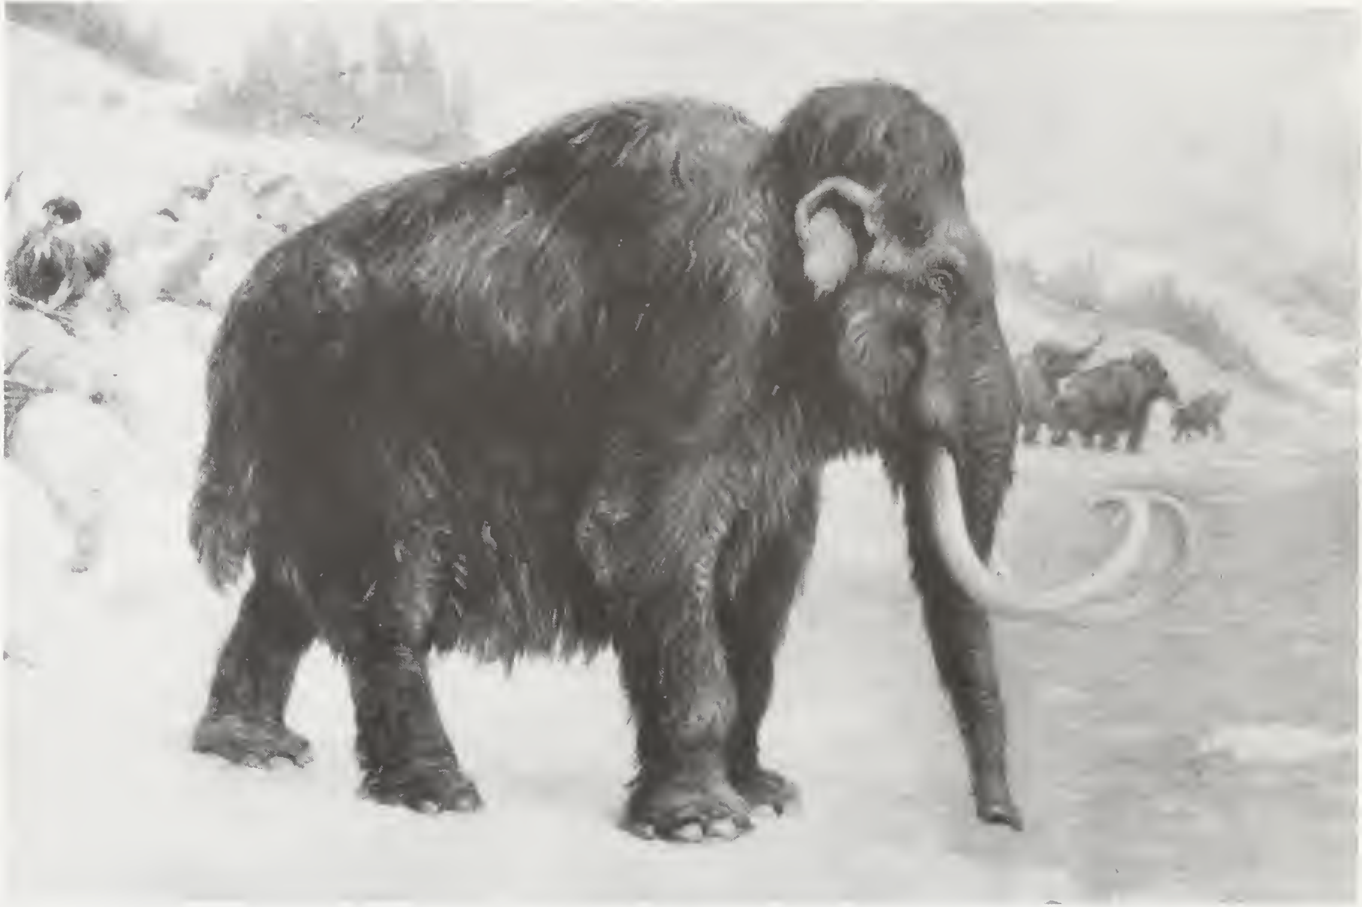

Fig 1.3. Hairy Mammoths. Charles R. Knight's well-known painting (a precursor of many others) has done much to perpetuate the myth that mammoths were adapted to Arctic conditions (see Appendix A). Courtesy of American Museum of Natural History, Dept. of Library Services. Photo: H.S. Rice.

Put another way, did not the occurrence in 'drift' deposits of unfrozen remains of animals identical to those represented by the Siberian carcasses prove that ice had formerly covered all the regions where such remains are now found? Would not the one-time presence of ice across all these regions reconcile the apparent anomalies of the fossil record?

It was decided, therefore, that in the not-so-distant geological past – a factor emphasised by the remarkable freshness and scarcely-fossilised condition of the bones of the 'drift' animals – huge areas of the northern hemisphere must either have been swathed in ice or had experienced temperatures considerably lower than they do today.

In 1821, the Swiss engineer Ignaz Venetz drew attention to evidence he took to be former Alpine glaciation on a huge scale[122]. Shortly afterwards the Norwegian geologist Jens Esmarch similarly advocated far greater landward extensions of the Norwegian glaciers and, by 1832, Prof A Bernhardi had proposed that the North Polar ice had once extended to the southernmost edge of the German plain now dotted with 'erratics'. Just two years later, Johann von Charpentier noted the existence of deep grooves and scratches on many Alpine rock surfaces and boulders and, like a colleague, Karl Schimper, concluded that they were the work of ice and that a veritable Ice Age characterised by numerous large glaciers descending hills and mountains everywhere in central Europe had once been a reality. By virtue of their natural slow movements, glaciers, of course, admirably epitomised Lyell's then recently-published theory of uniformity and gradualism.

Thus, with their constant and remorseless movement, active glaciers (as distinct from those in retreat) were thought to be capable of providing the continuous power necessary to move huge boulders, striate and polish rock surfaces, and deepen or widen older valleys. The stony material excavated by the ice would be carried slowly down to the terminal ends of the glaciers in the normal way and there deposited as moraines (piles of deposited debris) analogous to those still formed by many present glaciers. Earlier investigators professedly saw morainic debris in the many heaps and banks of stones and gravel traceable all over western and central Europe, and the notion soon arose that all these had once been deposited by now vanished glaciers.

By 1836, when the Swiss naturalist Louis Agassiz of Motiers joined Charpentier in his Alpine studies, many ears receptive to the idea of former extensive glaciation already existed in Europe, and a report submitted by Agassiz to the Annual Congress of Swiss Scientists in the July of that year was accordingly well received. Agassiz's report proposed that a profound fall in temperature had occurred previous to the upheaval of the Alps and that tremendous masses of ice had smothered land surfaces as far distant as 'erratics' and striated rocks are now distributed. Agassiz expanded his ideas in a larger work published in 1840[123] and it established him as the inventor of the Ice Age, even though, as noted above, Charpentier and Schimper had independently proposed just such an 'age' several years earlier.

After disposing of all previous alternative hypotheses, Agassiz argued that repeated falls of temperature had occurred before the Alpine upheaval and that an immense ice-sheet or mer de glace had covered the greater part of northern and western Europe, much of the western end of the Mediterranean as far south as the Atlas Mountains of North Africa, and that a similar glacial mantle had blanketed north-western Asia and much of North America. Only the highest summits protruded above Agassiz's alleged glacial 'sea', principally because their jagged and angular profiles were obviously never rounded or smoothed by ice. Agassiz then envisaged an Alpine rise, an increase in temperature and a melting away of the ice-sheet.

He failed to explain why there had been a lowering of temperature in the first place, merely alluding vaguely to some sort of climatological change. That, if true, was, like the ice, no more than an effect of some other cause – a circular argument if ever there was one! It apparently never occurred to Agassiz, nor his many supporters, that such a change must have been occasioned by something even more radical than the immense ice accumulations he postulated. Nevertheless, once formed, the ice itself must also have engendered a lowering of temperature across the regions it allegedly covered.

Despite these shortcomings, Agassiz's hypothesis won rapid acceptance in geological circles – one suspects because, to at least some degree, it followed so closely upon the heels of Lyell's by then fashionable and beguilingly logical theory of uniformity. Indeed, it was soon widely held that huge slow-moving glaciers and ice-sheets were sufficient to account for all observable 'drift' phenomena. That extensive, enormously thick, ice-sheets formerly lay across vast tracts of the northern hemisphere during Pleistocene times began to be accepted as having actually occurred. Theory was beginning to be converted into fact.

As scholars pondered the implications of Agassiz's theory it became apparent that as the ice-sheets could not have moved of their own accord, and allegedly buried all but the very highest peaks of known mountain systems in the regions they supposedly blanketed, still higher ground had to exist somewhere within the ice's sphere of advocated operations to supply the impetus to propel them equatorwards. To overcome that problem it was speculated that crustal dislocations resulting in the up-rise of a range of very high mountains had taken place in the far north, at or near the present North Pole. The steep gradients occasioned by the range's great altitude allegedly provided the conditions necessary to push accumulating ice downwards and outwards to the distant margins of the ice-sheets. Later, it was argued, these mountains subsided and the ice, no longer replenished and deprived of motion, melted away.

The scenario just outlined was, of course, not only conjectural but completely false. Science has never found any trace of the imaginary northern mountain range. In retrospect it is astonishing that this unscientific explanation ever came to be formulated, yet in a short time both it and the concept of immense thick ice-sheets descending from a hypothetical northern mountain system, to cover all of northern and eastern North America and western and northern Eurasia, was enthusiastically embraced and came to be regarded as virtually established fact. After all, it was argued, did not the slow but irresistible power of enormously thick moving ice ideally explain the observed distribution of the 'erratics', striae and the 'drift' deposits? Such views, albeit somewhat modified, still persist today.

And then an interesting development occurred.

Over a decade later, the Scottish geologist Andrew Ramsay completed studies which suggested that the Pleistocene epoch had hosted two glacial ages. Soon afterwards, Oswald Heer, investigating the Pleistocene flora of Switzerland, discovered 'interglacial' deposits containing remains of warm-temperate plants and animals. Independent confirmation of two or more apparently warmer interglacial episodes was also afforded about that time by German evidence. Then, in 1875, Otto Torrell thought he could conclusively show that the numerous north German 'erratics' had been dispersed to their present locations by giant glaciers moving southwards from a central ice-sheet believed to have occupied the Scandinavian plateau.

To confuse matters, several later geologists significantly increased the number of supposed ice ages and interglacials (or interstadials as they are now often called). Prof Penck, for instance, argued for three or four, Prof Geikie for five or six, and Dr Croll for seven. Various later writers have suggested even higher numbers. In contrast, at least two leading American authorities, Wright and Upham, maintained that there was really only one ice age of considerable duration which, periodically expanding and contracting, gave the impression of alternating glacial and interglacial episodes. Ocean levels are also said to have fluctuated appropriately during this alleged cycle of events.

Inevitably, the length of the Pleistocene epoch hosting these events increased every time writers multiplied the number of separate glacial and interglacial episodes. Thus, initially of modest duration, it steadily lengthened to one or two or more million years. En route to arriving at that situation, all kinds of estimates of the durations of the supposed glacial and interglacial cycles were proposed, discussed and, as often as not, discarded. Precise agreement was almost never reached. More recently, the great lengths previously advocated for the formation and for the waning of these episodes have begun to be queried, and in some cases drastically reduced on the basis of new evidence.* Although this aspect of the Ice Age will be examined more fully later, we may nevertheless recall noting earlier that the growth and decay of some of these glacial and interglacial phases proceeded with remarkable rapidity[124] – quite unlike the process imagined by Agassiz, Penck, Geikie and most earlier glacialists, and quite at variance with the gradualism enshrined in Lyell's famous theory of uniformity.

Thus, through an uneasy mixture of field discoveries, inferences and presumptions, was born the concept of an Ice Age occupying an ever-lengthening Pleistocene period. By now, of course, it will be evident that the whole edifice of the Ice Age of orthodoxy rests upon very shaky ground. That is not to assert that the Ice Age did not exist, but does indicate that it occurred in a form and by a means not properly accommodated by conventional dogma. Moreover, a serious error down the years has been the general acceptance by most older (and many present) glaciologists that the Ice Age, whatever its origin, character and duration, developed and ran its course in a world topographically similar to that of today. As we shall now see, that too was a fallacy, and that the implications of that conclusion are huge and very far reaching.

9

UPHEAVAL

There is absolutely no doubt that the stupendous natural forces connected with mountain-building (orogeny) are closely related to large-scale deformation of the Earth's crust, and that many of the world's highest ranges originated in and even attained their present elevations during crustal disturbances that signalled the end of Pleistocene times. That is not to imply that the Alps or Himalayas, for instance, attained their present form at a single catastrophic stroke, for reliable evidence indicates that the original upthrust of these and other ranges first began millions of years earlier, in some cases as far back as the Mesozoic Era (see table 1A). Varying amounts of increasing elevation occurred sporadically down to the close of the Pleistocene. We do urge, however, that a high percentage of today's major ranges rose to their present heights only at the end of, or after, Pleistocene times. By general consensus of opinion, that event occurred about 11,000 years before the present (see Part Five). Before then, as demonstrated by numerous geological facts and observations, mountains were mostly of very modest elevation. Evidence supporting that contention is both widespread and convincing.

---

* See Note 2.

The geological modernity of folded mountains in many parts of Asia was recognised early this century by Dr Bailey Willis when he wrote how they "challenge credulity by their extreme youth"[125]. His conclusions were confirmed by studies of mountain ranges in China, where huge uplifts of the Earth's crust were found to have occurred since the glacial period[126]. Similar youthfulness characterises the ranges bordering the western Gobi desert, including all those from the Russian Altai mountains to the Tien Shan range[127]. Indeed, it has been said of this region that:

> The present Gobi basin is relatively young, and was formed coincidentally with the uplift of the Transbaikal ranges.[128]

Certainly within human memory a large inland sea, referred to in ancient Chinese records as the 'Great Han Hai', occupied the Gobi basin. This apparently extended from the Great Khingan Shan in the east to the Tien Shan and Pamir ranges in the west, a distance of some 2,000 miles (3,200km), and from north to south a distance of some 700 miles (1,120km). Its volume was accordingly immense. At the time of the sea's existence, the entire basin apparently lay from two to three thousand feet (600 to 900m) lower than it does today, and there is every indication that it was uplifted simultaneously not only with the Pamirs and great ranges of western China but also with the Tibetan plateau immediately to the south. The draining away of the water constituting this inland sea must have been a truly devastating event.

The same upheaval affected the mountainous region of northern China too, where huge lava outpourings occurred on the Great Khingan Shan[129]. Not improbably these events were concurrent with the similarly large basaltic flows on the neighbouring Sikhote-Alin range, and with the spectacular collapse of the sea floor by many thousands of metres, along the eastern shoreline of the present Kamchatka peninsula, all the way south to the islands of Japan[130]. The Bayan Kara Shan range in western China was upheaved some 6,500ft (2,000m), while Minya Konka, one of the world's highest peaks, was uplifted 3,250ft (1,000m), more or less coincidentally with the elevations of the ranges in Yunnan Province by at least 6,500ft (2,000m)[131]. Southwards, the Tibetan Plateau was elevated by a still greater amount – 9,750ft (3,000m). Opinions differ whether this took place in early[132] or late[133] Pleistocene times – but as this uplift is known to have been coincident with the elevation of the Himalayas to their present height, which, according to Flint[134] and others, occurred at or just after the end of Pleistocene times, we are probably justified in ascribing a like date to the Tibetan disturbances too.

Flint linked this Himalayan uprise with the formation of other major Earth features thus:

> Late Pleistocene uplift occurred in the Himalayan region and in the Alps, and large scale rifting took place in eastern Africa[135].

Among other ranges affected then were "the Cordilleran systems in both North and South America, the Caucasus, and many others"[136]. Wadia confirmed this with regard to Himalayan orogeny when he wrote:

> Evidence of the extreme youth of Himalayan orogeny has multiplied of recent years. The tilting and elevation of the Pleistocene lake and river deposits of the Kashmir valley (Karewa series) containing fossil plants and vertebrates, to a height of 5,000–6,000ft; the dissection of river terraces containing post-Tertiary mammalia to a depth of over 3,000ft and the over-thrusting of the older Himalayan rocks upon Pleistocene gravel and alluvia of the plains have been noted by the Geological Survey of India and other observers[137].

Astonishing as it may seem, this over-thrusting of older upon newer formations was attended by the dragging-up by more than 5,000ft (1,500m) of marine beds containing palaeolithic remains in Kashmir, and occurred during the age of humanity[138]. The Indian geologist M S Krishnan traced evidence for an extraordinarily massive uplift of the Pir Panjal mountains, also in Kashmir, which attained an even greater elevation. He noted:

> The last stage of the uplift, which must have been of the order of 6,000ft, is believed to have occurred since the advent of early man. This upheaval has not only elevated the Pir Panjal and folded and tilted the Karewas, but has also affected the rocks of the Potwar and the Salt range.[139]

Not only were the Himalayas and their satellite ranges affected by this gigantic crustal uplift, but so also were the Pamirs, the Hindu Kush, Karakoram and Kailas ranges, the Kun-lun mountains and the Altai and Tien Shan ranges, all of which rose to their present altitudes geologically very recently[140]. After detailed studies of the Nanga-Parbat massif in the western Himalayas, Dr P Finsterwalder concluded that its uprise was immediately post-glacial[141]. Such crustal movements understandably affected local natural drainage, rivers there exhibiting repeated proofs of rejuvenation due to uplifted watersheds. The course of the Narbada River, which has been changed by "late earth movements", is a fine instance of this, while the precipitous waterfalls at Jabalpur owe their present spectacular image to the same cause[142].

Comparably vast changes in the elevations of hills and mountains and of a reorganised water pattern took place about the same time in Burma[143] and undoubtedly extended to northern Thailand, Laos and parts of Vietnam as far south as Malaya. Upraised beaches along the latter's coast show:

> ...a recession of the sea and a lowering of sea level of at least 50ft... There is evidence that the sea level has fallen more than 300ft, in the area including Mt Ophir and Kedah Peak, since, or during, Pleistocene times.[144] (Our italics).

Might not the elevation of these beaches have resulted as much from an uprise of the land as from a drop in sea level? Such an explanation would accord with Umbgrove's statement that:

> Should one, nevertheless, cling to the theory of submerged continents, the only alternative would be to assume that while vast blocks were being submerged in one area, parts of the ocean floor of almost identical size were being elevated in others[145].

In other words, when portions of the Earth's crust sink in one place, other portions tend to rise elsewhere in compensation.

Space limitations preclude more than the most cursory references to the similar and apparently coeval evidence known from the Philippines[146], various parts of Indonesia[147], the Pacific generally and Australia[148], so suffice here to assert that much of the topography of all these regions came into being a mere 11,000 years or so ago.

Before that date it was markedly different.

Much the same can be said of the present Alpine scenery in Europe. Not so long ago, geologically speaking, they were little more than a chain of low hills[149], but, judging from the under-cited remarks of Dr Reginald Daly of Harvard, the processes by which they acquired their present character involved a truly appalling paroxysm of Nature.

> During the building of the Alps gigantic slabs of rock, thousands of feet thick, hundreds of miles long and tens of miles wide, were thrust up and then over, relatively to the rocks beneath. The direction of the relative over-thrusting movement was from Africa towards the main mass of Europe to the north. The visible rocks of the northern Alps of Switzerland have thus been shoved northwards distances in the order of 100 miles. In a sense the Alps used to be on the present site of northern Italy.[150]

In effect, the present Alps represent a crustal shortening of "about 100km"[151], which some authorities have suggested was as much as 600km[152]. This was caused by a variety of interrelated processes including massive over-thrusting of older upon younger strata analogous to that previously noted in the Himalayas. Over-thrusting on a grand scale is common for instance in the Jura mountains[153], while that in the Glarus mountains of east Switzerland is traceable for many miles and is a showpiece of Alpine geology[154]. The Silbern and Glarnisch peaks are arresting examples of stratal inversion, and the Roggenstock, the Mönch and the mighty Jungfrau not less so[155].

Although various explanations of the precise modus operandi of these processes have been proposed from time to time, their cause and development are still imperfectly understood. Erich Haarmann advocated that the great rock masses were forced to slide over one another by their own tremendous weight, but the role played in this process by plutonic melts (layers of molten rocks formed deep within the Earth), such as would permit this, has yet to be clarified. Nonetheless Haarmann's hypothesis is perhaps still the most attractive of those available. Certainly the juggernaut-like progress of billions of tonnes of rock over surface strata, crushing and obliterating everything in its path is almost unimaginable.

Prof Oswald Heer associated this convulsion with the "glacial epoch"[156] during late Pleistocene times. Today, the summits of three of the highest Alpine peaks, Mt Blanc, Monte Rosa and the Matterhorn, respectively stand 15,781ft (4,856m), 15,217ft (4,682m) and 14,691ft (4,520m) above sea level. If we assume the description of the proto-Alps as "low hills" to signify no more than say 2,000ft (600m), the uprise involved must have been as much as 12,000–13,000ft (3,700–4,000m). A stratal uplift of this magnitude is positively staggering, while the heat generated by the physical over-thrusting and inversion of such gigantic rocky masses must have been appalling.

It is unnecessary here to review all the great mountain systems of the world. We may pass on to consider just a few outstanding examples from Africa and the Americas, merely pausing en route to note that the elevation of the Norwegian mountains, with their fiords – of which more shortly – is thought to have been late glacial or even post-glacial[157].

Almost certainly the orogeny just discussed was coeval with crustal dislocations along the north-west African coast and in the adjacent Atlas mountains. The latter, in particular the Anti-Atlas, formerly extended into the present Atlantic Ocean at least as far as the Canary Islands. The subsidence of this earlier westerly prolongation of Africa, marked by gross local distortions of strata, occurred in late Pleistocene or earliest Holocene times[158]. Significantly, coincidental with this subsidence, the Hoggar (Ahaggar) and Aïr regions of the Sahara far to the south-east were evidently in the process of being abruptly upheaved[159].

Unquestionably, these elevatory and depressive crustal movements, the emptying in some localities of lakes and inland seas and the creation and enlarging of rivers elsewhere were intimately connected with huge tectonic disturbances of the kind that produced the Great Rift Valley of east Africa, a feature commonly assigned to late glacial (Pleistocene) times[160].

These geophysical changes find almost exactly similar parallels in the Americas. Referring to the western Cordilleras of North America, Daly remarked:

> ...the whole Rocky Mountain front, for hundreds of miles, has been pushed up and then out, many miles over the plains.[161]

Writing specifically of Chief Mountain in Montana, he noted how it was:

> ...thrust bodily upon much younger strata of the Great Plains, and then driven over them eastwards, for a distance of at least eight miles. Indeed, the thrust may have been several times eight miles.[162]

Such crustal dislocations embraced enormous areas and titanic tonnage. For example: "All of the Glacier National Park in Montana and all the Rocky Mountain area up to the Yellowhead Pass in Alberta" was moved laterally for many miles[163]. These mountains, Fig 1.4. Youthful mountain profiles in the high Andes, southern Chile.

Courtesy of P J Michael, Univ of British Columbia, Canada.

therefore, afford strident echoes of the situation already recorded in the Alps and Himalayas and it is certainly no surprise to find Forrest adding:

> There is a good body of evidence, that the elevation of the western part of North America (like that of Norway) was post-glacial or late glacial.[164] (Our italics).

Considering the Coast Ranges of southern California, another authority observed: "There, within the short limits of the Pleistocene Epoch, strata a mile thick were deposited"[165]. These were later intensely eroded and deformed, being "...finally... uplifted a quarter of a mile above the sea – the last episode is demonstrated by a flight of marine terraces which marches like a cyclopean stairway up the seaward slope of some parts of the range".[166]

This rate of deposition (not to mention the degree of crustal uplift – itself of late or post-glacial age) hugely transcended the norm demanded by Lyell's gradualism, as also did the geologically very recent and cataclysmic stratal contortion and upheaval, by at least 6,500ft (2,000m), of the Cascade Mountains and the Sierra Nevada in Oregon and eastern California[167].

South of the Equator, the mighty Andes everywhere exhibit signs of extreme youthfulness. The longest continuous range on Earth, the Andes are actually very ancient mountains which only acquired their present striking relief at the end of Pleistocene times[168]. This has been described as geologically very rapid and attended by intense vulcanism[169], several of the volcanoes attaining enormous heights. The Andean uplift was immense, with mountain passes in Peru and Bolivia often lying as much as 13,000ft (4,000m) above sea level. Everywhere the rugged and jagged profiles of the Andean peaks bespeak of violent, catastrophic formation.

Confronting us at almost every turn are abundant, indisputable and tellingly consistent evidences of a geologically recent, worldwide orogeny characterised by crustal

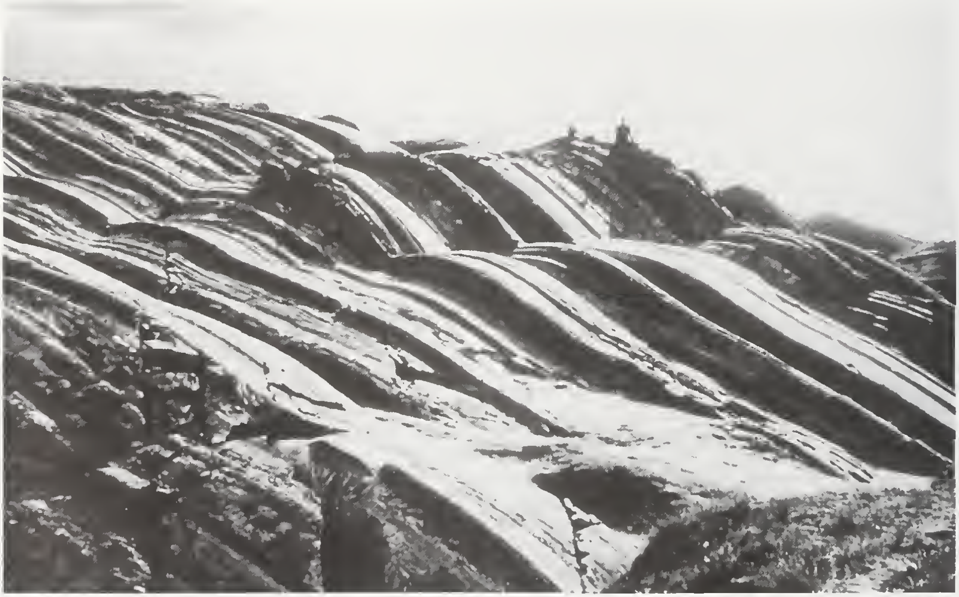

Fig 1.5. Geologically youthful fault-grooves in the Peruvian Andes, near Cuzco. Formerly attributed to glacial action, this feature provides evidence of the magnitude of crustal disturbances.
Courtesy of Dr Siegfried Muessig, Los Angeles, California.

dislocations, upthrusts and faulting on a gargantuan scale. Recognition of the truly global dimensions of this mountain-building has been long voiced by geophysicists. Reviewing mountains generally, Dr Walter Bucher of Columbia University has observed:

> Taken in their entirety, the orogenic belts are the result of worldwide stresses that have acted on the crust as a whole. Certainly the pattern of these belts is not what one would expect from wholly independent, purely local changes in the crust".[170]

A possibly even greater authority, Vening-Meinesz, asserted that: "If we examine the pattern of great geosynclines [large geological troughs] over the Earth's surface, we cannot doubt that their cause must have a worldwide character"[171].

Commenting upon the same phenomena, Dr J H F Umbgrove admitted "I feel there is overwhelming evidence that the movements are the expression of a worldwide, active and deep-seated cause..."[172].

A very large number of similar opinions could be cited, together with a large array of varying hypotheses explaining the causes of orogeny. It is, unnecessary to indulge in this here, although we would again emphasise the general agreement that some worldwide cause was responsible for the phenomena just discussed. Suffice it to observe that something acting on a planetary scale and with staggering power was basically responsible for these titanic crustal disturbances in times geologically very recent, described by one writer as: "A remarkable and stupendous period – a period so startling that it might justly be accepted with hesitation, were not the conception unavoidable before a series of facts as extraordinary as itself"[173].

10

COLLAPSE

We have already noted that crustal subsidences, sometimes amounting to veritable collapses, occurred in some regions simultaneously with the late Pleistocene elevation of mountains elsewhere. They were evidently part and parcel of the same terrible world calamity, and a few words about them will be appropriate here.

Both the Canaries and the Azores experienced widespread volcanic activity during late Pleistocene times, the sea floor round the Azores in particular being covered by lava. Unlike the Canary and Madeira islands, the Azores are situated on the eastern slope of the Mid-Atlantic Ridge. Since the great ocean basins either side of it are only thinly coated with sediments and in places are actually barren of them[174], it is generally regarded as very youthful[175]. The Mid-Atlantic Ridge is also directly associated with a great world-encircling fracture complex which we will discuss shortly. Tachylite, a lava which naturally disintegrates in sea water within 15,000 years of eruption, lies on the sea-bed around the Azores and apparently dates from outpourings less than 13,000 years ago. How much younger than that date is unknown. Notwithstanding this, may we not wonder if all these islands were once a part of an Atlantic plateau extending westwards of the Anti-Atlas mountains – previously noted as having formerly extended to the Canary Islands – which submerged as recently as the late Pleistocene? That such possibilities should be seriously considered finds support in the discovery of geologically very young beach sand in two deep-sea cores procured in this area from depths of 10,500ft (3,250m) and 18,440ft (5,700m), indicating that the region was above sea level at no very remote period. The noted oceanographer Maurice Ewing concluded from this evidence that:

> Either the land must have sunk two or three miles, or the sea must once have been two or three miles lower than now. Either conclusion is startling[176]. ...If the sea was once two miles lower, where would all the extra water have gone?[177]

Only the greatest conceivable disturbance could have produced crustal faults and collapses as great as these.

By the well-developed method of echo-sounding, an expedition in which Dr Ewing took a prominent part measured the thickness of the sedimentary ooze on the slopes of the foothills of the Mid-Atlantic Ridge. These showed:

> ...thousands of feet of sediment on the foothills of the Ridge. Surprisingly, however, in the great flat plains on either side of the Ridge, this sediment appears to lie less than 100ft thick... Always it has been thought that the sediment must be extremely thick, since it had been accumulating for countless ages... But on the level basins that flank the Mid-Atlantic Ridge our signals came back too close together to measure the time between them... They show the sediment in the basins is less than 100ft thick.[178]

Granitic and sedimentary rocks which must originally have been "part of a continent" were dredged up near the Mid-Atlantic Ridge from a depth of 3,600ft (1100m). They exhibited deep scratches and striations similar to those stones in 'drift' formations commonly attributed to glacial action. However, in the same area there were found "...some loosely consolidated mud stones, so soft and weak that they would not have held together in the iron grasp of a glacier. How they got there is another riddle to be solved by further research"[179]. As discovered earlier, it seems highly questionable that there ever was a glacial age of the type clearly envisaged by Ewing and other geologists.

Together with many other geological and topographic formations on the bed of the Atlantic these mud stones were formed not underwater but in the open air, and must, despite their present fragile state, date from a time when that portion of the ocean floor was above sea level. A precisely similar conclusion has been reached by another writer respecting the Mid-Atlantic Ridge itself. He wrote:

> ...the inequalities, the mountains and valleys of its surface, could never have been produced in accordance with any laws for the deposition of sediment, nor by submarine elevation; but, on the contrary, must have been carved by agencies acting above the water level.[180]

Although writing in the 1920s, the celebrated French geologist Pierre Termier spoke of a now-vanished North Atlantic landmass in terms as valid now as then. He stated:

> The conclusion is inevitable: the land which existed about 900km to the north of the Azores and, perhaps, embracing these isles, was plunged into the deep, in times so comparatively recent that geologists call it 'the present', and actually it is as if it all happened for us but yesterday.[181]

It may not be unreasonable, especially in view of confirmatory biological evidence to be detailed later, to regard the volcanic upheavals traced on the bed of the Atlantic around the Azores as having occurred synchronously with the breakup and subsidence of Appalachia, the name given by geologists to a continental landmass in the North Atlantic also known as North Atlantis[182]. Now reposing some two miles (3.2km) below the level of the adjacent continental shelves[183], Appalachia connected Europe and North America via Greenland and Iceland (see map 1B). The fact that the degree of its submergence accords closely with that of the ocean basins flanking the Mid-Atlantic Ridge as determined by Ewing, is particularly noteworthy. Although it is now impossible to estimate the true extent of Appalachia, it must, as Brewster observed, have been:

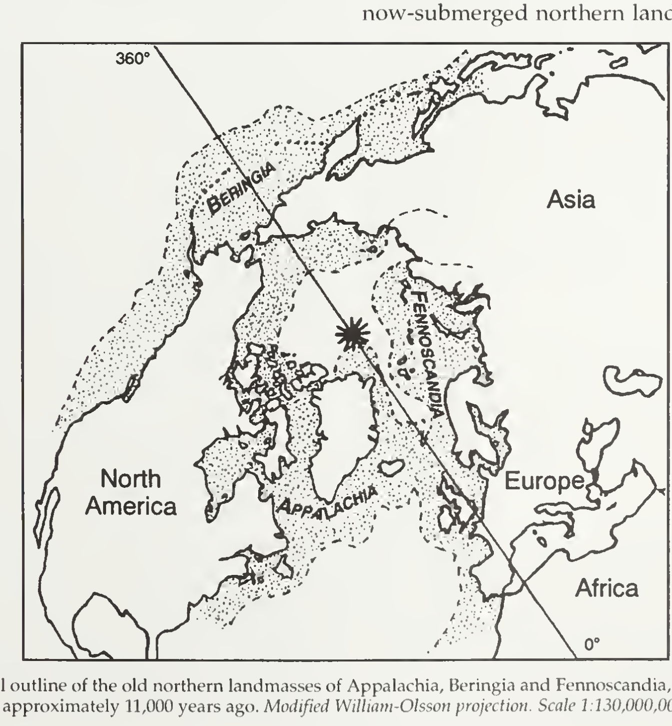
> ...a large continent, for the sand and gravel and mud which the rivers washed out to sea and the waves ground up on the shore have built up most of half a dozen big states [in North America], while in some places the deposits are a mile thick.[184]

Like many others, Prof Scharff of Dublin argued that this landmass foundered during late Tertiary times, excepting the Azores and the Madeiras which were:

> ...still connected in early Pleistocene (Ice Age) times with the continents of Europe and Africa, at a time when man had already made his appearance in western Europe, and was able to reach the islands by land[185]

In Geikie's opinion, however, certain biological evidence – discussed more fully later – shows that continuous land united Greenland and north-west Europe as late as post-glacial times, a view shared by Prof Judd[186]; and Forrest was among those who concluded that this landmass "...sank beneath the sea at the end of the Ice Age"[187].

It is also relevant that a truly colossal amount of sea-bed scour, or erosion, has been traced between Greenland and North America and ascribed to a time loosely termed as 'glacial'[188]. Presumably these crustal disturbances – collapses, for they were nothing less – occurred more or less simultaneously with the subsidence of the entire North Atlantic floor between Greenland and Norway by some 9,000ft (2750m), a convulsion which Forrest believed took place "since the Ice Age"[189]. In our submission these tremendous changes occurred synchronously with the break-up and drowning of the greater part of Fennoscandia, a now-submerged northern landmass formerly connecting Spitzbergen with northern Eurasia (map 1B).



Map 1B. General outline of the old northern landmasses of Appalachia, Beringia and Fennoscandia, which submerged approximately 11,000 years ago. Modified William-Olsson projection. Scale 1:130,000,000.

Leaving the Atlantic for the Indian Ocean we find in the latter interesting evidence for the geologically recent submergence of another extensive landmass or series of large islands which Wallace called the great Southern Continent[190]. This submergence was apparently yet another facet of the global catastrophe under discussion and, as in so many other areas, here also it was accompanied by stupendous volcanic activity. Records of this were gathered by the Swedish survey ship Albatross in 1947, when, for several hundred miles south-east of Sri Lanka, it sailed over a vast and continuous plateau of hardened lava. This filled almost all the earlier valleys on the sea-bed and gave the ocean floor there a singularly level surface. One recent authority regarded this lava as being very probably the undersea counterpart of the Deccan trap of India[191], where basaltic lava several thousand feet thick continuously covers an area of not less than 250,000 square miles (647,500 km^2). According to H F Blanford, the eruption of this material may have been synchronous with the sinking of Wallace's Southern Continent, of which he believed the Seychelles, Mauritius, the Adas Bank, the Laccadives, Maldives and Chagos island groups, and the Saya de Malha (Mulha) are the last surviving remnants[192]. To Blanford's list can also be added Sri Lanka, for it is believed to have been severed from the Indian state of Madras "in sub-recent times"[193].

In passing, we should note that considerable botanical and zoological evidence exists supporting the geologically-recent reality of extensive land in the southern Indian Ocean, and over much of present-day Oceania. Concerning the latter, Prof Scharff has written:

> ...Dr von Ihering goes so far as to positively state that in his opinion the Polynesian Islands are not volcanic eruptions of the sea floor, which being without life were successively peopled from Australia and the neighbouring islands, but the remains of a great Pacific continent, which was in early times connected with other continental masses.[194]

That the subsidence of this pan-Pacific landmass occurred within the memory of humanity appears to be borne out by ancient Maori recollections of Hawaiki, their ancestral 'fatherland' which, though properly outside the immediate concern of geophysics, certainly represents curious but peculiarly telling auxiliary records of this disaster. S P Smith summarised these memories as follows:

> In some of these epithets of the ancient fatherland, it is clear to me that a continent rather than an island is referred to, and this is the description given to me of Hawaiki-nui, by Tare Watere Te Kahu, a very learned member of the Ngai-Tahu tribe... 'Hawaiki-nui was a mainland (Tua Whenua) with vast plains on the side towards the sea and a high range of snowy mountains on the inland side; through this country ran the river Tohinga'[195].

Numerous geological and palaeontological facts also apparently point to the former and rather recent existence of this old Pacific continent, while the severity of the cataclysm which overwhelmed it may be gauged by the staggeringly large crustal dislocations of 'late Pleistocene' date in central Westland, New Zealand. There, the vertical crustal uplift east of the great fault in the Southern Alps (South Island) is estimated to have been as much as 58,500ft (18,000m) with a horizontal displacement of similar magnitude[196]. Positively stupefying, this crustal change represents a catastrophic action so huge that, even by itself, it would have caused worldwide repercussions. That it was merely a part of still greater crustal disturbances having ramifications far beyond New Zealand underscores the giant scale of these events in Oceania during times usually stated as terminal Pleistocene. These changes extended even to the northernmost Pacific, where a continental-sized landmass, occupying the whole of the Bering Straits and the ocean-floor immediately south of it, foundered at the end of Pleistocene times. The scale of the subsidence of its western sector, particularly along the eastern coastline of the Kamchatka peninsula, was spectacular. Science knows this sunken land as Beringia (see map 1B).

We may not err far in assuming that such tremendous crustal disorders occurred more or less simultaneously with the subsidence of Appalachia, Fennoscandia and the great sunken continent in the south Indian Ocean, and with the uprise of the many major mountain ranges previously mentioned. We shall now see that this was almost certainly so.

11

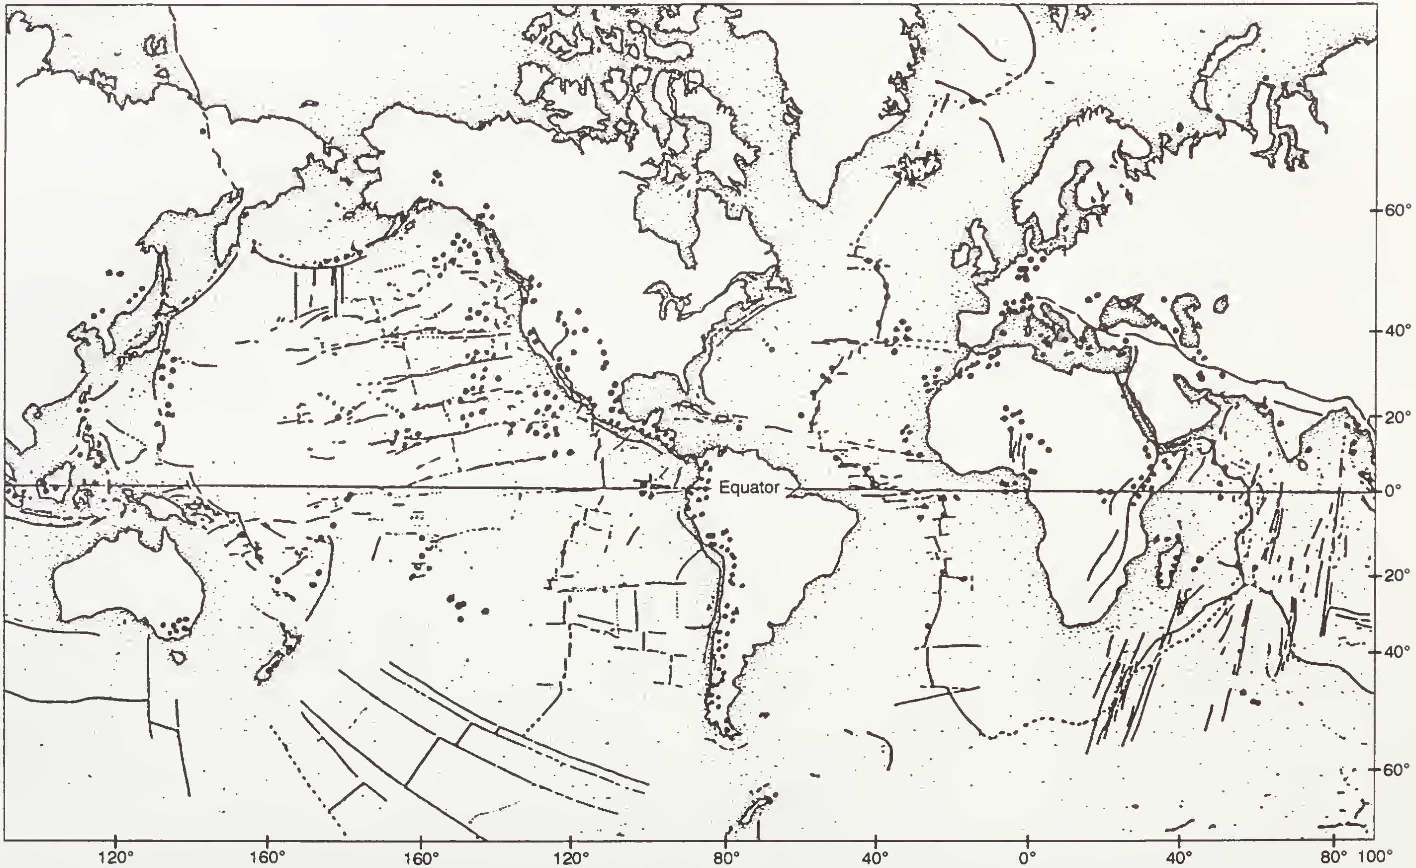
SHATTER

The formation of certain salient topographical features, such as fiords, are usually attributed in the majority of textbooks to the action of moving ice. Detailed field studies of the well-developed fiord systems of Greenland[197], the Hebrides[198] and Scandinavia[199] have tended to favour quite another explanation, namely that they had a tectonic origin, are really gigantic cracks in the Earth's crust, occupied and partially modified by glaciers only at a later date. It has been discovered that glaciers do not hollow fiords, but, through the transportation of stony debris from higher to lower levels, tend instead to choke fiord mouths and diminish or even nullify thereby the alleged excavating power of glacier ice[200]. Numerous students of fiords are agreed on this matter. Certainly ice cannot have easily produced those fiords which are open at both ends[201], or extend across sea-floors!

Acceptance of a tectonic origin for fiords also eliminates the necessity of attributing immensely long periods of time for their formation, such as would be required had ice excavated them. This is an important point.

Fiords also appear to be inseparably linked to a more fundamental crustal fracture complex encircling the globe, to which submarine canyons, deep-sea trenches and the celebrated Great Rift Valley of Africa all belong (see map 1C). All seem to be connected with a huge crack which traverses the Earth's crust for over 40,000 miles (64,000km) on a long meandering course[202]. Nearly all the fractures associated with this giant crack show geologically youthful images. Many deep-sea trenches, for example, contain little in the way of in-filling sediments, and the walls of many fractures are sharp and angular. General agreement exists that this fracturing occurred on a planetary scale and everywhere at about the same time[203]. Some authorities have also argued that, for the observable effects to have been produced, the Earth's axis must formerly have been inclined in a more vertical plane than at present[204]. This also is an important point relative to the classical references to axial orientation in the legendary Golden Age and Proctor's observation on the polar inclination obtaining when the aquatic constellations were invented (see I: 5. A Displaced Axis?).

Dictionaries define excoriation as the stripping or removal of skin by abrasion. Here, we apply this process to the surface of the Earth's skin, its crust or lithosphere, in that it has caused the sudden fissuring and violent break-up of many surface rocks predating those classified as Pleistocene. This fissuring occurred alike on land and under the sea, its extent being worldwide and clearly linked to



60°
40°
20° 0° 20° 40°
60°
Equator
120°
160°
160°
120°
80°
40° 0° 40°
80° 100°

Map 1C. Map of Pleistocene world fracture complex, showing major faults and deep-sea trenches. Dots represent principal centres of coincident vulcanism.
After Shepard, Emery, Menard et al.

acute crustal dislocation. Numerous submarine valleys are actually great crustal fractures now partially filled by sediments, and are intimately associated with the collapse of areas now forming ocean basins and the faulting and submergence of the continental shelves. It is particularly interesting to note some renowned authorities suggesting that such profound changes might have been due to external influence exerted by some stellar body – a cosmic visitor[205].

Other fractures and rock fissures are demonstrably connected with the massive late Pleistocene orogeny previously reviewed. The Gangetic Trough, for instance, evidently originated with the elevation of the Himalayas and the Tibetan plateau to their present height. The fact that the Gangetic Trough is 1,200 miles (1,900km) long, averages 250 miles (400km) in width, and is over 6,500ft (2,000m) deep, indicates the colossal power of the forces producing both it and the associated orogeny. It is a Pleistocene feature, yet, although the mighty River Ganges now flows along it, the trough itself is largely choked by Pleistocene debris of enormous thickness[206]. Gravity surveys have indicated that these in-filling deposits are about 6,500ft (2,000m) thick[207], and "...cannot be earlier than sub-Recent" in age[208].

Many further similar examples could be given from around the world, but such repetition would add little and would result in unnecessarily irksome reading. Suffice it here to observe that the foregoing evidence clearly shows that the end of the Pleistocene epoch, approximately 11,000 years ago, was characterised by gigantic and violent crustal convulsions which, viewed globally, were nothing short of cataclysmic. They did not punctuate a comparatively inert world in which the sub-polar latitudes lay under tremendously thick slow-moving ice-sheets. The sheer volume and extent of the strata affected by these disorders and the great heights and depths to which strata were redistributed indicates that, if the ice-sheets of orthodoxy really existed, then the ice must have covered regions which were either in the process of being enormously upheaved, displaced, vertically faulted and fissured, or subsided to remarkable depths. None of these unstable crustal conditions could have been conducive to the formation or maintenance of ice-sheets like those conventionally envisaged.

Special note should be taken of the repeated datings of these crustal derangements by acknowledged authorities: 'late Pleistocene', 'terminal Pleistocene', 'end of the Ice Age', 'post-glacial', and so on. Although Agassiz and other early advocates of the Ice Age argued that the ice developed before the rise of the Alps and other high ranges, modern glacialists all agree that high mountainous land is necessary to provide (and replenish) the snow from which glacier ice is derived, to supposedly produce the various geological phenomena allegedly characteristic of glacial conditions. If, however, most of the world's present major ranges attained their existing elevations a mere 11,000 years or so ago, where was the high land attracting heavy snowfalls and providing the ice and the motive power for the alleged ice-sheets specifically stated to have preceded the modern uplands?

Did ice in another guise cause the supposed glacial phenomena, distribute the 'drift' and disperse the 'erratics'? Rather than ice-sheets, abnormal numbers of 'drift'-laden icebergs were at one time conjectured as having floated equatorwards from polar regions, depositing 'erratics' and 'drift' and polishing and striating rock surfaces as they did so. That hypothesis was eventually discarded, as no reasonable mechanism could be determined which would generate excessive numbers of icebergs for a limited (glacial) period, cease doing so for a following (interglacial) period, and then reactivate the cycle again – not once but several times. Modern icebergs, moreover, carry little stony debris and very few rocks that are describable as 'erratics'. It is certainly unscientific to suppose without good evidence that icebergs behaved differently in the past or were burdened with stony cargoes vastly different from those they carry today.

A closer look at conventional Ice Age concepts, at the capacity of large masses of ice and at the geological phenomena commonly attributed to large scale ice action, suggests that the Ice Age, if it ever really existed, must have done so after the majority of the above-mentioned crustal disturbances had taken place. Certainly the shattering of the Earth's crust had already occurred by that time.

12

AN ICY CHIMERA

Inevitably the cause of the series of presumed ice advances and retreats epitomising the supposed glacial and interglacial episodes has long puzzled Earth scientists and astronomers, who, down the years, have made many attempts to explain them, rationally. Rather conveniently, these explanations have fallen into eight more or less distinct categories, thus:

- Geophysical Theories: 1. continental drift (the slow drifting of crustal continents toward or away from each other); 2. polar wandering (slow changes in the Earth's axis of rotation); 3. crustal sliding.
- Land-Water Changes: 1. oceanic changes (relocated oceans, rearranged oceanic circulation or changed directions of ocean currents); 2. landmass altitude changes (larger land areas brought above the permanent snow line, feeding the growth of ice-sheets).
- Glaciological Theories: periodic melting of basal ice layers of natural ice-caps, causing massive surging of ice leading to formation of huge peripheral ice-shelves which, in turn, displace sea water sufficiently to produce sudden rises in world sea levels.
- Atmospheric Changes: 1. variations in carbon dioxide content in the atmosphere (reduction of amount of CO_2) and reduced rate of absorption by the atmosphere of long-wave radiation, causing atmospheric cooling; 2. variations in suspended volumes of volcanic and other dust in the atmosphere; 3. variations in ozone content.
- Meteorological Changes: regarded as a secondary mechanism for promoting glaciation once the latter has commenced.
- Axial and Orbital Changes: 1. alterations in axial tilt of the Earth; 2. the 'Drayson Effect' (periodical axial changes leading to loss of terrestrial equilibrium); 3. changes in the length of the Earth's orbit around the sun.
- Solar Emission Alterations: changes in the intensity or composition of solar emissions received by the Earth.
- Astronomical Theories: 1. excessively cold regions in space traversed by the solar system (and thus the Earth) during late Pleistocene times; 2. collisions or near-misses with astronomical bodies disrupting the pre-glacial terrestrial environment (planets, moons, comets, asteroids and meteor showers have all been proposed as candidates).

Both 'uniformitarian' and 'catastrophist' explanations feature in this list. All are essentially speculative, and none adequately explains the basic mechanism by which Pleistocene ocean levels (traceable from physical evidence) apparently oscillated by as much as 975ft (300m). Considering the shaky alliance between assumptions, conjecture and a misconceived topographical background long embodied in orthodox Ice Age discussion, it is little wonder that all these explanations have failed to account for all aspects of the so-called Ice Age enigma, In their present form they are incapable of doing so.

Space limitations regrettably preclude detailed analyses of these often ingenious hypotheses, so we shall pass on to briefly consider: (a) the most commonly offered description of the Ice Age itself, and (b) some of the many reasons why, so the evidence tells us, the notion of the Ice Age can never have been more than a grand illusion.

The classic definition of the Ice Age centres on the concept of extensive, continuous, and often enormously thick ice-sheets smothering virtually all polar latitudes down to approximately 50° N and S latitude, with the greatest icy accumulations apparently occurring in the northern hemisphere. This concept reached its greatest development in the writings of various late nineteenth century glacialists, of whom Geikie[209], Dawkins[210], Croll[211] and Penck[212] were especially prominent. Although later research has signally emended those views, from time to time the outmoded hypothesis they represented still finds its way into textbooks about Earth history, and persists in being the popular concept of the Ice Age generally.

More up-to-date views of the Ice Age world, in discarding the near-hemispheric ice-sheets of the earlier theorists, have replaced those with a series of much smaller fluctuating ice-sheets radiating out from separate northern ice domes, with ice-free regions, some little more than corridors, existing between them. The retention of the term 'glacial', initially devised to accurately reflect the nature of the icy model postulated by nineteenth century glacialists, and its application to modern Ice Age concepts, although technically correct, unfortunately still tends to perpetuate a false (the discarded) panorama for interested modern lay-readers as yet familiar only with the older nineteenth century Ice Age doctrines. Certainly very few of the multitude of facts and details nullifying the earlier views which we are about to review have percolated down to them.

Thus, not only has much of this painstakingly amassed evidence largely failed to filter down to society generally, but so also have the modified (more modern) perspectives of the Ice Age now promoted in scientific circles. Accordingly, much of what follows, though factually correct, may at first seem not merely novel but startling and perhaps even disturbing, as cherished conventions fracture and totter.

Today, the world's coldest known land region is north-eastern Siberia. There, if anywhere, we might expect huge ice-sheets to have developed if the Ice Age theory possessed validity. Yet comparatively very few areas of Siberia exhibit signs of significant glaciation, either past or present. Clearly great cold does not of itself necessarily promote the development of ice-sheets. Antarctica and Greenland, however, both of which are less cold than Siberia, possess such sheets. Later we shall examine why this is so.

Interestingly, as in neighbouring Alaska to the East, thin rock pinnacles still stand unglaciated at several Siberian localities which thick ice, had it once existed, would unquestionably have ground down and demolished. The same observation applies to the broken stumps and roots of large trees which, like the mammoth carcasses found in the same general region (of which more anon)[213], have remained frozen solid ever since the day they perished, are still in the positions in which they originally grew. Some are even replete with their original leaves, flowers and fruits[214], albeit in permanently frozen and blackened condition. These, too, should have been scoured away had ice-sheets ever mantled and passed over Siberia. But these remains have not been destroyed any more than have the many thousands of others found as jumbled masses on several of the Arctic islands north of the Siberian mainland[215] or encountered in similar confusion in the frozen ground of neighbouring Alaska[216].

Again, in stark contrast to orthodox Ice Age theory, even many northern areas outside Siberia said to have lain under the thickest parts of the alleged ice-sheets afford scant evidence of glaciation or ice-sculpturing of any sort, and in numerous cases are actually devoid of it. The Sverdrup Islands[217], northernmost Greenland[218] and many of the islands of the Canadian Arctic[219], not to mention practically the whole of Alaska, are cases in point. Spitzbergen is another[220].

As the following selection of information amply demonstrates, northern latitudes have yielded several unexpected discoveries totally at variance with the tenet of vast sprawling North Polar ice-sheets. Their collective message is a singular one.

Firstly, numerous marine shells, often of currently-existing species, lie at high elevations on several islands in Arctic Canada[221]. They should have been pulverised had ice-sheets ever crept across those territories, for in no instance do they appear to have been deposited where they are now found since alleged Ice Age times.

Secondly, among the most telling details in this category are the numerous enclaves of unglaciated territory within regions which, glacialists long argued, supposedly lay under thick, continuous ice-sheets, not once but on several successive occasions. In addition to the molluscan testimony just noted, we should carefully mark that no evidence is known from southern Scotland of glaciation antedating the so-called latest observable ice advance, which glacialists call the Weichselian advance. Indeed, it has lately been urged that not only was southern Scottish topography much the same before the Ice Age as it is now[222], but also that south-western Scotland suffered less glacial erosion than surrounding regions because of its generally lower altitude[223] – despite glacialists depicting that area as a major centre of glaciation on Ice Age maps of Britain (see map 1D).

Farther north, deeply weathered, undisturbed, soils in Aberdeenshire were seemingly never glaciated, while further north still, on the North Sea bed near the Shetland islands, supposed glacial deposits dated as Weichselian are unexpectedly thin or absent altogether[224]. Again, in the Frigg Field area (59°N, 2°E) midway between the Shetlands and Norway, sea-floor cores are devoid of identifiable glacial deposits. This discovery has suggested that:

> ...some part of the northern North Sea was ice-free in the late Weichselian glacial advance, but this is difficult to reconcile with the suggestion that Shetland was glaciated in the Weichselian by ice which came from the east – probably from Scandinavia.[225]

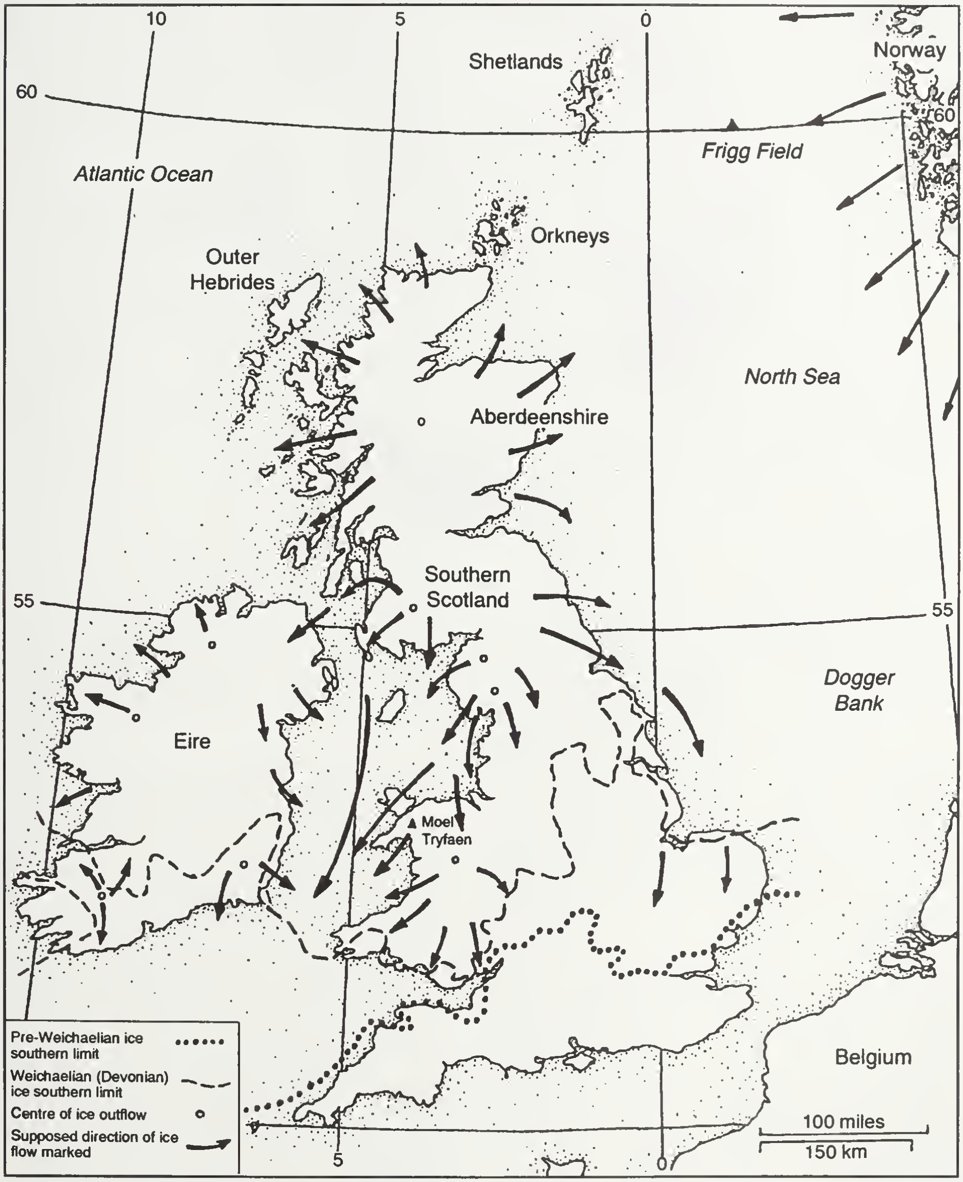
Similar problems surround the presence of demonstrably British 'erratic' boulders of porphyry, limestone and sandstone on and just south of the Dogger Bank area of the North Sea, because the Weichselian ice sheet alleged to have transported them there is commonly envisaged as having advanced from the direction of Norway to the north-east[226]. These 'erratics' can only have travelled from the north-west against the supposed direction of the Weichselian ice-flow.

Significantly, comparable evidence occurs in the Outer Hebrides on the other side of the British Isles. There, rock striae indicate that whatever scored them proceeded from the north-west. Hebridean glaciation is usually held to have advanced from the north-east, the very opposite direction[227].

Data from the Faeroe islands, even farther north, cast further doubts on the very existence of former extensive ice-sheets in the North Sea region. Deposits attributed to ice action have been interpreted there as due to local ice, "...rather than to an ice-sheet advancing from the north or having contact with the Norwegian mer de glace"[228].

On mainland Britain, several 'drift'-less areas in northern England – south of York, for example[229] – reinforce the general picture now emerging, as does the apparent failure of any ice to have crossed the North Sea to terrain north of the Humber[230].

During so-called Weichselian times the Norwegian mountains were supposedly the centre of a regular mer de glace which, at its maximum, stretched south-westwards to embrace not only the Faeroes, Shetlands and Orkneys, mainland Scotland and Wales, all but southernmost England and the entire North Sea area, but also the whole of Eire. As previously noted, many parts of this extensive region were apparently never glaciated at all – a detail parallelled by the absence of detectable glaciation on the Lofoten islands



10
5
0
60
55
Shetlands
Norway
Frigg Field
Atlantic Ocean
Orkneys
Outer Hebrides
North Sea
Aberdeenshire
Southern Scotland
Dogger Bank
Eire
Moel Tryfaen
Belgium
Pre-Weichaelian ice southern limit
Weichaelian (Devonian) ice southern limit
Centre of ice outflow
Supposed direction of ice flow marked
100 miles
150 km

Map 1D. The British Isles showing the supposed maximum southern limits of the pre-Weichselian glaciations and the Weichselian glaciation, and the centres from which ice is alleged to have radiated, according to conventional glacial theory. Compiled from several sources.

(68°N, 15°E)[231] and the unglaciated character of innumerable jagged rocks off Norway's western coast[232]. Moreover, the lower deposits occupying the adjacent Norwegian deep-sea trench are also apparently non-glacial[233].

Why is glacial evidence absent from parts of mainland Britain and the bed of the North Sea if an ice-sheet allegedly mantled that entire region? Was it because, as intimated earlier, glacial action actually never occurred there?

Notable reinterpretations of alleged glacial deposits in England and Ireland have also recently been proposed. At Ipswich in Suffolk, well known glacial sequences formerly considered as representative of three glacial phases are now regarded as typifying only one[234]. Again, despite a supposedly well-established stratigraphy (identification of the relative position of layers of deposits), there is now little evidence that in Northern Ireland 'drift' deposits are much older than 10,000 years BP[235], a date commonly stated to be that when the Ice Age finally ended.

Comparable evidence is also known from mainland Europe, the North Atlantic, the Arctic Ocean and North America – but as we have already noted several examples from some of these regions we need mention here only a small selection of additional instances.

In Europe, the Alpine record of glaciation – the earliest studies of which, remember, initiated the concept of an Ice Age – shows it to be not only very youthful[236], but also surprisingly sparse. Indeed, except for deposits of Weichselian date, the overall record there is "very spotty"[237].

It is a very well known fact that much of the world's rainfall occurs when wind-blown, moisture-laden air rises over upland areas, and that when this concerns mountains or high hills the moisture often descends not as rain but as snow. Especially relevant to this is the conclusion reached by the celebrated glacialist Albrecht Penck, that Alpine snowfall during Ice Age times was not appreciably heavier than that of today[238]. If that were indeed so, it would be illogical to postulate that immense ice-sheets developed then in and around the Alps if they do not do so now. But other important factors are involved and should be considered here.

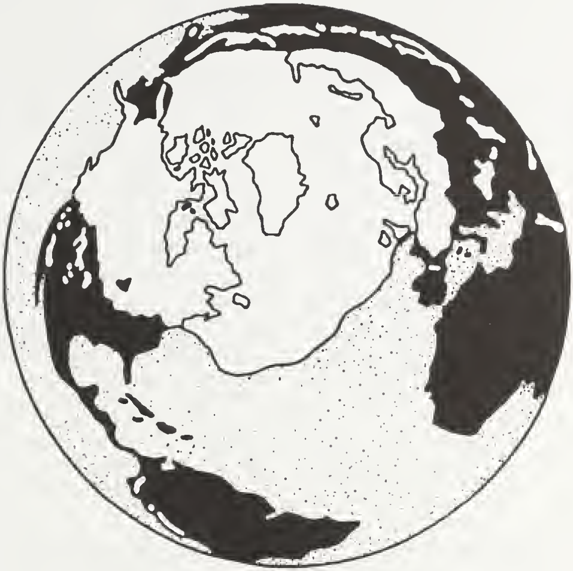
The Alps attained their present height suddenly and violently in times so recent that their upthrust actually post-dated the era normally assigned to the Ice Age itself. Thus the Alps, as we know them, hardly existed when the Ice Age is supposed to have occurred. They were merely a "chain of low hills". This means that, if the Alps were formerly much lower, they were unlikely to have attracted the heavier snowfalls required to underpin the formation of the huge ice-sheets of conventional Ice Age dogma.

If the Alps, Rockies, Himalayas and other major mountain ranges rose to their present elevations only at the close of the Pleistocene epoch – during or just after the final stages (the Younger Dryas episode) of the supposed Ice Age, we can scarcely continue to associate the development of massive ice-sheets with mountain systems generally too low to have acted as effective causal agents of such glaciation. Significantly, no ice-sheets of any magnitude are presently developing in or around the world's greatest mountain ranges, themselves all now much higher than in Pleistocene times. As we shall see later, the great ice-sheets of Greenland and Antarctica have formed as a result of the operation of other factors.

Thus, if many of today's highest mountains were much lower when the alleged Ice Age was reputedly at its zenith, how did so much ice, if it actually existed, manage to accumulate? Indeed, we can take a step further and ask whether the ice-sheets so beloved of glacialists ever existed at all!

In addition to the above-mentioned objections, many more exist which echo the same query. A look at some of these is educational.

Claims that glacial deposits exist on the floor of the Barents Sea, north of Norway, have lately been dismissed as incorrect. No glacial mantle ever existed there, and none ever connected Scandinavia, Novaya Zemlya, Franz Josef Land or Spitzbergen[239]. The aforementioned detail that Spitzbergen was apparently never glaciated is thus found to be entirely compatible with the absence of glacial deposits on the surrounding sea-floor.



Map 1E. Map of alleged maximum extent of Pleistocene glaciation in the Northern Hemisphere. After W C Putnam.

Yet innumerable maps of the Ice Age have long persisted in depicting the region embracing all these lands, as also that of the Alps, as buried under enormous ice-sheets (see map 1E).

Earlier, we drew attention to the remarkable speed with which the final stage of the Ice Age – the Younger Dryas episode of late Weichselian times – came to an end, and how its closing stages were linked to abrupt increases in snowfall and radical oceanic, climatic and botanical changes across much of the northern hemisphere.

Initially it might be considered reasonable to expect the end of an Ice Age to herald warmer conditions, but widespread investigations have shown that the reverse actually happened: temperatures generally fell as the effects attending the termination of the Younger Dryas episode (or Alleröd as it is sometimes referred to) were experienced globally[240].

Sea-surface temperatures, for example, dropped in the North Atlantic[241], in the western North Pacific[242], in the South China Sea[243] and even in the tropical Sulu Sea between the Philippines and northern Borneo (Kalimantan)[244], where marine cores indicate a "pronounced cooling of surface waters during Younger Dryas times" in tandem with an increased summer monsoonal regime in central China[245].

Late Pleistocene sediments in deep-sea cores obtained from the bed of the central North Atlantic contain the remains of planktonic foraminifera – minute marine organisms – which collectively exhibit faunal patterns so complex that they cannot have resulted from temperature oscillations like those commonly associated with glacial cycles[246]. Similar puzzles have been afforded by marine cores from the Caribbean basin. These show a former mixing of top and bottom ocean-water layers ten times faster than the speed at which the succession of glacial and interglacial episodes is supposed to have taken place. It was, therefore, concluded that:

> ...because of the unique character of deep-sea sedimentation, a change in the average would require major alterations to the > physiography of the earth and/or in the biological balance of the high seas.[247]

As shown by other aforementioned data, that is precisely what the general record of Younger Dryas times repeatedly urges. Effects of changes like these were widespread. They were, for example, felt around Hudson Bay[248], across Atlantic Canada[249] and in the northeastern USA[250], and occurred even as far south as South America and Antarctica[251].

The demonstrably global extent of these environmental changes, which inevitably affected plants and land animals in many latitudes, is paralleled by a similar worldwide concordance of their general dates of occurrence.

In southern Chile, for example, where these changes impoverished older beetle populations[252], their effects took place about 10,000 years BP[253], approximately at the time when North Atlantic sea-surface temperatures dropped[254]. Tibet became suddenly wetter[255], and the vegetation in north-western USA underwent marked changes[256]. Very clearly something important occurred during or just before the 10,000 years BP datum indicated, something large enough to affect practically the whole of Earth's environmental conditions and huge numbers of the planet's natural inhabitants.

13

INESCAPABLE EVIDENCE

To those accustomed to the now well-established notion of a Pleistocene Ice Age like that advocated by Agassiz and championed so forcefully by Geikie and others in the last century, or who are aware of the modifications made to it this century, the substance and abundance of the foregoing interrelated details may well astonish. After all, has not the idea of an Ice Age been carefully investigated from every angle by armies of experts in multitudes of concerned disciplines for over 150 years? Although the actual cause of the Ice Age is still uncertain the reality of such an age is surely beyond dispute? Surely so many specialists cannot all have consistently misread the record for so long?

The underlying problem, of course, has been the continued acceptance of the constraints inherent in Lyell's 'uniformitarianism', with its insistence upon terrestrial agencies being the sole generators of observable topographical and atmospheric changes, irrespective of the individual scale, speed or intensity of these. A major outcome of this entrenched perspective has been the steady accumulation of unaccommodatable data diametrically opposed to, or at least highly bruising of, Lyellian concepts and the notion of an Ice Age.

Dispassionate consideration of this 'anomalous' data leads unerringly to the realisation that: 'uniformitarianism', while certainly not a fallacious doctrine, is yet no more than a particular aspect of a wider whole – which we discussed earlier in Part One: 7 Perspectives – a question of scale; also, that something other than ice, operating in a worldwide capacity, was responsible for the deposition of 'drift' and the creation of other supposedly Ice Age phenomena.

Probably no clearer account of the supposed deposition of 'drift' material by large slow moving ice-sheets like those of conventional Ice Age theory can be cited than that given a few years ago by L Dudley Stamp, who, recognising two major effects of glaciation, wrote:

> One of the two major effects of glaciation is... the sweeping bare of large tracts of the country, and the time which has elapsed since has generally been inadequate for the formation of a complete soil mantle. There are large tracts of bare rock: soils which have been formed are characterised by immature profiles, whilst the interference with the pre-glacial drainage has resulted in water-logging over huge tracts and the consequent development of extensive bogs...
>
> The other major result of glaciation is the deposition on lower ground or on marginal areas of the material swept from the highlands. The mantle of glacial deposits which results is conveniently referred to under the comprehensive term 'drift'. Drift deposits are of the most varied character, and although two types may be very closely related in geological origin they may be so different in lithological characters [rock composition] as to give rise to land forms, soils and vegetation of the most contrasted types.[257]

Like those of all conventional glacialists, Stamp's summary, though factually accurate respecting the variability and distribution of 'drift' deposits generally, is a typically uniformitarian explanation of the relevant phenomena. In it the Ice Age is assumed to have been an indisputable fact, whereas it never was nor has been more than an ingenious theory. Slow ice movements are advocated; ice is so completely accepted as having been the 'drift'-producing agent that it is spoken of as having certainly produced both it and the obviously attendant geological effects; the scale and extent of the supposed ice-sheets are inferred from the scale and extent of the 'drift' deposits allegedly produced by them – a circular argument. Nor does Stamp's exposition satisfactorily account for the presence in some areas of 'drift' on hill summits only. As we shall now see, these assumptions, while superficially attractive, are seriously at odds with a whole range of recorded facts.

Particularly interesting and certainly perplexing is the well-established fact that many allegedly glaciated hills and mountains in the northern hemisphere are scored and striated from top to bottom on their northern sides only. In North America this remarkable condition is quite common[258]. It would thus seem that ice-sheets glaciated the northern and north-western faces of these eminences as they slowly crawled up them but failed to glaciate the southern slopes as they presumably accelerated down them – an effect completely opposite to that allegedly generated by downward-moving masses of ice – for example, that of glaciers. In any case, as shown below, ice cannot ascend hills.

Of further relevance is the fact that deposits of gravel and other 'drift' materials sometimes occur only on the northern and north-western flanks of hills, in some instances showing every indication of having been actually plastered up against the hillsides with great force[259]. Many cases of this occur on both sides of the Atlantic. In Labrador, for example, 'erratic' boulders have been rammed into hillsides apparently with much violence[260]. Rather interestingly, eastern Labrador, together with Newfoundland, was apparently never glaciated[261].

A strange selectivity arises here.

Also noteworthy is the occurrence of so-called 'drift' materials at localities far beyond the limits of the most extensively conceived ice-sheets. Thus, if ice action genuinely distributed all the 'drift' deposits within the supposed limits of the greatest ice-sheets then it somehow also contrived to do so in many areas ice is supposed never to have reached.

Large 'erratic' boulders in the Sahara Desert; on the Mongolian plains, and in subtropical Uruguay constitute a parallel anomaly. And when it is discovered that it is possible to produce rock striae like those usually attributed to ice action (see figs 1.6–1.9) by such dissimilar agents as drift-sand[262], fast-moving nuées ardentes (swiftly flowing, high temperature, gaseous clouds erupted from volcanoes, see fig 1.8), snow, mudslides[263] and high pressure grit-charged steam[264], we are obliged to seriously question the alleged glacial origin of striae generally, particularly when, as in numerous instances, they, too, occur far outside the furthest traceable limits of supposed bygone ice-sheets.

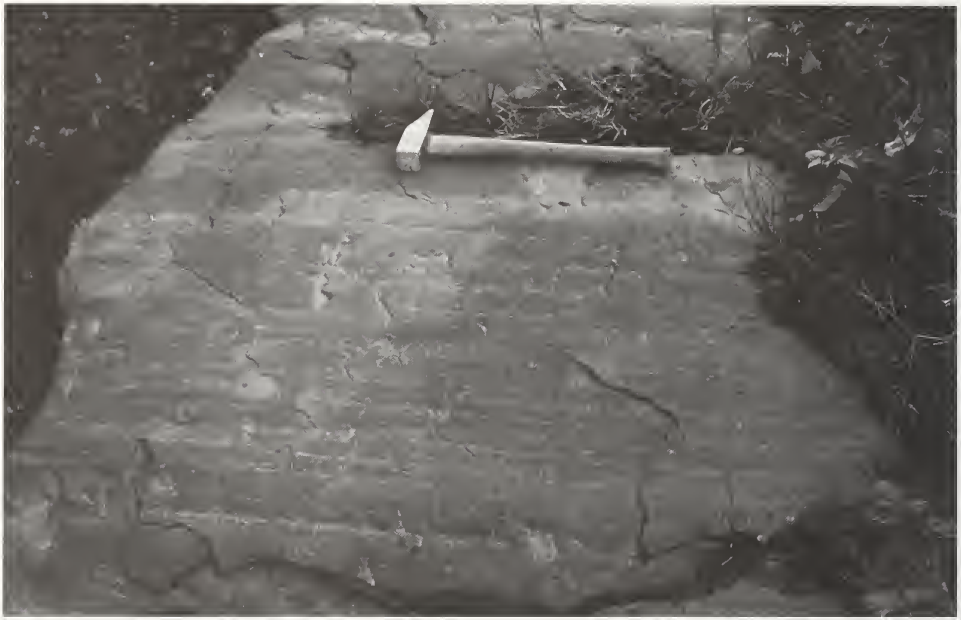

Fig 1.6. A rock at Appley Bridge near Wigan, England, showing surface striations commonly ascribed to ice-action. Reproduced by permission of the Director, British Geological Survey: NERC copyright reserved.

Still other 'peculiarities' are exhibited by geological phenomena associated with Ice Age doctrine. Scrutinised more closely these also reveal yet more doubts about the former reality of an Ice Age like that favoured by orthodoxy. Eroded and fragmentary shells occur within the 'drift' deposits on Moel Tryfaen, a mountain in North Wales rising 1,300ft (400m) above sea level. Perplexingly the species represented include not only northern but also temperate and southern forms adapted to very varied habitats. Some required deep and others shallow water, some sandy and others muddy water, and some were peculiar to shingly and others to a bare rocky environment[265].

In contrast to the above we now perceive an unnatural generality in the evidence.

In stating that ice could never have brought together so varied a molluscan assemblage as this, it is hardly necessary to add that water could have – in which case the enveloping 'drift' deposits must have been similarly water-borne. Such a conclusion was reached by the great English geologist Roderick Murchison with regard to the 'drift' deposits of Russia[266], and by many of the earlier American geologists respecting the same beds in the USA. One of these geologists, Prof Andrews, as cited by Howorth, remarked that many:

> ...gravel hills are sharp and conical and interspersed with deep circular valleys without outlets, from which the region has obtained the popular name of the Potash Kettles... It would seem to be an unavoidable inference that our drift of this region not only came from the north, but it came in a vast sweep of water deep enough to cover gravel hills 800ft high, and with velocity enough to throw coarse material into lofty and steep summits.[267]

Again, it may be asked how is it possible to ascribe to ice in any form the simultaneous

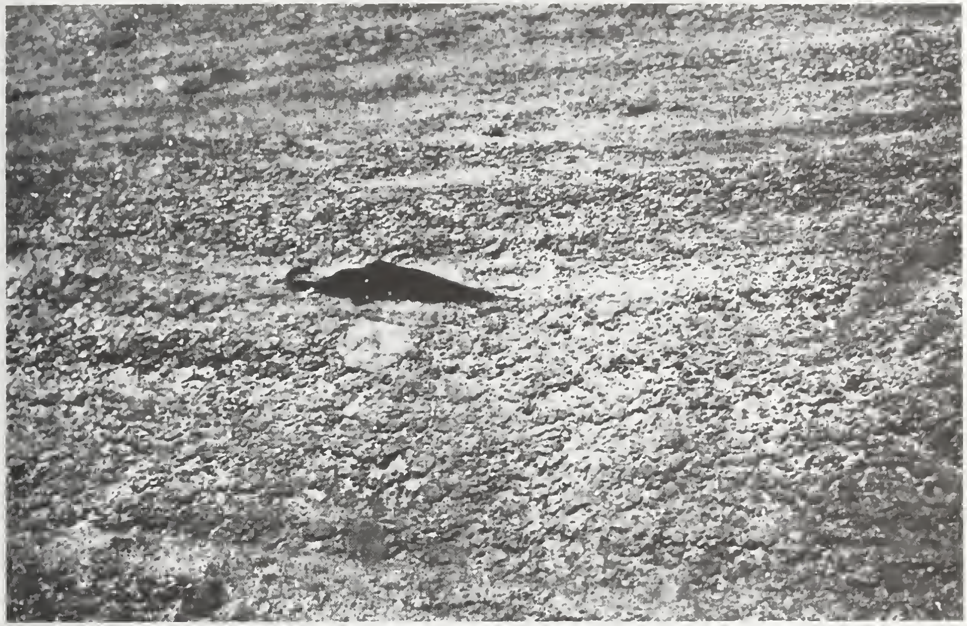

Fig 1.7. Rock striated by sand-blast, Mont Pelée. By permission of the Geological Society of America Bulletin, (vol 20, 1908, pl 39, fig 1), and R S L, Oxford (Geol Per 21).

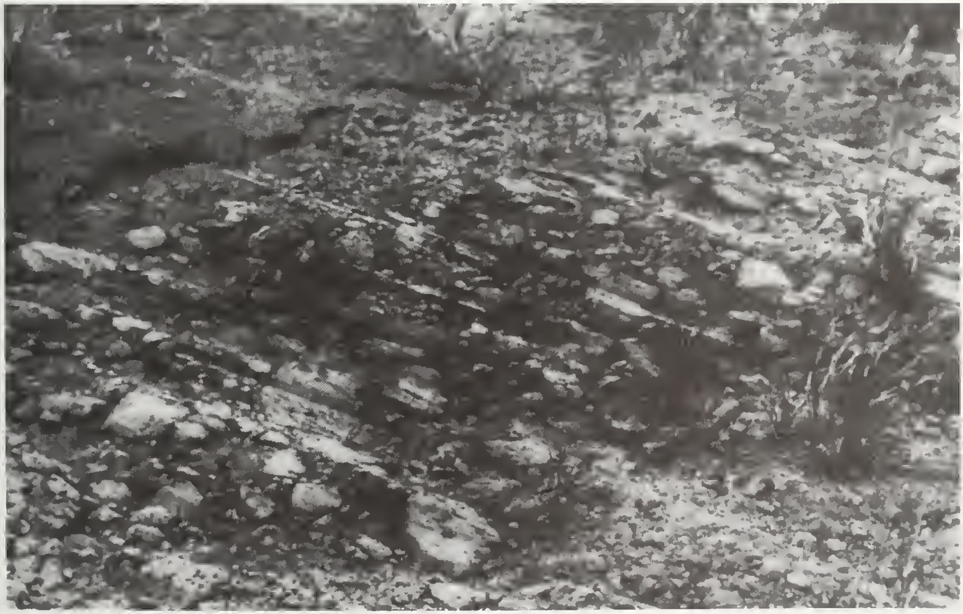

Fig 1.8. Rock surface striated by nuées ardentes action during the 1929–32 eruption of Mont Pelée. By permission of the Carnegie Inst, Washington DC. From F A Perret's The Eruption of Mont Pelée 1929–1932.

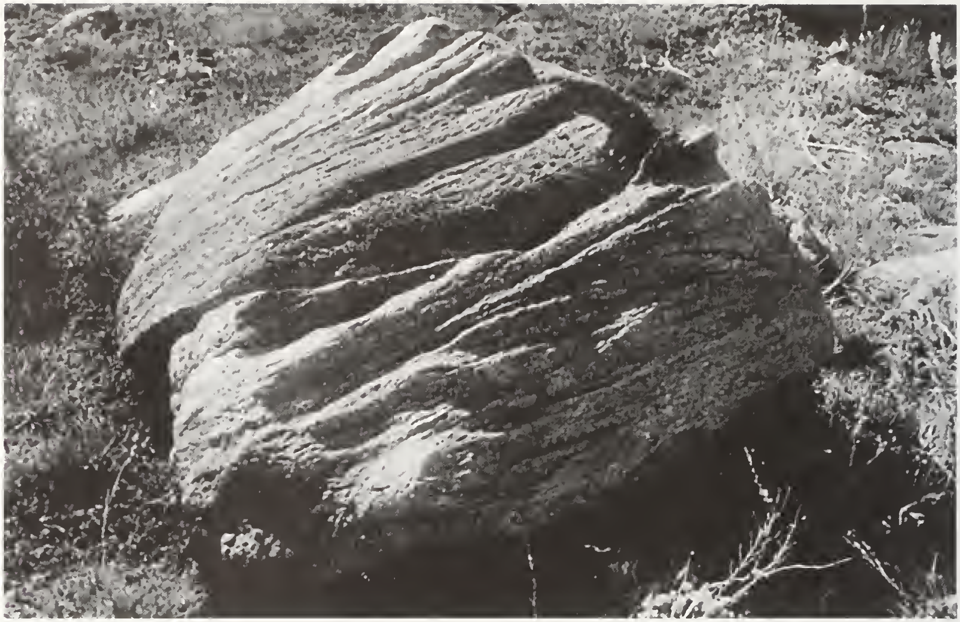

Fig 1.9. Rock striations produced by wind action, Wyoming. From R P Sharp's "Pleistocene ventifacts east of the Big Horn Mountains, Wyoming", Journal of Geology, vol 57, 1949, by permission of Univ of Chicago Press and R S L, Oxford.

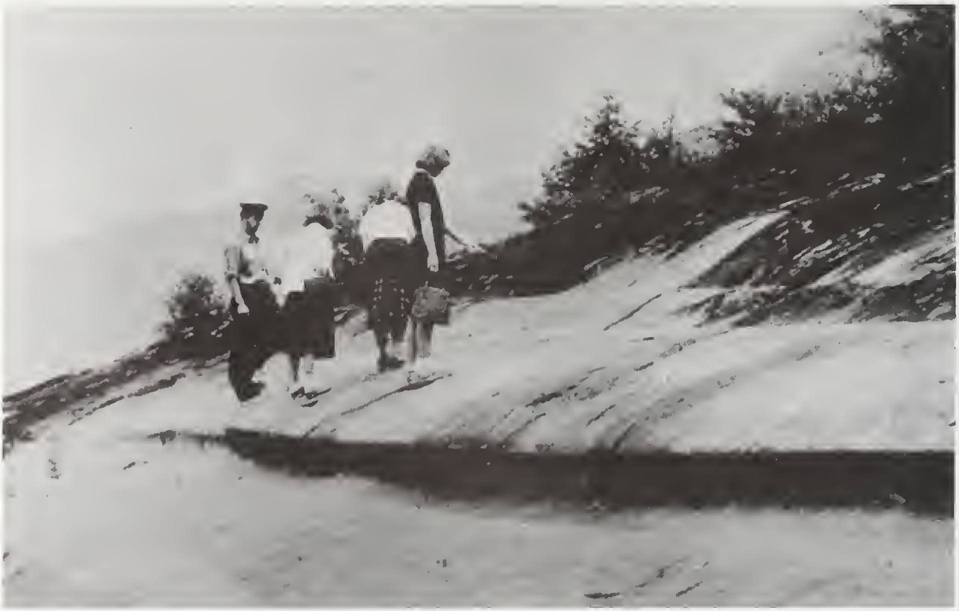

Fig 1.10. Alleged glacial rock-grooves in crystalline strata at Val Camonica, north Italy. From W G Putnam's Geology, 1964. With permission from Oxford Univ Press.

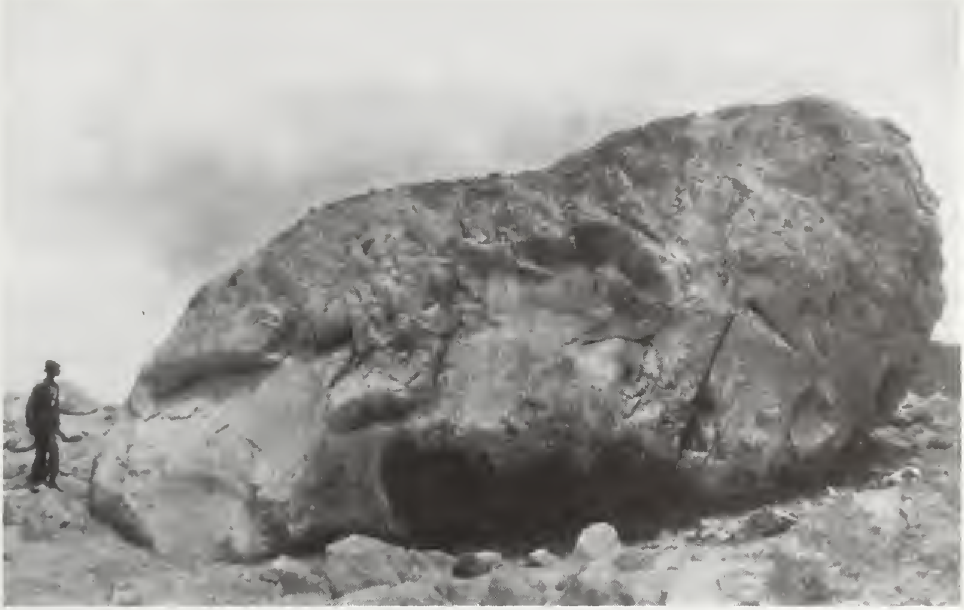

Fig 1.11. A giant boulder transported aerially a distance of three miles (5km) by nuées ardentes, near Mont Pelée. From F A Perret's "The Eruption of Mont Pelée, 1929–1932", by permission of the Carnegie Institution, Washington DC.

dumping of huge 'erratics' at all kinds of elevations alongside thick accumulations of 'drift' containing delicate shells when, at other localities, and at equally varied heights, other 'erratics', occurring far from shells and 'drift' of any kind, repose directly upon bare, polished and striated rock surfaces attributed to the same icy process supposedly responsible elsewhere for depositing the 'drift' and the organic remains (shells included) it often encloses?

If ice was responsible for the above phenomena, the remorseless grinding and scouring of everything in its line of advance should have been as capable of removing all small stones and grit, not to mention fragile shells, as it was of wrenching off from parent bedrock the huge stones deposited as 'erratics' with, it sometimes seems, great violence. But it didn't.

Nor, we may point out, did ice-sheets allegedly capable of producing results like those just enumerated ever invade the regions inhabited by the southern shell species. Nevertheless, the same species occur in 'drift' deposits at many places located in temperate zones supposedly laid down by ice-sheets said to have proceeded from the north. Here we have another example of 'inferred' ice action and direction of operation at variance with field evidence.

Puzzling though the evidence is, ice assuredly never simultaneously transported to the same locality so many climatically-undifferentiated shell species – and Moel Tryfaen is but one of several very similar instances elsewhere. It follows therefore that ice did not accumulate the enveloping 'drift' deposits either, or those like it elsewhere. Nor, as further corollary, can it have dispersed the 'erratic' boulders or striated rock surfaces intimately associated with the 'drift' beds.

And, it may also be asked, why do the 'erratics' and the 'drift' (as in Eire for example[268]) sometimes abound on the higher peaks only to be absent from adjacent lower ground? Such effects are scarcely those of normal 'uniformitarian' actions.

Indeed, the longer such problems are pondered the less likely it seems that ice could, under any conceivable circumstances, have caused such effects, and indications mount up that the supposed Ice Age of Pleistocene times was really no more than an icy chimera. If so, then the validity of the Pleistocene period itself, as a distinct geological division, is also called into question.

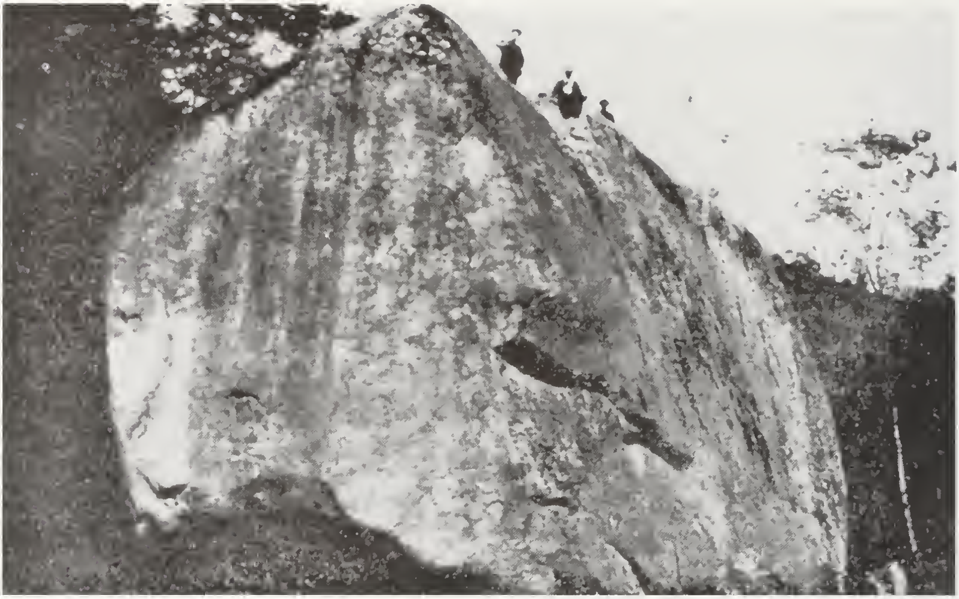

Fig 1.12. The giant erratic Madison Boulder at Conway, New Hampshire, estimated to weigh not less than 10,000 tonnes. The human figures show the boulder's great size. Photo: R A Daly, "The Changing World of the Ice Age", 1934, by permission of Yale Univ Press.

But before the Ice Age is pre-emptorally jettisoned here as the causal agent behind all the above-mentioned phenomena, let us be certain that all normal actions of ice have been duly considered and abandoned as untenable for sound reasons. Nothing less satisfies.

As presently understood, the physics of ice suggests that, on attaining a sufficient thickness, the supposed ice-sheets of the Ice Age must have moved under the influence of gravity, and that, due to the enormous weight of the ice, the movement would have been downwards – from higher to lower levels. Due to the composition of ice, this movement or flow would have to be viscous (semi-fluid or sticky). This means that only the basal layers of the ice-sheet would have moved on downhill gradients, and that only its upper layers would have moved over flat country. Sir Henry Howorth emphasised this when he wrote:

> A more important and far-reaching difficulty... is the proved incapacity of glacier ice, as of any other viscous body, to travel over enormous stretches of level country, and up and down long hills, as it must have done if the glacial theory is to become the final and effective explanation of a large part of the drift phenomena.[269]

Glacialists, however, have usually argued that glaciers do not behave in the same way as ice-sheets (such as those on Greenland and in Antarctica), a point also dealt with by Howorth as follows:

> It is... useless to quote glaciers to the ice men. They repudiate glaciers as tests altogether [a long way from Agassiz's and Charpentier's original ideas: authors], just as they repudiate laboratory experiments upon ice. With > them all inductive methods and arguments fail, since they always reply that the ice they appeal to is something entirely different to the ice of glaciers. It is ice-sheets they rely upon, portentous ice-sheets such as no longer exist anywhere. A Saturnian postulate, in fact, is their platform, and not a mundane one. Yet it ought to be a condition even of such a transcendental postulate as this that the ice in an ice-sheet should act in accordance with, and not contrary to, the nature and the physical qualities of ice. If it does not, the appeal ceases to be a scientific appeal, and it is, in fact, very largely an unscientific appeal which is continually being made by this noisy, clamorous school of writers, who never verify their premises and make assumptions as readily as they abandon them.

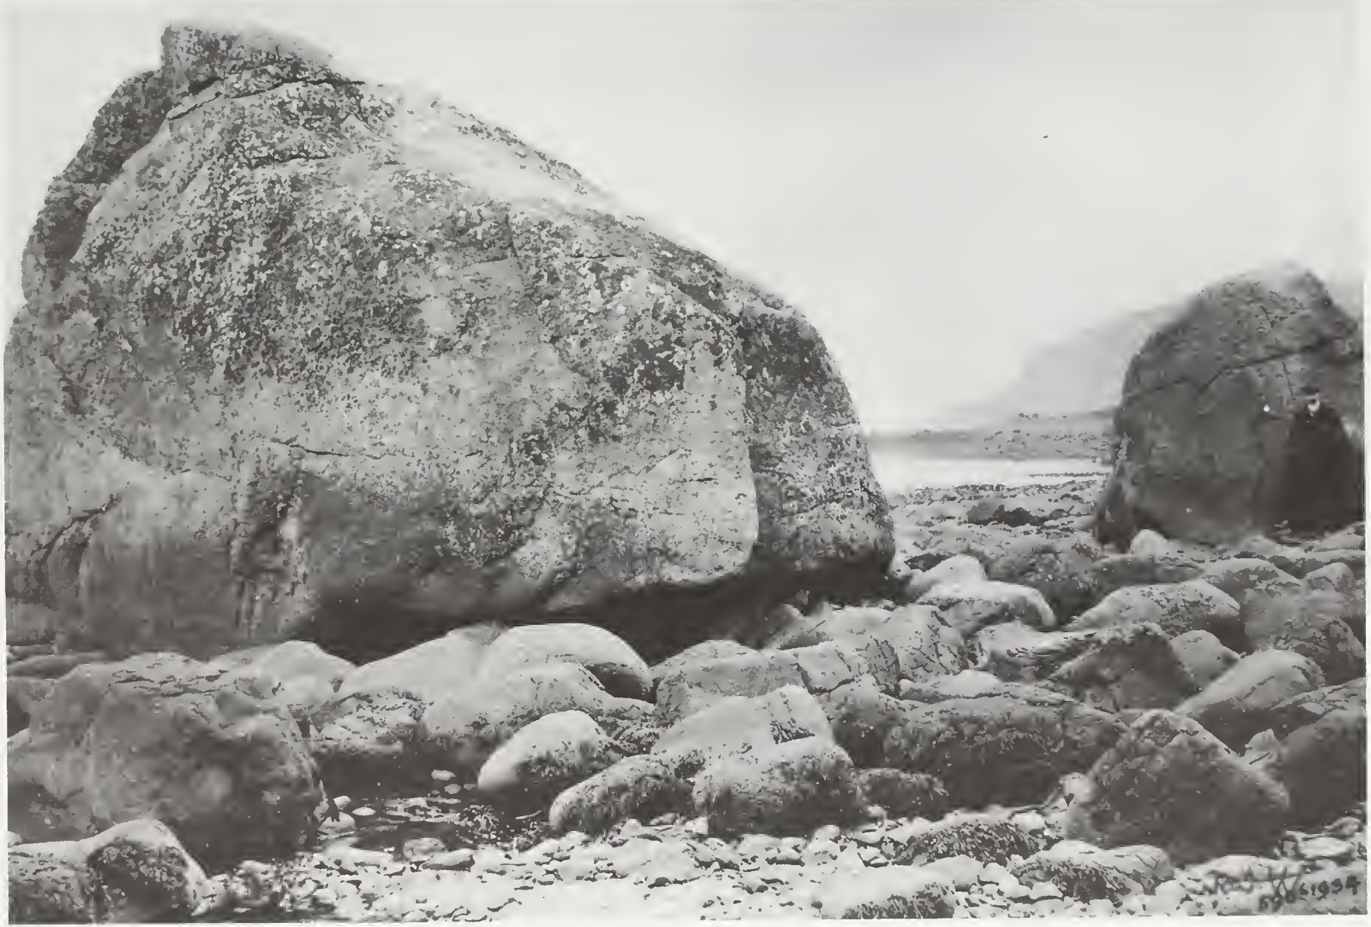

Fig 1.13. Two huge erratic boulders on the beach near Greyabbey, Co Down, Ulster. The nearest weighs over 500 tonnes. By courtesy of Dept of Geology, Ulster Museum.

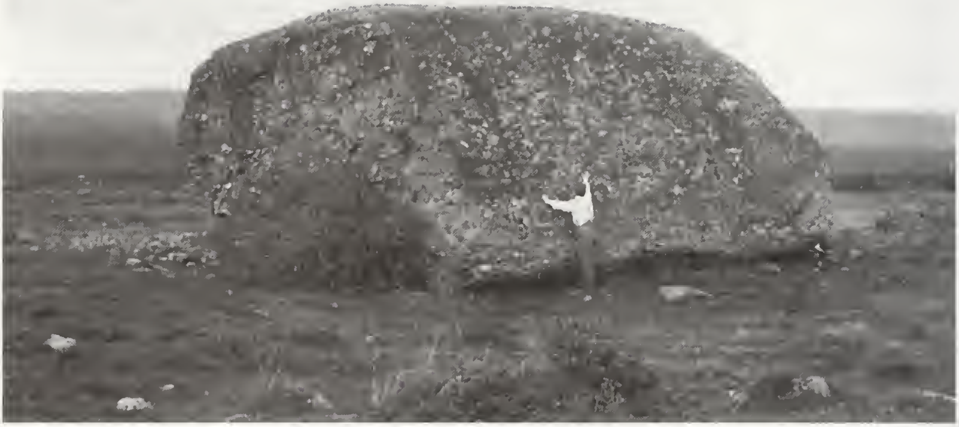

Fig 1.14. Erratic boulder near Nairn, Scottish Highlands.

>
> An ice-sheet is only a great mass of ice after all; a mass of ice which, instead of lying on a mountain slope or being embayed in a valley or on a plane surface, is supposed to have smothered and covered a stretch of uneven country and swathed it in a continuous mantle, Such a mass of ice cannot acquire properties not possessed by other ice. If it moves it must move according to the mechanics of ice and, as we have seen, ice moves in no other fashion than by the influence of gravity.[270]

At this juncture we interject the observation that to advocate causes in the past which differed from those of present experience, so far as ice is concerned, is actually contrary to the uniformitarian principles glacialists claim to uphold. Considering ice as a solid, Howorth went on to note:

> If a solid be so heavy and so big that it requires more than a certain force to move it, it will crush rather than move, that is to say, the whole thrust will be dissipated by the object being reduced to pulp, or even liquid, which will flow away rather than move en masse.[271]

Many earlier glacialists spoke of these ice-sheets being hundreds, perhaps thousands of feet thick. Howorth, complaining at such extravagances, exposed their shortcomings thus:

> ...it is not possible to pile up a mass of ice to an indefinite height, or to force a mass of ice of greater length than about seven miles along a level surface by any pressure, however obtained, without its crushing, and without, therefore, the thrusting force being dissipated.[272]

A glance at map 1E showing alleged glaciation in the Northern Hemisphere shows that the extent of these ice-sheets greatly exceeds "about seven miles", that the topography of considerable areas (especially in North America) was essentially flat or level, and that in other regions allegedly mantled by ice-sheets it was singularly rugged. Thus, according to ice physics, these ice-sheets should not have been capable of moving over either level or rugged terrain. The properties of ice preclude this.

The excavating and demolition powers of thick moving ice, relative to the glacialist's assumption that ice-sheets broke up the surface strata they supposedly over-rode, were also discussed by Howorth, who observed:

> Ice is much softer and more easily crushed than the great majority of rocks, and would itself be crushed and reduced to slush by its own pressure long before the rock upon which it stands could itself be broken... We must always remember the kinds of materials upon which the supposed crushing was effected. These are not lumps of soft rock showing crushed outlines, but clean broken and shattered masses with their surfaces still raw and unhealed, consisting of the hardest crystalline rocks such as granites, seynites, porphyries, etc, as well as limestones, sandstones and chalk, and we are asked to believe that the same ice-sheets which thus shattered such intractable materials in situ after passing on a few yards travelled over beds of laminated and stratified sand and loam with such a gentle touch as not to disturb the laminations...
>
> The word impossible is not a favourite of mine, but I am bound to say that, if it is... applied to any physical operation, I know of none where it seems so applicable as to the process appealed to by the ultra-glacialists for the manufacture of drift by an ice-sheet smashing its own bed.[273]

Very interestingly, ice is protective as well as destructive. The incalculable power of thick ice moving continuously down a gradient is, of course, well known, and such ice may well have planed off rock surfaces, scored and striated others, and removed previous loose boulders and unconsolidated surface deposits obstructing its downward course. But to achieve this the ice must be moving. On reaching level terrain the ice-flow would speedily cease. It has long been established that glaciers on descending-to-level ground quickly lose their forward momentum. Stationary, ice fails to significantly injure even fragile shells or loose accumulations of soft sand or grits. It simply stagnates and, very often, slowly melts away. Thus ice on level terrain, being, as we have just noted, unable to move in any direction of its own volition, would tend to actually protect rather than abrade any land surface it mantled. Indeed, the great ice-sheet presently covering the land surface of Antarctica appears to play an almost totally protective role[274]. The ice there also exhibits a notable absence of stony debris in the glaciers and icebergs so typical of that southern continent, despite the fact that its sub-ice topography is in places known to be ruggedly mountainous. Consequently there is a singular scarcity of surface moraines in Antarctica – a certain pointer to the near-minimal surface scour presently occurring there. Yet, during so-called Ice Age times, great ice-sheets like that of Antarctica are stated to have caused spectacular land surface damage on virtually a hemispheric scale!

While on the subject of 'scour' and 'debris' relative to ice action, two further points of marked significance merit close attention here.

If, relative to different types of terrain, the aforementioned orthodox contentions re-

Table 1B

Conventional Euro-American Quaternary subdivisions

Common subdivisions of Quaternary glacial deposits recognised in Europe and America. Not to scale.

	Years B P	ALPS	NORTHERN EUROPE	BRITISH ISLES	NORTH AMERICA	NORTHERN EUROPE	BRITISH ISLES	NORTH AMERICA
	9,000						Flandrian	Recent
	10,000			Devensian
HOLOCENE	10,270		Late Weichselian
	10,350		Upper Dryas
	10,900	Würm
	11,600				Wisconsonian	Alleröd
	12,200		Middle Dryas
	12,400
	13,000		Lower Dryas			Bolling
	14,250 ?		Mid-Weichselian
UPPER PLEISTOCENE	25,000
	30,000
	45,000
	50,000		Early Weichselian
	70,000
	97,000					Eonian	Ipswichian	Sangamon
	140,000 ?
		Riss	Saale	Wolstonian	Illinoian
						Solstein	Hoxnian	Yarmouth
MIDDLE PLEISTOCENE		Mindel	Elater	Anglian Lowestoftian	Kansan
							Cromerian
				Beestonian				Aftonian
							Pastonian
	600,000 ?
		Gunz	hiatus
	1,600,000 ?			Bavertian	Nebraskan
LOWER PLEISTOCENE							Antian
				Thurian	Pre-Nebraskan
	2,050,000 ?		hiatus				Ludhamian
		Donau
	2,450,000 ?						Waltonian

specting ice action during the Ice Age really do represent the norm of glacial behaviour, then why did ice fail to remove the unconsolidated 'drift' deposits from many of the higher peaks – which the ice allegedly smothered or overrode – and yet sweep bare much of the nearby lower ground where large accumulations of 'drift' should logically occur? The field evidence on this matter seems to be diametrically opposed to the acknowledged normal processes of ice action on gradients and level surfaces as described above. Indeed, in terms of modern glacier action, the 'drift' actually exhibits characteristics fatally at variance with that action, even if applied to the most conservative Ice Age scenario.

It is undoubtedly noteworthy that neither mountain glaciers generally, nor the Antarctic or Greenland ice-sheets, are now accumulating extensive 'drift'-like deposits. Moreover, present glacier moraines contain angular rocks unlike the usually rounded stones and boulders in the 'drift' itself. These latter are themselves usually rounder than that other vexatious Ice Age phenomenon, the 'erratics' – the significance of this point will become clearer later in this book. It can be truly held, therefore, that modern glacial (glacier) deposits possess virtually no typical 'drift'-like features and should be more accurately described as 'heterogeneous (unstratified) muck'.

Again, although moraines are today found at the foot of many glaciers, it does not necessarily signify that every moraine associated with 'drift' deposits was actually produced by glacial action. A receding sea-tide will leave what is essentially a moraine upon a beach, and at least one good record is known of a morainic structure formed by unusually severe cloudbursts – moraines which covered several acres and contained trees, soil, stones and boulders weighing up to an estimated 100 tonnes each[275].

As repeatedly recorded, 'drift' is often encountered in the most unexpected places. The collective effect of such distribution is the very opposite of that which could be anticipated from thick ice-sheets allegedly disintegrating the rock surfaces they are said to have over-ridden. Such theoretical ice movements could be expected to sweep bare all hillsides and summits, accumulating the resultant debris ('drift') in valleys and on lower ground. That the 'drift' was often not deposited and distributed in that fashion only serves to support the aforementioned fact that ice (even as huge sheets) does not and cannot naturally ascend gradients (let alone the steep inclines and summits of lofty hills and mountains). Nor, as Howorth and others have stressed, should we expect ice – under whatever guise – to have behaved differently in the past.

If, therefore, past and present ice movements were essentially identical, the ice-sheets of glacial theory could have flowed down gradients only, or for strictly limited distances across generally flat countryside. From this it follows that the succession of glacial advances and retreats envisaged by glacialists as typifying Pleistocene times, and supposed to have ebbed and flowed across hundreds, even thousands of miles of diverse terrain, were more or less physical impossibilities, In short, they cannot have actually existed. Thus the distinctive names awarded this alternating cycle of glacial advances and retreats (see table 1B) also become largely meaningless.

Numerous lines of enquiry converge upon the startling fact that the Ice Age of orthodoxy is no more than the shaky theory it always has been and its alleged former reality, as conceived by its advocates, just a wonderful myth. There was indeed an 'ice age', but, as shown later in this book, it occurred at a later date and was of comparatively brief duration.

If, as demonstrated, the great ice-sheets so beloved of glacialists never existed, because the uplands so necessary for their development and maintenance were either too low or non-existent during alleged Ice Age times, and because ice, even very thick ice, cannot behave in the manner required by glacial theory, it follows that other geological phenomena commonly ascribed to massive ice-action were caused by some other agency or combination of circumstances. Among such phenomena may be mentioned moraines, striated rocks, rock flutings, giant surface grooves, cirques (bowl-shaped hollows at the top of valleys), hanging valleys (tributary valleys hanging high above valleys they feed into), roches moutonnées (polished rock surfaces), kettle-holes (small bowl-like depressions), drumlins (oval hillocks), eskers (long gravel ridges), kames (sand-gravel ridges), 'erratic' boulders and various other types of surface denudation. It is, therefore, unnecessary to consider these features here, although we shall return to them later when we identify the agencies which unquestionably caused them.

14

TURMOIL UNLEASHED

The idea of huge circumpolar ice-sheets relentlessly creeping for thousands of years across extensive swathes of land rendered desolate and frigid, and in which nothing very sudden occurred (save, perhaps, the collapse of large pieces of ice), has long been an essentially uniformitarian concept. The occurrence of so much ice has often been regarded more as a biological than as a geophysical catastrophe, but one which, operating so slowly in most regions, has come to be thought of as gradual. Neither the biological nor the geological record, however, support this view, for both reflect catastrophe and destruction on a global scale.

It is widely agreed that, towards the close of Pleistocene times, profound climatic deterioration occurred worldwide. Numerous life-forms previously dominant or very prolific either became extinct or greatly depleted numerically. This change affected the animal and vegetable kingdoms equally, marking in fact a Great Divide in the terrestrial biological record. From a uniformitarian standpoint, this was a truly extraordinary occurrence representing a real catastrophe.

So widespread is the evidence for these changes, and so apparently indiscriminate the annihilation of diverse animal groups, that the closing stages of the Pleistocene period might justifiably be styled an age of wholesale slaughter. In the words of Prof L C Eiseley, the phenomenon drives "...the biologist to despair as he surveys the extinction of so many species and genera in the closing Pleistocene"[276]. Considering these exterminations further, he added:

> We are not dealing with a single, isolated relict species but with a considerable variety of Pleistocene forms, all of which must be accorded, in the light of cultural evidence, an approximately similar time of extinction[277]

In Europe immense herds of diverse animals utterly vanished off the face of the Earth for no obvious biological reason. They were seemingly virile, numerically strong faunal groups, well adapted to their natural environment, yet, geologically speaking, they disappeared with frightening abruptness. The same biological decimation was enacted simultaneously in Australasia, Asia and Africa. Of the latter G E Pilgrim noted:

> ...at approximately the same time we witness a similar extinction of the mammal faunas of Africa and Asia, though in their case this may not have been caused by glacial conditions.[278]

What conditions could these have been? Conditions acting as effectively outside the alleged limits of the hypothetical polar ice-sheets as within them, and on a hemispheric scale.

In the New World, for example, practically the whole Pleistocene mammalian fauna was wiped out or reduced to a pitiful vestige of its former greatness. Among the mammals so affected were:

> ...all the camels, all the horses, all the ground sloths, two genera of musk-oxen, peccaries, certain antelopes, a giant bison with a horn spread of six feet, a giant beaver-like animal, a stag-moose and several kinds of cats, some of which were of lion-size.[279]

Additions to this list include several types of elephants, including the mammoth and the mastodon (though a few individuals are known to have survived Pleistocene times in North America), all the northern rhinoceroses, giant armadillos, several kinds of bear, numerous members of the canine family, tapirs, a variety of rodents, and various large flightless birds.

Coincident with this dreadful slaughter upon the land was the deposition far inland of myriads of contemporary marine shells, and the stranding at great elevations of marine mammals such as whales, porpoises, walruses and seals. Elsewhere, vast forests were flattened and buried under equally vast accumulations of sand or mud or piled up in broken and twisted heaps. At some localities plant remains were packed so densely and in such abundance as to form lignite (soft brown coal akin to peat) beds of great extent[280], while at others animal and plant remains were mixed together in inexpressible confusion as heterogeneous masses. In Alaska, for example, thick frozen deposits of volcanic ash, silts, sands, boulders, lenticles and ribbons of unmelted ice, and countless relics of late Pleistocene animals and plants lie jumbled together in no discernible order, This amazing deposit, usually referred to as 'muck', has been described by Dr Rainey as containing:

> ...enormous numbers of frozen bones of extinct animals, such as the mammoth,

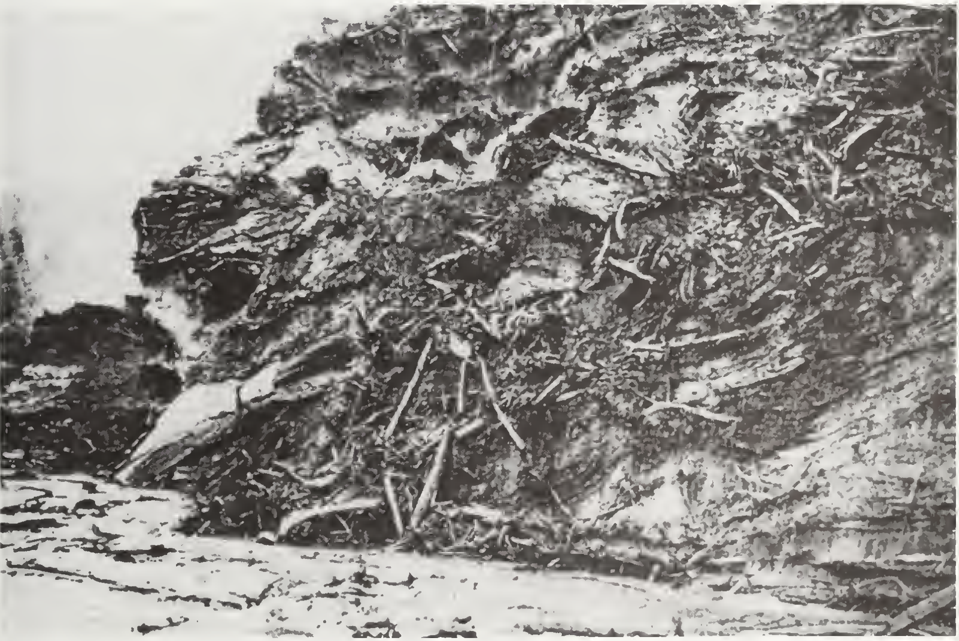

Fig 1.15. A typical exposure of Alaskan 'muck', composed of chaotically dispersed fragments of trees, plants and animals in frozen silt and lenses of ice. Courtesy of Prof Frank C Hibben, Dept of Anthropology, Univ of New Mexico.

> mastodon, super bison and horse, as well as brush, stumps, moss and freshwater molluscs.[281]

Hibben described these deposits in very similar language:

> In many places, Alaskan muck is packed with animal bones and debris in trainload lots. Bones of mammoths, mastodons, several kinds of bison, horses, wolves, bears, and lions tell a story of a faunal population... within this frozen mass lie the twisted parts of animals and trees intermingled with lenses of ice and layers of peat and mosses. It looks as though in the midst of some cataclysmic catastrophe of ten thousand years ago the whole Alaskan world of living animals and plants was suddenly frozen in mid-motion in a grim charade.[282]

In another publication, the same author commented:

> Although the formation of the deposits of muck is not clear, there is ample evidence that at least portions of this material were deposited under catastrophic conditions. Mammal remains are for the most part dismembered and disarticulated, even though some fragments yet retain, in their frozen state, portions of ligaments, skin, hair and flesh. Twisted and torn trees are piled in splintered masses... at least four considerable layers of volcanic ash may be traced in these deposits, although they are extremely warped and distorted.[283]

Hibben also suggested that this volcanic ash contributed to the wholesale death and destruction we have been reviewing. He wrote:

> One of the most interesting theories of the Pleistocene end is that which explains this ancient tragedy by worldwide, earth-shaking volcanic eruptions of catastrophic violence. This bizarre idea, queerly enough, has considerable support, especially in the Alaskan and Siberian regions. Interspersed in the muck depths, and sometimes through the very piles of bones and tusks themselves, are layers of volcanic ash. There is no doubt that coincidental with the end of the Pleistocene animals, at least in Alaska, there were volcanic eruptions of tremendous proportions... Toxic clouds of gas from volcanic upheavals could well cause death on a gigantic scale...[284]

We shall later have a few words to say about late Pleistocene vulcanicity worldwide, so we merely mention here that at least 76 major volcanoes, both currently active and recently extinct, exist today in the Aleutian islands immediately south-west of Alaska alone. Many of these appear to have been active around late Pleistocene times.

Hibben's observations also introduce the element of great heat into the argument surrounding the problematical origin of the so-called Ice Age. Discussing the problem from the viewpoint of physics, the celebrated Victorian physicist John Tyndall, as long ago as 1883, stressed that "...the enormous extension of glaciers in bygone ages demonstrates just as rigidly, the operation of heat as well as the action of cold"[285].

Although Tyndall has since been proved wrong on some counts, his remarks respecting great heat required for the formation of widespread ice-sheets are still correct and have been upheld by nearly all later geophysicists. Among these was Dr Donald Menzel of Harvard who, after examining the problem from an astronomical viewpoint, opined:

> If solar variability caused the ice ages, I should prefer to believe that increased warmth brought them on, whereas a diminution of heat caused them to stop.[286]

So, even if they really existed, the huge ice-sheets of Pleistocene times needed great heat for their formation, an element conceivably provided by many volcanoes erupting simultaneously. Such an event, if it actually occurred, must also have generated tremendous atmospheric pollution and hurricane force winds[287]. That it did occur seems to be indisputably established from the massive late Pleistocene vulcanism traceable not only in Alaska but, as shown later, in many other regions both north and south of the equator. Such extensive vulcanism must obviously have been due to some still more fundamental cause.

The frightful hurricanes just alluded to were doubtless primary factors in the demise of so much insect and bird life during late Pleistocene times – for what agency other than extremely violent winds could have brought together in one place such dissimilar avian species as the following? They included: Grebes, herons, bitterns, storks, wood ibises, spoonbills, swans, various geese (including the snow goose), ducks, American vultures, kites, many kinds of hawks, falcons, eagles, caracaras, the Teratornis, quails, cranes, partridges, turkeys, rails, gallinules, parrots, coots, plovers, turnstones, woodcock, snipes, surf-scooters, stilts, sandpipers, barn owls, seven other owl species, flycatchers, woodpeckers, swallows, jays, crows, magpies, titmice, chickadees, ravens, mockingbirds, waxwings, thrashers, meadowlarks, shrikes, two species of blackbird, redwings, orioles, finches, sparrows and buntings[288]. Remains of all these birds were discovered in the late Pleistocene tar-seeps at McKittrick in California, and the asphalt pits at Rancho La Brea in the same state.

This extraordinary assemblage is not an isolated freak occurrence. In late Pleistocene deposits at San Pedro, also in California, the following mixed bird assemblage was found with the remains of camel, bison, a ground-sloth, various rodents and the mammals known as Felis, Megalonyx and Aenocyon: loon, ancient murrolet, black-footed albatross, black-vented shearwater, fulmar, Brandt's cormorant, green-winged teal, mallard duck, cinnamon teal, white-fronted goose, surf-scooter, Californian quail, turkey vulture and western meadowlark[289]. All but the first, second and fourth species are still in existence, although like the equivalents from Rancho La Brea and McKittrick they are now spread over many different latitudes and occupy very different habitats. It is more than probable that most if not all these birds never originally dwelt together in the places where we now find their bones. They were brought together from various directions involuntarily by irresistible winds and buried in a common grave by, it would appear, catastrophic agencies.

Again, how does one correlate the extremely varied remains in the lignite deposits at Geiseltal in Germany with the theory of uniformity? Although now regarded as partially of Tertiary and partially of Pleistocene age[290], the tropical plants, insects and animals embedded in them do not square with the equivalents typical of the steppe conditions often stated to have been characteristic of that latitude during late Pleistocene times. The amazing preservation of the soft parts of many of these organisms suggests a very recent origin of the entire assemblage. The insect fauna, for example, is a modern one. It occurs "...in present Africa, in East Asia and in America in various regions, preserved in almost original purity"[291].

Complete insects, however, are rarities. The vast majority have been torn apart – and suddenly at that, because the process of fossilisation of all surviving parts with silica invading the tissues must have been virtually instantaneous ('Fast blitzschnell' – German), and was undoubtedly responsible for preserving the membranes and original colours of these insects so marvelously[292].

For the vertebrated animals (animals with a spinal column) these lignites are a veritable graveyard. The bones of giant constrictor snakes, East African salamanders, crocodiles, South American condor, an Indo-Australian bird, marsupial mammals, apes, as well as, paradoxically, mammals from northern steppe habitats, lie buried together in no particular order[293].

The plant remains are also perplexing. Fungi and algae still attached to leaves impressed into the lignites are today found only on plants in Brazil, the Cameroons and Java[294]. Chlorophyll is also preserved in many of the leaves which, numbering literally billions, form huge beds within these lignites. The leaves belong to plants from all parts of the world, not just from one or two climatic zones only. The leaves are also mostly shredded so that only their fine fibres or nervous systems remain intact. The fibres often retain their original green (chlorophyllic) colour, and indicate that the leaves must have been rapidly excluded from contact with air and light, and buried almost immediately they were stripped from the parent plants[295]. Many of the plant species concerned still flourish in the tropics today.

Only some tremendous hurricane acting in concert with vast surging masses of water could have transported and accumulated these remains at Geiseltal – a hurricane and a deluge operating on a scale and with a ferocity far beyond that of which modern humanity has any experience.

These remarkable faunal and floral assemblages at McKittrick, Rancho La Brea and Geiseltal form singular parallels with the aforementioned shell assemblages found in the 'drift' at Moel Tryfaen in North Wales. Further examples, not detailed here, are also known from other parts of the world. The process responsible for these effects clearly operated not only at many widely-sundered localities and at more or less the same point in Earth history, but affected plants, invertebrates, insects and land, sea and air animals equally. In other words, it acted globally and indiscriminately. Allied with the phenomena found in Alaska, a repeating pattern of wholesale destruction, often involving organisms which could never have lived in the vicinity of huge ice-sheets, emerges worldwide. It was a time when appalling carnage and tremendous natural disturbances occurred hand in hand. Put bluntly, it was a time of unbridled turmoil.

15

EVIDENCE FROM THE ARCTIC

Not as spectacular, perhaps, as the animal fossils discovered in Alaska and Siberian Russia, the equivalent botanical evidence from the Arctic is nevertheless of similar importance. Above all, it represents essentially sedentary life which mostly lived and died where its remains now occur. Adapted to well-defined climatic zones and altitudinal habitats, plants faithfully reflect the meteorological conditions which must have formerly prevailed where their fossils now repose. Taken as a whole, the flora constitutes a natural living background against which normally more mobile life-forms – for example, insects, molluscs and vertebrated animals – live and die. Plant cover in one form or another is virtually a prerequisite haven for such mobile organisms and, amongst other things, functions locally as a partial humidity control. Its importance for other life-forms cannot be overemphasised.

The former existence of a warm, equable region traditionally sited somewhere in the north – often specifically at or near the North Pole itself – would, we may reasonably infer, have been clothed with abundant vegetation by the very nature of such a climatic regime. Much irrefutable evidence indicates that it was so. Palaeobotanists are well aware that a milder climate formerly prevailed throughout much of the present Arctic.

Numerous discoveries of warmth-loving plant remains assigned a Miocene or Pliocene date have been made at many northern localities, including Spitzbergen, the east and west coasts of Greenland, the islands comprising Kong Karl Land, Ellesmere Island, Banks Island and Alaska. Virtually identical remains occur on the Kamchatka peninsula of eastern Siberia, now lying well south of the Arctic Circle. Further consideration of these remains leads to some interesting conclusions.

Today, the winter temperature at 81°N, which is well inside the Arctic Circle, can and does drop from, −40°C to a still lower figure at the Pole itself, although even this does not reach that of the 'Cold Pole' in Siberia where, in the Oymyakon-Verkhoyansk basins, temperatures as low as −70°C have been recorded[296]. Conversely, the summer temperatures in latitude 81°N reach a cool 3°C[297].

Such severe temperature fluctuations obviously restrict the type and range of vegetation capable of surviving these extremes. Thus, if conventional concepts of lengthy Pleistocene glaciations and interglacial episodes are correct, these northern plant assemblages can have changed but little for hundreds of thousands of years. Plant records immediately preceding Pleistocene times, however, reveal that a markedly different flora flourished then in present Arctic latitudes, showing these to have been far warmer than they are today, and that many of the genera and species hardly differed from those which now thrive much further south. The findings of Prof F E Weiss, quoted by H E Forrest, stressed this:

> It has been shown by Heer, Unger, Ettinghausen and others that many plants of the Miocene period are so closely related to those of today that they cannot be distinguished as separate species (eg Taxodium disticum), and in most cases the living species are very closely related to those of the Miocene period [which is generally believed to have ended at least ten million years ago! – authors]
>
> | Miocene | Recent |
> |---|---|
> | Populus balsaminoides | Populus balsamifera |
> | Platanus aceroides | Platanus occidentalis |
> | Sequoia sternbergii | Sequoia gigantea |
> | Sequoia langsdorfii | Sequoia sempervirens |
>
> This indicates that there has been very little change since that period and we must consider the distribution of plants today in the light of that which existed in the Tertiary period. The remains from that period also show that the species occurring at that time had a much wider distribution, in the Northern Hemisphere at all events, than is the case nowadays. We may take it that the circumpolar flora of that time was most nearly related to the existing flora of north-east America, including as it did such genera as Liquidambar, Vitis, Magnolia and Liriodendron.[298]

It is more than curious that the existing flora of Greenland shows that flowering plants, which are said to have survived there from pre-glacial times, indicate that this so-called glacial epoch must have been much less severe than commonly believed[299], especially as Greenland is conventionally stated to have been repeatedly buried under enormously thick ice-sheets in Ice Age times, which obliterated everything in their path.

Early scientific expeditions to Spitzbergen discovered and collected 136 specimens of Miocene plants representing species of fir, spruce, marsh cypress, hazel, elm, sequoia, liquidambar, gingkos, tulip trees, magnolia and freshwater plants[300]. A similar picture came to light near Disko island off western Greenland where pine cones, acorns and other plants were discovered last century[301]. Further finds elsewhere in Arctic America concerned temperate-zone trees such as walnut, beech, oak, poplar, lime – some with fruit still on the branches – maple, magnolia, cypress, plane trees and conifers[302]. Some remains represented tropical ferns and the breadfruit[303]. Rather unexpectedly, many of these remains occurred in a sparry iron ore[304], a fact which will later assume much significance. Elaborating upon this evidence Sir Charles Lyell remarked:

> Professor Heer has examined the various collections of fossil plants that have been obtained in Northern Greenland (latitude 70°N), Iceland, Spitzbergen and other parts of the Arctic regions, and has determined that they are of Miocene age, and indicate a temperate climate. The Arctic Miocene flora now comprises 194 species, and that of Greenland 137 species, of which 46, or exactly one third, are identical with plants found in the Miocene beds of Central Europe. Considerably more than half the number are trees, which is more remark> able since at the present day trees do not exist in any part of Greenland even 10° further south. More than 30 species of Coniferae have been found, including several sequoias (allied to the gigantic Wellingtonia of California)... also beeches, oaks, planes, maples, walnuts, limes and even a Magnolia... andromeda, hazel, blackthorn, holly, dogwood and hawthorn. A species of zamia (zamites) grew in the swamps, with potamogeton, sparganium and menyanthes, while ivy and vines twined round the forest trees, and broad-leaved ferns grew beneath their shade. Even in Spitzbergen, as far north as latitude 78°, no less than 95 species of fossil plants have been obtained, including hazel, poplar, alder, beech, plane-tree and lime. Such a vigorous growth of trees within 12° of the Pole, where now a dwarf willow and a few herbaceous plants form the only vegetation and where the ground is covered with almost perpetual snow and ice, is truly remarkable. The identity of so many of the fossils with Miocene species of central Europe not only proves that the climate of Greenland was much warmer than it is now, but also renders it probable that a much more uniform climate prevailed over the entire Northern Hemisphere[305].

While adding further botanical species to these impressive lists, modern research has merely confirmed the Miocene character and luxuriance of these ancient northern forests. It was, however, this same evidence which, last century, prompted the view that the terrestrial axis must have changed since Miocene times[306]. The great Swedish geographer, Nordenskiöld, concluded that summer temperatures then at latitude 78°N must have attained at least 14–15°C to have permitted the survival of these plants[307]. He was, however, greatly puzzled at being unable to find any transitional plants in northern latitudes which bridged the Miocene/Pliocene/post-glacial gap[308]. Everywhere there seemed to be a sudden change from an older Miocene/Pliocene flora to a modern (post-glacial) one, in which plant types linking the two regimes were conspicuously absent. Nordenskiold eventually decided that, without leaving one transitional plant to be found today, the glacial scour of the Ice Age must have ground up or carried away all evidence of such vegetation in northern latitudes[309]. Nordenskiöld subscribed, of course, to the then-fashionable theory of immensely thick ice-sheets mantling great regions of the northern hemisphere.

Iceland was also formerly milder than it is today. The presence there in clays described as 'very late Pleistocene' of large trees such as oak, maple, sequoia, spruce and others is irrefutable proof of this. Collectively, they point to a former mean annual temperature of 11°C. It has been suggested that these trees flourished during an "interglacial warm period"[310], yet their mode of interment within the clays bespeaks of sudden agitated conditions, the very reverse of those supposedly typifying the so-called interglacial episodes. Interestingly, P E P Norton concluded, after studying the remains of shells and pieces of wood in deposits assigned a late Pleistocene or early Holocene age at Tjornes in northern Iceland, that they had been accumulated under violently agitated circumstances[311]. Dated as being 11,000–12,500 years old, these fossils indicate that this part of Iceland remained unglaciated[312] at a time elswhere alleged to have featured prodigious ice-sheets which, by then said to have been slowly melting, still dominated many northern landscapes.

The aforementioned absence of glaciation of sizable areas of Arctic Canada may have been still greater than generally conceded; for although Cornwallis and Devon islands at 75°32'N are commonly believed to have been glaciated and are depicted as being so on maps reconstructing Ice Age times, Grinnell Land still further north at the polar end of Ellesmere Island, Banks Island and Prince Patrick Island all yield evidence militating against the notion that they were ever glaciated at all.

On the contrary, immense quantities of ancient permanently frozen wood, pine cones and acorns lie at an elevation of some 150ft (46m) above present sea level near the centre of Banks Island. One of the trees discovered there had apparently grown on the spot and retained many of its leaves, albeit blackened and withered[313]. Significantly, no oaks now flourish within several hundred miles of this island, so where have the acorns come from? Eleven other trees found on Banks Island were later identified as conifers of North American type, and two species of flowering plants were also recognised among this debris[314].

Supposed driftwood, much of it semi-fossil, was also encountered last century along the shores of Banks Island, at some places as much as 580ft (177m) above sea level[315]. Sir Robert McClure, who made many of these discoveries, found traces of former immense forests at several other localities on the island, about which Robert Damon of Weymouth wrote as follows:

> Sir Robert McClure mentions, in his narrative of the discovery of the north-west passage, the existence of a fossil forest on Banks Land, latitude 74°25′, where, for a depth of 40ft, the cliff was composed of one mass of fossil trees... 120 miles further north... [existed]... a similar kind of fossil forest.[316]

McClure met with comparable remains of ancient trees still further North, at latitude 76°12N, on Prince Patrick Island, where trunks as much as 4ft (1.3m) in circumference occurred. Some were so ancient that the wood had lost its combustibility and refused to burn[317].

Although Geikie thought these trees were probably referable to the Miocene period[318], the fact that they were superficially in a condition which, in other circumstances, would be regarded as combustible, suggests that they, too, were not properly fossilised and not, therefore, referable to such a remotely distant period as the Miocene. Nevertheless, these trees may indeed have represented typical Miocene species which, as we have repeatedly noticed, seemingly survived almost unchanged across many presently Arctic regions from the Miocene period down to late Pleistocene times – despite the intervention between those temporal extremes of the whole of the Pliocene and Pleistocene epochs (see table 1A). Such possibilities are enormously enhanced when we again note, as Nordenskiöld and other palaeobotanists also have, that in Arctic lands the change from an older Miocene/Pliocene flora to a modern (post-glacial) one, without transitional botanical species, was not only abrupt but occurred geologically very recently indeed.

If, as previously argued, the glacial and interglacial successions typifying conventional Ice Age times never actually existed, and if, as has also been suggested, some kind of post-Miocene axial shift has occurred, then Nordenskiöld's problem respecting the hiatus in the Arctic botanical record evaporates, for no transitional plants ever existed either, and the traceable changes were fundamentally environmental ones. Plants, being sensitive environmental 'thermometers', merely reflected those changes. Abrupt changes inevitably precluded the development of transitional plant species.

What this really means is that, while a rich and diverse botanical assemblage now preserved in sub-fossil form at various Arctic sites represents an ancient Miocene/Pliocene flora, the discovered specimens of it do not date from such distant times but are remnants of the last representatives of that flora which perished during the widespread environmental changes experienced across these northern latitudes at the close of Pleistocene times. Very significantly, as we shall shortly discover, a geologically late survival of ancient biota is duplicated in the record of the sub-fossilised animals entombed in the Pleistocene rock fissures and bone caves further south, where Miocene and Pliocene species sometimes lie cheek-by-jowl with Pleistocene and even modern (existing) species.

Further aspects of these profound northern changes and of the orthodox reconstructions of Ice Age times also exist which briefly merit consideration.

Among the more important of these are the conditions existing on either side of the northern end of the Nares Strait, the narrow channel which, straddling latitude 82°N, separates north-western Greenland from Grinnell Land on Ellesmere Island. There, conditions believedly typical of glacial and interglacial episodes of Ice Age times exist side by side[319], for despite its far northern location Grinnell Land features little permanent ice and hosts a considerable variety of plants which grow upon non-glacial soils, whereas Greenland, across the Strait, is perpetually smothered in snow and ice.

Here is an instance where glacial and so-called interglacial conditions do not, as in most Ice Age models, have to be successive. Given the appropriate conditions, they can be coeval. That such contrasting conditions can actually exist in such close geographical proximity on opposite sides of the Nares Strait is due largely to the warm waters of the western branch of the Gulf Stream flowing northwards up Davis Strait as far as Grinnell Land and influencing conditions there conducive to plant growth. Such conditions, however, are apparently exceptional, for, as shown earlier, the existence in alleged Ice Age times of extensive and lengthy glacial and interglacial episodes during conditions of near-hemispheric extent is no longer really tenable. The evidence supposedly representative of them requires alternative interpretation.

Here, a further point concerning soils also arises.

If Grinnell Land, as presumed by orthodox Ice Age dogma (but contrary to field evidence), was formerly glaciated by thick scouring ice-sheets, why did the ice not remove that region's original (old) soil – as has apparently occurred across much of northern mainland Canada (although not on many of that country's Arctic islands, where the aforementioned tree and plant remains testify so eloquently to its retention)? Enormous ice sheets of the type so commonly a part of standard Ice Age scenarios should have scoured away all such soil and all the botanical remains just discussed.

It has long been known that glacial soils are generally sterile and, for lengthy periods following their deposition, do not encourage plant growth. Highlighting this point many years ago, the American naturalist McGee, as cited by Howorth, observed:

> ...crude soils, such as fresh glacial clays from some yards beneath the surface, are not adapted to the support of luxuriant vegetation.[320]

Drawing upon the conclusions of several earlier authorities, McGee added:

> ...of the valleys laid bare at the glacial period, those whose glaciers retreated first present a richer and more varied vegetation than those which remained a long time covered with ice... The western slope of the Rocky Mountains exhibits abundant traces of glaciation evidently quite recent, geologically speaking, though it may well be doubted whether the glaciers have existed within many centuries, yet scarcely any vegetation has sprung up on the light glacial soil.[321])

Here, therefore, is a further detail suggesting that Grinnell Land, and probably much of Ellesmere Island as a whole, was never extensively glaciated, if at all.

But the absence of appreciable soils across huge northern stretches (the Canadian-, Hudson Bay- or Laurentian-Shield[322]) of mainland Canada, as also parts of western Siberia[323] and Finland[324], if not removed by ice that seemingly never was, must have resulted from the operation of other agencies. Wind and water are the only two alternative agents which could conceivably have produced the observable effects. Their operation, however, would have had to have been on a stupendous scale.

Together with the frozen soils of 'unglaciated' Alaska and eastern Siberia, with their abundant refrigerated relics of flowering and fruit-bearing trees and plants belonging to species now unable to grow in such high latitudes, the botanical testimony of the Canadian Arctic islands indicates the richness of the flora that formerly flourished in Arctic latitudes under climatic conditions clearly very different from those now extant there. Nor do we need reminding that the cessation of those conditions was apparently sudden, complete, and occurred at the very close of so-called Ice Age (Younger Dryas) times with astonishing rapidity (see I:5 A Displaced Axis?); or that an equable pre-catastrophic Golden Age traditionally existing during the 'childhood of humanity' in northern latitudes, where life existed in serenity. The traditional end of this paradisical world is consistently described as sudden and violent – a not unexpected fate of an era terminated by agencies which, on the basis of the aforementioned astronomical data, perhaps involved a change to the tilt of Earth's rotational axis. As we shall see later, a surprisingly large number of scholars have discussed this possibility. One scarcely needs to add that any such axial change would inevitably have generated major climatic changes and would have engendered biological destructions of exactly the magnitude the aforementioned evidence indicates.

16

AN INTERIM SUMMARY

Having now reached a point where the validity and significance of several diverse but related aspects of recent Earth history have been outlined in some detail, it may, before continuing further, be useful here to recapitulate the main themes discussed and the conclusions reached, especially as these collectively form the terrestrial background against which the awesome saga traced throughout the remainder of this book originally unfolded.

We have seen that humanity's age-old preoccupation with world history has steadily evolved from simple beliefs featuring a succession of ill-defined World Ages (or World Suns) – each allegedly terminating catastrophically – and that the most widely remembered and recent of these events was the Great Flood or Deluge of traditional and scriptural histories.

The interrelated questions of the 'date of Creation' and the 'age of the Earth' figured prominently in the deliberations of many classical and post-classical historians who, until the late 1820s, regarded the Deluge as not only real but as an important datum in practically all their historical schemes. They freely used the terms 'antediluvian' and 'post-diluvian' to denote pre-Flood and post-Flood events, peoples and things.

Irrespective of the particular strata from which they were obtained, fossils, which had apparently fascinated people since prehistoric times, were widely regarded as the physical remnants of antediluvian creatures drowned in the Deluge, although some thinkers realised quite early on that certain fossils represented organisms which had left no living descendants, and that some apparently belonged to eras so distant from ours that these were already immensely ancient even before the Deluge. Estimates of the real age of the world were regularly recalculated and slowly extended from a few thousand years to hundreds of thousands, and ultimately to millions of years – sufficient time, in the opinion of some adventurous scholars, in which pre-Adamites (people before Adam, the traditional 'first' man) could have lived or evolved.

Astronomical discoveries during the late 1600s and early 1700s revealed the periodicity of many comets and the existence of gravity, for the first time. William Whiston, who was cognizant of these discoveries and a friend of many who had made them, was seemingly the earliest to have proposed the idea that a comet, passing close to Earth, had gravitationally displaced the oceans and caused them to overflow their natural basins as a vast worldwide Flood. This theory was set out in a book which, published in 1696 and another in 1717[327], showed how the Deluge could have occurred through the 'geo-physics' involved, and how it could have been a cosmically rather than a terrestrially-induced event.

Through providing a hitherto-missing workable mechanism – a defensible cause, as against that traditionally invoking unverifiable 'divine wrath' – confirming on the basis of cold scientific facts the apparent veracity of the scriptural and traditional accounts of a tremendous prehistoric Flood, Whiston's books accordingly became very influential and, in the process, initiated the 'scientific' foundation of the 'Catastrophist' school of thought.

During the 130 years or so following Whiston's books, the hypothesis of a comet-induced Deluge was enthusiastically cultivated by scientists and churchmen alike. The theory seemed to satisfactorily embrace both their sets of beliefs. Ultimately, however, their application of the theory to a whole range of natural phenomena became ever more forced and unlikely, and a point was eventually reached where 'catastrophism', as represented by Whiston's hypothesis, had clearly overstepped its mark and reached absurd proportions. Academicians reacted by seeking alternative, less sensational explanations.

Re-studies of many natural phenomena eventually resulted in the appearance during the early 1830s of Charles Lyell's now famous 'Theory of Uniformity', in which the extravagances of the catastrophists were discarded in favour of slow, gradual changes extending over immense periods of time. The age of the Earth thus grew longer still, and Lyell's new approach (actually built in part on earlier but at that time insufficiently noticed similar ideas advanced by James Hutton and William Smith) was swiftly acclaimed – one suspects as much as a relief from previous rampant 'catastrophism' as from any general recognition of 'uniformity's' inherent merits.

From Lyell's work sprang the 'uniformitarian' school of thought, which has ever since been in opposition to that of the catastrophists and has assumed ascendancy over it. It should be noted, however, that 'catastrophism' has never entirely died out, and has recently received support from some eminent sources[325].

But even before, and after, Lyell's day, naturalists acknowledged that certain geological phenomena existed which bespoke of sudden and violent changes – the very opposite of the calm uniformitarian norm. The phenomena included polished and striated rocks, 'erratic' boulders, extensive unstratified 'drift' deposits, abruptly frozen mammoth and rhinoceros carcasses in Siberia, and an astonishing profusion of unreasonably jumbled bony remains of countless incompatible animals in caves and rock fissures on every continent. Although fuller consideration of these remarkable burials occurs in Part Two, neither they nor the other anomalies just listed could be readily accounted for by uniformitarian tenets, especially as in almost every case they were primarily surface phenomena and therefore geologically youthful. Lengthy ages of serene conditions could never have produced them.

Nevertheless, less than ten years after the publication of Lyell's theory, another was proposed which, amongst other things, was thought to satisfactorily explain most of this anomalous material on non-catastrophic grounds. This was the Ice Age or glacial theory of the Swiss geologist Louis Agassiz. Like Lyell's, it was destined to become exceedingly influential in geological and biological circles.

Giant glaciers and huge ice-sheets smothering all but the highest peaks in northern lands were the main features in Agassiz's hypothesis. Ice, not Deluge waters, had purportedly striated and polished hard rocks, distributed the 'erratics' and had deposited the unconsolidated 'drift'. Thus, wherever such phenomena existed, that was where prodigious quantities of ice formerly existed and produced these effects. Above all, ice is slow-acting.

Though still exceptional, the frozen Siberian animal carcasses were, as they belonged to species also entombed unfrozen in geologically youthful 'drift' deposits elsewhere, quickly regarded as being similarly youthful. The relevant individuals, it was reasoned, must have belonged to animals which had lived and died in glacial conditions. Geologists invented a special epoch, the 'Pleistocene', to accommodate all such material.

The champions of ice as a causal agent for so many 'Pleistocene phenomena' could, it seemed, adequately account even for apparent anomalies like these. Accordingly, the Deluge ceased to be regarded as the cause of the 'drift' and associated geological phenomena, and was no longer recognised as an important benchmark in history. If it had ever occurred it probably had been a local event of scant significance outside the region it affected.

Encouraged by the apparent merits of Agassiz's theory, geologists everywhere renewed their studies of geological evidence previously ascribed to diluvial action. The outcome was a number of important, and sometimes diametrically opposed, developments.

Several separate alleged ice advances (stadials), alternating with ice retreats (interstadials) were professedly recognised. Elaborate schemes, in which the advances were generally envisaged as having been from polar latitudes equatorwards, were devised to explain these. To accommodate these stadials and interstadials, which, a priori, were imagined as lengthy episodes due to the usual slow actions of ice, the 'Pleistocene' period lengthened again. Some modern estimates of its duration make this span as much as three million years[326].

Particular attention was paid to what had actually caused the Ice age. Many explanations were proposed and discarded. None met all the necessary criteria – a situation still the case today.

Extended field studies also began to reveal serious defects in Agassiz's hypothesis. 'Erratic' boulders and 'drift' deposits were discovered in regions that even the most massive ice-sheets could never have reached. These, however, were also essentially identical to the 'erratics' and 'drift' of more northern areas where large accumulations of ice could most certainly once have existed. Conversely, 'drift' was found to be singularly absent from many northern localities where, if Ice Age theory was correct, it should occur.

Wind, water, mud-slides and various volcanic actions, as well as other agencies, began to be recognised as equally capable of scoring and striating rocks under given conditions. The predominant orientation of rock striations was surprisingly consistent throughout much of the northern hemisphere, and was sometimes associated with 'drift' deposits confined to northern or north-western mountain slopes, or to areas devoid of 'drift' altogether. In many areas striae affected older topographical features in ways that frequently negated all known ice behaviour.

Extraordinary accumulations of incompatible organisms – shells, birds, mammals, plants and so on – were encountered in 'drift' deposits hundreds, even thousands, of miles too far north of their present habitats. Southwards-moving ice could hardly have transported such remains to the localities yielding them. Elsewhere, extensive debris of ancient forests were met with in northern lands now far too cold to support any such vegetation, yet the immense ice-sheets of conventional Ice Age dogma had somehow avoided them and failed to scour away their trunks and branches as it had allegedly scoured away rocks elsewhere when accumulating the 'drift' deposits.

The orthodox concept of immense sprawling polar ice-sheets which, after long ages, slowly melted away, is, like the modified versions of it developed since, so full of fatal shortcomings and so at variance with inescapable field evidence, that the standard notion of the Ice Age must now be regarded as fundamentally flawed and almost certainly a chimera. Indeed, any application of it hemispherically, as was formerly common practice, is undoubtedly fallacious. Nevertheless, something – if not ice – had to have occurred which created and distributed so widely the so-called 'glacial' phenomena – and geologically lately at that, as the phenomena themselves are demonstrably youthful too.

Geologists have established that a similar modernity characterised the shattering, collapse and upheaval of many sizable portions of the Earth's crust, as well as the concomitant elevation of most of our planet's highest mountain ranges. Many highly competent authorities have been united in describing these huge disturbances in graphically catastrophic terms, dating them as having occurred 'at the end of the Ice Age', 'at the close of the Pleistocene epoch' or 'in sub-Recent times' – quite the reverse of what could be reasonably expected of uninterrupted uniformitarian conditions.

It is clear that before the onset of these disturbances world topography differed appreciably from that of today. The Alps were simply 'a chain of low hills'; the proto-Rockies, if they truly existed, were actually located considerably farther west; the Gobi desert was allegedly a great inland sea. A full list of these changes is impressively long and everywhere reflects the effects of a worldwide catastrophe.

In whatever guise even a small pre-catastrophic Ice Age might have existed, it, like the full-blown chimerical one disposed of above, certainly never sprawled across topographies familiar to modern people.

Palaeontologists and biologists have likewise reached generally similar conclusions respecting the demise of countless plants and animals on all continents 'at the close of the Pleistocene epoch'. Extinctions then were sudden, violent, frighteningly wholesale, indiscriminate and very extensive. Science has also determined, as will be elaborated on more fully anon, that many of the animals concerned were not adapted to the widespread glacial conditions supposedly typical of many regions immediately preceding these extinctions, but were more suited to milder and gentler regimes. The refrigerated evidence of warm/temperate vegetation from Arctic lands independently and strikingly supports that scenario, and suggests that some alteration of the axial tilt of the Earth may have attended the aforementioned crustal disturbances. They also intimate that the earliest histories which refer to remotely ancient times epitomised by a Golden Age may, after all, allude to some long-forgotten reality.

Evidence thus converges from numerous directions to support the conclusion that, on the testimony of radio-carbon and other dating techniques, immense physical and climatic changes occurred on Earth some 11,000 years or so ago – when an Ice Age that probably never was came to an end, and an apparently typical uniformitarian regime was abruptly terminated.

The collective and unavoidable message of these and other innumerable details is that, at some stage, colossal masses of water played a very important (although not the only) role in effecting these changes. This again suggests that the many surviving accounts of a worldwide Deluge long ago may yet be found to rest upon a substratum of now dimly-remembered fact.

Be that as it may, however, geophysics (as presently understood) reveals that Earth is seemingly incapable of generating of its own volition physical convulsions of the type and magnitude registered naturally in recent Earth history. Some other cause must have arisen – a cause powerful enough to affect the entire globe more or less simultaneously – to satisfactorily meet all relevant criteria. Only some closely-approaching cosmic object of considerable size could activate the titanic forces which, though part and parcel of a wider, more profound, universal uniformitarianism, only become naturally unleashed during such confrontations, and would be necessary to produce such gargantuan topographical and biological changes so rapidly and extensively on Earth.

The relationships between apparently incompatible uniformitarian and catastrophic regimes of the kinds just mentioned have been shown to be extremes of what, in reality, is a single astronomical or cosmic 'norm', manifesting itself on Earth only at the times of cosmic confrontations. A question of relative scale is directly involved – nothing more and nothing less. In such a context, the 'catastrophism' and 'uniformitarianism' of previous historians is not merely unreal, but a serious stumbling-block to a fuller and more lasting understanding of recent Earth history.

Finally, that many ancient Deluge accounts also describe the Flood as one of the results of a tremendous celestial conflict certainly cannot be without significance, and indicate that singular prospects now confront us at almost every turn.

Table 1C

Synopsis of major global geophysical changes during 'late Pleistocene' times

Formation of deserts	Dried-up rivers/lakes/seas	Changed natural drainage/lake levels	Disappearance of land-bridges/land-masses	Raised beaches	Coastal warping	Marine displacements	Vulcanism	Fissures and fractures	Stratal inversion	Overthrusting of older over younger strata	Crustal tilting	Crustal shortening	Lateral crustal displacement	Orogeny and faulting	Sea-floor collapse	Land subsidence	Elevation
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	ARCTIC
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Jan Mayen Islands
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Bear Island
☐	☐	■	■	■	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	Spitzbergen
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Kong Karl Land
☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	Franz Josef Land
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	White Sea
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	Kola Peninsula
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	Kanin Peninsula/R. Ob
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Novaya Zemlya
☐	☐	☐	■	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Vaygach Islands
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	Barents Sea
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Kara Sea
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	Laptev Sea
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	New Siberian Islands
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Verkhoyansk foldbelt
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Bering Strait
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	Chukchee coast
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	Anadyr Bay
☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	■	☐	☐	■	Ural Mts.
☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	St Lawrence Islands
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Seaward Peninsula
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	South Alaska coast
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Alaskan Range
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Gulf of Alaska
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Aleutian Islands
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Canadian Archipelago
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	NORTH ATLANTIC
☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	GREENLAND
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	Davis Strait
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Carey Islands
☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	ICELAND
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Appalachia
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Azores
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Canary Islands
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	Mid-Atlantic Ridge
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	General
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	EUROPE
☐	☐	☐	■	■	■	■	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	BRITISH ISLES
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	Irish Sea
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	North Sea
☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	■	■	NORWAY
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Skagerrak
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	SWEDEN
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	FINLAND
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	■	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	■	Alps
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	POLAND
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	Carpathian Mountains
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	■	Ural Mountains
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	Gibraltar
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	Aegean Sea
☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Aral Sea

Table 1C (Continued)

Synopsis of major global geophysical changes during 'late Pleistocene' times

Formation of deserts	Dried-up rivers/lakes/seas	Changed natural drainage/lake levels	Disappearance of land-bridges/land-masses	Raised beaches	Coastal warping	Marine displacements	Vulcanism	Fissures and fractures	Stratal inversion	Overthrusting of older over younger strata	Crustal tilting	Crustal shortening	Lateral crustal displacement	Orogeny and faulting	Sea-floor collapse	Land subsidence	Elevation
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	ASIA
■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	IRAN
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Altai Mountains
☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Tibetan Plateau
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Tien Shan
■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Gobi Basin
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Pamirs
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Hindu Kush
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Karakoram
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Kailas Mountains
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Kuenlun Mountains
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Alai Mountains
☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Himalayas
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Pir Panjal
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	Assam Valley
☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Nanga-Parbat
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Naga, Patkai
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Bombay
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Arakan coast
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Palk Strait
☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	BURMA
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	THAILAND
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	MALAYA
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	LAOS
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	VIETNAM
☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	Kamchatka Peninsula
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Bayan Kara Shan
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Minya Konka
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Yunnan Province
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Great Khingan Shan
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Sikhote-Alin Mountains
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Sea of Japan
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Yellow Sea
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Hainan Islands
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	JAPAN
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Sea of Okhotsk
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	Kuril Islands
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	PACIFIC OCEAN
☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Mindanao Islands
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	PHILIPPINES
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Asian coastline
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	MARIANAS
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Hawaii
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	General

Table 1C (Continued)

Formation of deserts	Dried-up rivers/lakes/seas	Changed natural drainage/lake levels	Disappearance of land-bridges/land-masses	Raised beaches	Coastal warping	Marine displacements	Vulcanism	Fissures and fractures	Stratal inversion	Overthrusting of older over younger strata	Crustal tilting	Crustal shortening	Lateral crustal displacement	Orogeny and faulting	Sea-floor collapse	Land subsidence	Elevation
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	THE AMERICAS
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	Rocky Mountains
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Coast Ranges
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Cascade Mountains
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Sierra Nevada
■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Colorado
■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Salt Lake valley
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Grand Canyon
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	St Lawrence valley
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	East Coast
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Bermuda
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	Florida
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Gulf of Mexico
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	EL SALVADOR
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	HONDURAS
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	NICARAGUA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	GUATEMALA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	COSTA RICA
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	■	■	Caribbean area
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	Venezuelan Basin
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	Andes
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	COLOMBIA
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	EQUADOR
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	PERU
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Lake Titicaca
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	BOLIVIA
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	CHILE
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	ARGENTINA
☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	GUYANA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	AFRICA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	West Coast
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Anti-Atlas Mountains
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Atlas Mountains
■	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Sahara
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Aïr
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Hoggar
☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Lake Chad
☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	ETHIOPIA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	SOMALIA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Great Rift Valley
☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Lake Albert
☐	■	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	KENYA
☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Lake Victoria
☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	TANZANIA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	SOUTH AFRICA
■	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Namibian Desert
■	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Kalahari Desert
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	AUSTRALASIA & OCEANIA
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Indian Ocean
☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	■	INDONESIA
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	NEW HEBRIDES
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Adelaide - South Australia
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Blue Mountains (NSW)
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	Eastern Highlands
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	New South Wales
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	York Peninsula
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Torres Strait
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	Bass Strait
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	NEW ZEALAND
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	South Antarctic Peninsula

REFERENCES

1. Grafton, A T. 1975. "Joseph Scaliger and Historical Chronology: the Rise and Fall of a Discipline", History and Theory; vol xiv, pp156–185.
2. Pfeiffer, R. 1976. History of Classical Scholarship from 1300 to 1850 (Oxford), ix + 214pp.
3. North, J D. 1977. "Chronology and the Age of the World", pp307–333 in W Yourgrau and A D Breck (eds), Cosmology, History and Theology (New York) xvi + 416pp.
4. Vossius, I. 1659. Dissertatio de Vera Aetate Mundi (The Hague), 2 + iii-iv + 1pp.
5. Allen, D C. 1963. The Legend of Noah (Urbana, IL), vi + 221pp; see especially chap 3.
6. Rupke, N A. 1983. The Great Chain of History – William Buckland and the English School of Geology (1814–1849), (Oxford), xii + 322pp.

   Collier, K B. 1968. Cosmologies of our Fathers: some theories of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries (New York), 500pp.
7. Finegan, J. 1964. Handbook of Biblical Chronology: principles of time reckoning in the ancient world and problems of chronology in the Bible (Princeton), xxvi + 338pp.
8. Dean, D. 1981. "The Age of the Earth Controversy: Beginnings to Hutton", Ann Sci, vol 31, pp435–456.
9. McGinn, B. 1979. Visions of the End: Apocalyptic tradition in the Middle Ages (New York), 232pp; see pp1-11.

   Patrides, A D. 1963. "Renaissance Estimates of the Year of Creation", Huntington Library Quarterly, vol 26, pp315–322; see pp320–322.
10. Ussher, J. 1650–1654. Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti, a Prima Mundi Origine Deducti (London), lxviii + 124pp.
11. Finegan, J. 1964. Op cit.
12. Bayle, P. 1695–1697. Dictionnaire historique et critique, 2 vols. (Rotterdam).
13. Harvey, J. 1588. Discoursive problems concerning prophecies (London), 4 + 133pp; see p34.
14. Bacon, R. 1433. Opus Majus, 2 vols. (Oxford), tr R B Burke; vol 1, pp209–210.
15. Newton, I. 1728. The Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms Amended (London), xiv + 276pp.

    Kennedy, J. 1751. New Method of Stating and Explaining the Scripture Chronology, upon Mosaic Astronomical Principles, Mediums, and Data, as Laid Down in the Pentateuch (London), 431pp.
16. Whiston, W. 1696. A New Theory of the Earth (London), 2 + 95 + 388pp.
17. Edwards, W N. 1967. "The Early History of Palaeontology", British Museum (Natural History), Special Guide no:8, viii + 58pp.

    Rudwick, M J S. 1976. The Meaning of Fossils, 2nd edn. (London) & New York), 287pp.
18. Raven, C E. 1950. John Ray, Naturalist (Cambridge), xix + 506pp; see p425.

    Gunther, R W T (ed). 1928. Further Correspondence of John Ray (London) 336pp. see p260.
19. McKerrow, R B (ed). 1966. "Pierce Penilesse" (1592) in T Nashe's Works, 5 vols. (Oxford); vol 1, p172.
20. Edwards, W N. 1967. Op cit, p21.
21. de La Peyere, I. 1655. Preadamitae (Amsterdam), 4 + 128pp.
22. Hampson, N. 1968. A Cultural History of the Enlightenment (New York), 304pp; see p90.
23. Diderot, D. 1749. Lettre sur les Aveugles (London), 220pp.
24. Buffon, G L de. 1749. Histoire Naturelle, 44 vols (Paris); see vol 1.
25. Maillet, B de. 1748. Telliamed (Amsterdam), 2 vols. NB: The first English edition of this work was published in London in 1750.
26. Coltman, D. 1966. Diderot's Selected Writings, tr D Coltman (New York & London); see p197.
27. Howell, J. 1753. Familiar Letters on Important Subjects, 10th edn (Aberdeen), iv + 480pp; see p346.
28. Edwards, W N. 1967. Op cit, p1.
29. Torrens, H S. 1985. "Early Collecting in the Field of Geology", see pp204–213 in Impey, O, and A Macgregor (eds) The Origins of Museums: The Cabinet of Curiosities in sixteenth and seventeenth century Europe (Oxford), 300pp.
30. King, R. 1986. "The Oldest Profession?", Geological Curator, vol 4, no:6; see p356.
31. Hooke, R. 1688. "A Discourse of Earthquakes" in Posthumous Works, edited by R Waller, (London: 1705), 4 + xxviii + 572pp; see p411.
32. Dereham, W (ed). 1718. Philosophical Letters between the late learned Mr Ray and several of his ingenious correspondents (London), xii + 290pp; see p256.
33. Halley, E. 1715. "A short account of the causes of the saltness of the ocean, and of the several lakes that emit no rivers, with a proposal, by help thereof, to discover the age of the World", Phil Trans Roy Soc Lond, vol 29, pp296–300.
34. Rappaport, R. 1973. "Lavoisier's Theory of the Earth", Brit Jl Hist Sci, vol 6, pp247–260; see p258.
35. Saussure, H B de. 1796. Voyage dans les Alpes, 8 vols. (Neuchâtel); see vol 3, pp910 (chap xiv, p625).
36. Oldroyd, D R. 1979. "Historicism and the rise of Historical Geology – Part I", Hist Sci, vol 17, pp191-123.
37. Davies, G L. 1969. Earth in Decay (London), xvi + 390pp; see pp110–126.

    Glass, B, O Temkin and W L Strauss Jr (eds). 1959. Forerunners of Darwin: 1745–1859 (Baltimore); see pp238–240.
38. Toulmin, G H. 1785. The Eternity of the World (London), 133pp; see pp3,110.
39. Geikie, A. 1962. The Founders of Geology, 2nd edn, repr (New York), 486pp; see chap 4.
40. Hutton, J. 1785. "Theory of the Earth: or an investigation of the laws observable in the composition, dissolution and restoration of land upon the globe", Trans Roy Soc Edin, vol 1 (1788), pp209–304.

41. Smith, W. 1816. Strata Identified by Organised Fossils (London), 32pp.
42. Howorth, H H. 1887. The Mammoth and the Flood (London), xxxii + 464pp; see pp82–83.
43. Albritton, C C. 1980. The Abyss of Time: Changing Conceptions of the Earth's Antiquity after the Sixteenth Century (San Francisco), 251pp.
44. Townsend, J. 1813. The Character of Moses established for Veracity as an Historian, Recording events from the Creation to the Deluge, (Bath) 2 vols.

    Ure, A. 1829. A New System of Geology, in which the Great Revolutions of the Earth and Animated Nature are Reconciled at once to Modern Science and Sacred History (London), lv + 621pp.

    Hales, W. 1830. A New Analysis of Chronology and Geography, History and Prophecy; in which their Elements are attempted to be explained, harmonised and vindicated, upon Scriptural and Scientific Principles; tending to remove the Imperfection and Discordance of Preceding Systems, and to Obviate the Cavils of Sceptics, Jews and Infidels, 4 vols, 2nd edn (London).
45. Embleton, C and C A M King. 1975. Glacial Geomorphology, 2nd edn (London), vi + 573pp; see p320.
46. Taylor, F B. 1910. "Richmond and Great Barrington Bowlder Trains", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 21, pp747–752; see p749.
47. Benton, E R. 1878. "The Richmond Bowlder Trains", Bull Mus Comp Zool, Harvard, p25.
48. Taylor, F B. 1910. Op cit, p748.
49. Knetchel, M M. 1942. "Snake Butte Boulder Train and related glacial phenomena, north-central Montana", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 53, no:6, pp917–936.
50. Branner, J C. 1913. "The Fluting and Pittings of Granites in the Tropics", Proc Amer Philos Soc, vol lii, pp163–174; see plate IIa.
51. Sauramo, M. 1929. "The Quaternary Geology of Finland", Bull Comm Geol Finland, no:86.
52. Agassiz, L. 1840. Études sur les Glaciers (Neuchâtel), 346pp.
53. Murray, A S. 1893. Manual of Mythology (New York), xl + 368pp; see p44.
54. Alexander, H B. 1916: in L H Gray (ed). The Mythology of All Races, 13 vols. Archaeol Inst Amer (Boston); see vol xi, p91.
55. Alexander, H B. 1916. Loc cit, p24d.
56. Gray, L H (ed). 1916. Op cit, vol x, p221.
57. Alexander, H B. 1916. Loc cit, p311.
58. Gray, L H (ed). 1916. Op cit, vol ix, p178.
59. Gray, L H (ed). 1916. Op cit, vol iv, p369.
60. Donnelly, I. 1883. Atlantis: The Antediluvian World, new enlarged edition (1949), ed E Sykes (London & New York), xix + 355pp; see p78.
61. Colson, F H (tr). 1941. Philo: 'On the Eternity of the World', (London & New York), 10 vols. (1929–1962); see sect 8.
62. Murray, H, J Crawfurd, et al. 1836. An Historical and Descriptive Account of China (Edinburgh & London), 2nd edn; see vol 1, p40.
63. Dixon, R B. 1916. Oceanic Mythology (Boston), xv + 364pp; see p15.
64. Moor, E. 1810. The Hindu Pantheon (London), xiv + 466pp; see p102.
65. Bellows, H A (tr). 1923. The Prose Edda: Voluspa (London); see second stanza.
66. Colson, F H (tr). 1941. Philo: 'Moses' (London & New York); see vol 2, x, p53.
67. Warren, H C. 1896. Buddhism in Translation (Harvard Univ Press), xx + 520pp; see p322.
68. Brasseur, de Bourbourg. 1857–1859. Histoire des nations civilisées du Mexique (Paris); see vol 1, p206.
69. Miller, F J (tr). 1916. Ovid: 'Metamorphoses' (London & New York); see Book 1, P113.
70. Lenormant, F. 1891. Beginnings of History (New York), tr by F Brown from the 2nd French edn, xxx + 588pp.
71. Curtius, E R. 1953. European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages.
72. Frye, M. 1983. The Great Code (Toronto), xxiii + 261pp; see p72.
73. Maspero, G C C. 1895–1899. Histoire Ancienne des Peuples de l'Orient classique, 3 vols. (Paris); see vol 1, p38.
74. Lenormant, F. 1891. Op cit, p531.
75. Mallet, P H. 1902. Northern Antiquities, new & enlarged edn (London), 578pp; see p406.
76. Castrén, M A. 1953. Nordische Reisen und Forschungen, 3 vols. (St Petersburg); see vol 1 – "Finnische Mythologie", xii + 340pp, tr by A Schiefner; see pp32–33.
77. Lenormant, F. 1881. "Ararat and Eden: a Biblical Study (Part 1)", Contemp Rev, vol 40 (Sept 1881), pp453–478; see p460.
78. Baldwin, J D. 1896. Prehistoric Nations (New York), vii + 414pp; see p283.
79. Anonymous. 1959. Larousse Encyclopaedia of Mythology (London), viii + 500pp. see p394.
80. Douglas, R K. 1879. Confucianism and Taoism (London), 287pp; see p278.

    Legge, J (ed). 1876. The Chinese Classics, 4 vols. (Hong Kong); see vol iii, pt 1, footnote on p34.
81. Anonymous. 1823–1851. The Chinese Repository, 21 vols. (Canton); see vol 4, p194.

    Warren, W F. 1898. Paradise Found: The Cradle of the Human Race at the North Pole, 10th edn, (Boston), xxiv + 505pp; see p181.
82. Reed, E J. 1880. Japan: Its History, Traditions and Religions, 2 vols, 2nd edn. (London); see vol 1, p27.
83. Jowett, B (tr). 1919. The Dialogues of Plato (Oxford), 24B, 25B-D.
84. Darmestetter, J (tr). 1883. Zend-Avesta: The Vendidad, 3 vols. (Oxford); see vol 1, Fargard, p8.
85. Pietremont, C A. 1879. Les Aryans et leur Première Patrie (Paris), 53pp; see p15.
86. Lactantius, P. 1742. Auctores Mythographi latini (Amsterdam), 962pp.

87. Rafinesque, C S. 1836. The American Nations, 2 vols. (Philadelphia); see song iii.
88. Jacolliet, L. 1887. The Bible in India (New York), vi + 325pp; see p198.
89. Matthews, V. 1883. "Navajo Mythology", Amer Antiq Orient Jl (Chicago), vol 5, pp207–224; see p209.
90. Klee, F A G. 1847. Le Déluge (Paris), 336pp; see p307.
91. Laertius, D. Works, ii, 9 (cited by W F Warren. 1898. Op cit, pp191–192).
92. Warren, W F. 1898. Op cit; see footnote on p192.
93. Proctor, R A. 1870. Light Science for Leisure Hours (London), viii + 316pp; see pp309–312.
94. Whyte, C. 1928. The Constellations and Their History (London), 284pp; see p217.
95. Lockyer, N. 1894. The Dawn of Astronomy (London), xvi + 432pp; see p152.
96. Gallant, R L C. 1964. The Bombarded Earth (London), 256pp; see p147.
97. Wainright, G A. 1932. "Leptopolis", Jl Egypt Archaeol, vol xviii, pp159–172; see p164.
    Wainright, G A. 1936. "Orion and the Great Star", Jl Egypt Archaeol, vol xxii, pp45–46; see p46.
98. Jeans, J. 1945. The Stars in Their Courses (Cambridge), xi + 188pp; see p17.
99. Noel, M, and D H Tarling. 1975. "The Laschamp Geomagnetic Event", Nature, vol 253, pp705–706; see fig 2 on p705.
    Noorbergen, R. 1978. Secrets of the Lost Races (London), x + 228pp; see pp20–21.
100. Lehmann, S J, and L D Keigwin. 1992. "Sudden Change in North Atlantic circulation during the last glaciation", Nature, vol 356, pp757–762; see p757.
101. Fairbanks, R G. 1993. "Climatic Change: Flip-Flop end to last Ice Age", Nature, vol 362, p495.
102. Dansgaard, W, S Johnsen, and J C White. 1989. "The Abrupt Termination of the Younger Dryas Climate Event", Nature, vol 339, pp532–534; see pp532–3.
103. Alley, R B, D A Meese, et al. 1993. "Abrupt increase in Greenland snow accumulation at the end of the Younger Dryas Event", Nature, vol 362, pp527–529.
104. Wright, H E. 1989. "The amphi-Atlantic distribution of the Younger Dryas palaeoclimatic oscillation", Quat Sci Rev, vol 8, pp295–306.
105. Waythomas, C F, and D S Kaufman. 1991. "Comment on 'Latest Pleistocene Increase in Wind Intensity recorded from Eolian Sediments from Central Alaska' by N Bigelow, J E Begét, and W R Powers", Quat Res, vol 36, no:3, pp329–333; see p329.
106. Kolstrup, E. 1990. "The puzzle of Weichselian vegetation types poor in trees", Geol Mijnbouw, vol 69, pp253–262.
107. Ager, T E. 1975. "Late Quaternary Environmental History of the Tenana Valley, Alaska", Rep Inst Polar Studies (Columbus), no:54.
     Anderson, P M. 1988. "Late Quaternary Pollen Records from the Kobuk and Noatak Drainages, Northwestern Alaska", Quat Res, vol 29, pp263–276.
108. Van Campo, E, and F Gasse. 1993. "Pollen and Diatom-Inferred Climatic and Hydrological changes in Sumxi Co Basin (Western Tibet) since 13,000 yr BP." Quat Res, vol 39, no:3, pp300–313.
109. Jarvis, D I. 1993. "Pollen Evidence of Changing Holocene Monsoon climate in Sichuan Province, China", Quat Res, vol 39, no:3, pp325–337.
110. Lyell, C. 1831–1833. The Principles of Geology: Being an attempt to explain the Former Changes of the Earth's Surface, by reference to causes now in Operation, 3 vols, (London).
111. Whiston, W. 1696. Op cit.
112. Donnelly, I. 1895. Ragnarok: The Age of Fire and Gravel 13th edn. (New York), vi + 452pp.
113. Beaumont, C. 1932. The Mysterious Comet (London), 288pp.
114. Patten, D W. 1966. The Biblical Flood and the Ice Epoch: a Study in Scientific History (Seattle), xvi + 336pp.
115. Hwang, L S, and A C Lin. "Experimental Investigations of wave run-up under the influence of local geometry", Proc Internat Symp on Tsunamis and Tsunami Res, (Honolulu: 1970), pp406–425.
116. Verbeek, R D M. 1886. Krakatau (Batavia).
117. Frazer, J G. 1919. "The Great Flood", pp104–361 in Folklore in the Old Testament, 3 vols. (London); see vol 1, chap 4.
     Suryakanta, S. 1950. The Flood Legend in Sanskrit Literature (Delhi), 4 + viii + 149pp.
118. Pallas, P S. 1788–1793. Voyages en Différentes Provinces de l'Empire de Russie, et dans l'Asie Septentrionale, 5 vols. (Paris).
119. Cuvier, G. 1834. Recherches sur les Ossemans Fossiles des Quadrupèds, 4th edn, 10 vols. (Paris).
120. Erman, G A. 1848. Travels in Siberia, 2 vols. (London); see vol ii, pp379–380.
121. D'Archiac, E J A. 1865. Paléontologie Stratigraphique. Leçons sur la faune quaternaire (Paris), 292pp.
122. Venetz, I. 1859. Mémoir sur les variations de la Température dans les Alps de la Suisse (Berne), published posthumously; 38pp.
123. Agassiz, L. 1840. Op cit.
124. Dansgaard, W, S J Johnsen, and J C White. 1989. Loc cit.
     Lehmann, S J and L D Keigwin. 1992. Loc cit.
     Johnsen, S J, H B Clausen, et al. 1992. "Irregular glacial interstadials recorded in a new Greenland ice core", Nature, vol 359, pp311–313; see p313.
     Fairbanks, R G. 1993. Op cit; see p495.
125. Willis, B. 1907. Research in China, 2 vols, Carnegie Inst (Washington) Publ.
126. Lee, J S. 1939. The Geology of China (London)~ xv + 528pp; see p207.
127. Berkey, C P, and F K Morris. 1927. "Geology of Mongolia: A Reconnaissance Report based on the Investigations of the Years 1922–3; Central Asiatic Expeditions", Amer Mus Nat Hist (New York), xxxi + 475pp; see p35.

128. Berkey, C P, and F K Morris. 1927. Op cit, p27.
129. Lee, J S. 1939. Op cit p201.
130. Lee, J S. 1939. Ibid.
131. Lee, J S. 1939. Op cit. pp396–397.
132. Embleton, C, and C A M King. 1975. Op cit, p30.
133. Lee, J S. 1939. Op cit, pp206–207.
134. Flint, R F. 1947. Glacial Geology and the Pleistocene Epoch (New York), xviii + 598pp; see p523.
135. Flint, R F. 1947. Op cit, p10.
136. Flint, R F. 1947. Ibid.
137. Wadia, D M. 1938. "The Structure of the Himalayas and of the North India Foreland", Presidential Address, 25th Indian Sci Congr (Calcutta), geol sect, p26.
138. Heim, A and A Gansser. 1939. The Throne of the Gods: an Account of the First Expedition to the Himalayas (New York), xxv + 233pp; see p218.
139. Krishnan, M S. 1949. Geology of India and Burma (Madras), 544pp; see p511.
140. Wadia, D N. 1953. Geology of India (London), xx + 531pp; see pp22–23.
141. Finsterwalder, R. 1936. "Die Formen der Nanga Parbat-Gruppe", Zeit Ges Erdk Berlin, pp321f.
142. Wadia, D N. 1953. Op cit, p405.
143. Krishnan, M S. 1949. Op cit.
144. Scrivenor, J B. 1931. The Geology of Malaya (London), xx + 217pp; see pp119–120.
145. Umbgrove, J H F. 1947. The Pulse of the Earth, 2nd edn. (The Hague), xxii + 358pp; see p235.
146. Smith, W D. 1924. Geology and Mineral Resources of the Philippine Islands (Manila), 559pp; see pp89–90, 92, 467.
147. Brouwer, H A. 1925. The Geology of the Netherlands East Indies (New York), xii + 160pp; see p40.

     Brouwer, H A. 1947. Geological Explorations in the Islands of Celebes: Summary of the Results (Amsterdam), 346pp; see pp17,49.
148. Tennison-Woods, J E. 1862. Geological Observations in South Australia, principally in the southeast of Adelaide (London), xviii + 404pp; see p208.

     Brown, D A, K S W Campbell, and K A W Cook. 1968. The Geological Evolution of Australia and New Zealand (Oxford), x + 409pp; see p348.
149. Trümpy, R. 1980. Geology of Switzerland: A Guide Book, Part 4: An Outline of the Geology of Switzerland (Basel), 104pp; see p93.
150. Daly, R A. 1926. Our Mobile Earth (London & New York), xxii + 342pp; see pp232–42.
151. Trümpy, R. 1980. Loc cit.
152. Rutten, M G. 1969. The Geology of Western Europe (Amsterdam), xviii + 520pp; see p211.
153. Rutten, M G. 1969. Op cit, pp382–388.
154. Rutten, M G. 1969. Op cit, p177.
155. Lubbock, J. 1896. The Scenery of Switzerland and the causes to which it is due (London), xxxv + 480pp; see pp291–292,369.
156. Heer, O. 1875, The Primaeval World of Switzerland, 2 vols, tr W S Dallas and edited by J Heywood (London); see vol 2, p224.
157. Forrest, H E. 1935. The Atlantean Continent: Its Bearing on the Great Ice Age and the Distribution of Species, 2nd edn. (London), 352pp; see p234.
158. Gentil, L. 1914. "La Géologie du Maroc", Congr Géol Internat, session xii, p703.

     McMaster, R L, and T B La Chance. 1968. "Seismic Reflectivity Studies on northwestern African continental shelf: Strait of Gibraltar to Mauritania", Amer Assoc Petrol Geol, vol 52, pp2387–2395.
159. Furon, R. 1963. Geology of Africa (Edinburgh), xii + 377pp; see p72.
160. Baker B H, P Mohr & M A J Williams. 1972. "Geology of the Eastern Rift System of Africa", Geol Soc Amer Spec Paper, 136.

     Dixey, F. 1956. "The East African Rift System", Overseas Geol Surv Min Resour Divn, (London), suppl 1, 77pp.

     McConnell, R B. 1972. "Geological Development of the Rift System of Eastern Africa", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 83, pp2549–2572.
161. Daly, R A. 1926. Op cit, p231.
162. Daly, R A. 1926. Op cit, pp228–229.
163. Price, G M. 1946. Commonsense Geology (Mountain View), 239pp; see p120.
164. Forest, H E. 1935. Ibid.
165. Putnam, W C. 1964. Geology (New York), xii + 480pp; see p117.
166. Putnam, W C. 1964. Ibid.

     Weaver, C E. 1949. "Geology of the Coast Ranges north of San Francisco Bay", Mem Geol Surv Amer, vol 35, pp1–242; see p166.
167. Fenneman, N M. 1931. The Physiography of the Western United States (New York).
168. Zeil, W. 1979. The Andes: A Geological Review (Berlin), viii + 260pp; see p173.
169. Fairbridge, R (ed). 1975. "The Encyclopaedia of World Regional Geology, Part I: Western Hemisphere (including Antarctica and Australia", vol vii in Encyclopaedia of Earth Sciences (Stroudsburg), xv + 704pp; see pp266, 464.
170. Bucher, W H. 1933. The Deformation of the Earth's Crust (Princeton), xiii + 518pp; see p144.
171. Poldervaart, A. 1955. "Symposium on the Crust of the Earth", Geol Soc Amer Spec Paper 62; see p319.
172. Umbgrove, J H F. 1947. Op cit.
173. Geikie, J. 1877. The Great Ice Age 2nd edn. (London), xxvii + 624pp; see p73.
174. Ewing, M, J I Ewing, and M Talwani. 1964. "Sediment Distribution in the Oceans: the Mid-Atlantic Ridge", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 75, no:1, pp17–34.
175. Ewing, M. 1949. "New Discoveries on the Mid-Atlantic Ridge", Nat Geogr Mag, vol xcvi (Nov), pp611–640; see p613.
176. Ewing, M. 1949. Op cit, pp614, 616.

177. Ewing, M. 1949. Op cit, p618.
178. Ewing, M. 1949. Ibid.
179. Ewing, M. 1949. Ibid.
180. Anonymous. 1877. "Glimpses of Atlantis", Scient Amer, vol xxxvii, no:4, pp48–49.
181. Termier, P. 1922. A la Gloire de la Terre: Souvenirs d'un Géologie (Paris), 425pp; see p132.
182. Brooks, C E P. 1949. Climate Through the Ages (New York), 395pp; see pp247–251.
Termier, P. 1913. "Atlantis", Bull Inst Oceanogr (Monaco), no:256, pp219f.
Termier, P. 1916. "Atlantis", Rep Smithsonian Inst. (Washington), pp219–234.
183. Umbgrove, J H F. 1947. Op cit, pp35–38.
184. Brewster, E T. 1928. This Puzzling Planet (New York), 328pp; see pp134–135.
185. Scharff, R F. 1902. "Some Remarks on the Atlantis Problem", Proc Roy Irish Acad (Dublin), sect B, vol xxiv, pp268–302.
186. Scharff, R F. 1907. European Animals (London), xiv + 258pp; see p126.
187. Forrest, H E. 1935. Op cit; see p234.
188. Laine, E P. 1980. "New Evidence from beneath the western North Atlantic for the depth of Glacial Erosion in Greenland and North America", Quat Res, vol 14, pp188–198.
189. Forrest, H E. 1935. Op cit; see pp190–192.
190. Wallace, A R. 1876. The Geographical Distribution of Animals; with a study of the relationships of living and extinct faunas as elucidating the past changes of the Earth's surface, 2 vols. (London); see vol 1, pp328–329.
191. Carson, R L. 1951. The Sea Around Us (London), iii + 230pp; see p64.
192. Blanford, H F. 1875. "On the Age and Correlations of the Plant-bearing series of India and the former existence of an Indo-Oceanic Continent" Q Jl Geol Soc Lond, vol 31, pp534–540.
Sewell, R B. 1935. "Geographic and Oceanographic Research in Indian Waters", Mem Asiatic Soc Bengal, vol ix, pp1–7.
193. Wadia, D N. 1953. Op cit, p37.
194. Scharff, R F. 1899. The History of the European Fauna (London), vii + 364pp; see p20.
195. Smith, S P. 1910. Hawaiki: The Original Home of the Maori, 3rd edn (Christchurch, NZ), 301pp; see p58.
196. Hitchcock, C H. 1901. "New Zealand in the Ice Age", Amer Geol, vol xxvii, pp271–281.
Suggate, R P. 1963. "The Alpine Fault", Trans Roy Soc New Zeal, geol sect, vol 2, pp105–129.
197. Tayler, J W. 1870. "On the Making of Fiords", Jl Roy Geogr Soc Lond, vol xl, pp228–230.
198. Gregory, J W. 1927. "The Fiords of the Hebrides", Geogr Jl, vol 69, pp193–216.
199. Gregory, J W. 1913. The Nature and Origin of Fiords, (London), xvi + 542pp.
Peteressen, K. 1885. "How the Norway Fiords were Made", Nature (London), vol xxxii, pp177–180.
200. Tayler, J W. 1870. Ibid.
201. Sokolov, V N. 1977. Stratigraphy of Spitzbergen (Boston Spa), iv + 298pp; see p273.
202. Ewing, M, et al. 1957. Columbia Research News, March (1957) issue.
203. Hobbs, W H. 1905. "The Correlation of Fracture Systems and the Evidence for Planetary Dislocations within the Earth's Crust", Trans Wiscon Acad Sci Arts Lett, vol xv (August), pp15–29; see p15.
Hobbs, W H. 1911. "Repeating Patterns in the Relief and Structure of the Land", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 22, pp123–176; see p163.
204. Umbgrove, J H F. 1947. Op cit, p307.
Vening Meinesz, F A. 1943. "Spanningen in de aardrost tengevolge van poolverschuivingen", Ned Akad Wet Versl, vol lii, no:5.
Vening Meinesz, F A. 1947. "Shear Patterns of the Earth's Crust", Trans Amer Geophys Union, vol 28, no:1, p161.
205. Anonymous. 1937. "Submarine Canyons", Geogr Rev, vol 27, pp681–683.
Hess, H H, and P MacClintock. 1936. "Submerged Valleys on Continental Slopes and Changes of Sea Level", Science, vol 83, n s, pp332–334.
206. Oldham, R D. 1917. "The Structure of the Gangetic Plain", Mem Geol Surv India, vol xlii, pt 2.
207. Glennie, E A. 1932. "Gravity Anomalies and Structure of the Earth's Crust", Prof Papers Geol Surv India, no:27.
208. Wadia, D N. 1938. Op cit, p26.
209. Geikie, J. 1877. Op cit.
210. Dawkins, W B. 1880. Early Man in Britain and his place in the Tertiary Period (London), xxiii + 537pp.
211. Croll, J. 1893. Climate and Time in their Geological Relations; a theory of secular changes of the Earth's climate (New York), xvii + 577pp.
212. Penck, A. 1889. Theorica über des Gleichgewicht der Erdkruste (Vienna), 26pp; and 1909: Die Alpen im eiszeitalter, 3 vols (Leipzig); see vol 3.
213. Pfizenmayer, E W. 1939. Siberian Man and the Mammoth, (London), xii + 356 (tr M D Simpson); see map and table of discoveries.
214. Anonymous. 1895. "Baron von Toll's Expedition to Arctic Siberia", Geogr Jl, vol v, pp373–376.
215. Erman, G A. 1848. Travels in Siberia, 2 vols. (London); see vol 2, pp379–380.
216. Hibben, F C. 1943. "Evidence of Early Man in Alaska", Amer Antiq, vol 8, pp254–259; see p256.
Hibben, F C. 1946. The Lost Americans (New York), xi + 196pp; see pp90–92.
Guthrie, R D. 1990. Frozen Fauna of the Mammoth Steppe: the Story of Blue Babe (Univ Chicago Press).
217. Bird, J B. 1966. The Physiography of Arctic Canada (Johns Hopkins Univ Press), xix + 336pp; see p11.
218. Stefansson, V. 1942. Greenland (New York), viii + 338pp; see p4.
219. Griggs, R F. 1942. "Indications as to climate changes from the timberline of Mount Washington", Science, vol 95, no:2473, p519.

220. Bird, J B. 1966. Op cit, p11.
    Mangerud, J, M Bolstad, et al. 1992. "The Last Glacial Maximum on Spitzbergen, Svalbard", Quat Res, vol 38, p131.
221. Bird, J B. 1966. Op cit, p135.
222. Greig, D C. 1971. The South of Scotland (Edinburgh), 114pp; see p98.
223. Shotton, F W (ed). 1977. British Quaternary Studies (Oxford), xii + 298pp; see p240.
224. Denton, G H, and T G Hughes (eds). 1981. The Last Great Ice Sheets (New York), 464pp; see p265.
225. Shotton, F W (ed). 1977. Op cit, pp188–202.
226. Shotton, F W (ed). 1977. Op cit, see p265.
227. Williams, W M. 1887. "The Great Ice Age and the Origin of Till", Q Jl Lit Sci Arts Lond, vol 7, pp214–237.
228. O'Dell, A C. 1957. The Scandinavian World (London), xvi + 549pp; see p308.
229. Harmer, F W. 1907. "The Glacial Deposits of the East of England", Rep Brit Assoc Adv Sci, (York: 1906), pp570–572; see p571.
230. Harmer, F W. 1907. Ibid.
231. Shotton, F W (ed). 1977. Ibid.
232. Howorth, H H. 1893. The Glacial Nightmare and the Flood, 2 vols. (London); see vol 2, p79.
233. Denton, G H, and T G Hughes (eds). 1981. Ibid.
234. Rose, J, and P Allen. 1977. "Middle Pleistocene Stratigraphy in southwest Suffolk", Jl Geol Soc Lond, vol 133, pp83–102.
235. Wilson, H E. 1972. Regional Geology of Northern Ireland (Belfast), 95pp; see p82.
236. Flint, R F. 1971. Glacial and Quaternary Geology (New York), xii + 892pp; see p646.
237. Flint, R F. 1971. Op cit, p647.
238. Huntington, E. 1914. "Solar Hypothesis of Climatic Changes", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol xxv, pp477–590; see p574.
239. Sokolov, V N. 1977. Op cit; see pp260–293.
240. Kudras, E R, H Erleekeuser, R Vollbrecht and W Weiss. 1991. "Global Nature of the Younger Dryas cooling event inferred from oxygen isotope data from Sulu Sea cores", Nature, vol 349, pp406–409.
241. Rind, D, D Peteet, W Broecker, A McIntyre, and W Ruddiman. 1986. "Impact of Cold North Atlantic sea-surface temperatures on climate: Implications for the Younger Dryas Cooling (11–10k)", Climate Dynamics, vol 1, pp3–33.
242. Kallel, N, L D Labeyrie, et al, 1988. "Evidence of cooling during the Younger Dryas in the western North Pacific", Oceanologica Acta, vol 11, pp369–375.
243. Wang, L, and P Wang. 1990. "Late Quaternary Palaeoceanography of the South China Sea: Glacial-interglacial contrasts in an enclosed basin", Palaeoceanography, vol 5, pp77–90.
244. Linsley, B K, and R C Thunell. 1990. "The record of deglaciation in the Sulu Sea: Evidence for the Younger Dryas event in the tropical western Pacific", Palaeoceanography, vol 5, pp1025–1039.
245. Zhisheng, A, S C Porter, et al. 1993. "Episode of Strengthened Summer Monsoon Climate of Younger Dryas Age on the Loess Plateau of Central China", Quat Res, vol 39, no:1; see p45.
246. Corliss, B H. 1975. "Late Pleistocene Palaeoclimatology: Planktonic Foraminiferal Analyses of Sediment Cores for the central North Atlantic", Palaeogeogr Palaeoclimat Palaeoecol, vol 18, pp45–61.
247. Emiliani, C. 1966. "Palaeotemperature analysis of Caribbean Cores", Jl Geol, vol 74, pp109–123.
248. Hillaire-Marcel, C. 1976. "La déglaciation et le relèvement isostatique de la baie d'Hudson", Cahiers de Géographie du Quebec, vol 20, pp185–220.
249. Mott, R J, D R Grant, R Stea and S Occhietti. 1986. "Late Glacial Climatic Oscillations in Atlantic Canada equivalent to the Alleröd/Younger Dryas event", Nature, vol 323, pp247–250.
    Mayle, F E, A J Levesque, and L C Cwynar. 1993. "Accelerator-MassSpectrometer Ages for the Younger Dryas Event in Atlantic Canada", Quat Res, vol 39, no:3, pp355–360.
250. Peteet, D M, J S Vogel, et al. 1990. "Younger Dryas climatic reversal in northeastern USA? AMS ages for an old problem", Quat Res, vol 33, pp219–230.
251. Jouzel, J, C Lorius, L Merlivat, and J R Petit. 1987. "Abrupt Climatic Changes: The Antarctic Ice Record during the Late Pleistocene", pp235–245 in Abrupt Climatic Change, ed W H Berger and L D Labeyrie (Dordrecht).
252. Hoganson, J W, and A C Ashworth. 1992. "Fossil Beetle Evidence for Climatic Change 18,000–10,000 Years BP, in South-Central Chile", Quat Res, vol 37, no:1, pp101–116.
253. Heusser, C J. 1987. "Late Quaternary Climates in Chile", pp59–83 in Late Cainozoic Palaeoclimates of the Southern Hemisphere, ed J C Vogel (Rotterdam).
254. Lehmann, S J, and L D Keigwin. 1992. Op cit, p757.
255. Van Campo, E, and F Gasse. 1993. Op cit.
256. Barnowsky, C W, P M Anderson, and P J Bartlein. 1987. "The North-Western US during Deglaciation: Vegetational History and Palaeoclimatic Implications", pp289–321 in The Geology of North America. Vol K-3, North America and Adjacent Oceans during the Last Deglaciation (ed W F Ruddiman and H E Wright, jr).
257. Stamp, L D. 1960. Britain's Structure and Scenery (London), 317pp; see pp111–113.
258. Dana, J D. 1880. Manual of Geology, 3rd edn. (New York), xvi + 911pp; see p537.
259. Forrest, H E. 1935. Op cit; see p99.
260. Wright, G F. 1911. The Ice Age in North America and its bearing upon the Antiquity of Man, 5th edn. (New York), xxi + 763pp; see p634.
261. Forrest, H E. 1935. Op cit, p229.
262. Bryan, K, and C C Albritton, jr. 1942. "Wind-polished rocks in the Trans-Pecos Region, Texas and New Mexico", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 53, pp1403–1416.

Stanger, W. 1852. "On Certain Furrows and Smoothings on the surface of granite caused by Drift Sand, at the Cape of Good Hope", Rep Brit Assoc Adv Sci (Belfast, 1853), p61.

263. Embleton, C, and C A M King. 1975. Op cit, p184.
264. Anderson, T. 1908. "Report on the Eruptions of the Soufrière in St Vincent in 1902, and on a visit to Montagne Pelée in Martinique", Phil Trans Roy Soc Lond, ser A, vol 208, pp275–304; see pp300–301.

Hovey, E O. 1909. "Striations and U-shaped Valleys produced by other than Glacial Action", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 20, pp409–416; see especially fig 2, in pl 38.

265. Nicholson, A C. 1892. "On the High Level Glacial Gravels, Gloppa, Cym-y-bwlch, near Oswestry", Q Jl Geol Soc Lond, vol 48, pp86–95.
266. Murchison, R I. 1845. The Geology of Russia in Europe and the Ural Mountains, 3 vols. (London); see vol 1, p553.
267. Howorth, H H. 1893. Op cit; see vol 2, p891.
268. Charlesworth, J K. 1924. "Glacial Geology of the North-West of Ireland", Proc Roy Irish Acad (Dublin), vol xxxvi, pp182,231.

Du Noyer, G V. 1862. "On the Evidence of Glacial Action over the south of Ireland during the Drift period; and of a subsequent slight elevation followed by a depression of the land to its present level", The Geologist, vol 5, pp241–254; see p246.

269. Howorth, H H. 1905. Ice or Water?, 2 vols. (London); see vol 1, p xlvii.
270. Howorth, H H. 1905. Op cit; see vol 1, pp404–405.
271. Howorth, H H. 1905. Op cit, vol 1, p383.
272. Howorth, H H. 1905. Op cit, vol 1, p xxxviii.
273. Howorth, H H. 1905. Op cit, vol 2, pp344–345.
274. Lorius, C, L Merlivat, J Jouzel and M Pourchet. 1979. "A 30,000 year climatic record from Antarctic Ice", Nature, vol 280, pp644–647.
275. Anonymous. 1896. "Cloudburst tracks and water-gaps in Alabama", Science, vol 3, pp276–277.
276. Eiseley, L C. 1946. "The Fire Drive and the Extinction of the Terminal Pleistocene Fauna", Amer Anthrop, vol xlviii, pp54–59; see p54.
277. Eiseley, L C. 1943. "Archaeological Observations on the Problems of Post-Glacial Extinction", Amer Antiq, vol viii, no:3, pp209–217; see p225.
278. Pilgrim, G E. 1944. "The Lowest Limit of the Pleistocene in Europe and Asia", Geol Mag, vol lxxxi, no:1, p28.
279. Flint, R F. 1947. Op cit; see p523.
280. Bell, R. 1898. "On the occurrence of Mammoth and Mastodon remains around Hudson Bay", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 9, pp369–390; see pp385–386.

Dawson, W, and D P Penhallow. 1889. "On the Pleistocene Flora of Canada", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 1, pp311–334; see p320.

Heawood, E. 1912. Geographical Discoveries in the 17th and 18th Centuries, (Cambridge), xii + 475pp; see p340.

281. Rainey, F. 1940. "Archaeological Investigations in Alaska", Amer Antiq, vol 5, pp299–308.
282. Hibben, F C. 1946. Op cit, pp90–92.
283. Hibben, F C. 1946. Op cit, pp176–177.
284. Hibben, F C. 1943. Op cit, p256.
285. Tyndall, J. 1883. Heat: A Mode of Motion (New York), 591pp; see pp191–192.
286. Menzel, D. 1950. Our Sun (Harvard), 350pp; see p248.
287. Lamb, H H. 1970. "Volcanic Dust in the Atmosphere: with a chronology and assessment of its meteorological significance", Phil Trans Roy Soc Lond, vol 266; pp425–533.
288. Schultz, J R. 1938. "A Late Quaternary Mammal Fauna from the Tar Seeps of McKittrick, California", Contrib Palaeont Carnegie Inst (Washington), no:487, pt iv, pp113–215; see table 3 on pp136–140.
289. Hay, O P. 1927. "The Pleistocene of the Western Region of North America and its Vertebrated Animals", Carnegie Inst (Washington), Publ no:322B, 346pp; see p172.
290. Krumbiegel, G. 1962. "Tertiär und Pleistozän im Geiseltal (Exkursion A5)", pp81–95 in "Exkursionführer das Pleistozän im Sächsisch-thuringischen Raum. Herbsttagung 1962", Gesamtinhaltsverz Wiss Zn Univ Hochsch DDR.
291. Nilsson, H. 1953. Synthetische Artbildung: Grundlinien einer exakten Biologie, 2 vols. (Lund); see Walther & Weigelt.
292. Nilsson, H. 1953. Op cit; see Voigt.
293. Nilsson, H. 1953. Op cit; see Kuhn.
294. Nilsson, H. 1953. Op cit; see Knöck.
295. Nilsson, H. 1953. Op cit; see Weigelt and Noack.
296. Paramuzin, Y P. 1960. "The Zonal Character of the Cold Pole", Soviet Geogr, vol 1; see pp40–42.
297. Austin-Müller, A. 1963. Climatology, 9th edn, (London), ix + 350pp; see pp241–245.
298. Forrest, H E. 1935. Op cit, pp294–295.
299. Scharff, R F. 1899. Op cit, p163.
300. Kropotkin, P. 1900. "Baron von Toll on New Siberia and the Circumpolar Tertiary Flora", Geogr Jl, vol xvi, see pp95–99.
301. Foster, L W. 1873. Pre-Historic Races of the United States of America (Chicago and London), 415pp; see p29.

Markham, C R. 1875. "On the Progress of the Arctic Expedition to the 17th July, and the return voyage of the Valorous", Proc Roy Geogr Soc Lond, vol xx, no:1, pp95–98.

302. Coleman, A P. 1928. "Unsolved Problems of Arctic America", Geogr Soc Amer, Spec Publ. no:7, p83.
303. Hooker, J D. 1881. Presidential Address, Proc Roy Geogr Soc Lond, vol 3, pp601–603.
304. Heer, O. 1867. "On the Miocene Flora of North Greenland", tr by R H Scott, Rep Brit Assoc Adv Sci (Nottingham, 1866); see pp53–55.
305. Lyell, C. 1870. Elements of Geology (London), xvi + 803pp; see p215.
306. Kropotkin, P. 1900. Loc cit; see p97.

307. Nordenskiöld, N A E. 1887. The Geology of Spitzbergen (Stockholm), 55pp.
308. Nordenskiöld, N A E. 1887. Op cit, pp43–47.
309. Nordenskiöld, N A E. 1887. Op cit, p52.
310. O'Dell, A C. 1957. Op cit, p327.
311. Norton, P E P. 1975. "Palaeoecology of the Mollusca of the Tjornes Sequence", Boreas, vol 4, no:2, pp97–111.
312. Denton, G H, and T G Hughes (eds). 1981. Op cit, p35.
313. Richardson, J. 1861. The Polar Regions (Edinburgh), ix + 400pp; see pp290–291.
314. Markham, C R. 1906. "On the next great Arctic Discovery, the Beaufort Sea", Geogr Jl, vol xxvii, no:1, pp1–14.
315. Bird, J B. 1966. Op cit, p135.
316. Damon, R. 1860. The Geology of Weymouth, Portland and the Coast of Dorset (London), xii + 199pp; see p96.
317. Whiteley, D G. 1910. "The Ivory Islands of the Arctic Ocean", Jl Trans Vict Inst Lond, vol xliii, pp35–37.
318. Geikie, J. 1881. Op cit; see 3rd rev edn (London), p517.
319. Fielden, H W. 1878. "Geology of the Coasts of the Arctic Islands", Q Jl Geol Soc Lond, vol 34, pp556–567; see pp565–567.
    Greeley, A W. 1866. "Arctic Expedition with reference to Grinnell Land", Proc Roy Geogr Soc Lond, vol x, no:8, pp156–176; see p162.
320. Howorth, H H. 1893. Op cit, vol 2, p462.
321. Howorth, H H. 1893. Ibid.
322. Pickles, T. 1939. The World (London), xvi + 431pp; see pp142, 144.
323. Holmes, A. 1944. Principles of Physical Geology, (London), xii + 532pp; see p189.
324. Putnam, W C. 1964. Op cit, p112.
325. Ager, D. 1993. The New Catastrophism: The importance of the Rare Event in Geological History (Cambridge), 231pp.
326. Putnam, W C. 1964. Op cit, p349.
327. Whiston, W. 1717. Astronomical Principles of Religion, Natural and Revealed, in Nine Parts – the Cause of the Deluge (London), xxxii + 305pp.

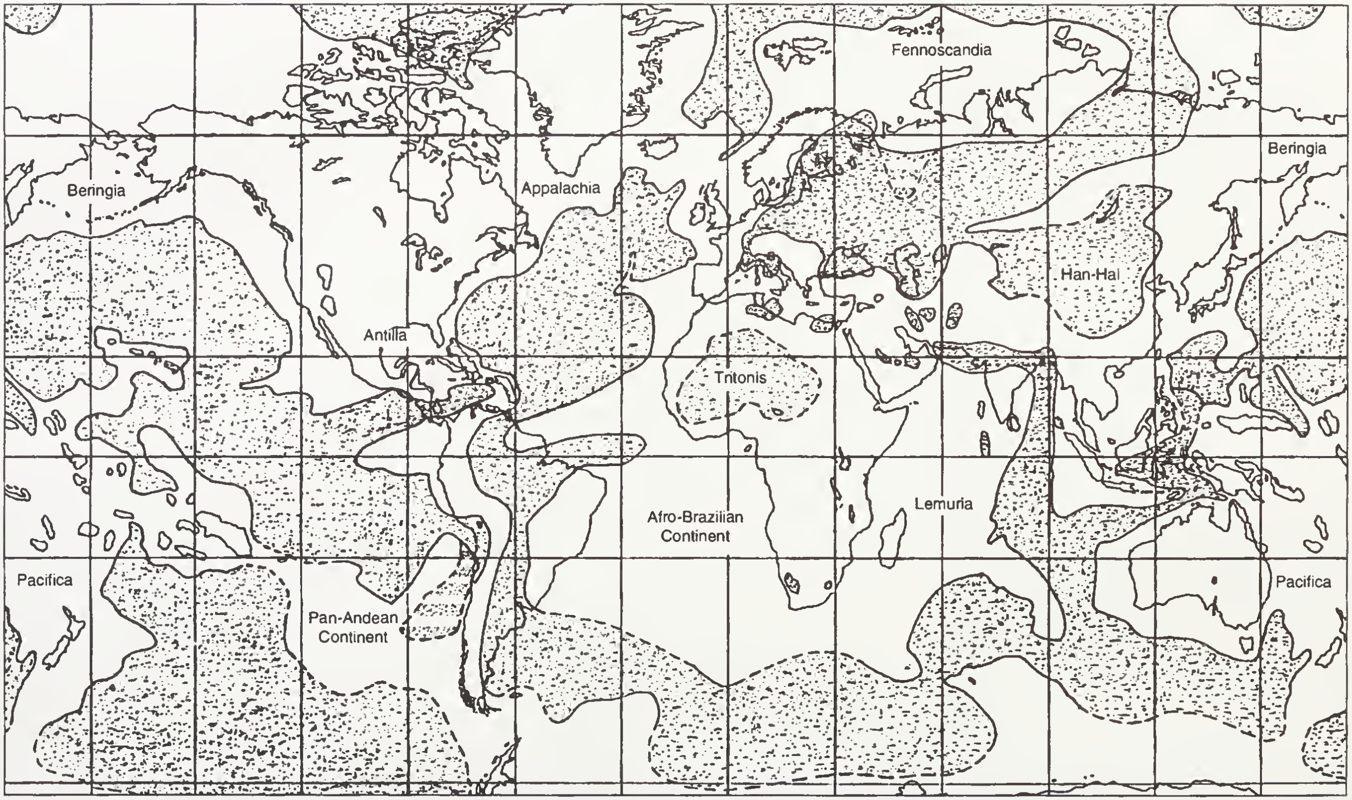
PART TWO

PREMATURE EXTINCTION



Fennoscandia
Beringia
Appalachia
Beringia
Han-Hai
Antilla
Tritonis
Afro-Brazilian Continent
Lemuria
Pacifica
Pan-Andean
Continent
Pacifica

Map 2A. A tentative reconstruction of the pre-catastrophic 'Pleistocene' world.

1

THE TESTIMONY OF BIOLOGY

The enormous geophysical disturbances described in Part One inevitably made dreadful and often fatal inroads into animal and plant life almost everywhere, the evidence collectively afforded by their remains representing a truly astonishing story.

Forming an older but now largely destroyed biological assemblage, the geologically recent date of the demise of animal and plant life is indicated by the scarcely-fossilised condition of its remains. Moreover, the present distribution of various identical or closely-allied living species, sometimes inhabiting widely-sundered land regions no longer physically connected, is seemingly contrary to their natural dissemination. These regions, therefore, must formerly have been either geographically more continuous or environmentally more favourable to the uninterrupted spread of the biota concerned – and geologically recently, at that. Both living and numerous lately-defunct species thus represent opposite sides of the same biological coin. Of these, the living forms are the scattered descendants of biota which survived the terrible disturbances of some 11,500 years ago, whereas the extinct forms represent the annihilated victims of those convulsions.

As noted previously, almost all traditional recollections of a lost primeval northern homeland provide it with a marvelously equable climate and a wonderful diversity of plant and animal life, and agree that it ultimately perished in a sudden disaster of great magnitude. Also, as mentioned before, much palaeobotanical evidence exists in northern latitudes supporting these contentions.

The loss of these northern tracts naturally resulted in new topographical conditions and a highly modified oceanic and meteorological circulation worldwide. The evidence of the fossils, therefore, is not merely an adjunct of this disaster, but eloquent testimony to both pre-catastrophic environmental conditions and the awesome forces responsible for their termination.

These same fossils, moreover, throw much light on the present and sometimes unexpectedly disjointed distribution of innumerable life-forms in all hemispheres. Indeed, failure to recognise a sudden terminating calamity of geologically recent date renders comprehension of how many existing organisms attained their present distribution extremely difficult, if not actually impossible.

Scrutiny of our biological coin, therefore, yields much information germane to our main theme. We begin with some of the evidence concerning still extant plant species from Europe and the general Atlantic region.

2

A LOST EURO-AMERICAN FLORA

In central Europe, lignite beds containing the remains of so-called Pleistocene mammals have been found in the north-eastern Carpathians[1], while at Sprottau in Silesia cones of Pinus sylvestris lie alongside the bones of mammoths[2]. Remains of the same or allied conifers have also been encountered at many places in central and southern Germany. At Leffe, for instance, Pinus occurs with larch, hazelnut, horse-chestnut, waternut, and an extinct tree (Juglans tephrodes) resembling the American black walnut. Remnants of conifers have also been discovered at Imberg in Bavaria; alongside birch and willow in Savoy; and at Erzgebirge in Upper Saxony. In the same region, fragments of the so-called ague-trefoil have been found at Steinbach; birch and Vaccinea uliginosum at Kolbermoor in Bavaria; and those trees in company with willow, hazelnut, white oak, Vibernum, and a large assemblage of other plants, at Lauenburg[3].

Abundant remains of similarly aged plants including birch, willow and Polygonum have also been found at the Swiss localities of Schmerzenbach, Bonstetten, Schönenberg, and Hedingen; while near Lake Zürich, extensive lignite beds representing luxuriant vegetation, and containing the bones of mammoth, hippopotamus, rhinoceros, bear and other contemporary animals[4], underlie and are overlain by 'drift' deposits.

Some of these lignites – known as Schieferkohle or brown coal – are so youthful that wood debris in them is sometimes found unmineralised, as in Styria[5], or uncrushed, as in Bavaria[6].

Numerous central European plants in so-called Ice Age times were thus clearly warm-temperate species hardly differing from those still thriving there today; and they were accompanied by mainly herbivorous animals seemingly adapted to feeding on them, even though the mammoth has long been considered an 'arctic' type. The apparent enigma of believedly warm and cold climate organisms sharing common graves is repeated on virtually every continent.

Professor Scharff once made some very pertinent remarks about Pleistocene plants occurring in the present Alpine region, thus:

> The severity of the climate during the Glacial period is often assumed from the occurrence in Pleistocene strata of such plants as Dryas octopetala, some species of willow, dwarf birch, and others, which are now found in high latitudes and in the Alps, but are, as a rule, absent from the plain of Northern Europe. Professor J Geikie... believes... that an Arctic flora took possession of England as soon as the climate enabled it to live in the country. Arctic plants, according to this explanation... were the first immigrants to reconquer the dreary, plantless wastes and make it habitable for mammals.
>
> Fortunately these views do not at all agree with those of many of our leading European botanists... Professor Warming is of the opinion that the main mass of the present flora of Greenland survived the glaciation period in that country; whilst Professor Drude has shown that all plant life could not possibly have been destroyed in northern countries. He maintains that the greater part of the Arctic floral elements which unite Greenland and Scandinavia must have survived the glacial period in these countries in sheltered localities.[7]

Momentarily laying aside the fact that Scharff and the undermentioned authorities tried to explain this botanical evidence within the framework of orthodox Ice Age concepts, we should note that Col W H Fielden reached the following significant conclusion regarding various Arctic plants:

> To my mind, it seems indisputable that several plants now confined to the polar area must have originated there, and have outlived the period of greatest ice development in that region.[8]

Similar views about the 'pre-glacial' origin of much polar vegetation and of what is commonly known as the Alpine flora were also held by the botanist John Ball, who enquired:

> Is it credible that in the short interval since the close of the glacial period, hundreds of very distinct species and several genera have been developed on the Alps, and, what is no less hard to conceive, that several of these non-Arctic species and genera should still more recently have been distributed at wide intervals throughout a discontinuous mountain chain some 1,500 miles in length, from the Pyrenees to the Eastern Carpathians?[9]

Scharff, agreeing with these opinions, boldly stated:

> The glacial or Alpine flora is very old, and must have originated long before the Ice Age.[10]

That these plants survived the supposed severity of glacial conditions has puzzled many observers, especially orthodox glacialists. Many therefore concluded that these plants flourished outside the limits of the alleged glaciations and only later colonised Alpine areas.

A notable advocate of this solution was Professor A Engler, one of the foremost nineteenth century authorities on the geographical distribution of plants. He noted that several typically Siberian plants which today also occupy the Alps, the Caucasus and the Carpathians are entirely absent from the Scandinavian mountains, where, if anywhere in northern Europe, we should expect to find them[11]. Alpine-like plants, however, occur in Lappland, a low-lying tract immediately north-east of the Scandinavian highlands. Interestingly, Lappland hosts virtually three-quarters of all known circumpolar plants, and these collectively indicate that one or more land routes formerly existed between northwestern Europe and Greenland[12]. The main route was almost certainly the aforementioned landmass of Fennoscandia.

Significantly, another leading Victorian botanist, Professor F Krasan, believed that many plants now inhabiting the high Alps flourished at sea level during Pliocene times. He stressed that:

> Especially the evergreen species exhibit the impression of an originally mild climate – of a climate without winter frosts – for otherwise the plants would have developed into species with deciduous leaves.[13]

Note that modern geology envisages the Alps as: "...only a chain of low hills during most of the Pliocene"[14], and that, together with the Scandinavian mountains and most of the world's other major ranges, they rose to their present elevation only during late 'Pleistocene' times.

Thus, generally lower landmasses (including now-submerged tracts which then united regions now separated by water), together with the absence of the vast northern ice-sheets of conventional Ice Age theory (see Part One), not only encouraged more genial climates nearly everywhere, but provided almost exactly the conditions postulated by Krasan and others, best suited for evergreen plants. These factors, in turn, again suggest geologically recent crustal changes and a coeval shift of the terrestrial axis.

To those who would ask why Alpine vegetation, if originating at low altitudes during a climatically equable era, is now largely confined to cold Arctic latitudes or high mountainous regions, we refer them to the eminently reasonable explanation advanced by Scharff as long ago as 1899[15].

In western Europe we find many examples of trees and plants formerly thriving at localities now apparently inimicable to them. In its wild state the box tree was once widespread in north-western France and central Europe, whereas today it is found only around Lyons. Similarly, the grey willow, found in 'drift' deposits from Algeria to the depths of Germany and the British Isles, previously had a much greater range, but is now rare in the south, occurring only near water in very damp valleys. It is, however, correspondingly abundant in the north. Considering such facts, the noted botanist Count Saporta concluded:

> ...there has been a double retreat in opposite directions, showing that then the differences between the north and south of Europe were less accentuated.[16]

It is unnecessary here to cite all the studies made of these west European floral migrations and retreats. It suffices for present purposes to refer interested readers to the works of Lubbock[17], Geikie[18], de Mortillet[19], F E Zeuner[20], R G West[21], and Nilsson[22], who, between them, span the development of knowledge in this particular field of enquiry and provide numerous instructive examples.

Many discoveries in west European 'drift' deposits have concerned the remains of large maple and coniferous trees. The latter, especially, have been repeatedly encountered in Britain. At Wawne in Holderness, for example, drainage works last century exposed a buried forest, composed mainly of "gigantic pines"[23]; while others, lying horizontally 9ft (2.8m) below ground level, in company with the bones of horse, hippopotamus, mammoth, red deer and bovids, were found near Leeds in Yorkshire in 1852[24]. Innumerable roots of enormous size and the prostrate trunks of giant fir, oak, alder and hazel trees – complete in some instances with leaves, berries and nuts – mixed with mammoth bones, were discovered under thick layers of peaty-earth at low-tide level on the shore between Sutton and Cleethorpes last century[25]. The Rev Edward Trollope, who reported these finds, contended that a great flood had overwhelmed these organisms[26]. An essentially similar discovery occurred at Northampton in 1859[27].

The geographical preferences of the following plants, common to western Europe and large areas of North America, also signify the former existence of at least one land route to account for their present distribution. These plants include Calluna, Leerzia, the sedge Carex extensa, Lobelia dortmanna, Eriocaulon septangulare, and the water-weeds Alisma, Lemna, Potamogeton and Myriophyllum. Of these, the first four enjoy wide distribution across western Europe. Eriocaulon, however, is restricted to colonies near the coast of Donegal and south-west Ireland, reappearing only on the Scottish islands of Coll and Skye. Again, the freshwater genus Naias flexilis, while present in most North American streams and ponds, occurs in Europe only in south-west Ireland, Galway, the Isle of Skye, Perthshire and Esthwaite Water in Cumbria.

To all these may be added the American strand-plant Spartina stricta, which, in Europe, thrives now only in south-western regions, and Scheucheria palustris which, although well established in Canadian bogs from Labrador to British Columbia, has only the most tenuous toehold in westernmost Europe[28]. Commenting upon this evidence, Forrest said:

> In particular, it is difficult to believe that water-weeds such as Potamogeton, Lemna, Alisma and Myriophyllum could have reached their present habitats by an Arctic route. If, however, they were denizens of the lakes and marshes of an Atlantean continent in Miocene and Pliocene times, their distribution is accounted for quite naturally.[29]

Incidentally, Forrest's Atlantean continent corresponded with Appalachia, mentioned in Part One.

These and numerous similar discoveries all over Europe reveal a now largely vanished flora which was formerly far more varied than its few surviving members, and which, in geologically very recent times, extended much further north than it could do so today.

3

THE SAGA IN THE ATLANTIC

Turning to the former extent of analogous flora in and around the present Atlantic, we find that they, too, occupied now vanished tracts which disappeared simultaneously with their European counterparts. Reviewing the Atlantic flora generally, Scharff concluded that the Azores and Madeira islands were directly united to mainland Europe until at least 'glacial' times[30], by which, of course, he meant down to the time of the great catastrophe under consideration.

One of the plants closely studied by Scharff was the orchid Spiranthes, which flourishes today only in North America and Ireland[31]. Spiranthes is apparently a relict member of what has been called the North Atlantic Arctic flora, the present disjointed distribution of which suggests original dissemination via islands or land-routes now far below Atlantic waters[32].

Those who doubt such explanations, and favour a comparatively great age for the Atlantic basin, are reminded that many authorities – including Prof Neumayer, and Dr von Thering[33], Prof E Hull[34], Dr Lloyd Praeger[35] and others – have postulated geologically recent transatlantic connections in order to adequately account for present biological distributions, and that modern oceanographic and geological researches testify among other things to both a temporally recent prolongation of the Anti-Atlas mountains of Morocco to the Canary Islands, and to an apparent western extension of Africa as far as the Azores. The fact that Adiantum reniforme, a type of fern known to have flourished in Portugal during Pliocene times, now thrives only on the Azores and Canary islands[36], thus becomes explicable.

Plants common only to the Atlantic isles and western Europe actually run into hundreds:

> There are in the Azores 480 known species of flowering plants and ferns, of which no less than 440 are also found in Europe, Madeira, or the Canary Islands; while 40 are peculiar to the Azores, but are more or less closely allied to European species.[37]

The western extremity of the transatlantic land-route passing through Madeira and the Canaries seems to have lain in what today is the Caribbean region, while the route itself may have formed the northern edge of Termier's previously noted Africo-Brazilian continent as:

> A connection between the flora of Madeira and that of the West Indies and tropical America has been inferred by the presence in the former of six ferns found nowhere in Europe or North Africa, but existing on the islands of the east coast of America or on the Isthmus of Panama. A further relationship to that continent is to be traced by the presence in Madeira of the beautiful erinaceous tree Clethra arborea, belonging to a genus which is otherwise wholly American; and of a Persea, a tree laurel, also an American genus.[38]

A few degrees below the equator off northeastern Brazil, the island of Fernando de Noronha bears a flora and fauna closely allied to that of the Caribbean[39]. Interestingly, the seaweeds around the island are "related chiefly to those of the Mexican Gulf"[40].

Further south, at latitude 20°20'S, about 600 miles (960km) east of Brazil, on the

Table 2A

Present distribution of some geographically isolated plants indicative of lost continental landmasses in Oceania and the southern hemisphere

After Guppy, Scharff, Moseley et al

		Atlantic Isles			Africa			Indian Ocean						Asia					Australasia					Pacific Islands														Americas
Genus and species	Type of plant	South Trinidad	South Georgia	Tristan da Cunha	Southern Africa	Equatorial Africa	East Africa	Madagascar	Rodriguez Island	Mauritius	Marion Island	Kerguelen Island	Heard/McDonald Group	Indian Archipelago	Burma	Malaysia	Java	Borneo (Kalimantan)	Australia	Tasmania	New Zealand	New Guinea/Papua	Solomon Islands	Marquesas Islands	New Caledonia	New Hebrides	Keeling Atoll	Wallis Islands	Cambier Island	Fiji	Tahiti	Tonga	Samoa	Rarotonga	Paumatu Archipelago	Hawaii	Pitcairn Island	South America	West Indies	North America
Pringlea antiscorbutica	Kerguelen cabbage	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	■	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Juncus	Ground plant	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□
Nertea	Alpine plant	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Geranium	Alpine plant	□	□	□	□	■	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□
Sanicula	Alpine plant	□	□	□	□	■	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□
Lobelia anceps	Tree lobelia	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□
Lobelia spp	Small shrubs	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□
Schiedea	Shrub	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	■	□	□
Alsinidendron	Shrub	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	■	□	□
Polygonium glabrum	Aquatic/semi-aquatic	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	■	■	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□
Pisonia umbellifera	Seaside shrub	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	■	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Haplopetalon	Shrub	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Couthovia	Tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Eucalyptus	Tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Luzula campestris	Alpine plant	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□
Coprosoma	Upland plant	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□
Vaccinium	Ground plant	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	■	□	□	■	□	□	□	□
Alyxia olivaeformis	Small tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	■	□	□	□	□
Alyxia stellata	Small tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	■	■	■	■	□	□	□	□	□	□
Alyxia scandens	Small tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	■	■	■	■	■	□	□	□	□	□
Alyxia bracteolosa	Small tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	■	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Alyxia sp	Small tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□
Uncinia	Alpine plant	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□
Peperomia	Low herb	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	■	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Pimia	Tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Nototrichium	Small tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□
Richella	Tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Geissois (7-8 species)	Saxifraga	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	■	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Oncocarpus	Tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Begonia	Orchid	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□
Eugenia rarillora	Tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	■	■	■	■	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Eugenia monticola	Tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	■	■
Eugenia sp	Tree	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Stenogyne	Trailing plant	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	■	■	□	□	□	□
Wikstroemia indica	Tree-shrub	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	■	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	■	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□
Fragaria chilensis	Chilean strawberry	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	■	□	□
Isodendron	Shrub	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	■
Nothocestrum	Small tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	■	□	□
Thaucombaula	Shrub	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□
Gouldia	Tree-shrub	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	■
Straussia	Tree-shrub	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	■
Deyeuxia	Upland grass	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	■	□	□
Dammara (Agathis)	Conifer	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	■	■	■	■	□	□	□	■	■	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Podocarpus	Conifer	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	■	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□
Dacrydium	Conifer	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	■	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□
Dianella ensfola	Herb	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	■	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□
Dianella intermedia	Herb	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	■	■	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□
Dianella sp	Herb	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	■	□
Smythea	Straggling shrub	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	■	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Graeffea	Tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□
Broussaisia	Saxifraga tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□
Pterotropia	Tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□
Bobea	Small tree	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	□	■	□	□	□	□

remote, virtually treeless, island of South Trinidad, abound the perished but unfossilised remains of a species of the tree Eugenia, indicating that the island was formerly well-wooded[41]. The present, much wider geographical distribution of Eugenia, shown in table 2A, is revelationary.

Still further south, the flora of the island-group of Tristan da Cunha, Nightingale, and Inaccessible is essentially Fuegian (South American) with an admixture of Cape (South African) genera[42]. Moseley concluded from these details that:

> The close similarity of the flora of the three islands of the group points to a former connection between them.[43]

Such facts point unmistakably to the rather recent existence in what is now the South Atlantic of one or more land routes or archipelagos over which plants had spread both west and east.

4

A SUNKEN SOUTHERN CONTINENT?

Wild plants enjoying even greater discontinuous distribution are known from areas of the southern hemisphere now mostly occupied by southern Africa, Australasia, the southern regions of the Indian Ocean and Pacific Ocean and South America. Collectively, these plants suggest the former occurrence of a now-sunken continental landmass which embraced all these regions, and seemingly connected in the east with another sizable landmass in what is now the Pacific Ocean, and in the east, apparently, with the southern portion of the aforementioned Africo-Brazilian continent in the west.

The previous existence of this great southern continent has long been recognised by geologists and naturalists, who have given it a variety of names – Gondwanaland, Indo-Oceana and Lemuria being the best known. The now submerged Pacific landmass has been variously called Oceana and Pacifica, and is of interest in that, as far as the botanical evidence is concerned, it was apparently joined, either directly or via islands, to western North America.

Table 2A summarises the present distribution of many of these plants, which include such well-loved forms as Begonias and Geraniums. It should be noted that, of the plants listed in table 2A, the seeds of the Kerguelen cabbage, which form the principal food of the local teal, are too soft and perishable to pass unharmed through that bird, and are very unlikely to be transported to more distant regions on the bird's feet or feathers[44]. Other plants on Kerguelen Island also occur in southern New Zealand, about 2,350 miles (3,760km) to the east in the South Pacific, and on South Georgia Island, some 2,700 miles (4,320km) to the west in the South Atlantic[45], the overall impression being that all the Kerguelen plants are actually relict species. Also of relevance is the fact that silicified trunks of large trees occur in late 'Pleistocene' lavas on Kerguelen Island, indicating that a well developed flora thrived there until geologically recently[46].

It must be significant that the great botanist, Joseph Hooker, concluded that the majority of the islands of the Indian Ocean were the upland peaks of a now-submerged southern continent, thus parallelling the conclusions reached by the naturalists who studied the floras of the Atlantic Islands and the Iberian peninsula.

Of particular interest is the fact that the shrub Pisonia umbellifera cannot be dispersed by water currents, yet it exists discontinuously from Australia to Tonga, while a closely related species, P aculeata, also thrives in the Americas and the Old World[47]. Again, Peperomia flourishes in such widely dispersed countries as Australia, various Pacific islands, the West Indies and Bermuda – but while some have suggested that birds may have carried the seeds to the two latter localities from Oceania[48], and despite the surprisingly great powers of flight of some birds, the immense distances involved renders such an explanation decidedly suspect. Moreover, as shown later, innumerable identical or nearly-allied species of insects, crustaceans and molluscs, which birds do not disperse, still inhabit the same broad belt of geographically discontinuous habitats.

Hooker's conclusions respecting a former southern continent foreshadowed those reached by Guppy years later for the Fijian area of the Pacific. Discussing the present distribution of the conifers Dammara, Podocarpus and Dacrydium, Guppy thought that they denoted the:

> ...original continuity of the Fijian land area, not only with the neighbouring islands of the New Hebrides and of New Caledonia, where these genera alike occur, but also with New Zealand, Tasmania and Australia, where they attain a great development.[49]*

Interestingly, Dacrydium and Podocarpus are also known from South America[50], so it may be germane to mention that tree trunks, roots and branches litter the seabed between Panama and the Galapagos Islands[51], and that others occur in late 'Pleistocene' volcanic tuffs on Fiji[52]. Evidently, extensive forests formerly clothed huge land areas in what today are the Indian and Pacific oceans, that these existed until late 'Pleistocene' times, and that widely scattered colonies of Dammara, Podocarpus, Dacrydium, Eugenia and other plants on the islands now characterising these oceans represent the last vestiges of a once far more glorious flora.

Finally, the Eucalyptus tree of the Indian archipelago and Australia is, like the trees (plane, poplar, sequoia, etc) mentioned in Part One, apparently a survivor from Miocene/Pliocene times. In Australia, it occurs abundantly with the cones of the southern conifer Banksia in argillaceous deposits in southern Victoria[53]. These beds have been variously dated as late Pliocene or early Pleistocene. It will be recalled that the fern Adiantum reniforme, which still thrives on the Azores and Canaries, lived in Portugal during Pliocene times, and that much of the present circumpolar flora is similarly ancient.

No less than seventy-seven species of living plants, some with notable Pliocene, even Miocene, characteristics, are unique to Tasmania, New Zealand and Central America[54], so it must be of interest that subfossilised fruits discovered in Australian gold-bearing drift-gravels of Pleistocene age also belong to Miocene plants[55]. At some places in Victoria, these Australian gravels overlie the prostrate trunks and branches of large trees, some stumps still in situ, with their roots embedded in the original ancient soil[56].

It appears that various geologically 'old' plants still flourish virtually unchanged at many localities, exhibiting few or no signs of having developed into new forms during the intervening period (millions of years, according to conventional geological chronology). Could it be that the ancient flora they represent persisted right down to so-called late 'Pleistocene' times when, together with contemporary animal life of every kind, it was catastrophically decimated and its surviving elements obliged to inhabit (on a discontinuous basis) the new topography occasioned by the cause of those changes? If, as is widely agreed, the Pleistocene period ended about 11,000 years ago, it follows that essentially Pliocene floras clothed great areas of the world until that date. Innumerable botanical remains encountered in 'drift' and other 'Pleistocene' deposits the world over seem to suggest precisely this.

---

* See Note 3.

5

THE BURIED FORESTS OF NORTH AMERICA

Vegetable remains entombed in alleged 'Pleistocene' deposits are known from many localities in Europe[57], Africa[58], Asia[59], Australasia and South America[60] – where so-called late Tertiary (Miocene/Pliocene) and early Pleistocene plant fossils now reposing at 13,000ft (4,000m) at Corocoro, and at 14,000ft (4,308m) at Potosi, in Bolivia, include a fern and tropical trees closely allied to those now living in the Amazon lowlands[61]. Such remains, however, are probably most abundant in North America, where several spectacular finds have occurred. We commence with a look at some of the evidence from southern Canada.

Sir William Dawson and Prof D P Penhallow[62] were among the earliest students of Canada's so-called 'Pleistocene' floras – but while their work has inevitably been augmented by more recent discoveries and reports, much of what they recorded is highly relevant to the main theme of this book. For example, at Scarborough Heights and elsewhere near Ontario, clays yielded remains of cedar and pine trees, portions of rushes, leaves, a variety of seeds, specimens of Chara, Bryum, Fontinalis and two species of Hypnum[63]. Then, near the River Don, Toronto, leaves and wood fragments were discovered in dark hued clays 70ft (22m) below ground level, where, also, a Maple leaf occurred in overlying reddish ferruginous sand, itself overlain by boulder-clay[64]. Boulder-clay also overlies a bed at Rolling River, Manitoba, containing shell and fish debris mixed with a great variety of plant remains[65].

At Cape Breton a hardened peaty bed, subjacent to 'till' or boulder-clay, contains twigs, branches of coniferous trees, and a great variety of fibrous and epidermal tissues, apparently of swamp vegetation indicative of a genial climate. When ignited, these remains burnt with a flame in the manner of lignite[66]. As noted below, lignitised plants are actually quite widespread in 'drift' deposits over much of east-central Canada.

Lignite occurs in or below superficial deposits in the valleys of the Albany, Kenogami, Missinaibi and Abitibi rivers between Hudson Bay and the Great Lakes. On the bed of the Kenogami it appears in association with 'till' and boulder-clay, and contains pieces of canoe birch and coniferous wood. That along the south branch of Coalbrook is 3ft (1m) or more in thickness, is overlain by up to 70ft (22.5m) of pebbly 'till' and gravels, and, retaining a "distinct woody character", contains the flattened trunks of trees some 2ft (0.6m) in diameter.

Two miles above Woodpecker Island in the same valley horizontal beds of lignite, composed chiefly of sticks and half-decayed rushes, occur in the midst of 'till' deposits 125ft (38m) thick. Three miles (5km) below Woodpecker Island lignite, as much as 6ft (1.8m) thick, extends for hundreds of yards, and consists of laminae of moss and sticks in prodigious quantities[67]. Indeed, so numerous are lignite seams throughout this general region that lignitous matter is believed to underlie all the clays, sands, gravels and other superficial deposits, blanketing the territory south-west of James Bay for a distance of no less than 200 miles (320km)[68].

The peaty and woody accumulations in the Bow and Belly river valleys of Alberta are comparable examples from western Canada, where pressure has sometimes hardened them to the consistency of lignite[69]. Further north, just below the top soil at certain places in the valley of the Mackenzie River, shales forming the river banks are covered with the largely undecayed leaves of very ancient deciduous forest trees such as maple, oak and poplar, none of which can now thrive at that latitude[70]. Various early travellers observed burning seams of lignite at several places in the Mackenzie valley above the Bear River[71].

Faced with such evidence, it is difficult to disagree in general with the following conclusion which, although formulated by Dawson and Penhallow over a century ago, is still essentially correct:

> ...When these plants flourished in Canada, there must have been open water and a land flora in the Arctic basin – conditions, of course, altogether incompatible with the existence of a polar ice-cap, although not inconsistent with their existence in the more elevated districts or those cooled by the cold Arctic currents.[72]

Indeed, modern observations made in Arctic Canada, militating against former extensive ice-sheets there, strongly support Dawson and Penhallow's argument, while the evidence of the 'genial' character of many of the recorded plants merely emphasises what has already been inferred about the vanished Arctic forests. The half-decayed condition of much of the known material clearly indicates that its destruction, accumulation, and burial was a geologically recent event. As a whole, this Canadian evidence compares favourably with the European lignite discoveries and with the apparently coeval testimony of the lignites at Geiseltal in Germany.

As noted previously, many ancient valleys and gorges in the American Midwest lie buried under immense accumulations of 'drift' and associated materials originating in more northerly latitudes, where "Logs and fragments of wood are often got at great depths in the buried gorges"[73].

At Bloomington, Illinois, pieces of wood, some of it yew, were found 123ft (38m) below the surface during the sinking of a shaft[74]; a huge log was discovered 40ft (12m) below ground-level, resting directly upon 'till' or hard-pan, during the digging of a well at Columbia, Ohio[75]; while elsewhere in Ohio, and also in Michigan, similar finds have occurred. Overall, the finds have been very numerous:

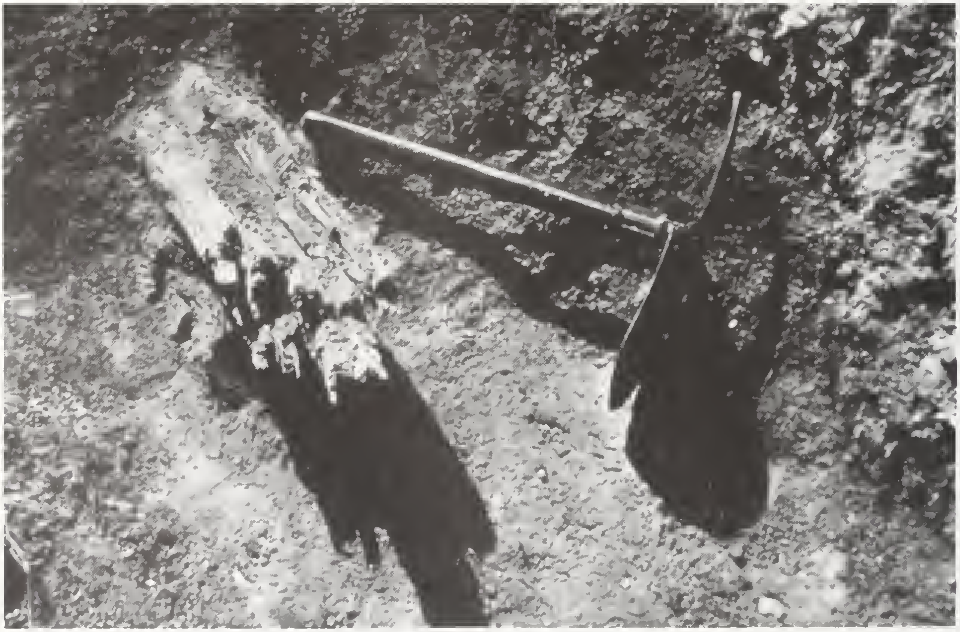

Fig 2.1. Buried log in soil section, Shelby County, Ohio. Courtesy of Dr R P Goldthwait.

> Buried tree-trunks are often exhumed from the glacial drift at a depth of from 20–60ft from the surface. Dr Locke has published an account of a mass of buried driftwood at Salem, Ohio, 43ft below the surface, embedded in ancient mud. The museum of the University of Michigan contains several fragments of well-preserved tree-trunks exhumed from wells in the vicinity of Ann Arbor. Such occurrences are by no means uncommon. The encroachments of the waves upon the shores of the Great Lakes reveal whole forests of the buried trunks of the white cedar[76].

Buried timber resembling that of the osage-orange has been found at a depth of 42ft (13m) at Coventry, Summit City, near Lake Erie, Ohio, and mineralised black and brittle wood apparently of a cedar tree at a depth of 30ft (9m) in a similar excavation at Ross City, also in Ohio. A 20ft (6.2m) long trunk of a white cedar, complete with roots and portions of the upper boughs, came to light in 'muck' beds 18ft (5.5m) below ground-level in Cleveland, Ohio, a district where a layer containing abundant partly-decayed pine, spruce and cranberry leaves has been repeatedly penetrated – the result being that untreated water from many wells formerly sunk there was unfit to drink. Together with twigs, leaves and dead shells, the partially rotted but unmineralised remnants of another large cedar tree were found 12ft (3.6m) below the surface at Dover, Cuyahoga County, Ohio, and 3 miles (4.8km) north of New Burlington a "dense layer of logs" was encountered 30ft (9m) below the surface.

Of 59 wells sunk by the early 1860's in Hamilton County, Ohio, six had penetrated 'muck' beds, leaves, timber or carbonaceous silt. These accumulations were occasionally of enormous thickness. Leaves, sticks and vegetable mould exposed in a well shaft at or near Carey's Academy, Cleveland district, comprised a layer no less than 9'2" (2.8m) thick. In another well nearby, a great bed of leaves and logs, this time under blue clay, was passed at a depth of 40ft (12m). This blue clay occurred in at least 35 wells sunk in Hamilton County by 1864, and invariably contained logs, twigs, and leaves.

An upright tree stump, complete with roots, was discovered in this same blue clay at a depth of 30ft (9m) below ground-level 8 miles (13km) east of Oxford in Butler County, Ohio, while at Athens, also in Ohio, several large logs were found 10ft (3m) lower down. Great beds of timber occur at several places in Mercer County, Ohio, between 40 and 50ft (12m and 15m) from the surface, and half-decayed logs were quite commonly found while sinking wells on the upland farms in nearby Sciota County. Closely similar finds were made at varying depths in Madison, Franklin, and Stark counties, showing that: "...muck beds and trees are universal beneath the soil throughout Ohio"[77].

The extent of these buried forests clearly outstretches even that of the sizable state of Ohio. For instance, well-preserved willow remains came to light in red clay 50ft (15m) below the present surface of Lake Michigan, in a well sunk at Green Bay, Wisconsin[78], while further north abundant decayed vegetation has been found under similar circumstances on Oak Island at the western extremity of Lake Superior[79].

Several years ago, at the site of Two Creeks, Wisconsin, abundant remains of large forest trees were discovered buried under deposits attributed to the Mankato glacier, allegedly a feature of the supposed Wisconsinian ice advance about 25,000 years ago. Accordingly, these trees were initially believed to date from that time, but later laboratory Carbon-14 tests on spruce wood and associated peat from the site reduced their antiquity to, significantly, only 11,000 years BP[80].

Elsewhere in Wisconsin, decayed and unmineralised white cedar wood has been found 18ft (5.5m) down in a well shaft in Walworth County, while at Appleton township unrotted red cedar (Juniperus virginiana) occurred at the same depth. A second, more decayed, specimen occurred nearby at a depth of 30ft (9m). In adjacent Minnesota, white cedar wood was discovered at the base of sandy clay 10ft (3m) below ground-level near the Mesabi Range on the banks of the Embarras River, and two large logs of resinous timber at a depth of 60ft (18m) in a well sunk at Iowa City, in Iowa. At Burlington, also in Iowa, extensive beds of sticks and leaves have been encountered 12ft (3.6m) below the surface – similar occurrences being recorded at various other localities west and south of that town[81]. Still more numerous finds of subterranean timber have been made all across Illinois, especially in the counties of Jersey, Marion, St Clair, Woodford, Grundy, McLean, Morgan, Tazewell, Menard and McHenry, and sometimes at depths of up to 110ft (34m) below ground-level[82].

Yet other finds could be listed from neighbouring Mississippi and Indiana, although the many examples just cited adequately convey the immense, and probably more or less continuous, extent of this buried vegetation. Together with the stupendous volumes of plant debris forming the previously-mentioned Canadian lignite deposits north of the Great Lakes, these discoveries west and south of the Great Lakes in effect constitute one gigantic raft of subterranean botanical rubbish – the remnants of once vast forests of mixed conifers and deciduous timber, overwhelmed and deeply buried by whatever deposited the even more gargantuan volumes of 'drift' all over mid-western America and southern Canada. Before their destruction, however, these forests extended much further north than is possible today.

Interestingly, modern botanical research has shown that, even during alleged glacial times, the commonest tree genera in, for example, Illinois were "present there during the entire Wisconsinian (Pleistocene)"[83], that deciduous forests south of the Sangamon River in Illinois, Indiana and Ohio, were dense and flourished in a "climate more humid than the present one"[84], and that northern plants have been identified in these buried floras of the American Midwest[85]. One authority, Grüger, has even concluded:

> One must assume for this region for the entire Wisconsinian, a temperate climate, which may have permitted the survival of many plant types relatively close to the ice edge.[86]

Other botanists, concerned more with floral distribution than with geological hypotheses, have arrived at rather similar conclusions. Braun, for example, has postulated ideas very similar to those advocated by Grüger on the basis of present plant geography[87], a line also adopted by Iltis still more recently[88]. Yet others could be quoted.

If, as previously advocated, the ice-sheets of glacial theory never existed in so-called 'Pleistocene' times, then the difficulties confronting botanists studying evidence like the above largely evaporate. Moreover, the fragile nature of much of this botanical debris – leaves, rushes, twigs, nuts, cones, berries, moss etc. – strongly militates against ice having overwhelmed and buried such material, even though the deposits enveloping it are conventionally regarded as 'glacial'. The fact that equally large buried forests and delicate plants occur in Alaska and all over northern Siberia, but not in deposits usually thought to have been laid down by ice-sheets, is highly relevant, and suggests that all these flora, whether in America or elsewhere, perished from the same general cause and at the same time.

Collectively, the foregoing testimony of numerous living and lately-extinct plants shows not only that many flora were once far more extensive than at present, but also that they were so until surprisingly recently – they inhabited latitudes in which they can no longer flourish, and clothed a world topographically very unlike our own. This testimony also indicates a former prevalence of climatic conditions considerably more genial than today. The botanical evidence as a whole, therefore, harmonises extremely well with the unrelated disciplines of Pleistocene geology and early tradition (see Part One). As we shall now see, the record of zoology is practically a duplicate of that just examined.

6

DISLOCATED FAUNAS: THE ATLANTIC BASIN

Like the botanists, many zoologists studying the geographical dispersal of land and freshwater animals have concluded that various land-routes or close-knit archipelagos must have formerly occurred in many regions now below sea level, to satisfactorily account for existing faunal distributions. Prof H Simroth, for example, investigating the slugs of the Iberian peninsula, North Africa and the Canary Islands, deduced that a direct land connection between the three areas must have existed until comparatively very recently[89].

Well known malacologists (studying molluscs) have reached similar conclusions. Thus, on the Azores, out of 69 species of land-shells (which have a natural aversion to sea-water) 37 are common to Europe or the other Atlantic Isles. Most, if not all of them, are thought to have probably originated at those localities in 'pre-glacial' days, during or even before 'Pleistocene' times[90]. They are, therefore, relict species of a fauna now drastically reduced numerically and territorially. Both Dr W Kobelt and Dr von Ihering have shown that European, West Indian and Central American land-shells certainly implied the former existence of some transatlantic land-route, severed only towards the close of the 'Pleistocene' period[91].

That such land connections really did exist seems irrevocably established by the following data:

> The present fauna of the four archipelagos – the Azores, the Madeiras, the Canaries and Cape Verde – is not an island but a continental fauna: in particular, the mollusc fauna is indigenous to the Mediterranean and distinct from the equatorial-African. At the same time, there is a resemblance in the fauna of the Canaries and Mauritania, both showing the same kind of molluscs. The earth-worms, Oligochetes, in the Canaries, are akin to the same creature in Southern Europe.
>
> It is to be concluded from these observations that in an epoch close to ours – say, at the end of the glacial period – the islands of the four archipelagos were joined to the African continent.[92]

Again, Prof.Scharff noted that operculate (lidded) land-shells of the West Indies comprise:

> ...so large a proportion of the Antillean land-snail fauna, that a majority of the genera are found on two or more of the islands and the mainland, while nearly every species is absolutely restricted to a single island, appears to me to be very strong testimony in favour of a former general land connection.[93]

Evidence from Jamaica and the Lesser Antilles indicates that the disappearance of this land connection was accompanied by the near-extinction in late 'Pleistocene' times of a very diverse earlier ('glacial') land-snail fauna[94] – a factor accounting for the remarkable distributional pattern of the present snails as noted by Scharff and, as seen below, why many of them, though now insular forms, are so closely related to one another. It would, moreover, not be unreasonable to conclude that the loss or subsidence of this former land connection occurred coevally with that of the transatlantic land route called for above by Kobelt and von Ihering, on the basis of other molluscan evidence.

Ewing, it will be recalled, indicated the awesome vertical scale, and Termier the huge linear extent of such subsidence when, at the close of the 'Pleistocene' epoch, large portions of the Atlantic floor – which must a priori have included the land routes of the naturalists – sank some 2–3 miles (see Part One).

Elsewhere, as between Greenland and Norway, the greater part of the North Atlantic subsided as much as 9,000ft. That freshwater shells inhabiting a bog at Killough in Co Down, N Ireland, are stunted forms allied not merely to some still living in Arctic Europe, Greenland and America, but to others, almost identical, dredged as dead shells from the Atlantic floor near Rockall off the Norwegian and Scottish coasts, the Shetland islands, Iceland and Jan Mayen island, at depths of up to 9,000 fathoms, and generally from all areas between Davis Strait and Gibraltar[95], confirms not only the enormity of this crustal subsidence, but supports those claims which date the collapse as having occurred "since the Ice Age"[96].

Elaborating upon the American and African relationships of the Atlantic isles fauna, Merezhkovsky added:

> ...the geographical distribution of the molluscs Oleacinidae, existing only in Central America, in the Antilles, the Canaries, the Azores, on the island of Madeira and in the Mediterranean basin, presupposes the existence... of a continent embracing all these regions. Fifteen varieties of molluscs live only in the Antilles and on the Senegal coast of Africa, and it is impossible to explain their presence by the transportation of the embryos; while the coral fauna of the islands of St Thomas includes six varieties, of which one, apart from this island, breeds on the submarine rocks of Florida; while four are on the Bermuda isles, which again can scarcely be explained by the transportation of the embryos, as their watery life is too short to allow for their being transported by oceans currents.[97]

All the land-shells of the Bahamas, Puerto Rico, Haiti, Cuba and Jamaica are generally related to each other and to those of Florida and Yucatan (Mexico), whereas those from the Windward Isles are closely allied only to South American forms[98]. This suggests the occurrence of a natural barrier separating the two areas represented by these distinct land-shell groups even before 'Pleistocene' times – a detail seemingly confirmed by the fact that:

> The fishes, shells, sea-urchins and other organisms of the West Indian basins belong to modern types, which to a large extent seem to have migrated from the Atlantic Ocean. Their recent appearance suggests great changes in the physical history of the West Indian seas...[99] (our italics) and by the recent discovery of fossils of the same species of foraminifera (uni-celled marine creatures) in sea-bed cores obtained from both sides of the Panamanian isthmus[100]. Today, these creatures are specifically distinct either side of the isthmus.

Like many other naturalists, Spencer concluded that the submergence of the Antillean landmass and elevation of the Panamanian isthmus were geologically recent events, and that much marine zoological data from the Caribbean generally loudly echoes the implications of the land-shells of the Atlantic isles, north-western Africa and the Iberian peninsula[101].

Among annelids, the occurrence of similar earthworms in the Canaries and southern Europe represents further powerful evidence for an uninterrupted land connection between those regions at no very remote date, for, like the slugs and most land-shells, earthworms soon perish if consigned to seawater. The same fate befalls similarly immersed frogs, toads and newts, yet the presence of several identical or related species of these amphibians in water-sundered Sardinia, Corsica and the British Isles suggests that these islands, too, were recently united to the European mainland[102].

The French writer, L Germain, has highlighted the fact that certain insects – such as the familiar Canary Butterfly Setomorpha discipunctella – also occur in West Africa and tropical America[103]. Enlarging upon this subject, Spence noted that:

> Sixty per cent of the butterflies and moths found in the Canaries are of Mediterranean > origin, and twenty per cent of these are to be found in America... The (crustacean) Platyarthus is represented by three species in Western Europe and North Africa, one in the Canaries, and one in Venezuela.[104].

And Wallace said of the insects of the Azores:

> The butterflies, moths and Hymenoptera are few in number... Beetles are more numerous... The total number of species is 212, of which 175 are European... 23 of these are not found in any of the other Atlantic islands... Besides these are 36 species not found in Europe, of which 19 are natives of Madeira or the Canaries, 3 are American, and 14 are altogether peculiar to the Azores. These latter are mostly allied to species found in Europe, or in the other Atlantic islands, while one is allied to an American species... Many of these small insects have, no doubt, survived the glacial epoch, and may, in that case, represent very ancient forms which have become extinct in their native country.[105].

Analogous details are traceable between the European and North American ants and beetles. Among the Lepidoptera, for example, 243 species are common to these continents, while:

> A great number of North American ants are identical with European ones... Northern Europe possesses one peculiar genus of Ant – Anergetes. This is closely allied to Epoccus, another genus confined to North America... 487 species of Coleoptera are common to North America, Northern Asia and Europe.[106].

The restriction of the water-mite Hydrachna geographica – a creature with limited powers of flight – to Europe and eastern North America[107] is still another example, which also parallels the distribution of the freshwater sponge Hetermeyenia ryderi, thriving today only along the North American Atlantic coast (between Florida, Newfoundland, and Sable Island) and western Scotland and Ireland[108]. Such distribution is inexplicable unless continuous land with freshwater lakes and ponds once existed between Europe and North America.

The distribution of the pearl mussel (Margaritana margaritifer) suggests it is another relict species, since:

> The European freshwater pearl mussel is found in the United States, where other allied species exist. In Eastern Europe and Western Asia the genus is unknown. It is widely spread in Western Europe from Northern Scandinavia to Spain – without, however, entering a single river communicating directly with the Mediterranean or crossing the coastline of that ancient Central European ocean which extended along the northern border of the European Alps eastward to Asia in Miocene times. Its very discontinuous range, coupled with its peculiar European distribution, and its absence from Western Asia, seem to imply that the freshwater pearl mussel found its way across the Atlantic with the sponges just referred to, at a very remote time.[109]

The freshwater molluscs of Iceland and the present distribution of woodlice tell a similar story:

> Twenty-one different kinds of land and freshwater mollusca are known from Iceland, including such well-known species as Arianta arbustorum. This is not likely to have been accidentally introduced, and its presence in Iceland strongly supports the idea of a former land-connection between that island and Europe. Such common European woodlice as Porcellio scaber and Oniscus asellus are liable to be unintentionally carried by man. Yet the fact that these two species are widely spread and apparently indigenous to both Europe and America, and are found not only in Iceland, but also in the Faeroes, is significant.
>
> Among the Iceland freshwater molluscs there is one which has probably been derived from a former land-connection with Greenland, viz Succinea groenlandica. It > is common to both countries, yet quite unknown in Europe proper.[110]

As remarked earlier, abundant molluscan and other evidence obtained from the floor of the North Atlantic indicates the geologically very late existence of a land connection between North America and western and north-western Europe, via Greenland and Iceland. Succinea groenlandica is an excellent example of that former reality.

This sunken North Atlantic territory which, in its time, formed much of the now-submerged lands of Appalachia and Fennoscandia (see map 1B) was also the domain, as shown below, of many 'old' (Pliocene) molluscan biota – zoological parallels of the similarly 'ancient' plant species noted previously among the scarcely-fossilised botanical evidence recorded from now-inhospitable Arctic latitudes. The freshwater character of most of these molluscs and, as noted with regard to much of the lost Euro-American flora, many of the aquatic plants, indicates that these sunken lands were well watered and enjoyed pleasant climatic conditions – conditions vastly different from those now typical of the same latitudes today, yet able to support comparatively delicate creatures like water-mites and freshwater sponges.

Near Billefjorden on Spitzbergen five north-dipping ancient shorelines contain numerous shells of the cold-water Pliocene mollusc Astarte borealis[111], a mollusc which also occurs profusely in the 'drift' deposits on Moel Tryfaen and at Gloppa near Oswestry, Wales[112], while a contemporary thick-shelled mollusc, Cyrtodaria siliqua, although known from so-called 'glacial' clays in Co Durham and Caithness, no longer thrives in Britain[113], yet still does so in Nova Scotia and several eastern states of North America.

Here, then, are instances of formerly widespread Pliocene molluscs now extinct at many of their previous European habitats but still surviving in limited areas of the New World. The significance of the survival to present times of various typical Pliocene and Miocene plants has already been noted. This, we now see, is duplicated in the zoological record.

The aforementioned Mediterranean element reappears among the 'higher' animals of the Atlantic islands. The lizards, for example, include a North African form and a South American (Chilean) form, but virtually all the burrowing (Amphisbaenid) lizards exhibit Mediterranean or African affinities, with a few also apparently having New World relationships[114]. The lizard Thysanodactylus bilineatus is also of interest as being common to Brazil and the island of Fernando de Noronha[115], these two localities also sharing the cricket genus Gryllus[116].

The present distribution of the Sirenian genus Manatus and of the Monk Seal Monachus, is also peculiar. Neither of these marine mammals frequent the open sea, yet today several known species inhabit opposite shores of the Atlantic – the West Indies, western Mediterranean and the seaboards of West Africa and eastern South America. This suggests the almost inescapable conclusion that the ancestors of these mammals spread along some ancient coastline uniting the Old and New Worlds until comparatively recent times[117].

7

DISLOCATED FAUNAS: EURASIA, OCEANIA AND THE SOUTHERN HEMISPHERE

Remaining with the Mediterranean element, but this time in the Mediterranean itself, we find that the land-shell Buliminus pupa occurs only in Algeria, Sicily, southern Italy, Greece and Asia Minor, and that a related species, B fasciolatus, is confined to Greece, Syria and the islands of Crete, Cyprus and Rhodes. These and practically all other species of Buliminus are geographically very restricted and do not survive prolonged immersion in salt-water.

Conchological researches have shown that Morocco and southern Spain were also physically united in the recent past and that land-shells typical of those on Sicily also thrive in the Tetuan Mountains just south of the Strait of Gibraltar[118]. Further east, a whole assemblage of plants and animals was found by the French savant Blanchard to be common to Tunisia and Sicily[119].

Among the near-endless ranks of beetles, no less than 12 species of Hopatroides flourish in Greece and Asia Minor, and one H thoracicus in Andalusia, Spain. Similarly, the related form Amphicoma is represented by 15 species in western Asia and the Balkans, and by three others peculiar to north-west Africa and southern Spain[120].

Lepidopterists will know that Asia Minor hosts two of the three European species of the butterfly Thais, and that T cerisyi inhabits some of the Greek islands as well as the Greek mainland and Turkey. In Europe, Greece and southern Italy are the only habitats of the magnificent butterfly Danais chrysippus which, however, is well known from Syria, Persia and the whole of southern Asia. Interestingly three species also occur in North America.

Although at least 32 species of Bacillus, a genus to which the stick-insects belong, are scattered across southern Asia, Africa, Australasia and the Sandwich Islands, four additional species known from southern Europe also range into northern Africa[121]. This distributional pattern closely resembles that of Rhax and Galeodus, two spider-like genera occupying southern Europe, North Africa and western Asia[122].

Crustaceans also furnish analogous details, the freshwater crab Thelphusa fluviatilis being a case in point. Although other species of it occur as far south as Madagascar and the Cape of Good Hope and as far east as Australia, T fluviatilis thrives in southern Spain, North Africa, Sicily, southern Italy, Greece, Cyprus, Turkey, Syria, and Persia[123].

Another freshwater crustacean, the crayfish Hemicaridina desmaresti, inhabits Spain, Corsica, Sardinia, Sicily and Asia Minor, while the subterranean shrimp Typhlocaris "is represented by three isolated species around the Mediterranean". Certain other shrimp genera typical of tropical land-locked salt-water pools enjoy even more exotic geographical distribution. Antecaridina lauensis, for example, is known only from the Dahlak archipelago in the southern Red Sea, the island of Europa and the Fiji islands. Similarly Ligur uvae occurs only on Aldabra Island north-west of Madagascar, Halmahera Island in Indonesia and Fiji; while one Hippolytid genus has been recorded only from Cape Ras Muhammad in southernmost Sinai, Funafuti in Micronesia and Hawaii[124].

Volumes could be filled with additional 'Mediterranean' examples of similarly dispersed insects, molluscs and crustaceans, but we must pass on to consider various higher animals exhibiting similarly discontinuous distribution.

The toad Discoglossus pictus, for instance, lives in Spain, north-west Africa, Malta, Sicily, Sardinia and Corsica[125]. The ubiquitous tree-frog Hyla arborea ranges from Japan, through China, Persia, Asia Minor, southern Europe, France, Spain to North Africa and is present on Corsica, Sardinia, Sicily and on most of the larger Greek islands as well as on the Madeira and Canary islands and the Salvages. Regarding its Mediterranean distribution, Scharff remarked:

> The occurrence of the tree-frog on so many of the Mediterranean islands is of particular interest, especially as... the more minute features of the various forms can be traced from island to island, adding one more proof – if proof were needed – of their former continuity.[126].

Amphibians, of course, are as adversely affected by salt-water as land and freshwater shells, so these varieties of Hyla arborea must have reached their present habitats before the disruption of the landmass of which the present Mediterranean and Atlantic islands are remnants.

An impressive number of reptiles enjoy a generally comparable distribution. The worm-like lizard Blanus cinerus, for instance, lives in Spain, North Africa and on some of the Greek islands. Another lizard, belonging to the family Scincidae, thrives today on several Greek isles, as well as on Sicily, Sardinia, Spain and the Canary Islands, while the European chameleon Chamaeleon vulgaris occurs in southern Spain, North Africa and Sicily. Among the snakes, Periops hippocrepis is found only in Spain, Sardinia and Greece; the burrowing Typhlops lumbricalis on mainland Greece and some of its islands and in Asia Minor as far as the Caucasus Mountains; and Eryx jaculus on the Greek islands of Naxos and Tinos, in Turkey and across south-western Russia[127].

Eight species of amphibians and reptiles occur east and west of the Italian peninsula, and south of it in North Africa, but are absent from Italy itself. Forsyth-Major demonstrated the close affinities of the North African, Sardinian and Corsican forms. Out of a total of 21 species, 12 inhabit Italy, at least 16 North Africa and 17 Spain. From such evidence he argued that Corsica, Sardinia, Sicily and north-west Africa constitute a zoogeographical province from which Italy, except for a few west coast localities, is excluded, and that:

> The close relationship shown in the fauna of Corsica and Sardinia to Africa, permits the supposition that the connection with these islands had persisted to a much more recent date than with Europe (our italics).[128]

The botanical record from the same general region is strikingly similar[129].

With their great powers of flight and their seasonal migrations, particular species of birds are less easy to identify positively as truly indigenous to given geographical regions and are discussed but briefly here. Just two examples only need be considered. Of these, the fire-crested wren Regulus ignicapillus which very occasionally visits southern Britain, is common in Asia Minor and resident throughout the year in southern Europe. More importantly, it occurs in Sardinia, Malta and along the shores of northern Africa. Very interestingly, two related species, R teneriffae and R maderensis, inhabit the Canary and Madeira islands respectively.

Our second example, the common Goldfinch, Carduelis elegans, though breeding throughout Europe, except in the extreme north, is unusually abundant in southern Europe and north-west Africa and has a range extending eastwards to Persia and westwards to Madeira and the Canaries[130].

Among the mammals, it may be mentioned that scattered communities of a small race of red deer are to be found in Corsica, Sardinia and north-west Africa[131]. Fossil remains of the same deer have also been discovered in 'Pleistocene' cave-breccias – of which more shortly – on Malta[132] and Crete[133].

Natural dwarfing, apparently in response to insular conditions can, however, be achieved by some animals remarkably swiftly. Recent research[134] has demonstrated that the red deer of Jersey, Channel islands, for example, attained their present small size in just approximately 6,000 years. Several other analogous instances of rapid dwarfing among other animals have been recorded from other parts of the world[135].

The wild sheep of Asia Minor, Cyprus, Sardinia, Corsica and Tunisia, and the European Porcupine which occurs in Asia Minor, Greece and the island of Rhodes, southern Italy, Sicily, North Africa and Spain are analogous examples. Likewise, the small shrew-like Crocidura etrusca is found in southern France, Italy, Sicily and North Africa (and the Cretan cave-breccias); while the Black-mouthed Weasel, Mustela boccamela, inhabits Persia, Asia Minor, Greece, southern Italy, Sicily, and Sardinia. A closely related species, M africanus, flourishes in Malta and Algeria[136].

Additional instances abound of discontinuously distributed living biota in and around the Mediterranean basin, although those already cited adequately indicate the formerly very different arrangement of land and sea there.

What then was the general extent and shape of the ancient landmass which covered the present Mediterranean prior to its disruption and submergence?

During the Pliocene period – and probably in so-called early 'Pleistocene ' times too – continuous land united the present Balkan peninsula to Tunisia via southernmost Italy and Sicily[137]. Sicily itself was joined to Sardinia and Corsica and all three islands formed part of an apparently unbroken land tract stretching westward to embrace all north-west Africa, the Iberian peninsula and, perhaps, southwestern France. The Strait of Gibraltar did not exist at that time. Professor Suess christened all this land the Aegean continent[138], and Forsyth-Major referred to it as Tyrrhenia[139].

Uninterrupted land, dotted over with freshwater lakes, also united Crete and southern and eastern Greece with Asia Minor and all the land as far east, perhaps, as Afghanistan. Forests covered the Anatolian district of Turkey for at least a part of this period[140], and one or more large lakes occupied the Seistan basin of Afghanistan down to about 9,000 years BP[141]. Others also existed then in the northern portion of the Balkan peninsula. Numerous 'Pleistocene' animal remains found throughout this huge region belong to or are closely allied to forms still inhabiting South Africa. This detail implies that a land route occurred then between southwest Asia and South Africa.

The southern limits of Tyrrhenia are more conjectural although an extensive body of water, remembered traditionally as Lake Tritonis, allegedly divided the eastern and northwestern regions of Africa by occupying much of present western and central-southern Sahara; but whether any direct communication existed between it and the shallow sea due east of Tunisia, called the Pelasgian Sea[142], is unclear. Certainly there is every indication that innumerable animal and plant species freely migrated across this ancient landmass for untold ages. Extant biological evidence admits no other sensible explanation.

Like several other prehistorians and naturalists, Suess believed that Tyrrhenia foundered geologically recently – probably during early Holocene (ie post-glacial) times – and that ancient people witnessed it[143]. A goodly number of geologists, however, have urged that it must have been an earlier (Pliocene) event largely because many of the associated fossils represent supposedly typical Pliocene organisms. Although plausible, we have also noted that many existing plants and animals are essentially Pliocene survivors and that many 'Pleistocene' forms were too. The actual 'age' of many Tyrrhenian species, however, may be considerably younger than commonly realised. The determination of the Pliocene/Pleistocene boundary in the Mediterranean region (the site of this former vanished continent) is still uncertain and has lately been much discussed[144].

Shifting attention once more to the aforementioned sunken landmasses of Oceania and the southern hemisphere we find that:

> The presence of the wingless fly in both Kerguelen and Heard seems to show that the islands were formerly connected, which is also confirmed by the occurrence of freshwater fishes identical with species occurring in New Zealand, Tasmania and the Falklands and South America.[145]

Clearly insufficient time has elapsed for these creatures to have evolved into separate species since the break-up of the great landmass of which their present habitats were apparently once a part. It will be recalled that Ball made very similar observations about the geographically isolated Alpine flora in the northern hemisphere.

The small land-shell shaped like a pointed round tower, Clausilia, apparently first arose in earliest Tertiary times, yet still persists today in Ireland (two species), southern England (four species), Spain (one species), and in south-west Europe (where hundreds of different kinds thrive). Professor Boettger, who spent a lifetime studying this mollusc, recorded some 700 species of the genus and sub-divided it into several sub-genera. Many of these apparently had no fossil ancestors. Furthermore, almost 100 species of the subgenus Phaedusa still live in India, Sri Lanka (Ceylon), the Malayan peninsula, China and Japan[146]. Today, some occupy China (Garnieria), East Africa (Macroptychia), Madeira (Boettgeria) and South America (Nenia), and are spread the length and breadth of Termier's Africo-Brazilian continent, mainland Asia and various offshore islands.

The land-shells of the Pacific islands paint a similar picture. Their close relationships indicate that in comparatively very recent times the islands they now inhabit were united as a large landmass occupying much of central Oceania[147], and which, via the Galapagos Islands, connected with northwestern South America. The earthworms of these two last named regions are identical[148]. Innumerable other analogues abound in Oceania.

Niah cave in Sarawak, Kalimantan (Indonesian Borneo), contains the fossil remains of a large mammalian fauna which for the most part closely resembles that of tropical forest habitats in present-day southeast Asia. The fauna includes the Malay tapir (Tapir indicus) which, occurring only as a fossil in Kalimantan, Java and China, still lives in Sumatra, the Malay peninsula and Thailand. Also present is the giant pangolin (Manis palaeojavanica), known previously only from the supposed 'middle Pleistocene' deposits on Java, and a species of the 'ancient straight-tusked elephant' Palaeoloxodon namadicus, which had earlier been recorded only from similarly dated deposits in eastern Kalimantan[149]. Other fossils represent highland mammals like the lesser gymnure (Hylomys suillus) and the ferret-badger (Helictis orientalis), now living only at altitudes exceeding 2,000ft (615m).

Here, then, in Niah cave, is a 'late Pleistocene' fauna composed of forms still flourishing in the same general region or in neighbouring countries; or known elsewhere solely from allegedly 'older' deposits; or which in some cases are extinct everywhere. Animals like Tapirus, Helictis and Hylomys, therefore, are essentially relict genera.

The same label attaches to the Tasmanian 'wolf' (Thylacinus) and the Tasmanian 'devil' (Sarcophilus), two particularly savage marsupial carnivores that still survive on Tasmania but which, as fossils from Australia show, enjoyed a much wider distribution during the Pleistocene. Similarly, the sooty-opossum (Phalangista) and the brush-kangaroo (Halmaturus) are now found alive only on Tasmania, whereas they were formerly contemporaries of Thylacinus and Sarcophilus on mainland Australia[150]. Neither the primitive duckbilled platypus (Ornithorhynchus) nor the spiny anteater or Echidna (Tachyglossus) like salt-water, yet both are presently denizens of Tasmania and Australia[151], and the latter, with the related genus Zaglossus, of New Guinea also[152].

That dry land – which would have permitted unhindered colonisation by these animals – united New Guinea and northern Australia in the very recent past is now well-established. The evidence for it includes geologically young upraised coral terraces on the Huon peninsula of New Guinea[153], submerged channels on the bed of the Arafura Sea cut by bygone rivers associated with now-vanished Lake Carpentaria further west on the floor of Torres Strait[154] and various hydrological changes embracing the entire Gulf of Carpentaria[155].

It can be no coincidence that, more or less synchronously with these changes, others, which among other things affected vegetation in upland New Guinea[156] and the Javan and Sumatran highlands[157], occurred across the Moluccan Sea region between Celebes, the Philippines and New Guinea itself. There, approximately 11,000–10,000 years ago, there was a sudden increase in general humidity which, among a variety of botanical changes, promoted an abrupt expansion of hitherto seemingly rare mangrove forests[158]. Such changes cast much light on the still discernible extent of the dislocation suffered then by the once-continuous faunas and floras of formerly larger Indonesian and Australian landmasses.

The experience was apparently that previously noted with regard to the break-up of the inferred dry land inhabited by the surviving molluscs of the modern West Indies.

Numerous large flightless birds in the southern hemisphere are other noteworthy relict forms. The emu (Dromaeus) and the cassowary (Casuarius) which now live in Australia, New Guinea and various Indonesian islands are unknown as fossils before so-called Pleistocene times[159], as also is the case with the flightless kiwi (Apteryx) of New Zealand. Conversely, enormous now extinct populations of moas and other flightless birds, including the dangerous Harpagornis, abounded then in New Zealand; while on Madagascar the huge Aepyornis or 'Elephant-bird' was similarly common. The celebrated ostrich of Africa not only formerly ranged into Eurasia but was present in Pliocene faunas[160] and, with the flightless birds of the Pacific island of Guam, is one of the few flightless birds now living north of the equator. Interestingly, the flightless rhea of the pampas is also known from South American Pliocene[161] and Pleistocene deposits.

Irrespective of the animal classes to which they belong, all the foregoing organisms represent surviving fragments of immensely more varied faunas which existed until late Pleistocene times. They are the last vestiges of faunas which have been geographically dislocated. The distribution of these creatures is discontinuous in both hemispheres and highly suggestive of the former existence of large continental landmasses across much of what are now the southern Atlantic, Indian and Pacific oceans, and central Oceania. The geologically recent disappearance of these tracts, moreover, is seemingly confirmed by the significant absence of specific differentiation among any of the survivors.

8

A VANISHED PREHISTORIC OCEAN

Northwards of ancient Tyrrhenia and south-east of Fennoscandia, during times which geologists have called Pliocene and Pleistocene, was an immense sea or ocean of great zoogeographical significance. Formed aeons before in Miocene times or earlier, its waters covered areas which today are the Rhone and Rhine valleys, northern

Germany, most of central and Arctic Europe as far as the Urals, and huge tracts of Russia at least as far east as Lake Baikal and as far south as the Black and Caspian seas. This great body of water is known as the Miocene Ocean. The draining of this ocean was a calamitous event which apparently attended extensive land elevations and the demise of the Siberian mammoths and their contemporaries. As long ago as 1866 Raphael Pumpelly discussed this vanished sea and the Russian steppe deposits as follows:

> The sea in which the great steppe deposit was precipitated was studded with islands now represented by the ridges and peaks which rise above the plains. The surface of the plains rises everywhere toward the former islands, partly because the deposit in its formation adapted itself partially to the original surfaces of the valleys it fills, and partly from its thickness being increased by the tributary detritus of the islands...
>
> The age of this extensive deposit is a question of much interest. If it is contemporaneous with the steppes and terraces of the valley system of the Orkhon and Angara, it seems probable that the sea which left this deposit over nearly all of what is now the plateau, was also contemporaneous, within certain limits, with that great body of water which, extending from the polar ocean to the Caspian, occupied all Western Siberia.
>
> The fact... that seals, identical in species, inhabit the fresh waters of the lakes Baikal and Oron... and the Caspian Sea, seems to refer to that period. The Oron lake is a tributary of the Vitim, and through this of the Lena, in which no seals occur. This circumstance points very clearly to a former water communication between these far separated localities, and to the time at which the seals of the Oron became isolated from those of the Baikal and the Caspian falls – perhaps in the same period with the emergence of the great plains of northern and western Siberia, the deposits of which are characterised by abundant remains of the mammoth as well as of Bos urus and Rhinoceros tichorhinus.
>
> The closing event in the history of the great sea that in comparatively recent times covered so large a part of Asia, extended from the pole to the Caspian and Black Seas, and from the Ural mountains to near the Great Wall of China, was the disappearance of its waters from the long trough that reaches from the shores of the Arctic sea, through the Barabinsky steppe to the Aralo-Caspian depression.
>
> It appears to me that the ancient physical geography of this vast region, and the effects of its elevation, present one of the most interesting and important fields of exploration. Whether we consider the meteorological changes that must have been brought about by the upheaval of so large an area, or the influence of this great water communication and its currents on the distribution of existing genera, the geological phenomena that have affected this broad belt of the great continent have, beyond doubt, had an important influence on the recent history of our planet.[162] (Our italics).

A similarly recent draining of this great sea has been advocated by, among others, Sjögren[163], while the Arctic affinities of some of the denizens of its remaining portions – for example the Caspian and Aral Seas – also apparently confirm this opinion[164]. The fauna still occupying the Caspian Sea includes crustaceans belonging to an otherwise exclusively marine order, the Cumacea. Ten species peculiar to this body of water have been enumerated, and of others that thrive there the minute pelagic copepod Limnocalanus grimaldi (which also occurs in the Baltic Sea and Arctic Ocean), and the marine isopod related to the common wood-louse, Idotea entomon (which has a similar northern distribution), deserve special mention. Two species of the shrimp-like schizpod crustacean Mysis – M microphthalma and M caspia – which are closely allied to the Arctic species M oculata, also inhabit the Caspian[165].

Scharff has noted that several kinds of Caspian fish appear to be descended from typical marine forms, and that the presence there of seals of the species Phoca caspica: "...indicate that at no very distant date – at any rate since Pliocene times – a closer connection with the Arctic Ocean existed than at present"[166].

Broadly speaking, therefore, the present Caspian fauna is a relict marine one, very much like those of lakes Onega and Ladoga in European Russia, and like others in Finland and Sweden.

Recent Russian studies have not only confirmed but amplified these details and the climatic conditions under which they developed[167].

That the Caspian Sea once extended to the Aral and Black seas, and that all three are vestiges of that ancient Miocene Ocean which bathed the northern shore of the old Tyrrhenian continent has long been established. Certainly the sediments deposited by this huge body of water are traceable for immense distances. They reach at least as far north as the River Kama in Central Russia, where Karpinski[168] and others have studied them, and they have been explored in the Yenisei valley where they contain sub-fossil marine shells[169].

Closely similar shells have been recorded from the same sediments approximately 1,500 miles (1,920km) to the west[170], a matter of considerable palaeogeographic importance, as many earlier authorities favoured a water channel between the Miocene Ocean and the polar sea east of the Urals. These discoveries, however, indicated that, during the period in question, a great bay or gulf existed west of the Urals and penetrated at least as far north as the White Sea. From such details, Dawkins correctly deduced that before 'glacial' times: "...the sea had already rolled through the low country of Russia, from the Caspian to the White Sea and the Baltic, and formed a barrier to western migration to the Arctic mammals of Asia"[171]. Map 2A shows the probable disposition of land and sea in Eurasia at that time.

9

MEDITERRANEAN GRAVEYARDS

Attending as it did the break-up of much of Tyrrhenia and the elevation to their present heights of all the major European and Asiatic ranges, the draining of the old Miocene Ocean was sudden, violent and catastrophic. The displacement of its waters, in fact, constituted a disaster of the first magnitude. In few regions are the effects of this displacement more riveting than at various places around the present Mediterranean basin. Especially remarkable are the caves and fissures.

After exploring the Sicilian cave of Maccagnone, Dr Hugh Falconer reported:

> ...the cavern had been filled right to the roof, the uppermost layer consisting of a concrete of shells, bone-splinters, with burnt clay, flint-chips, bits of charcoal and hyaena coprolites, which was cemented to the roof by stalagmatic infiltration... of contemporaneous origin... A great physical alteration... occurred to the conditions previously existing, emptying out the whole of the loose, incoherent contents, and leaving only... portions agglutinated to the roof. The wreck of these ejecta being visible in the patches of ceneri impastati, containing fossil bones, below the mouth of the cavern.[172]

Elsewhere in Sicily, in the hills around Palermo, veritable hecatombs of hippopotamus bones have been found. As much as:

> Twenty tons of these bones were shipped from around the... cave of San Ciro, near > Palermo, within the first six months of exploiting them, and they were so fresh that they were sent to Marseilles to furnish animal charcoal for use in sugar factories... The bones were those of animals of all ages down to the foetus, nor do they show traces of weathering or exposure.[173]

The freshness of these bones and the presence of very young individuals shows that some sudden and geologically recent cataclysm was responsible for their accumulation. In Prestwich's opinion the causative agent was an immense flood which, at its nadir, submerged the British Isles, the whole of Central Europe and the Mediterranean islands of Corsica, Sardinia, Sicily and Malta. Reconstructing the event, Prestwich wrote:

> The animals in the plains of Palermo naturally retreated, as the waters advanced, deeper into the amphitheatre of hills until they found themselves embayed... the animals must have thronged together in vast multitudes, crushing into more accessible caves and swarming over the ground at their entrance, until overtaken by the waters and destroyed... Rocky debris and large blocks from the sides of the hills were hurled down by the current of water, crushing and smashing the bones.[174]

Prestwich also added that it was: "...impossible to account for the... phenomena ...by any agency of which our time has offered us experience... The agency, whatever it was, must have acted with sufficient violence to smash the bones"[175].

Among the animals found at Maccagnone were hyaena, lion, a large bear and the ancient straight-tusked elephant (Palaeoloxodon antiquus). These flourished alongside the aforementioned hippopotami, one of which (Hippopotamus pentlandi) was a dwarf form also known from coeval deposits on Malta, Crete, mainland Greece, Cyprus and in the cave of Santa Teresa near Spezzia in northern Italy[176].

Abundant remains of full-sized hippopotami have also been discovered in other Sicilian caves and rock-fissures[177], habitats hippopotami now seldom frequent. Their occurrence in caves and fissures, frequently too small to accommodate even one individual, is mystifying until it is realised that these animals did not live where their bones now repose but were transported en masse to these sites from more distant localities.

Also of much interest was the discovery in a cavern at Luparello, near Palermo, of the bones of a dwarf species of Palaeoloxodon, P mnaidriensis[178], a form better known from specimens found on Malta[179].

The old torrent bed of Benghisa on Malta abounds in breccia-filled fissures. Excavated last century these produced irrefrangible evidence that the breccias and the innumerable bones they contained had been deposited under exceptionally violent conditions.

> Among the large blocks of fresstone, either impacted or strewn in a heterogeneous manner, were lying seemingly entire skeletons of elephants, some of the skulls and jaws furnishing good evidence of the rough usage they had sustained by being broken and crushed flat by blocks which, with the force of impact, had cracked the others on which they impinged. These conditions were beautifully illustrated in the cases of thigh and pelvis bones, which had been smashed to pieces by blocks falling on them... Entire skeletons of the dormice (of a gigantic extinct genus) were found between blocks as if their bodies had sunk into the hollows as they floated past, whilst fragments of large birds' bones and traces of a huge fresh-water turtle, and several vertebrae and skulls of lizards, as large as a chamaelon, were found in conjunction with... land-shells... the appearance presented by this remarkable collection of organic remains seems... to indicate that water at one time flowed down the gap, and was subject to occasional extraordinary deluges which bore down the large blocks and whatever exuviae came within reach[180].

Dolomieu, an early observer, concluded that a great wave had passed over Malta, overwhelmed its animal denizens and washed off all its superficial soil (which accounted for the island's bare aspect)[181]. Admiral Spratt later reached similar conclusions[182]. Like the Sicilian bones, the tortoise and turtle remains found in these fissures appear to have been conveyed thence from some other unidentified locality by a large body of water which: "...at one time overflowed the greater portion of the eastern half of the island"[183].

Dr Leith Adams concluded that this deluge proceeded from a northern direction[184], that it had cast whole carcasses into the fissure at Mnaidra, and that, due to the exceptional freshness of their bones, many animals had been entombed in the flesh, albeit in dismembered condition[185]. This applied particularly to the remains of pygmy elephants which, as with the Sicilian hippopotami, represented individuals of every age from infant to adult[186]:

> In a little crevice in the eastern wall of the Mnaidra Gap in Malta not three feet either way, among enormous quantities of fossil land-shells, lay the two detached lower jaw bones of possibly the smallest of the two pygmy elephants, and under them portions of the spinal column with ribs in situ... The finding of fragments of pubic bones, and of vertebrae in their natural order of succession, and in a linear direction, shows clearly that there must have been several of the elephants introduced in the flesh.[187] [Our italics].

As previously seen, similar dismemberment characterised many of the coeval faunas now occupying the Alaskan 'muck' beds and we shall encounter them again sporadically over huge areas of Eurasia, North and South America and Australasia. These animals were not dismembered by natural predators, but by something acting just before or during their burial on quite literally a hemispheric scale.

Significantly, pygmy elephants, which appear to have been so prominent in the land fauna of the Tyrrhenian landmass, today only exist in the Congo basin. Similarly, the only living pygmy hippopotamus, Hippopotamus liberiensis, is now confined to West Africa.

The aforementioned gigantic dormice of Malta tell a parallel story. Adams observed that:

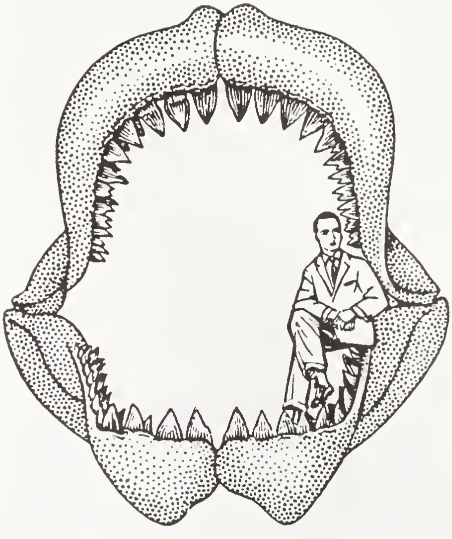
> ...their wholesale destruction at all ages of their existence, from the new-born to the aged (was clearly synchronous with) the wholesale destruction of the pachyderms... The rationale of finding such vast quantities of dormice and bird's bones, either... in fragmentary states or... entire, along with uninjured bones of elephants, or below or between blocks of stone in the old torrent-bed of Benghisa, together with their presence in almost every similar ossiferous deposit in the islands, seems to me conclusive that they cannot be accepted as representing the usual casuals from natural decay, but when taken in conjunction with what has been previously stated, they afford very strong circumstantial evidence that the extinction of the land fauna of the period was brought about by changes in the physical geography of the area...[188].

Excavations conducted a few years later by A A Caruana in the Maltese fissure of Is-Shantün revealed similar indiscriminate exterminations. Many 'Pleistocene' elephant bones and molars, including one of a pygmy species, were found mixed up with numerous bird bones and sharks' teeth. Caruana offered the standard explanation that the shark teeth had been derived from an earlier (Miocene) deposit scoured away by massive water action[189] – marine deposits abounding at some localities with teeth like those from Is-Shantün.

Miocene sharks were the largest which ever lived, and included the monstrous Carcharodon, one species of which, possessing distinctive triangular teeth up to 8″ long, may have had a 6–7ft wide jaw gape, and probably attained a length of 80ft[190]. Significantly, several smaller species of Carcharodon persisted down to late 'Pleistocene' times, and one, in effect still a 'Miocene' form, continues to do so off the eastern coast of Asia[191]. Very interestingly therefore, non-fossilised teeth, 5″ long and larger than in any known living shark, and essentially identical to those of the Miocene species, have been dredged up from the seafloor off Australia. They represent a shark which, according to Dr David Stead, must have been "80–90ft long"[192].

Now, while Caruana's suggested origin of the Is-Shantün shark teeth is conceivably correct, there is – because 'Miocene' sharks have survived down to our era – no longer any valid reason to regard the Is-Shantün cave specimens as necessarily older than the 'Pleistocene' deposits which yielded them – deposits accumulated at a time when, as shown above, species of Carcharodon certainly existed. Might it not be, therefore, that the absence of other Miocene fossils at Is-Shantün signifies that these sharks had, as living Miocene 'survivors', been swept out of the concomitantly emptying Miocene Ocean located north of Tyrrhenia and buried alongside contemporary land animals destroyed with them? In that connection it must surely be relevant that remains of great fish lie on and in the permanently-frozen Siberian deposits enclosing the debris of countless 'Pleistocene' land animals, including the aforementioned refrigerated mammoth and rhinoceros carcasses, and that various rock fissures in the Jura mountains and along the north coastline of the present Mediterranean are filled with fossils of Pliocene and 'Pleistocene' marine organisms[193].

Fig 2.2. Carcharodon shark-jaws.
Original in the Amer. Mus. Nat. Hist.



We have already noted that Tyrrhenia, apparently submerged at the end of 'Pleistocene' times – or even in earliest Holocene times[194]: the equivalent of Forrest's "since the Ice Age" dating for the disappearance of ancient Atlantic landmasses – was well populated by a great variety of 'Pleistocene' and Pliocene animals. The repeated parallelling of so many disparate details on a near-hemispheric basis within the same segment of time is surely not fortuitous.

Fissures in the side of a barren, truncated mountain, having a base a mile in circumference, situated near the village of Cérigo, on the Adriatic island of that name, contain a veritable graveyard of bones. Known locally as the 'mountain of bones', this eminence is covered from its base to its summit, both within and without, by the remains of a wide range of 'Pleistocene' animals[195]. Exactly as for the aforementioned Sicilian and Maltese evidence only aqueous action on a gigantic scale can account for such colossal bone accumulations.

Crete is another Mediterranean island in places honeycombed with limestone caves and fissures, yielding the bony remains of a large and interesting 'Pleistocene' fauna. This included rodents and pygmy elephants, from a cave near Cape Maleka, bones, horns, and teeth of antelopes and deer from a cavern on the promontory of Kutni[196], numerous rodent bones from a cave at Sphinari, and fragments of pygmy hippopotami in a hillside cave near Melato. Remains of similar animals, together with those of ruminants and a species of elephant occurred in another in the Bay of Kharoumis[197]. Widespread water action has been advocated for the extinction and burial of all these animals[198].

A very similar story unfolds in the western Mediterranean. Late 'Pleistocene' bone-breccia in caves and fissures on Corsica, Sardinia and the Balearic islands contain the fossil remains of a wide variety of animals that, in many instances, are actually typical late Tertiary (Miocene and Pliocene) forms. Indeed, when these fossils were first studied it was supposed that the breccias were likewise of Tertiary date[199], but subsequent studies of some of the rodents and molluscs disclosed their undoubted 'Pleistocene' age[200]. Once again, therefore, we find – on these islands – an ancient (Tertiary) fauna persisting down to the close of 'Pleistocene' times.

The event which submerged Tyrrhenia and choked caves and fissures on the aforenamed Mediterranean islands with animal remains also visited North Africa and the Iberian peninsula, similarly overwhelming the contemporary ('Pleistocene') fauna and flora there. Thus, remains of Palaeoloxodon have been found in Algeria[201], and at Tangier[202], and those of the enormous 'southern mammoth' (Archidiskodon meridionalis) at Mansoura[203]. Bones and teeth of hippopotami have been unearthed near Constantine and elsewhere in Algeria[204], others of the woolly rhinoceros (Coelodonta tichorhinus) at Chetma near Biskra[205], and those of its constant companion the hairy mammoth (Mammuthus primigenius) near Oran[206]. Among other Algerian fossil proboscidean remains, are some apparently of the living African elephant, Loxodonta africanus[207], an unexpected occurrence also parallelled in South African 'Pleistocene' deposits[208].

This Algerian 'Pleistocene' fauna also included various gazelles[209], several cervids like those known from the Corsican fissures[210], a series of bovids – including Bos (Bubalus) antiquus from Djelfa and Sétif[211] – and a number of horses[212]. Of the latter, one, although occurring in 'Pleistocene' deposits, strongly resembles the defunct Pliocene horse Equus stenonis[213], and another possesses teeth reminiscent of those of the earlier Miocene horse Hipparion[214]. Interestingly, Hipparion has been found elsewhere in undoubted late 'Pleistocene' deposits[215]. Once again, therefore, the evidence suggests the survival in north-west Africa during late 'Pleistocene' times of very ancient animal forms which had died out elsewhere, but which were there living alongside a rich variety of animals of more modern character.

North of Morocco, the 1,370ft (422m) Rock of Gibraltar is extensively fissured and displays old beach lines now some 600ft (185m) above present sea level. As Prestwich once observed, the Rock was:

> ...in Quaternary times, an island not more than 800ft, or less, high, which rose by successive stages to its present height. It is more than probable, however, that at some time before it settled at that level, the whole of the area was upheaved to such an extent that a land passage was formed to the African coast.[216]

Bones or portions thereof fill these fissures and represent:

> ...panther, lynx, caffir-cat, hyaena, wolf, bear, rhinoceros, horse, wild boar, red deer, fallow deer, ibex, ox, hare, rabbit... The bones are most likely broken into thousands of fragments – none are worn or rolled, nor any of them gnawed, though many carnivores then lived on the rock... A great and common danger, such as a great flood, alone could have driven together the animals of the plains and of the crags and caves.[217]

Captain Frederick Brome, one of the principal collector of these remains (which also included many species of birds) reached similar conclusions:

> The scattered, broken state of everything found, together with the fact that the objects were almost invariably discovered near and under the sides of the cavern and passages, appears to me to indicate that these appearances would only have been caused by some convulsion accompanied by flood[218].

Nor were the bones rolled or water-worn, and very few showed signs of having been gnawed. They looked, in fact, singularly fresh despite their splintered condition within the breccia[219]. Significantly, land and marine shells occurred at all depths down to 290ft (89m) below the surface in one of the fissures (Genista no:1), which also yielded pieces of coral[220]. Tons of bones were retrieved from these fissures, but were afterwards largely dispersed and lost to science[221].

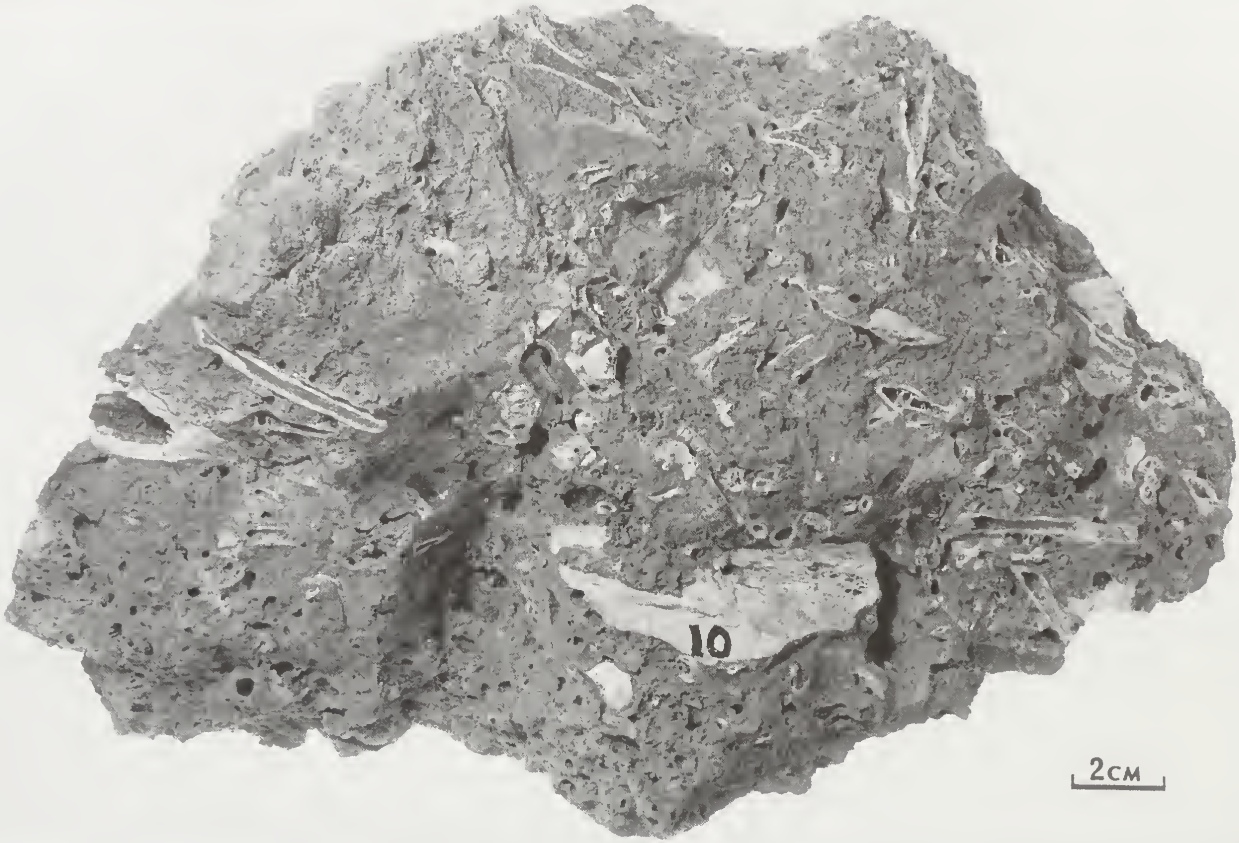


Fig 2.3. A rare photograph of bone breccia from Genista Cave, Gibraltar. Scattered fragments of bone can easily be seen embedded in the reddish-grey breccia. Although numerous descriptions have been published of various 'Pleistocene' animals from bone-breccias in-filling caves and rock-fissures, exceedingly few illustrations of the actual breccias have ever appeared. Courtesy of Salisbury and South Wiltshire Museum.

Although a few of the originally excavated pieces of bone breccia from Gibraltar have survived, a handful of examples may yet be examined in the Natural History Museum in London and the geological collections at Salisbury, England, and confirm the reported freshness of the remains embedded in them. Later excavations of other Gibraltar caves by, amongst others, D A E Garrod, A Craven Greenwood, R Wilson and J Waechter testify to the consistently unrolled and fresh appearance of the bones from all the caves explored, and the general accuracy of the above-cited observations of Prof Prestwich and Captain Brome – that is, diluvial not glacial action produced these accumulations.

10

SUBTERRRANEAN CHARNELHOUSES

Approximately 11,500 years ago the shattered remains of countless 'Pleistocene' (Ice Age) animals (sensu lato) and plants were deposited both north and south of the equator, in limestone caves and rock-fissures like those just reviewed. Usually featuring several chambers, these caves, via narrow fissure-like tortuous passages, often penetrate solid rock for horizontal and vertical distances sometimes exceeding several hundred feet, are intersected by separate fissure systems (fig 2.4), and are globally very numerous.

Most of the remains retrieved from these apertures have been deposited in great confusion, with normally incompatible kinds of animals lying in unnaturally close juxtaposition. Often accompanying these organic masses are both rounded and angular stones of dissimilar composition and, less frequently, sizable boulders. All these objects are usually enveloped and united by consolidated muds, earths or hard breccias, although at Mont de la Molière near Estavayer in Switzerland, at Kropp in Carniola and elsewhere, they are directly associated with iron-ore deposits[222]. In another case a nearly-complete rhinoceros skeleton has been found lying in a vein of lead at Dreamy Hole, Derbyshire, England[223].

In effect, these sites amount to underground charnelhouses, and, as previously noted around the Mediterranean basin, their testimony is important.

As present space limitations prevent reference to more than a tiny fraction of the total number of known sites, a small selection of typical Old and New World examples must accordingly suffice.

Bone-caves have been explored for well over 200 years, among the earliest British examples being a series of three at Oreston near Plymouth. The first of these, opened in 1812, contained numerous much broken but unabraded rhinoceros bones. The second, a smaller affair discovered in 1820, yielded mixed rhinoceros, bear and deer bones, while the third, excavated in 1822, was considerably larger and contained, in addition to still more rhinoceros remains, huge numbers of bones representing a wide range of other coeval mammals[224].

Table 2B compares the Oreston animals with those found a few years later in similar deposits in Ash Hole cave at Berry Head, in Brixham Cave and in Kent's Cavern, Torquay,

Table 2B

Animals found in cave-deposits, Devon, England

Scientific name	Common name	Oreston	Ash Hole Berry Head	Brixham Cave	Kent's Cave Torquay
Mammuthus primigenius	Hairy mammoth	X		X	X
Coelodonta tichorhinus	Wooly rhinoceros	X			X
'Rhinoceros' sp.				X
Machairodus latidens	Saber-toothed tiger				X
Panthera spelaea	Cave lion	X		X	X
Ursus priscus	Brown bear	X	X
Ursus cultridens	Bear				X
Ursus spelaeus	Cave bear	X		X	X
Hyaena spelaea	Cave hyaena	X		X	X
Canis lupus	Wolf	X			X
Vulpes vulpes	Fox	X			X
Felis catus	Wild cat				X
Putorius vulgaris	Polecat		X
Putorius ermineus	Stoat	?X	X		X
Lagomys spelaea	Cave pika				X
Sorex vulgaris	Shrew				X
Meles taxus	Badger		X		X
Arvicola amphibia	Water vole	?X	X	X	X
Arvicola agrestris	Field vole				X
Arvicola pratensis	Bank vole				X
Mus musculus	Mouse	?X		X
Rhinolophus ferrum-equinum	Great horseshoe bat				X
Sus scrofa	Hog	X
Capra sp. or Ovis sp.	Goat or sheep	X
Rangifer tarandus	Reindeer	?X	X	X	X
Cervus elaphus	Red deer				X
Megaceros hibernicus	Giant Irish deer	X			X
Strongyloceros spelaeus	Round-antlered cave deer				X
Cervids (various indeterminate species)	Deer (various forms)	X		X	X
Lepus variabilis	Norway Hare				X
Lepus cuniculus	Rabbit		X		X
Hippopotamus major	African hippopotamus				X
Bos primigenius	Auroch	X		X
Bison minor	Small bison	X
Equus fossilis	} Horses	X		X	X
Equus plicidens		X
Asinus fossilis	Large ass or Zebra	X

(after Buckland, Busk, Pengelly, Hodge, Boyd-Dawkins, and others)

England. The lists provide a good basis for comparison with analogous cave discoveries elsewhere.

Like those from the aforementioned Sicilian and Maltese sites, these South Devon remains, and especially those from Kent's Cavern, had:

> ...suffered considerably from pressure, after having first undergone violence from the force which impelled and congregated them in this narrow creek. They were found driven into the interstices of the opposite wall, or piled in the greatest confusion against its side[225].

As in the Mediterranean region, these British sites revealed young and old animals of many normally incompatible species entombed together, no single individual being preserved entire and the majority in an exceedingly fragmented condition. Many bones have also been found jammed into the furthest recesses of these caves, which sometimes occur several hundred feet from the cave's entrance.

Other British bone-caves and fissures of note occur on the Isle of Portland in Dorset[226]; Durdham Down near Bristol; in the Mendip Hills, Somerset[227]; at Cresswell Crags[228] and Windy Knoll[229], both in Derbyshire; at the south end of Kirkdale, Yorkshire[230]; on the Gower peninsula[231], Caldy Island and around Tenby in south Wales[232]; and the Vale of Clwyd, north Wales, where great accumulations of red clay invaded the cave at Cefn so forcefully that it ploughed up its original floor[233]. The bones in this cave belonged to mixed 'northern' and 'southern' animals – the 'northern' forms being represented by the bison, reindeer, and woolly rhinoceros and the 'southern' species by the ancient straight-tusked elephant (Palaeoloxodon antiquus), the round-nosed rhinoceros (Dicerorhinus hemitoechus), and Hippopotamus major[234].

It is unquestionably significant that one of the foremost investigators of the Cefn caves concluded that, during the 'drift' epoch, they had been submerged[235]. A marine invasion has been postulated to explain a similarly disturbed cave floor at Cae Gwyn near Denbigh[236]. Even in Eire analogous discoveries have occurred, the relevant phenomena again being attributed to water action[237].

Virtually indistinguishable from their British counterparts, numerous bone-caves, fissures and ossiferous breccias occur in continental Europe, being especially well developed in the limestone districts of France and Germany. Some, like the cave at Gailenreuth near Bayreuth (fig 2.4), have become internationally famous. Indeed, first explored in the late eighteenth century, Gailenreuth cavern was the earliest to be studied scientifically[238] and it became the standard by which all later similar cave discoveries were compared. Buckland's splendidly graphic description of this cave and its contents[239] clearly indicates that water, operating violently and tempestuously, had carried all the remains into the cavern and deposited them irregularly. Buckland's reference to the congeries of 'agglutinated' bones is especially noteworthy, as duplicated effects have sometimes been encountered in bone-caves elsewhere.

Other important German bone-caves occur at Köstritz[240], Kühloch[241], and in the Hartz Mountains (Biels' Höhle and Bauman's Höhle)[242], where the results of former powerful water action are again evident.

Of the many known French bone-caves and fissures, the 1430 foot (440m) high 'Montagne de Genay', located north-west of Semur in Burgundy, is a particularly striking example, the deposition of its bone-breccia capping being, in Prestwich's opinion, "an act of short duration"[243]. Other noteworthy French bone-fissures occur at Pédémar and Santenay. From the latter, various remains of lion, bear, wolf, fox, giant ox or bison, horse, lynx, Rhinoceros merckii and 'Cervus' elaphus var canadensis have been recorded lying in the wildest disorder[244]. In this assemblage of mixed 'northern' and 'southern' animals, the horses were exceptionally large and the wolves unusually abundant[245]. The presence of the Canadian species of deer, known too from several other west European sites, is also interesting.

Bone-caves and fissures in the French maritime departments of Aude and Gard[246] have yielded analogous evidence, as have those located in the escarpments bordering the Rhone valley from Doubs in the north[247] to Montpellier in the south[248]. The animals found at these sites include species present in the cave-breccias of Gibraltar and the railway cuttings at Mentone, Baoussé-Roussé, and near Antibes, dug in 1870[249].

At Nice, fissure deposits contained remains of yet extant land-shell, lizard, snake and tortoise species, and the bones of hairy mammoths, woolly rhinoceroses and extinct bears[250]. Other caves and fissures on the famed Côte d'Azur have yielded mixed terrestrial and marine organic debris. One such was Vallonet cave at Roquebrune-Cap-Martin, between Monaco and the Italian border, where bones of lions, rhinoceroses, hyaenas, macaco monkeys, elephants and, most significantly, whales came to light[251]. Whales and remains of marine creatures do not get into caves and fissures unless washed into them by masses of water.

Italy continues the story, for bone-fissures and caverns in the hills of Piedmont, Liguria[252] and Tuscany, have disgorged a fauna: "...not distinguishable from that of Gibraltar"[253], while generally similar occurrences of land-shells and animal bones abound in breccias at Verona, Vicenza, and other places in the southern foothills of the Italian dolomites[254].

In neighbouring Croatia, bone-caves in the Julian Alps[255], around Trieste[256], in the Pivka basin (Slovenia)[257], and along the Dalmatian coast[258], have yielded a variety of 'late Pleistocene' mammals of considerable interest. Thus, in a cave near Crni Kal, remains of the comparatively rare Dicerorhinus kirchergensis have been found[259], while Vjetrenica cave has produced bones of the leopard[260]. Eastwards in Croatia, the mountain of Ischuber features a breccia containing numerous bones of bears[261], contemporaries of other 'Pleistocene' cave-bears and lions found in the cave earths of inland Bosnia and Herzegovina[262].

Cave-bear remains also abound in several ossiferous caverns at Peggau, near Graz, in Austrian Styria[263]. The faunas from these and other Austrian bone-breccias[264] compare well with those from fissures penetrating limestone strata to depths of 720ft (221.5m) or more below ground level in Carniola, where bones of cave-bears and other mammalian carnivores were found to predominate[265].

The celebrated Dragon's Caves near Mixnitz, Austria[266], various Bohemian (Czech) bone-caves[267], and others in the Tatra Mountains near the Polish border[268], have yielded many coeval animal bones, while in Poland itself, a notable assemblage of 'late Pleistocene' rodents has been found in a cave at Nietoperzowa[269].

Completing our brief survey of this remarkably abundant European evidence, we should mention that in the Zakarpat district of Belarus, close to the Slovakian border, remains of a hairy mammoth, cave-bear, hyaena and other 'late Pleistocene' animals have been discovered in the bone-caves of Charitch, and that the cave-breccias in the Zhiguli Mountains near Kybyshev contain a profusion of comparably-aged bird and mammal bones[270]. Yet other breccia- and bone-filled caverns occur in the western foothills of the Ural Mountains resemble the examples just mentioned.

In continental Asia, shells and bones of elk, bison, and other 'northern' animals occur profusely in breccias occupying caves and fissures near Beirut, Lebanon[271], while remains of late 'Pleistocene' elephants, the woolly rhinoceros and Bubalus (the Indian water-buffalo), mixed with those of 'southern' animals, have been found in the cave of Ksar'Akil, Syria[272]. What these supposed 'northern' species were doing so far south has never been properly explained. The fact that allegedly 'northern' forms – bison, bear and a very large feline – have been found even further south in Israel[273], merely emphasises the error of the usual interpretation that these mammals were Arctic animals.

Immense quantities of 'Pleistocene' animal bones closely resembling those from aforementioned European caverns and fissures have been excavated from numerous bone-caves in the Altai mountains of central Asia. They include such interesting forms as mastodon, giant camel, gazelle, saiga antelope, giant beaver and ostrich[274], and are reminiscent of others from parts of inland China and Korea, which are riddled with fissures and caverns closely packed with shell and animal remains analogous to those we have just discussed.

Close to the village of Choukoutien, near Peking, a series of interrelated bone-caves and fissures discovered earlier this century has yielded information of great scientific importance. They contained some surprising anomalies, whereby typically 'late Pleistocene' animals occurred in the lower beds alongside representatives of 'old' faunas, while the reverse situation was sometimes met with in the upper beds. Moreover, in almost all instances and irrespective of whether they belong to 'old' or 'newer' types of animals, the bones were unabraded and looked amazingly fresh.

Among the animals found were a great variety of rodents, a porcupine, at least two species of hyaena, the wolf, fox and Cyon, a very large sabre-toothed cat, tiger, leopard, and other felines, brown bear, cave-bear, two-horned rhinoceros, woolly rhinoceros, big-horned sheep, an animal allied to the musk-ox (Boopsis sinensis), the pig, hare, deer, a horse, a camel, several kinds of bovids (including Bubalus), Cynailurus, a large elephant like Palaeoloxodon antiquus, the baboon, the ostrich, and a species of tortoise[275].

Viewed collectively, these animals reflect an extraordinary range of habitats and climatic conditions, and resemble the mixed faunal assemblages noted all over Europe. Thus, there were animals typical of jungles or warm-moist climates, of tundras or cold-wet climates, of prairies and steppes or dry-temperate climates, and of semi-desert or hot-dry climates.

At least one cave at Choukoutien contained a puzzlingly high number of complete skeletons of normally incompatible animals – hyaena, horse, tiger, Cynailurus, red deer, Viverra, and so on[276]. These suggested that, like some of their European contemporaries, these particular individuals were interred in the flesh.

One of the most unexpected discoveries at Choukoutien concerned the fractured remains of seven human beings squeezed into a fissure or narrow cave. Representing European, Melanesian and Eskimo racial types these aroused immediate interest[277]. Initially, it was assumed that these individuals had been murdered aeons before, as their skulls were badly smashed. This, however, begged the question of how or why such diverse racial types congregated simultaneously (demonstrated by the close juxtaposition of their skeletons) at a locality now far removed from their respective habitats, or came to lie in deposits enveloping similarly diverse animals.

If, however, tumultuous water-action was the entombing agent, then these faunally and climatically incompatible animals and humans, and the suspected complete carcasses, amount to oriental analogues of those ascribed to an identical cause in Europe and the Mediterranean basin.

Finds in a limestone cave near Reijo, Korea have included late 'Pleistocene' rhinoceros and horse remains of exceptional size[278], like those previously noted in the Santenay cave breccia. Interestingly, similar very large horse bones have been discovered in North American 'drift' deposits too.

> Evidence clearly echoing all this has come to light in various Australian caves. Ice-sheets like those advocated by orthodox glaciologists were, of course, conspicuously absent from Australia, so this evidence is especially significant. It occurs, for example: ...in caverns... at Wellington; at Boree; near the head of the Colo river; at Yesseba, on the Macleay river; at the head of the Coodradigbee; not far from the head of the Bogan, and in other places.[279]

Commenting on the Wellington valley bones, Lang observed:

> Frequently these occur so fixed between large rocks that it is quite impossible to get them out; and indeed, in general, none can be got in an entire state from the matrix, being in their embedded state full of fractures; ...the bones were in... abundance, and generally upright... the animals that owned these bones could not have died a natural death, for most of them have evidently been subjected to great violence, and exhibit fractures in every direction.[280]

A contemporary authority stressed the singular mode of burial of these remains thus:

> They are not found in any regular position, such as would be imagined had their owners lived and died where their remains now lie. Heads, jaw-bones, teeth, ribs, and femurs are all jumbled and concreted together without reference to parts. The quantity of small animals it must have taken to form a deep deposit of their bones, perhaps two feet deep, ten wide, and of indeterminate length, must have been something prodigious, for they are compressed into the smallest possible space and must have decomposed from exposure... No entire skeleton has been discovered, and very rarely were any two bones of the same animal found together. On the other hand... from the nearly natural position of the smaller bones in the foot of a Dasyurus, it can scarcely be doubted that this part of the skeleton was embedded in the cement when the ligaments still bound the bones together. The united radius and ulna of a kangaroo are additional evidence of the same kind; and yet, if the bones had been so separated and dispersed and broken into minute fragments, as they now appear in this breccia, while they were still bound together by ligaments, it is difficult to imagine how that could take place under any natural process with which we are acquainted... the best specimens of single bones have been found wedged between huge rocks, where the breccia is found like mortar between them, in situations eight or ten fathoms underground.[281] [Our italics].

Here, then, in these Australian caves we find precisely the same scenario as exists in the Eurasian equivalents – namely, that countless assorted animals (including some apparently dismembered while still in the flesh) were entombed chaotically and violently and crowded unnaturally into small rock cavities and crevices; the principal difference being that the Australian animals are not envisaged as 'northern' or Arctic species, whereas their European counterparts commonly are, and their burial attributed to ice-action.

Also noteworthy are the great depths at which some Australian finds have occurred. These rival many recorded from Europe. Thus, in bone-caves at Coodradigbee, emu remains were discovered over 200ft (61.5m) below ground level[282]. In Australia the burial of remains at such depths is surely consistent only with tumultuous water-action on a huge scale. The 'agglutinated' condition of numerous bones in rock-crevices and bone-caves around Chudleigh, Tasmania[283], suggests a similar causal agent, as in fact do the enormous accumulations of extraordinarily fresh-looking moa remains in various New Zealand caves, at several of which (eg Earnsclough, Otago and Manuhirikia), moreover, specimens have been found with sinews, muscles and dried flesh still attached[284].

Essentially identical evidence has been reported from South America. Numerous limestone caverns scattered across the Brazilian states of Sao Paulo, Minas Geraes, Goyaz and Bahia have yielded rich harvests of organic remains comparable to those mentioned on preceding pages. Of these, the extensive series of caves and deep fissures between the Rio das Velhas and the Rio Paraopeba in Minas Geraes state have yielded evidence of much importance. Staggering quantities of bones filled these apertures, but usually in such broken condition and so promiscuously that complete skeletons were extreme rarities. Near Caxoeira do Campo, for instance, is a cave some 120ft (36.9m) long, 6–9ft (1.8–2.7m) wide and 30–40ft (9–12m) high. From this the excavator Lund procured half a cubic foot of red earth packed with minute bones. Of all the half under-jaws detectable in it, 400 belonged to small opossums and the remainder to no less than 2,000 different kinds of mice, bats, porcupines and small birds. It should be stressed that Lund counted only under-jaws; numberless other small bones in the sample remained uncounted. Elsewhere, Lund excavated the whole of the clay floor of a 24ft (7.3m) long cavern at the Fazenda do Escravimia. The clay filled 6,552 firkins[285]. Lund again counted all the half under-jaws in a measured sample of this clay and, on the assumption that similar jaws were spread fairly uniformly throughout the remainder of it, concluded that the remains of not less than 6,881,500 individuals of opossums, mice, cavias and porcupines lay entombed within it. Even if this calculated total was exaggerated by as much as six times reality, a prodigious total of approximately 1,000,000 still results! In addition to these were immense numbers of uncounted bones of small birds, lizards, frogs and other diminutive creatures.

Among the more interesting larger animals found by Lund were the Megatherium, Mylodon, Toxodon, Macrauchenia, the giant armadillo Hopolophorus, an enormous rodent related to the modern Capybara, the extinct jaguar Smilodon neogaeus, Chlamydotherium, the defunct monkey Protopithecus, a mastodon and the flightless emu and rhea. It should be noted that mastodon remains seldom occur in caverns, being more usually discovered in fissures or natural hollows or pits underlying superficial deposits.

Several caves explored by Lund around the margin of Lagoa do Sumidouro, near Santa Lucia, contained human bones mingled with those of the extinct cave jaguar, a huge Capybara, and others belonging to horses and llamas[286]. One cave was especially noteworthy for yielding the bones of over fifty human beings of both sexes and every age from infant to decrepit old man. Their skeletons lay buried in hard clay and were discovered mixed together in such confusion – not only with each other but with Megatherium bones and those of other late 'Pleistocene' animals – as to preclude the idea that they had been buried by human agency. All the remains, both animal and human, possessed the same chemical composition, thereby indicating the contemporaneity of all the individuals represented[287]. Interestingly, the skulls of these ancient humans were dolichocephalic (or long-headed), a character which, according to Prof Scott-Elliott[288] and many other anthropologists, was distinctive of the 'old' European Neanderthal race, formerly thought to have been ancestral to modern humans (Homo Sapiens) and to have become extinct about 25,000 years ago.

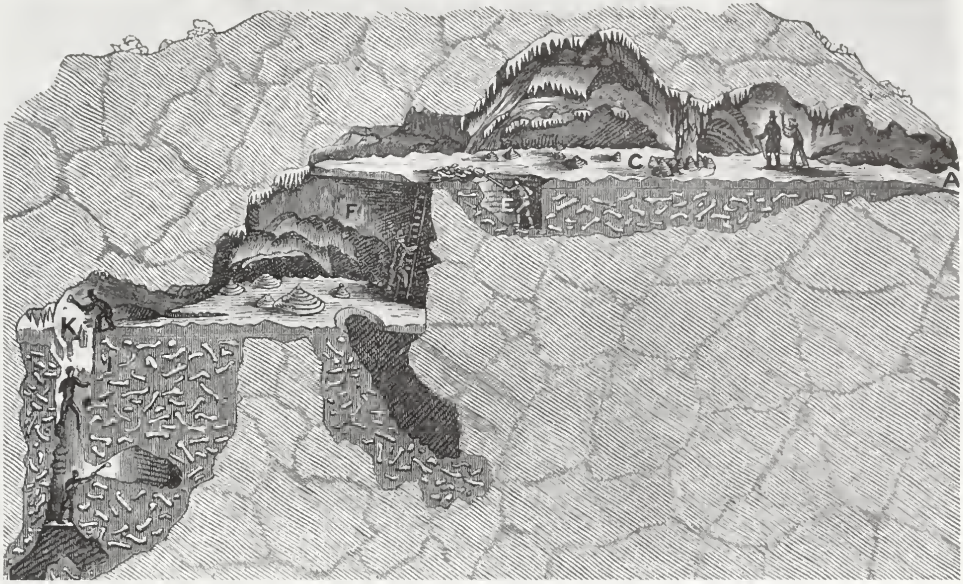

Fig 2.4. Vertical section of the cave at Gailenreuth, near Bayreuth, Franconia.

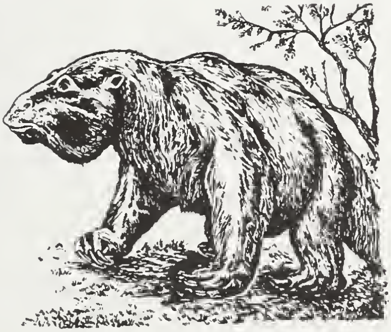
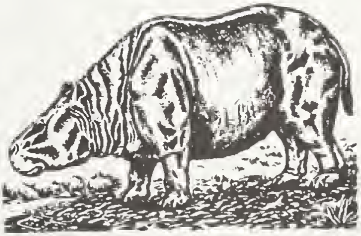
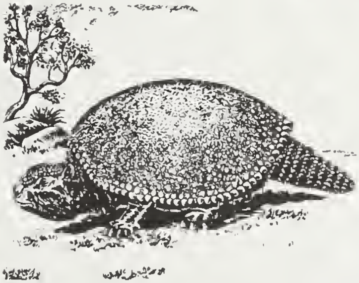


Left: Fig 2.5a. Megatherium. The largest of the ground-sloths, about 20ft (6m) long. Common in both North and South America. A smaller North American contemporary was the Mylodon.



Above: Fig 2.5b. Toxodon, a regular companion of Megatherium in South America, stood over 4ft (1.3m) high at the shoulders.



Left: Fig 2.5c. Glyptodon. A giant armadillo, some 9ft (2.7m) long. Known from both North and South America.

Fig 2.5abc. Some prominent 'late Pleistocene' animals of North America. Illustrations from "The Fossil Book" by Carroll Lane Fenton and Mildred Adams Fenton, reprinted by permission of Doubleday & Co, Inc.

Both these premises have proved to be fallacious. The lineage of Neanderthal Man is now known to have differed from that of Homo Sapiens – not being ancestral to modern humans[289], and that this race is now known to have survived in at least the Levant until Middle Palaeolithic times, or approximately 10,000 year ago[290]. The Neanderthals lived in organised communities, which would account for so many differently-aged individuals in the Lagoa Santa cave remains, although they also are suspected of being cannibalistic[291]

Although comparatively rare, human remains have also been found in certain North American caves. Conkling or Bishop's Cap Cave in the Organ Mountains, New Mexico, for instance, contained scattered human bones chaotically deposited with those of a ground-sloth (Nothrotherium), a coyote, a very large wolf (Aenocyon), numerous rodents, a horse, bison, an antelope, a camel (Tanupolama) and other 'Pleistocene' animals[292]. Several of these animals have turned up again in various other caves in the United States. In Gypsum Cave, near Las Vegas, Nevada, for example, unusually well-preserved fresh-looking remains of Nothrotherium, the camel, horse, and the mountain-sheep, have been discovered[293], while bone-breccias at Bootlegger Sink, Pennsylvania, have yielded a rich harvest of late 'Pleistocene' animals in every way analogous to those from equivalent European breccias[294].

But by far the most intriguing North American cave evidence was that found in a closed cave near Cumberland, Maryland. Among the animals discovered were the tapir, crocodile, wolverine, lemming, mink, porcupine, hare, red-squirrel, long-tailed shrew, badger, elk, coyote and a puma-like feline. Though mostly broken or fractured, all the remains were notably fresh-looking[295]. Dr J W Gidley and Dr C L Gazin, who conducted the first scientific investigation of these remains, observed:

> Many of the species are comparable to forms now living in the vicinity of the cave; but others are distinctly northern or Boreal in their affinities, and some are related to species peculiar to the southern, or Lower Austral, region.[296]

Initially these faunal differences were interpreted as meaning that the northern animals were deposited during a cool glacial episode and the southern forms during a warmer interglacial episode. This explanation subsequently crumbled, however, when continuing researches showed all the animals to have been coeval.

Indeed, it was reluctantly admitted that: "This strange assemblage of fossil remains occurs hopelessly intermingled...[297].

Confronted by all the foregoing evidence, its internal consistency and global distribution, it is difficult to withhold agreement from the following remarks by a former president of the Edinburgh Geological Society, which, though applied at the time to European bone-caves, relate equally to the equivalent sites on other continents:

> ...It is certain that these caves and fissures, so packed with carcasses, are now almost universally dissociated and broken off from the old lines of drainage in which they discharged the function of river channels... the old surfaces of country in which they occupied this position have been totally destroyed; and this destruction can only have been due to great fractures and great bendings of the underlying rocks... in very recent times great changes in the moulding of the earth's surface over a great part of Europe occurred with sufficient rapidity to cause a great destruction of animal life...[298]. [Our italics].

11

ILLUSORY FAUNAS

Before leaving the remarkable evidence of the bone-caves, some further aspects of the extraordinary story they tell require highlighting.

The tremendous, if disorderly, concentrations in certain caves and fissures of the bones of just one animal type, or very few types, is replicated on nearly all continents. Such distribution indicates that the cause of this phenomenon cannot, as is often postulated, have resulted, however indirectly, from even the most widespread ice action that it is possible to image – action which, as we have seen, in any case almost certainly never occurred.

During the formative decades of geological science, when certain caves confronted pioneer investigators with an unnatural abundance of remains of particular animal types, special names reflecting their speleological occurrence were invented to distinguish them. Among these were Ursus spelaeus (cave bear), Hyaena (Crocuta) spelaea (cave hyaena) and Panthera (Leo/Felis) spelaea (cave lion). Although the actual remains showed no special adaptation to regular cave-dwelling habits, it was assumed that the animals concerned had been cave-dwellers because they were found where they were.

Significantly, most of the animals awarded 'speleological' names were carnivores apparently related to living species which do sometimes favour caves as dens or lairs. It was not long before scholars were postulating certain caves as former bear or hyaena dens.

The first such explanation appears to have been proposed as early as 1795 by Rosenmüller[299] regarding the preponderance of bear remains met with in certain German caves[300], but did not achieve general popularity until 1821 when Buckland championed it to account for the unusually large number of hyaena bones found at Kirkdale Cave in Yorkshire[301], and others wrote about such lairs in verse[302]. Buckland's theory was also especially notable for involving climatic changes – for were not hyaenas, which no longer inhabit Britain, tropical animals? For a while, Buckland's notion of a 'hyaena den' became 'front page news'[303].

Quick to appreciate that point – duplicated by much other botanical and faunal evidence from temperate, even Arctic, latitudes across vast tracts of the northern hemisphere – Buckland's contemporaries, as well as many later writers[304], concluded that much warmer conditions than now had formerly prevailed at Kirkdale when hyaenas had frequented it and other now cool-temperate localities yielding such remains. Indeed, Buckland himself remarked that the presence of tropical hyaenas at Kirkdale indicated "...a probable change of climate in the northern hemisphere"[305].

It is hardly necessary to remind ourselves that all these conclusions and speculations appeared a full seven years before the publication of Lyell's 'uniformitarian' principles, and almost seventeen years before the announcement of Agassiz's glacial (ice age) hypothesis – both of which we discussed in Part One.

But the early palaeontologists operated a kind of 'double standard', for, where abundant herbivore remains predominated in cave breccias, as for example at Maccacogne in Sicily or Lagoa Santa in Brazil, they coined no 'speleological' names for them because their living, or nearest living, counterparts were natural denizens of grassland, woodland or aquatic environments, and a cave-dwelling existence could not be envisaged for such animals in any numbers, particularly as their skeletal remains showed absolutely no adaptations to the regular habitation of caves.

When, also, it is remembered that the bones of innumerable carnivores and herbivores identical to those entombed in the cave and fissure deposits have been found in coeval ('Pleistocene') gravels, sands and other strata elsewhere, often scores, even hundreds of miles distant from caves, it is apparent that they enjoyed a non-cave-dwelling existence. In this context, 'speleological' species names are incongruous. Nor is it convincing that the prodigious numbers of herbivore remains encountered in some caves can all have been the remnants of individuals dragged inside them by cave-dwelling bears, hyaenas, wolves or lions – even if extended over a period of many years. The curiously complete skeletons at Choukoutien, the sheer size of mastodon, mammoth and rhinoceros skeletons found in other caves, and the extraordinary number of hippopotamus individuals in the Sicilian caves around Palermo, are all details militating against interpretations requiring the herbivores to have been the remains of carcasses dragged into caves by carnivores.

The latter's failure to even commence dismembering some of the still-complete herbivore cadavers, supposedly dragged with immense effort inside the caves from without, or cornered and killed within it, is also inconsistent behaviour among carnivores habitually occupying caves, since they could hardly have failed to dispose of the carcasses over the immediately ensuing period.

The fact that certain caves contain virtually uncountable numbers of bones or, equally abnormally, are choked with the remains of a single animal type, deserves some explanation as to precisely what set of circumstances could have produced such effects.

If steadily worsening conditions preceding the outbreak of whatever slaughtered these animals signalled impending great danger even to the animals themselves, their actions will almost certainly have conformed to the behaviour patterns peculiar to different animal groups. Herbivores will have reacted with typical mass herd reactions; carnivores, canines excepted, as individuals or as limited family groups; and canines, especially wolves and other wild dogs, probably as packs. All creatures, irrespective of the categories to which they naturally belonged, would have instinctively sought shelter, and in many cases caves clearly offered ideal sanctuaries.

Unless the herbivores were large or very numerous, the carnivores would inevitably oust herbivores from caves to usurp their refugia. Herbivores seeking sanctuary would naturally avoid caves already occupied by carnivores and seek alternative shelter. It is not difficult therefore to appreciate how some caves came to be occupied solely by either carnivores or herbivores, and sometimes by just one species of animal.

But examples have been cited where both carnivores and herbivores co-mingled in a single cave, perhaps the only refuge available for miles – the panic-stricken recipients of a common threat among whom natural hostilities were mutually suspended.

The evidence everywhere strongly suggests that all these cave occupants were drowned en masse by violent water action, and in many cases never lived where they were entombed. It is also patently obvious, and will become ever more so as this saga unfolds, that those animals caught outside sanctuaries were also overwhelmed and then swept into and buried within caves and fissures alongside the original occupants, by the same massively destructive agent. This explains the mixture of faunal elements in many caves and fissures, the reason why young and old were slaughtered indiscriminately, and why the bone-cave phenomenon is generally of such worldwide extent. The underlying cause operated as thoroughly in supposedly glaciated areas as it did in those postulated to have laid outside them – and generally similarly in all hemispheres.

Enormous numbers of these animals, though now found in Arctic Siberia, Alaska and other lands now unable to support them, were moved vast distances from their original homelands by swiftly-moving water which transported them tumultuously in as immense moving masses of twisting, churning, water-borne organic debris, mud, silt and boulders. Only such a scenario explains the aforementioned evidence from Alaska, and the astoundingly fissured and shattered bones in the caves of Australasia and elsewhere – invariably buried in the utmost confusion, rammed into the furthest crevices of caves or buried astonishing depths down deeply-tortuous rock fissures.

Collectively, all the foregoing indicates that the pioneer students of these extraordinary remains committed an unfortunate error in inventing cave faunas that never actually existed, even though, as today, certain carnivores do sometimes inhabit caves for indefinite periods. Few, of course, will doubt that occasional lucky carnivore survivors of this traumatic episode (and a handful of these did exist) will, following the general cessation of this suggested stupendous water action, have located carcass-filled caves and fissures, and subsequently used them as ready-made larders. Carnivore tooth-marks on herbivore bones in cave breccias, as at Kirkdale and other caverns, strongly suggest that such occasions did indeed arise here and there in post-diluvial times, with some sites accordingly becoming bear and hyaena dens for unknown periods of time. But overall assessment of the known evidence indicates that such places were not common, even though, as seen later, other more terrible interpretations of the same evidence are possible.

Removal of the Ice Age of orthodoxy, as previously advocated, together with the realisation that most of the animals found in the cave and fissure deposits were never natural denizens of such sites, immediately eliminates the necessity to envisage cave faunas of the kind postulated by conventional treatment of the subject. The absence of such an Ice Age also invalidates those concepts which call for alternating glacial and interglacial interludes and the differing animal assemblages associated with them. In short, such faunas, especially the cave faunas, are illusory.

12

ABNORMAL BURIALS

The mammoths and mastodons mentioned throughout this book belonged to that group of trunk-bearing mammals known as Proboscidea. Unlike the mammoths, mastodons were not true elephants but a separate and generally more primitive proboscidean branch which parallelled them. Very numerous during late Pliocene and 'Pleistocene' times, the dominant form at the time of the great disaster we are alluding to was Mammut (formerly Mastodon).

Originally common in Europe and southern Asia during late Pliocene and early 'Pleistocene' times, Mammut seems to have largely withdrawn from those regions by the close of the 'Pleistocene' period, when, however, it abounded throughout the Americas. Mammut americanum, sometimes referred to as Mastodon giganteus, was the commonest North American species, whereas in South America M andium and M humboldti predominated. The main differences between these species was in their dentition.

Mature individuals of M americanum stood about 9½ft (3m) tall at the shoulders, although occasionally higher stature was attained. The feet had five toes, the great weight of these animals being carried by a large springy pad on the underside of the foot, a feature present even in juveniles. In life, the body was covered with rusty or dun coloured hair, and the tusks, which were large, tended to curve gently upwards. These details are well known because several more or less complete carcasses of these great creatures have been discovered in salt marshes and bogs.

Fig 2.6. Mammut Americanum: the life appearance of the American mastodon, based on buried specimens found in the United States. Illustration from "The Fossil Book" by Carroll Lane Fenton and Mildred Adams Fenton, copyright 1958. Reprinted with permission of Doubleday & Co, Inc.

The youthful appearance of many American mastodon remains is most striking, and has induced the observation that: "Some mastodon skeletons show every evidence that the animals lasted down to very late periods well within 'historic times', as that phrase is construed in Europe..."[306].

There is now no doubt that many mastodons survived in the New World well into Holocene times, when they were seen and hunted by palaeo-Indians. They survived an event that indiscriminately destroyed enormous herds of them, which dismembered and buried countless individuals of all ages and both sexes in great alkaline mud-banks and similar deposits, and which at many localities preserved their battered carcasses nearly as effectively as ice and frost did the Alaskan and Siberian mammoths.

While the northern animals were frozen solid in ground almost instantly reduced to permafrost conditions, the mastodons were entombed in great avalanches of mud and salts that, upon consolidating, often preserved many of their soft parts and sometimes even their stomach contents. Interestingly, while the Siberian and Alaskan mammoth remains often lie near or at the bottom of the 'muck' formation, so these mastodon carcasses frequently occur at or near the base of the North American bogs and marshes, which themselves often occupy hollows in the 'drift'[307]. The two sets of deposits thus appear to be essentially complimentary, and their origin probably a more or less simultaneous result of a common paroxysmal event, as mastodon and mammoth remains have been found at some localities lying alongside each other. Thus:

> In America the mastodon deposits are diluvial, and agree in position with those containing Elephas primigenius (in Eurasia)[308].

Among the first recorded discoveries of mastodons with preserved soft parts were five individuals found some 3 miles (4.8km) from the Ohio River by the Shawany Indians in 1762. Dr Warren, a diligent recorder of many early finds, mentions that: "...In digging a well near the entrance of the Wabash into the Ohio, there were found some bones of a mastodon... in company with skin and hair"[309].

Accompanying another skeleton found elsewhere were large pieces of skin resembling "fresh-tanned leather"[310]. The freshness of these mastodon soft parts is not unique, nor indeed peculiar to mastodons, but applies equally to the vegetable remains often found with them. Thus, occurring with a mastodon skeleton discovered in Orange County, New York state, in 1845, was a:

> ...mass of broken twigs, etc, lying beneath the pelvic bones... in quantity about five or six bushels; towards the posterior portion, it presented three traces of convolutions, passing in a straight column of four inches diameter through the pelvic orifice, and behind the ischium terminating in a homogeneous mass, evidently of a foecal character.[311]

A year earlier, several mastodon skeletons came to light in a natural basin at Hackett's Town, New Jersey, affording evidence of stomach contents[312], and a further instance occurred somewhat later at Newburgh on the Hudson River, when a mass of crushed twigs was observed between the ribs of a mastodon found there[313]. Yet another discovery of the same ilk occurred near Jamestown, New York state, in August 1871. The find was examined in situ by, among others, Prof S G Love, whose report, cited in Hartnagel and Bishop's valuable survey of New York mastodon discoveries[314], is well worth reading.

Microscopical examination of samples of these stomach contents revealed that the Newburgh mastodon apparently fed on hemlock-spruce[315] and that the Hackett's Town mastodons had evidently eaten young shoots of the white cedar[316]. It must be relevant, therefore, that white cedar wood is prominent in the previously noted subterranean forests of mid-western North America, which perished suddenly and were buried deep under 'drift' deposits.

The calamitously abrupt character of this event is underscored by the unexpected positions in which several virtually complete mastodon skeletons have been discovered. For example, nearly all the skeletons found in the deposits in the valley of the Great Osage river were in a nearly vertical position[317]; and James Southall says that, since early colonial days, many others have been met with standing erect just below the surface of swamps or bogs[318]. Again in the Newburgh mastodon: "The anterior extremities were extended under and in front of the head... The posterior extremities were extended forward under the body"[319].

And of another discovered in Monmouth County, New Jersey, in 1823, we read that:

> ...its vertebral column, with all its joints and ribs attached to them in their natural position, lay about eight or ten inches below the surface. The scapula rested upon the heads of the humeri, and these in a vertical position upon the bones of the fore-arm, as in life. The fore-arm was still buried. It inclined a little backwards, and the foot which was immediately below it was placed in advance of the other, as it would be if the animal had been walking. The four feet rested on the sandy stratum underlying the black earth in which the animal was embedded.[320] [Our italics].

Likewise, Van Rensselaer, discussing a mastodon skeleton found in 1823 near Long Branch, New Jersey, reported that: "Its position... was vertical, the feet resting on a stratum of sand and gravel, and the head to the west-south-west[321].

Elsewhere, mastodons have been discovered in other strange positions. Warren says the remains of the Hackett's Town specimens were:

> ...found covered from four to six feet deep, except the largest, which lay near the south-east side of the basin, and were but slightly covered. A few feet to the north of > this lay the next in size on its back, and a little to the north and west of this the other two, both as if in a standing position; and the calf was found in a similar position near the north side of the basin... The question very naturally occurs, 'How and when did so many of these large animals become embedded in this narrow space?' – questions more easily asked than answered. My first conjecture, before seeing the place, was, that they had been mired in attempting to reach a spring or lick; but the small extent and shallowness of the basin, and the gradual descent and character of its bottom (which... is perfectly solid... closely paved with rolled stones...) all forbid such a supposition.[322] [Our italics].

Even if these animals were mired – which, contrary to evidence, is still the most popular explanation – it is exceedingly difficult to conceive how, once stuck fast in thick mud, even a powerful animal like a mastodon could manage to turn itself upside-down and become buried 'on its back'. Certainly it might fall to one side and remain there for evermore, but not upside-down. The solid nature of the underlying strata is also interesting and repeated at many sites. That these animals may have sensed the catastrophe about to engulf them is possibly indicated by the curiously repeated south-west to north-east alignment of many of their remains[323]. Were they turning to face or to avoid a threat so enormous and sudden that in many instances there was not even time for them to be knocked over by it? Certainly we agree with Warren's observation that:

> The cause of the disappearance of the mastodon seems to be mysterious. We are... disposed to believe that an animal of so large a size, of so great a strength and such extensive distribution... must have required some great and general catastrophe to overwhelm and annihilate it.[324]

That water was a major element in that catastrophe has been traced at other North American mastodon sites. Thus, around a salt-marsh at Saltville in Virginia containing the remains of mastodon, Mammuthus primigenius and numerous other coeval animals and freshwater clams, many large angular blocks of jasperoid lying on the lower slopes of the hills rimming the marsh are "distinctly water-worn". Significantly, many of the clams still retain their iridescent nacreous shell layer as well as the periostracum[325], so geologically recent was their demise.

As well as mastodons, other contemporary animals retaining portions of their soft parts have been found in these North American bogs and marshes. Articular cartilage and tendinous attachments occurred on bones of a giant feline (Megalonyx) described by Dr Leidy in 1859[326], and soft parts adhered to the remains of a peccary found in a saltpetre deposit in Kentucky. But it is in the frozen ground of Siberia and Alaska that the most famous discoveries of this kind have been made.

The millions of animals that perished during the terrible convulsions which terminated the so-called 'Pleistocene' times were nowhere more dramatically preserved than in Siberia[375]. There, the picture is everywhere one of appalling disorder, carnage and wholesale destruction, with countless animals and plants frozen in positions of death ever since the day they perished. As a result, their remains are amazingly fresh-looking and are frequently indistinguishable from those of animals and plants that have died mere weeks ago. Here and there amid the chaotic masses of organic debris occur whole or partial carcasses of a wide array of late 'Pleistocene' animals – the Arctic equivalents of the mastodon cadavers just mentioned, and just as informative. These Siberian examples, however, have been deposited in particularly noteworthy fashion.

In the Lyakhov Islands, for instance, there exists an extensive lower layer of granular ice, 70ft (21m) thick, not formed from compacted snow, and directly overlying this is a layer of clayey freshwater material enclosing numberless tusks and skins of mammoths together with the refrigerated corpses of musk-ox, horse, rhinoceros, American stag, antelope, reindeer, tiger and other mammoths[327]. One of the mammoth carcasses found here was of special interest in that its remains had been smashed before coming to rest, for pieces of it were distributed around the main body of the specimen and much of its hair had been removed and its skin badly cut and excoriated[328]. Its mode of burial had obviously been exceedingly violent.

This singular depositional sequence is evidently extraordinarily widespread, for it is encountered many hundreds of miles distant in the valley of the Berezovka river. There, a mammoth carcass excavated in the middle Kolyma region in 1901, at a place by riverside cliffs, lay in a depression in fossil ice into which it had apparently been partially thrust. Great quantities of blood had flowed from the acute wounds it had suffered at the time of death, and this had congealed and frozen solid along with the dismembered tail of a bovine animal which was found immediately below the mammoth's right forefoot[329]. Not very far distant in the same district, the perfectly preserved upper part of a horse's skull, complete with muscle fibres, was found buried between the trunks of larch trees protruding from the river banks[330], while further east, in the valley of the Indigirka River, similar mangled animal remains have come to light.

Still further east, in the Yana valley, an allegedly complete carcass of a horse or pony was found during the late 1890's in frozen soil on the banks of a tundra lake north of Verkhoyansk. The specimen, which was never collected, is said to have possessed long greyish-white hair[331].

Very interestingly, Sir Roderick Murchison, reporting on the results of a then-recent expedition down the Yenisei River, recorded that:

> During the progress of this expedition the important discovery has been made of entire skeletons of mammoths, whose skin and hair has been preserved in frozen mud... the heads of these extinct elephants were, for the most part turned towards the south, as if the animals had been retreating southwards when caught either by inundation proceeding from the North Polar region... for when we travel southwards, we find mammoth remains becoming much scarcer, and instead of whole animals, we meet with their broken and disjointed bones only, as if they had been transported from the north.[332]

This closely parallels the previously-noted observations about the disposition of the upright mastodon carcasses and skeletons.

That water moving on a gigantic scale was indeed involved with these widespread extinctions is suggested by the head of a woolly rhinoceros, Coelodonta tichorhinus, discovered in 1771 near the Vilyui (Wiliui) River north of Yakutsk. Prof A F Brandt of Berlin wrote:

> On a careful examination of the head... it was... remarkable that the blood-vessels and even the fine capillaries were... filled with brown coagulated blood which in many places still preserved its red colour[333].

Asphyxia, either by drowning or suffocation, invariably induces gorging of the capillaries with blood. Brandt's analysis of the matrix adhering to this particular rhinoceros established drowning as the cause of death, and showed that it was buried with fragments of freshwater Pleistocene plants[334]. It must be relevant that buried masses of ancient ice occur, encasing the carcasses of mammoths and their contemporaries as at Berezovka, elsewhere along the Vilyui valley.

During the late 1700s, Pallas visited large areas of Siberia. In the Irtish River valley, he found sub-fossilised shells of living species no longer thriving at such latitudes. Many still preserved their horny pelicles and some retained traces of the molluscs themselves. Bones of mammoths and other extinct animals occurred in the same formation, and nearby the heads of great fishes and pieces of cellular bone of unidentifiable origin[335]. Elsewhere he saw a petrified jaw-bone coated with mussels[336]. He regarded these as having "...come from a great inundation"[337].

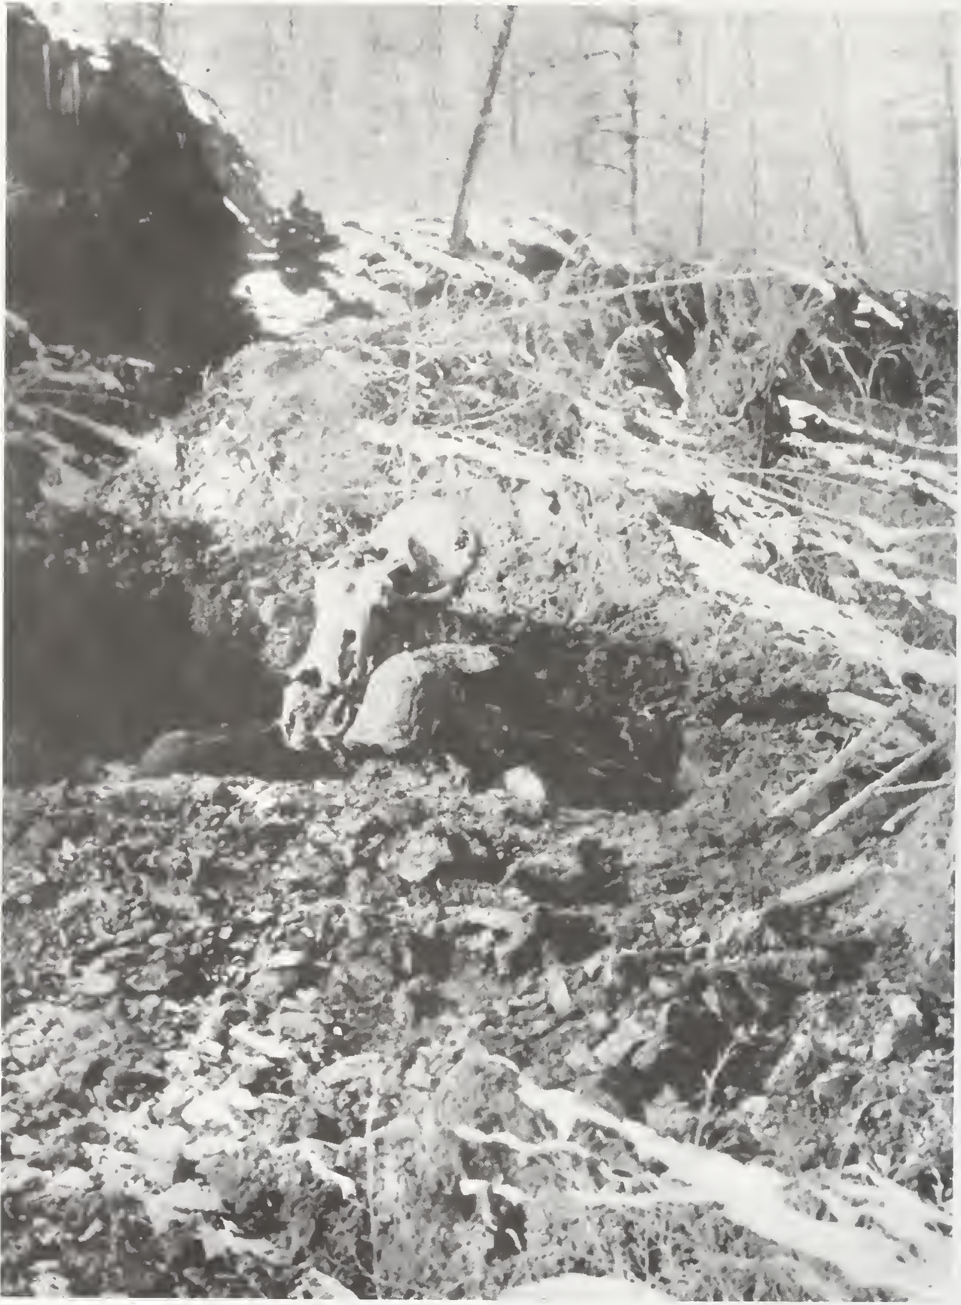

Fig 2.7. Frozen Mammoth of the Berezovka.
Photo by J Kirchner. By permission of the American Museum of Natural History.

If yet further evidence is needed, we can mention the discovery of a whale skeleton far inland on the Chukchee peninsula in north-eastern Siberia, still partially covered by skin, with deep red, almost fresh flesh adhering to many of its bones[338]. River floods had partly eroded the frozen sand enveloping this individual the preceding winter, and as exposure of the carcass to even one summer's sun would have induced putrefaction long ago, there could be no doubt of the specimen's very great antiquity. It was found at the same level as the bones of mammoths and other 'Pleistocene' mammals.

An almost identical picture emerges in neighbouring Alaska, where, in the 'muck' beds:

> The excellent state of preservation of many of the bones, the recent decay of animal matter shown by the existing odour, quantities of hair found in contact with a mammoth's skull, the occurrence of the outer sheath of bison's horns, and the finding of vertebrae of bovine animals lying in their proper order of sequence, render it probable that entire carcasses were deposited, and that congelation followed close upon their entombment.[339] (Our italics).

Furthermore:

> Most of the bodies of the animals had been torn and twisted by some violent cataclysm before being frozen in the enveloping muck... The archaeologists also found mammoth's meat which was still in an edible state.[340]

Richardson and Hibben, who made these observations, wrote before the more recent discovery of a partial carcass of a frozen baby mammoth in the Alaskan 'muck' beds[341], a find fully justifying Richardson's speculations over a century ago. This discovery is not unique, however, for in the summer of 1977 the refrigerated carcass of another baby mammoth, believed to be geologically older than its American counterpart, was exhumed near Madagan in eastern Siberia[342].

Among other Alaskan evidence may be mentioned the frozen carcass of a young musk-ox[343], and the partially complete frozen cadavers of bison, several felines, various deer and a wide range of other contemporaries of the mammoth found at localities scattered across the state's western terrain[344]

Similar burials occur even in Europe. A complete rhinoceros carcass preserved in an oil-saturated deposit has been found in Poland, and several mammoth skeletons or partial carcasses have been found in European Russia standing upright in consolidated silty mud. Of the latter, the best known examples were discovered at Swijatosski near St Petersburg in 1775[345], another near the same city about 1826[346], and one at Troitzkoe near Moscow in 1846, associated with plant fragments, fish scales and bones and pieces of coal[347]. All were reminiscent of the finds of erect mastodons in North America.

Unquestionably the Siberian and Alaskan animals and plants were the common victims of a catastrophe which afflicted both countries with equal force and produced similar results – results remarkably similar to those already noted at many Asiatic, European, North American and Australasian bone-caves and fissures, where entire or partially whole animals were also tumultuously entombed in the flesh. This aspect of the fossil evidence, whether encountered at allegedly glaciated localities or not, is impressively consistent worldwide.

On the basis of present mollusc distribution, the testimony of the now-vanished northern forests, the evidence of the lost Miocene Ocean and the central Siberian pollen record, northern latitudes were much warmer than today[348]. Quite clearly, therefore, the mammoth and its companions did not live during an Ice Age. They were the victims of an event which produced one, and which, in Siberia and Alaska, either transported their remains into arctic latitudes, or invested those latitudes with glacial conditions.

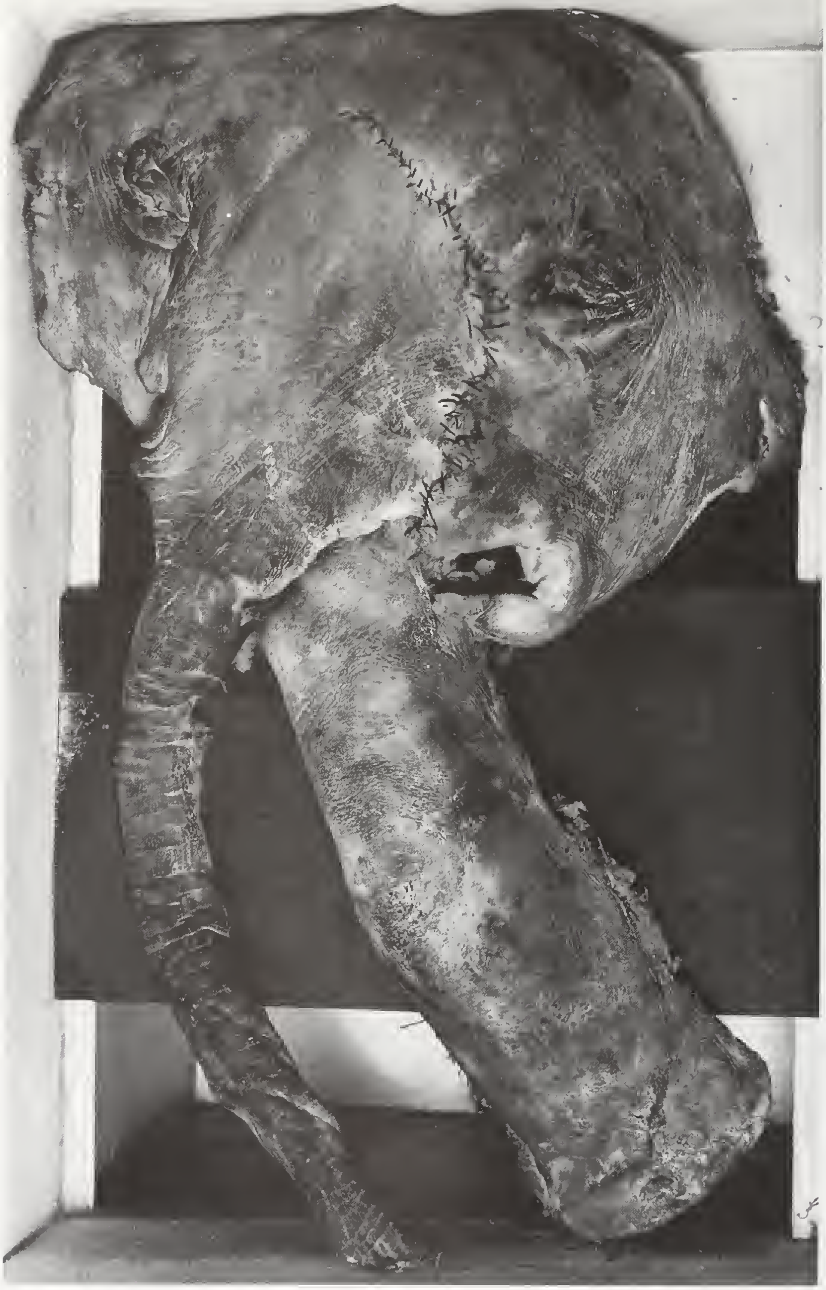

Fig 2.8. Trunk, head and forelimbs of frozen baby woolly mammoth, Alaska.
By permission of the American Museum of Natural History.

ossil remains of an (mammoth)
's tusk dug out of th at Baring Straits
March 1868
10cm

Fig 2.9. Part of a mammoth tusk, Alaska, found in 1868. Courtesy of the Univ of Southampton.

13

INCOMPATIBLE BEDFELLOWS

If upright skeletons and amazingly preserved frozen animals are prominent facets of the 'Pleistocene' biological record, so too is the following remarkable evidence from California, South America and Africa.

The previously-mentioned asphalt and tarseeps in California, which contain such a varied assortment of birds, are also the cemeteries for a rich assemblage of late 'Pleistocene' faunal and floral life. The most spectacular discoveries have occurred at Rancho La Brea. There, the remains are packed tightly together into an almost unbelievable conglomeration: "...a bed of bones... in which the number of sabre-tooth and wolf skulls together averaged twenty per cubic yard"[349].

So abundant were the remains that between 1906, when systematic excavations first began, and 1931, no fewer than 700 skulls had been retrieved of the sabre-toothed tiger (Smilodon) alone[350]. Accompanying these was a quite staggering profusion of bones and teeth belonging to horses, camels, bison, mastodons, mammoths, rodents, coyotes, wolves, sloths and numerous other mammals and birds[351]. Initially accorded a late Pliocene antiquity, later studies showed these remains to be coeval with late 'Pleistocene' plants collected from the Carpinteria asphalts. Very significantly, these plants proved to be typical of a Recent flora now only thriving 200 miles (320km) further north[352].

The exceptional number of animals at Rancho La Brea is usually explained thus: some animal stuck fast in the tar, crying out, attracted mammalian and avian carnivores anxious to secure an easy meal, but these in turn, also becoming ensnared in the sticky trap, joined their hoped for meals, the grim cycle being repeated innumerable times. This interpretation, however, is badly at odds with the facts, for, as Prof Merriam has observed:

> As the greater number of the animals... have been entrapped in the tar, it is to be presumed that in a large percentage of cases the major portion of the skeleton has been preserved. Contrary to expectations, connected skeletons are not common.[353] (Our italics).

Admittedly the bones are splendidly preserved as far as their often fragmentary state allows[354], but are, like their counterparts in the Alaskan 'muck' beds: "...broken, mashed, contorted, and mixed in a most heterogeneous mass, such as could never have resulted from the chance trapping and burial of a few stragglers"[355].

These animals were apparently buried violently in an already dismembered condition. Interestingly, a human skull, found among these animals, was assigned to 'Ice Age' times as the associated animal remains were of supposedly similar antiquity. The skull, however, is typical of normal crania in living Amerindians, a point of particular significance when we come to consider our next Californian discovery.

Shortly after the mid-nineteenth century discovery of gold in California, a succession of noteworthy finds occurred at several places where auriferous gravels, underlying lava-capped mountain ridges, were mined or tunnelled into for the precious metal. Of these finds Dr G F Wright has left us the following interesting account:

> As early as 1863 Dr Snell of Sonora began a systematic collection of animal and human > remains from the mines in his vicinity. In his collection were several objects marked as 'from under Table Mountain', among which was a human jaw...

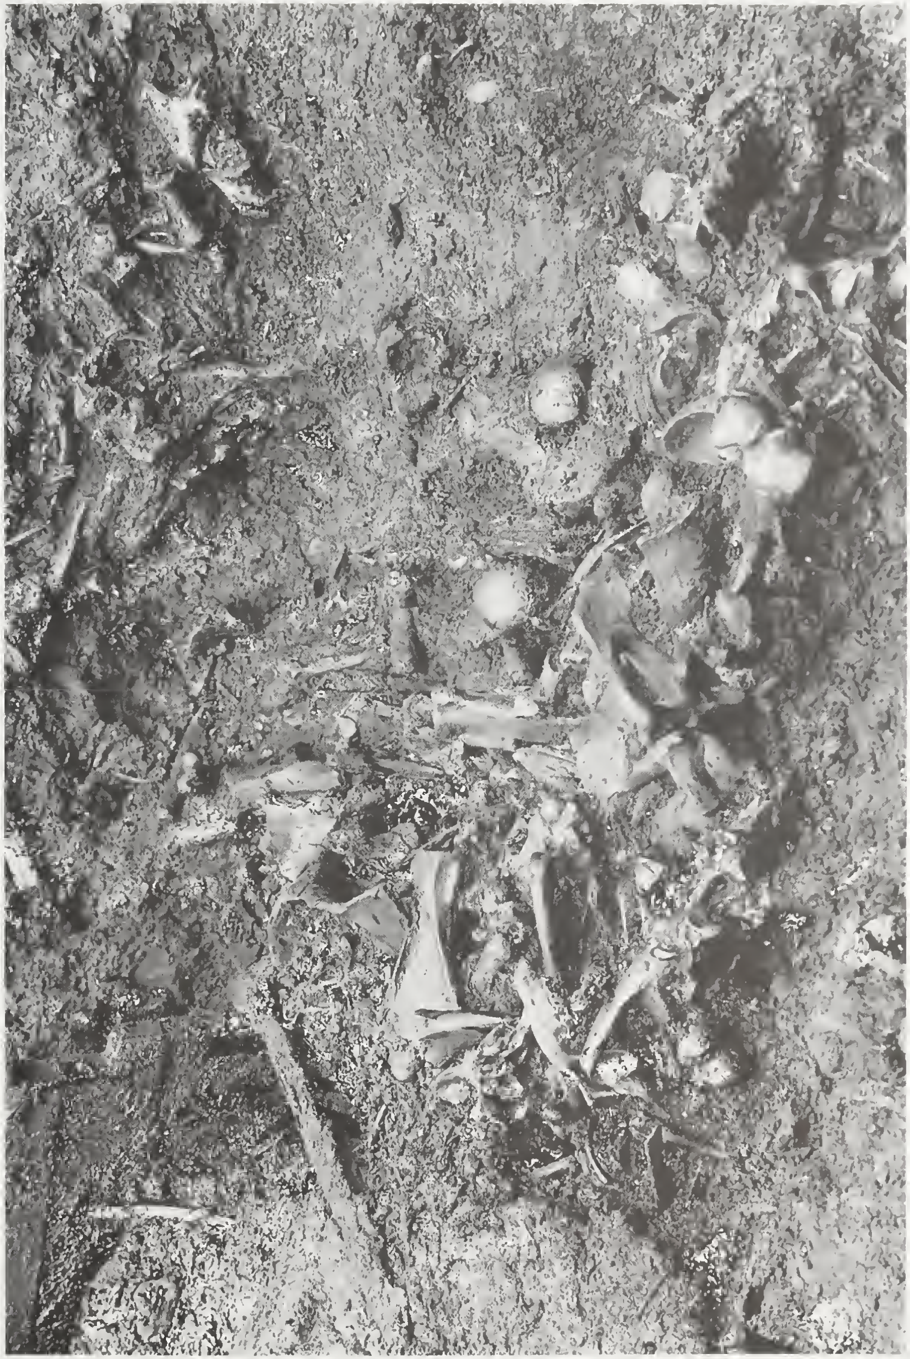

Fig 2.10. Part of the great accumulation of bones at the Rancho La Brea tar-pits, near Los Angeles, California. Note the disarticulated condition of the remains and their confused disposition within the tar. Photo by R S Lull. By permission of the Museum Archives, Los Angeles County Museum of Natural History, California.

>
> In 1857 Hon Paul Hubbs, of Vallejo... picked a portion of a human skull out of the dirt as it was brought from the Valentine Shaft, under Table Mountain, near Shaw's Flat...
>
> Ten years after, Mr Hubbs more fully detailed the circumstances of the discovery, and Professor Whitney and Gorham Blake Esq, made special examination of the locality and careful enquiries of the owners of the mine, and satisfied themselves that the bone really came from under the basaltic covering of Table Mountain... All this is preliminary to the famous Calaveras skull...[356]

The Calaveras skull was found by a certain Mr Mattison during February 1866 next to a petrified conifer 60–80ft (18–25m) long within gravel in a mine tunnel underlying 40ft (12m) of basalt capping Table Mountain near Altaville. It was originally mistaken for a petrified tree-stump as it was so encrusted with earth and stony matter[357]. However:

> ...the appearance of the skull in every way corroborated his (Mattison's) statement. The original incrustation shows that it was not taken from a cave... Fragments of bones and gravel and shells, were so wedged into the cavities of the skull... that there could be no mistake as to the character of the situation in which it was found. Chemical analysis showed that organic matter was nearly absent, and... (that the skull) was in a fossilised condition[358].

Wright also observed:

> ...the Calaveras skull, which, if genuine, far antedates anything human which has been discovered in Europe, is not of a particularly inferior order...[359].

Earlier scholars dated the skull as Pliocene because among other finds made under Table Mountain were the remnants of the typical Pliocene horse Hipparion[360], not recognised as having survived into late Pleistocene times until much later[361]. Today, the Table Mountain gravels are usually regarded as Pleistocene, while in some quarters the Calaveras skull has, despite much evidence to the contrary, been interpreted as that of a modern rather than a fossil man[362]. Other human remains, reportedly found in another mine tunnelled under Table Mountain[363], were certainly fossil, being associated with late 'Pleistocene' plants and the bones of mastodons and its contemporaries believedly deposited by "tumultuous waters"[364].

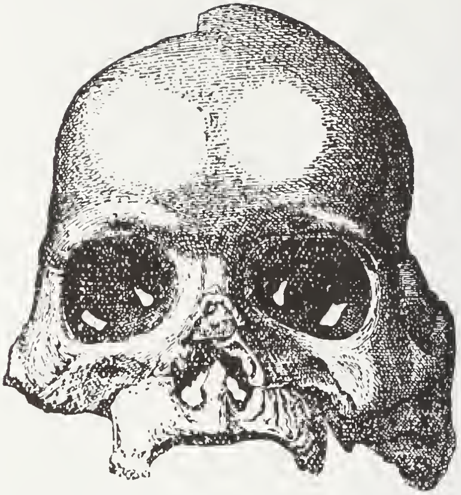

Fig 2.11. The Calaveras skull (after Whitney).

Great natural convulsions must also have been responsible for the disposition of whales and other marine creatures on the crests of mountains in various other parts of California. Thus Hay quotes Dr Steven Bowers as stating:

> Bones of whales and other cetaceans are met with in various portions of the county [Ventura county], especially along the sides and crests of the Santa Paula mountains.

> On the summit of this range, at an altitude of 2,000ft, the remains of a large seal, probably Eumetopias stelleri (E jubata), were obtained...[365].

Bowers assigned a Pliocene age to the deposits containing these remains, but Hay and others have shown that they date from later 'Pleistocene' times – in which case the deposition of cetaceans at such altitudes during times so geologically recent can only have proceeded under conditions that, elsewhere, would be termed catastrophic.

Animal fossils from the San Pedro Valley, California, present apparently anomalous faunal mixtures of much interest. Included are Miocene sharks, seals and porpoises, allegedly early Pleistocene sea-lions and land vertebrates, species of molluscs, sea-urchins, bryozoans and foraminifera which are still flourishing but unknown as fossils before Pleistocene times, and numerous late Pleistocene mammals and birds[366]. These are classic examples of 'old' and 'new' organisms coexisting in incompatible habitats or being assembled tumultuously and consigned to a common grave.

Last century, Prof P M Duncan, studying the Lake Titicaca basin of Andean Peru/Bolivia, noted the existence of siluroid, cyprinoid and other marine fishes in the lake, and that corals attached to rocks underlying the extensive nitrate deposits along the presently waterless Peruvian coast west of the lake represent existing species[367]. Today these corals lie 2,500–3,000ft (769–923m) above sea level. This region, however, which must once have lain much lower, is believed to have been well-wooded in the recent past and to have supported a rich and varied fauna. Numerous skeletons of forest-dwelling ant-eaters strewn across what is now the desert of Tarapaca eloquently testify to this[368].

Some unexpected 'late' occurrences of geologically 'old' animals have been reported from equatorial Africa. For example, in 1931, a portion of an articulated skeleton of the Miocene elephant Deinotherium was found in 'Pleistocene' deposits at Olduvai (Oldoway), Kenya, associated with shells of species still thriving in those latitudes. The skeleton occurred: "...in conditions which preclude the possibility that it is derivative"[369].

Other Deinotherium bones and teeth had previously been observed near Ngeti close to the Ugandan border with the then Congo territories (Zaire) by the Belgian geologist Delpierre, in beds which: "...on other evidence, he was convinced are of Pleistocene date. He affirmed, too, that these most unexpected fossils were not derived"[370].

More recently, further Deinotherium remains were retrieved from supposedly 'early Pleistocene' beds near Teleki volcano, Kenya, along with bones of a Machairodont lion, a large mustelid, Hyaena cf namaquensis, a hare, Tatera, Hystrix, a mastodon, a primitive elephant, several pigs, an extinct rhinoceros, a horse (Stylohipparion), a hippopotamus, a large giraffe, an okapi, various bovines, two kinds of crocodile, three species of tortoise (one of great size) and numerous fishes[371].

Recent reports and photographic records from an enclosed valley in the Nepalese Himalayas of a herd of living elephants apparently allied on the one hand to the Stegodon, a Pliocene and early 'Pleistocene' Asiatic ancestor of the modern elephants[372], and on the other, to Stegomaston, a mastodont genus as yet certainly known only from the early Pleistocene of the Americas[373], suggest an even more interesting instance of late survival of an animal extinct elsewhere, and that 'out-of-place' fossils like the Is-Shantün cave Miocene shark teeth and the Deinotherium remains just noted are indeed highly germane to the subject of this book.

Although little is presently known about them or their significance to general proboscidean evolution[374], these elephants almost certainly represent relict animals isolated in their present remote domain through the huge topographical changes wrought in the Himalayan region about 11,000 years ago by the great catastrophe here being unveiled – as we have seen in Part One.

Naturalists offer different explanations for these finds of antiquated species lying alongside those of geologically more modern aspect, frequently interpreting them as much on supposed geophysical grounds as on their anomalous biological character. Such assemblages,

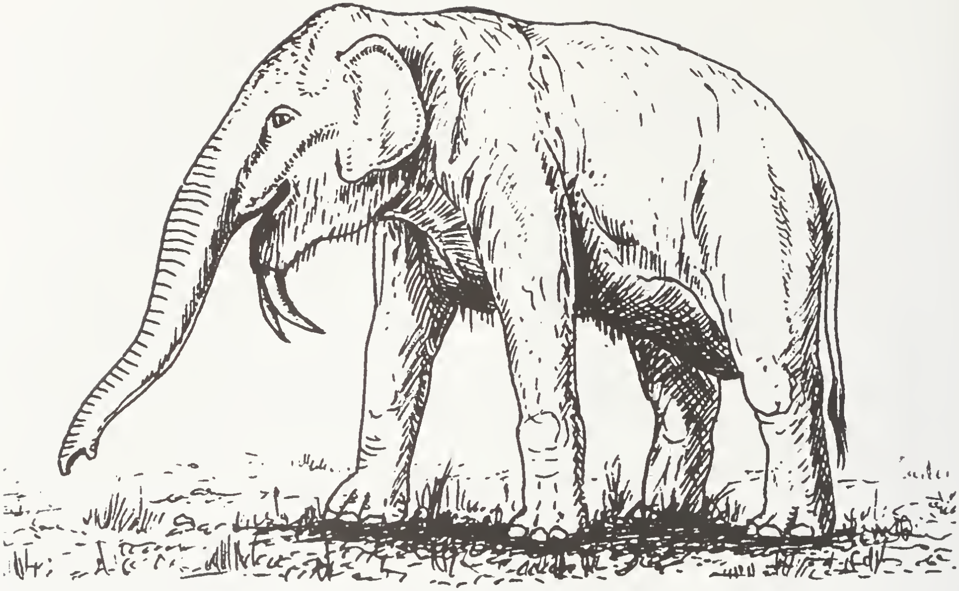

Fig 2.12. Deinotherium, which reached a height of 10ft (3m) at the shoulders. It possessed no upper tusks, but large lower tusks curved downwards and backwards. It probably had a long trunk. Original drawing by J B Delair.

both plant and animal, recur in nearly all latitudes, and were apparently produced more or less synchronously everywhere. Thus attributing the evidence from higher, colder latitudes to 'glacial' conditions is as questionable as ascribing evidence from lower, warmer latitudes to non-'glacial' causes. Non-'glacial' causes are advocated solely because of the assumed existence of extensive and chimerical northern ice-sheets. Neither non-existent northern 'glacial' conditions nor southern non-'glacial' causes are valid scenarios, and some alternative agency responsible for creating the recorded effects must be brought to light.

The evidence itself is perfectly unambiguous. Along with the removal of an 'Ice Age' like that which has been hitherto commonly envisaged, the evidence strongly suggests that there is something seriously amiss with the last phases of standard geological chronology. Whatever is amiss is intimately associated with the appalling extinctions, abnormal burials and the apparently endless instances worldwide of so-called 'contradictory' (or incompatible) field evidence. A deeper, but brief review of these chronological factors unquestionably reinforces this impression.

14

A REVISED GEOLOGICAL CHRONOLOGY?

The diverse geological and biological evidence (fossil and extant) we have examined thus 'far converges on the fact that stupendous worldwide geophysical changes have occurred geologically very recently. It also highlights the fact that an impressive range of plant and animal forms (each identical or nearly so) now distributed discontinuously in different regions of the world represent floras and faunas so lately dislocated that insufficient time has elapsed for new species to have developed within their ranks. These changes were evidentially sudden and violent, the present topographical conditions in the world being their principal visible legacy – and all living things the descendants of the animals and plants which survived them.

The testimony of the fossils, moreover, reveals that biological decimations were wholesale and without regard to the biological classes, numbers, sizes, ages, sexes, or health of the victims. Many organisms perished literally where they stood, being suddenly buried erect or even in walking positions – or were permanently frozen with singular rapidity following their demise.

Thus, not only these annihilations but also the deposition of many enveloping deposits ('drift') were catastrophically sudden. These deposits, usually attributed to prolonged and massive ice-action, often overspread extensive tracts of land, ignoring pre-existing topography – and they are sometimes immensely thick. Their accumulation, therefore, occurred on a colossal scale, both in terms of volume and linear extent.

Extraordinary speed, huge scale, great violence and indiscriminate action are therefore equally prominent factors in both the geological and the biological records of the period under review.

Typical 'drift' deposits occur far outside allegedly glaciated regions, or, conversely, are absent from many others believed to have been heavily glaciated. Abnormally buried organic remains in otherwise typical 'drift' deposits often occur in latitudes inimicable to large-scale ice-action. These are inescapable facts strongly militating against the popular explanation of the origin of these great deposits.

As noted previously, a special geological 'period', the Pleistocene, was erected by geologists expressly to embrace these formations, on the basis of the real existence of these former glaciations. Since, however, ice-action is by nature very slow, the time allocated for these glaciations and the resultant 'drift' accumulations has been correspondingly long. Accordingly, it has been common to reserve a span of two or more million years for the duration of the Pleistocene 'period'. Such concepts are seriously at variance with the field evidence, for if the glaciations of orthodoxy (the 'Ice Age') never really existed, and if the singular 'drift' deposits accredited to them were accumulated at comparatively great speed, then the duration of the Pleistocene epoch must actually have been unexpectedly brief.

Repeated discoveries in 'drift' deposits of mixed floras and faunas, simultaneously involve climatically-incompatible 'northern' and 'southern' species, modern and ancient biota, or forms which no longer flourish at the latitudes where their remains now occur. These loudly proclaim a sudden and violent extinction. The disposition of land and sea must also have differed markedly before the onset of these changes, and equally different meteorological conditions formerly existed, profoundly affecting the geographical distribution and general abundance of faunas and floras.

With the elimination of an Ice Age of conventional conception, and observing that many supposedly typical 'Ice Age' animals (eg, mammoth, woolly rhinoceros, etc) were not actually well adapted to glacial conditions, the faunas and floras found in Pleistocene 'drift' deposits must in reality have flourished during the preceding Pliocene period (see Appendix A).

The generally equable conditions characteristic of Pliocene times were highly favourable to the development and proliferation of life-forms of all kinds, and in that respect did not materially differ from the equally genial Miocene period which preceded it. A mixture of ancient (Miocene) and less ancient (Pliocene) organisms – including allegedly Arctic species – thrived side by side, therefore, throughout Pliocene times, persisting until its brief, sudden and cataclysmic close about 11,500 years ago – when, concomitantly with the deposition of the 'drift', they were slaughtered wholesale.

For these reasons, typical Miocene and Pliocene species occur with surprising frequency alongside those of supposedly younger 'Pleistocene' age, or figure alongside various specially adapted organisms now enjoying geographically discontinuous distribution. The occurrence of Miocene and Pliocene plants and animals, such as Deinotherium, Hipparion, Eumetopias, and Carcharodon, in late 'Pleistocene' deposits, or the survival of various living animals and plants having comparably ancient origins, thus ceases to surprise. We know of no other scheme which satisfactorily or comprehensively accounts for such otherwise anomalous biological occurrences.

Instead of being a distinct geological epoch of appreciable duration, the Pleistocene (as epitomised by the 'drift' formations and attendant phenomena) appears therefore to have been little more than a rather brief 'stage'. The time allegedly occupied by the glacial and interglacial episodes of conventional Pleistocene chronology was actually non-existent. Conversely, the

Table 2C

Revised chronology for the Tertiary and Quaternary periods in the light of the Phaeton disaster

ERAS	PERIODS	EPOCHS	STAGES	GENERAL CONDITIONS	Approx DATES (in years BP)
CAENOZOIC	QUATERNARY	HOLOCENE (Later)	HISTORIC	As at present	2,300-today
			SUB-ATLANTIC	Dry mild	2,700-2,300
			ATLANTIC	Wet mild	3,450-2,700
			BOREAL	Dry cold winters Warm summers GLACIERS MELT	5,500-4,900
		HOLOCENE (Earlier)	PRE-BOREAL	Dry cold	8,000-7,500
			SUB-ARCTIC	Wet cold	11,400
			PLEISTOCENE	Severe. Rapid development of glaciers	11,500
	Pheaton Disaster
	TERTIARY	PLIOCENE		Equable	14,000,000
		MIOCENE		Equable	29,000,000

Dates based on the latest available evidence

Pliocene period persisted to very much more recent times than has hitherto been commonly supposed.

The unique character of the 'drift' deposits, the 'erratics', 'roches moutonnées', and supposed glacial striations, however, is such that they merit a distinctive chronological 'compartment'. The term 'Pleistocene' is therefore retained as a 'stage' rather than an 'epoch' appellation, and is given that stature in the chronological revision summarised above in table 2C.

REFERENCES

1. Jack, R L. 1877. "Glacial Drift in the North-Eastern Carpathians", Q Jl Geol Soc Lond, vol 33, pp673–681; see p673.
2. Phillips, J. 1863. "The Antiquity of Man", Q Rev, vol cxiv, pp368–417; p378.
3. Schröter, C. 1882. Flora der Eiszeit (Zürich), 41pp; p14.
4. Lubbock, J. 1896. The Scenery of Switzerland, and the causes to which it is due (London), 2nd edn; p125.
5. Anker, M J. 1834. "The occurrence of Bones of Animals in a Coal Mine in Styria", Proc Geol Soc Lond, vol 1, p467.
6. Stevenson, J J. 1913. "The Formation of Coal Beds: IV", Proc Am Phil Soc, vol lii, pp31–162.
7. Scharff, R F. 1899. The History of the European Fauna (London), vii + 364pp; pp76–77.
8. Fielden, H W. 1894. "Notes on a small collection of Spitzbergen plants", Trans Norfolk Norwich Nat Hist Soc, vol 6, p51.
9. Ball, J. 1879. "On the Origin of the Flora of the European Alps", Proc Roy Geogr Soc Lond, vol 1, p576.
10. Scharff, R F. 1899. Op cit, p78.
11. Engler, A. 1879. Versuch einer Entwicklungsgeschichte d. extratrop. Florengebiete d. Nördlichen Hemisphäre, Leipzig, 2 vols, vol 1, p130.
12. Hooker, J D. 1862. "Outlines of the Distribution of the Arctic Plants", Trans Linn Soc Lond, vol xxiii, p252.
13. Krasan, F. 1896. "Zur Abstammungsgeschichte d. autochthonen Pflanzenarten", Mitt Naturw Ver Steierm, p37.
14. Trümpy, R. 1980. Geology of Switzerland: a guidebook. Part A: An outline of the Geology of Switzerland, Basel, 104pp; p51.
15. Scharff, R F. 1899. Op cit.
16. Saporta, G de. 1874. "Sur l'existence constatée du Figuires aux environs de Paris à l`époque quaternaire", Bull Geol Soc Fr, ser 3, vol II, pp439–443.
17. Lubbock, J. 1865. Prehistoric Times, London, xxiii + 512pp.
18. Geikie, J. 1881. Prehistoric Europe, London, xviii + 502pp.
19. Mortillet, G de, & A de Mortillet. 1900. Le Préhistorique. Origine et Antiquité de l'homme, Paris, 3rd edn, xxii + 709pp.
20. Zeuner, F E. 1959. The Pleistocene Period, London, xviii + 447pp.
21. West, R G. 1977. Pleistocene Geology and Biology, (London), rev edn, xi + 440pp.
22. Nilsson, H. 1983. The Pleistocene: Geology and Life in the Quaternary Ice Age, (Dordrecht, Boston, London), 651pp.
23. Pearsall, J I. 1854. "On changes observed in wood from the submerged Forest at Wawne, in Holderness", Rep Brit Assoc Advmt Sci, Hull, p45.
24. Denny, H. 1854. "On the remains of the Hippopotamus found in the Aire Valley deposits near Leeds", Rep Brit Assoc Advmt Sci, Hull, pp51–2.
25. Trollope, E. 1858. "On the Fens and Submarine Forests of Lincolnshire and other localities", Rep Brit Assoc Advmt Sci, Leeds, pp113–4; p114.
26. Trollope, E, 1858, "The Alluvial Lands and Submarine Forests of Lincolnshire", The Geologist, vol 1, pp501–4; p501.
27. 'Silex'. 1860. "Mammalian remains near Salisbury", The Geologist, vol 3, p77.
28. Forrest, H E. 1935. The Atlantean Continent: its bearing on the Great Ice Age and the distribution of species, (London), 2nd edn, 352pp; pp297–301.
29. Forrest, H E. 1935. Op cit, p297.
30. Scharff, R F. 1909. "On the Evidence of a former land-bridge between Northern Europe and North America", Proc Roy Irish Acad, sect B, vol xxviii, pp1–28.
31. Scharff, R F. 1902. "Some remarks on the Atlantis Problem", Proc Roy Irish Acad, sect B, vol xxiv, pp268–302.
32. Forrest, H E. 1935. Op cit, p245.
33. Scharff, R F. 1899. Op cit, p245.
34. Hull, E. 1912. The Sub-oceanic Physiography of the North Atlantic, (London), viii + 40pp.
35. Lloyd Praeger, R. 1932. "Recent views bearing upon the Problem of the Irish Flora and Fauna", Proc Roy Irish Acad, sect B, vol xli, pp125–145.
36. D S Merezhovsky. 1933. The Secret of the West, (London), Cournos, J (tr), 449pp; pp117–118.
37. Wallace, A R. 1911. Island Life, (London), 3rd edn, 563pp; p248.
38. Forrest, H E. 1935. Op cit, p249 (citing Encyclopaedia Britannica, 9th edn, 1879, vol XV, p180).
39. Moseley, H N, 1892, Notes by a Naturalist: an account of observations made during the voyages of HMS Challenger round the world in the years 1872–1876, (London), 2nd edn, 540pp; p72.
40. Moseley, H N. 1892. Op cit, p73.

41. Ridley, H N, 1930, The Dispersal of Plants throughout the World, (London), 744pp; p682.
42. Moseley, H N. 1892. Op cit, p11.
43. Moseley, H N. 1892. Op cit, p117.
44. Ridley, H N. 1930. Op cit, pp684–5.
45. Skottsberg, C. 1902. "Geographical Distribution of Vegetation in South Georgia", Geogr J, Nov 1902, pp498–502.
46. Hooker, J D. 1881. "Presidential Address", Proc Roy Geogr Soc, vol 3, pp601–3.
47. Guppy, H B. 1903. Observations of a Naturalist in the Pacific between 1896 and 1899, (London), 2 vols, vol 2, pp346–7.
48. Guppy, H B. 1903. Op cit, vol 2, p348.
49. Guppy, H B. 1903. Op cit, vol 2, p297.
50. Guppy, H B. 1903. Op cit, p298.
51. Anonymous. 1882. "Deep-Sea Remains of Trees", Engl Mech, vol 35, p424.
52. Guppy, H B. 1903. Op cit, vol 1, p233.
53. McCoy, F. 1874. Palaeontology of Victoria, (Melbourne), pp29–30.
54. Pennafort, R U y. 1900. "Brazil Pre-Historico", Memorial Encyclographico, (Fortaleza), p138.
55. Howorth, H H. 1887. The Mammoth and the Flood, London, xxxii + 464pp; p368.
56. Howorth, H H. 1887. Op cit, p372.
57. Göppert, H R. 1850. "On Vegetable Remains in the Salt Rock of Wieliczka", Q Jl Geol Soc Lond, vol 6, p32.
    Mortillet, G de, & A de Mortillet. 1900. Le Préhistorique. Origine et Antiquité de l'homme, (Paris), 3rd edn, xxii + 709pp.
58. Geyh, M A, & D Jäkel. 1974. "Late Glacial and Holocene climatic history of the Sahara Desert derived from a statistical assay of C^{14} dates", Palaeogeogr Palaeoclimat Palaeoecol, vol 15, pp205–8.
59. Tsukada, M. 1966. "Late Pleistocene vegetation and climate in Taiwan (Formosa)", Proc US Natl Acad Sci, vol 55, pp543–548.
    Wolfart, R. 1967. Geologie von Syrien und dem Libanon, (Berlin), xii + 326pp; p160.
60. Vuilleumier, B S. 1971. "Pleistocene changes in the fauna and flora of South America", Science, vol 173, no 3999, pp771–779.
61. Anonymous. 1917. "The Age of the Bolivian Andes", Geogr Rev, vol 4, p59.
62. Dawson, W, & D P Penhallow. 1889. "On the Pleistocene Flora of Canada", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 1.
63. Dawson, W, & D P Penhallow. 1889. Op cit, p315.
64. Dawson, W, & D P Penhallow. 1889. Op cit, pp315–6.
65. Dawson, W, & D P Penhallow. 1889. Op cit, p317.
66. Dawson, W. 1878. Acadian Geology, (London), xxvi + 694pp; p63.
67. Bell, R. 1898. "On the occurrence of Mammoth and Mastodon remains around Hudson's Bay", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 9, pp369–390; p385.
68. Bell, R. 1898. Op cit, p386.
69. Dawson, W, & D P Penhallow. 1889. Op cit, p316.
70. Hooker, J D. 1881. "Presidential Address", Proc Roy Geogr Soc, vol 3, pp601–3.
71. Heawood, E. 1912. Geographical Discoveries in the 17th and 18th Centuries, (Cambridge), xii + 475pp, p340.
72. Dawson, W, & D P Penhallow. 1889. Op cit, p320.
73. Whittlesey, C. 1867. "On the Fresh-water Glacial Drift of the Northwestern States", Smithson Contb Knowl, vol xv, art iii, pp1–29.
74. Anonymous. 1866–90. A Geological Survey of Illinois, (Springfield), 8 vols, vol iv, p179.
75. Whittlesey, C. 1867. Ibid.
76. Winchell, A. 1871. Sketches of Creation, (New York), 459pp, pp255, 259.
    Winchell, N H. 1875. "Vegetable Remains in the Drift Deposits of the North-West", Proc Amer Assoc Advmt Sci, vol 24, pp43–56.
77. Whittlesey, C. 1867. Op cit, pp13–15.
78. Whittlesey, C. 1867. Op cit, p15.
79. Whittlesey, C. 1867. Op cit, p13.
80. Flint, R F, & E S Deevey. 1951. "Radiocarbon dating of late Pleistocene Events", Amer J Sci, vol 249, pp257–300, p260; p262.
81. Whittlesey, C. 1867. Op cit, p15.
82. Winchell, N H. 1875. "Vegetable Remains in the Drift Deposits of the North-West", Proc Amer Assoc Advmt Sci, vol 24, pp43–56.
83. Grüger, E. 1972. "Pollen and seed studies of Wisconsin vegetation in Illinois, USA", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 83, pp2715–2734.
84. Leonard, A B, & J C Frye. 1960. "Wisconsinian Molluscan Faunas of the Illinois Valley Region", Illinois Geol Surv Circ, no 304, 32pp, p23.
85. Whitehead, D R. 1963. "Northern elements in the Pleistocene Flora of the South-east", Ecology, vol 44, pp403–6.
86. Grüger, E. 1972. Loc cit.
87. Braun, E L. 1950. Deciduous forests of eastern North America, (New York), 596pp.
    Braun, E L. 1951. "Plant distribution in relation to glacial boundary", Ohio J Sci, vol 51, pp138–146.
    Braun, E L. 1955. "Phytogeography of unglaciated eastern USA and its interpretation", Bot Rev Lond, vol 21, pp297–375.
88. Iltis, H H. 1965. "The genus Gentianopsis (Gentianaceae): Transfers and phytogeographic comments", Sida, no 2, pp129–154.
89. Simroth H. 1896. "Eine Bearneitung d. Russischen Nacktschnecken Fauna", Ann Mus Zool St Petersburg, 1896.
90. Wallace, A R. 1911. Island Life, London, 3rd edn, 563pp; p247.
91. Ihering, H von. 1893. "Najaden von Sao Paulo und die geographische Verbreitung d. Süsswasserfaunen von Süd Amerika", Arch Naturgesch, vol 59, (Bd 1), pp45–140.
    Kobelt, W. 1886. "Das Verhältnis d. Europe Landmoll. z. Westindien und Central Amerika", NachrBl dt malakozool Ges, 1886.
92. D S Merezhovsky. 1933. Op cit, p117.
93. Scharff, R F. 1899. Op cit, p21.

94. Goodfriend, G A, and R M Mitterer. 1988. "Late Quaternary Land Snails from the north coast of Jamaica: Local Extinctions and Climate Change", Palaeogeogr Palaeoclimat Palaeoecol, vol 63, pp293–311.
95. Charlesworth, J K. 1930. "Some Geological Observations of the origins of Irish Fauna and Flora", Proc Roy Irish Acad, vol xxxix, 1929–31, pp358–390; see pp369, 388.
96. Forrest, H E. 1935. Op cit, p234.
97. Merezhovsky, D S. 1933. Op cit, p118.
98. Spencer, J W. 1893. "The West Indian Bridge Between North and South America", Pop Sci Mon, vol liii, pp10–30; p26.
99. Spencer, J W. 1893. "Geological Waterways Across Central America", Pop Sci Mon, vol liii, pp577–593; p591.
100. Keigwin, L. 1982. "New Climate as Land Rises from the Sea", Sci Digest, March 1982, p21.
101. Spencer, J W. 1893. "The West Indian Bridge Between North and South America", Pop Sci Mon, vol liii, pp10–30; p25.
    Spencer, J W. 1893. "Geological Waterways Across Central America", Pop Sci Mon, vol liii, pp577–593; p587.
102. Scharff, R F. 1899. Op cit, p21.
103. Germain, L. 1913. "Le problème de l'Atlantide de la Zoologie", Ann Geogr Paris, vol xxii, no 123, pp209–226; p216.
104. Spence, L. 1925. The History of Atlantis, (London), xvi + 238pp; p63.
105. Wallace, A R. 1911. Island Life, (London), 3rd edn, 563pp; p244.
106. Emery, C. 1895. "On the Origin of European and North American Ants", Nature, vol liii, pp399–400.
107. Garnett, H. 1931. "Occurrence of the Water Mite, Hydrachna, etc", NW Nat, vol vi, p162.
108. Stephens, J. 1920. "The Freshwater Sponges of Ireland", Proc Roy Irish Acad, sect B, vol xxxv, no 11, pp205–254; pp246–8.
109. Scharff R F. 1907. European Animals, (London), xiv + 258pp; see p34.
110. Scharff R F. 1907. Op cit, p34.
111. Feyling-Hansen R W. 1950. "Changes of sea-level in West Spitzbergen: a new interpretation", Geogr J, vol 115, pp83–92.
112. Nicholson A C. 1892. "On the High-Level Glacial Gravels, Gloppa, Cryn-y-bwch, near Oswestry", Q Jl Geol Soc Lond, vol 48, pp86–95.
113. Trechmann C T. 1931. "The Scandinavian Drift or Basement Clay on the Durham coast", Proc Geol Ass, vol 42, pp292–296.
114. Spence L. 1925. ibid.
115. Moseley, H N. 1892. Op cit, p72.
116. Moseley, H N. 1892. Op cit, p88.
117. Scharff, R F. 1902. "Some remarks on the Atlantis Problem", Proc Roy Irish Acad, sect B, vol xxiv, pp268–302.
118. Kobelt, W. 1897–8. Studien zur Zoogeographie, (Leipzig) vols 1 & 2.
119. Blanchard, E. 1881. "Preuves de la Formation Récente de la Méditerranée", C R Acad Sci Paris, vol xciii, p1047.
120. Scharff, R F. 1899. Op cit, p268.
121. Wattenwyl, E von. 1880. Geschichte der Stadt und Landschaft Bern im dreizehnten und vierzehnten Jahrhundert, 2 vols, (Bern, J Dalp).
122. Scharff, R F. 1899. Op cit, pp269–270.
123. Scharff, R F. 1899. Op cit, p270.
124. Steinitz, H. 1973. "Ecology of the Ras Muhammad Crack in Sinai", Nature, vol 241, pp43–44, p44.
125. Scharff, R F. 1899. Op cit, p279.
126. Scharff, R F. 1899. Op cit, p261.
    Scharff, R F. 1897. "On the Origin of the European Fauna", Proc Roy Irish Acad, 3rd ser, vol iv.
127. Scharff, R F. 1899. Op cit, pp258–9.
128. Forsyth-Major, C I. 1883. "Die Tyrrhenis. Studien über geographie Verbreitung von Thieren und Pflanzen im westlichen Mittelmeergebeit", Kosmos, (Leipzig), vol xiii, pp1–17, 81–106, p106.
129. Engler, A. 1879. Op cit, vol 1.
130. Scharff, R F. 1899. Op cit, p257.
131. Murray, A. 1866. The Geographical Distribution of Mammals, (London), xvi + 420pp.
132. Scharff, R F. 1899. Op cit, p279.
133. Bate, D M A. 1905. "Four and a half months in Crete in search of Pleistocene mammal remains", Geol Mag, n s, dec v, vol ii, pp193–202.
134. Lister A M. 1989. "Rapid dwarfing of Red Deer on Jersey in the last Interglacial", Nature, vol 342, issue 6429, pp539–542.
135. Sondaar P. 1977. Major Patterns in Vertebrate Evolution, ed M K Hecht, P C Goody & B M Hecht, New York, ix + 908pp; see pp671–707.
136. Murray, A. 1866. The Geographical Distribution of Mammals, (London), xvi + 420pp.
137. Ouselati, A, R Paskoff, P Sanlaville. 1982. "La Tyrrhenien de Tunisie: essai de synthése", Bull Geol Soc Fr, ser 7, vol xxiv, no:2, pp173–178.
    Castany, G. 1962. "Le Tyrrhénien de la Tunisie", Quaternaria (Rome), vol 6, pp229–269.
138. Suess, E. 1892. Das Anlitz der Erde, (Vienna), 2 vols; see vol 1, p437.
139. Forsyth-Major, C I. 1883. Ibid.
140. Brinkmann, R. 1976. The Geology of Turkey, (Stuttgart), ix + 158pp; see p81.
141. Smith, G I. 1974. "Quaternary deposits in southwestern Afghanistan", Quat Res, vol 4, pp39–52; p45.
142. Arnaud-Vauneau, A, H Arnaud, P Burollet. 1982. "La Mer Pélasgienne", Bull Geol Soc Fr, ser 7, vol xxiv, no 2, pp161–171.
143. Suess, E. 1892. Ibid.
144. Bizon, G, C Müller. 1978. "Remarks on the determination of the Pliocene-Pleistocene boundary in the Mediterranean", in K Hsu, L Montadert et al, Initial Report D S D P, (Washington), vol 42, no:1, pp847–853.
145. Ridley, H N. 1930. The Dispersal of Plants throughout the World, (London), 744pp; pp684–6.

146. Boettger, O. 1878. "System verzeich d Lebenden Artend Landschneckengattung Clausilia", Ber Offenbach Ver f Naturkunde, 86pp.
147. Scharff, R F. 1899. Op cit, p261.
148. Beddard, F E. 1895. A Textbook of Zoögeography, (Cambridge), viii + 246pp; see p198.
149. Medway, Lord. 1964. "Post-Pleistocene Changes in the Mammalian Fauna of Borneo", Studies in Speleology, vol 1, 1963, pt 1, pp33–7; pp35–7.
150. Krefft, G. 1873. "The Vertebrata of Tasmania, recent and fossil", J Proc Roy Soc NSW, vol 1, pp30–41.
151. Parker, T J, W A Haswell. 1966. A Textbook of Zoology, (London), revd edn, 2 vols, ed by A J Marshall, vol 2; see pp690, 694.
152. Parker, T J, & W A Haswell. 1966. Op cit; vol 2, p694.
153. Chappel J. 1974. "Geology of Coral Terraces, Huon Peninsula, New Guinea: a study of Quaternary tectonic movements and sea-level changes", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 85, pp553–570.
154. Torgersen T, M Jones, D E Stephens & W J Ullman. 1985. "Late Quaternary Geological Changes in the Gulf of Carpentaria", Nature, vol 313, pp785–787.

     Jones M R and T Torgersen. 1988. "Late Quaternary Evolution of Lake Carpentaria on the Australian-New Guinea continental shelf", Aust J Earth Sci, 1988.
155. Smart J. 1977. "Late Quaternary Sea-level Changes, Gulf of Carpentaria, Australia", Geology, vol 5, pp755–759.

     Hopley D (ed). 1983. "Australian Sea-Levels in the last 15,000 years: A Review", Monogr Ser, Geogr Dept, James Cook Univ, Townsville, Australia.
156. Walker D, and J R Flenley. 1979. "Late Quaternary vegetational history of the Engan Province of upland Papua, New Guinea", Phil Trans Roy Soc Lond, ser B, vol 286, pp265–344.
157. Stuijts I, J C Newome & J R Flenley. 1988. "Evidence for Late Quaternary vegetational change in Sumatran and Javan highlands", Rev Palaeobot Palynol, vol 55, pp207–216.
158. Bowler J M, G Hope et al. 1976. "Late Quaternary Climates of Australia and New Guinea", Quat Res, vol 6, pp359–394.

     Barmawidjaja B M E, J Rohling et al. 1993. "Glacial Conditions in the Northern Mollucca Sea region (Indonesia)", Palaeogeogr Palaeoclimat Palaeoecol, vol 101, pp147–167, see p156.
159. Parker, T J, & W A Haswell. 1966. Op cit; vol 2, p608.
160. Parker, T J, & W A Haswell. 1966. Op cit; vol 2, pp606–7.
161. Parker, T J, & W A Haswell. 1966. Op cit; vol 2, p607.
162. Pumpelly, R. 1866. "Geological Researches in China, Mongolia and Japan, during the years 1862 to 1865", Smithson Contb Knowl, vol xv, pp1–143; pp76–7.
163. Sjögren, H. 1890. "Über das diluviale Aralo-Kaspiche Meer und die nord-europäische Vereisung", Jb K-K Geol Reichsanst Wien, vol xl.
164. Sars, G O. 1893–4. "Crustacea Caspien", Bull Imp Acad Sci St Petersburg, vol xiii.
165. Sars, G O. 1893–4. Op cit.
166. Scharff, R F. 1899. Op cit; pp258–9.

     Hubbard, G D. 1937. The Geography of Europe, (London), xii + 876pp; see p47.
167. Shabad T. 1951. Geography of the USSR: A Regional Survey, (New York), xxxii + 584pp.

     Velichko A A (ed). 1984. Late Quaternary Environments of the Soviet Union, (London), xxviii + 327pp.

     Rychagov G I. 1977. "The Pleistocene History of the Caspian Sea", dissertation paper, Moscow State Univ, Moscow.
168. Karpinski, A. 1888. "Übersicht d physiko-geograph Verhältnisse d Europ Russlands", Beitr Kennt Russ Reichs, 3rd Folge, vol iv, p182.
169. Nordenskiöld, N A E. 1881. Voyage of the Vega round Asia and Europe, (London), 2 vols, tr A Leslie; see vol 1, p378.
170. Murchison, R I. 1845. The Geology of Russia in Europe and the Ural mountains, (London), 2 vols.
171. Dawkins, W B. 1868. "The former range of the Reindeer in Europe", Pop Sci Rev, vol vii, p148.
172. Falconer, H. 1868. Palaeontological Memoirs and Notes, (London), 2 vols, ed R I Murchison.
173. Prestwich, J. 1895. On certain Phenomena belonging to the close of the last Glacial Period and on their bearing upon the tradition of the Flood, (London), 87pp; see pp50–1.
174. Prestwich, J. 1895. Op cit; pp51–2.
175. Prestwich, J. 1895. Op cit; pp vi, 7, 67, 74.
176. Forsyth-Major, C I. 1902. "On the Pigmy Hippopotamus from the Pleistocene of Cyprus", Proc Zool Soc Lond, (2), pp107–112.

     Howorth, H H. 1887. The Mammoth and the Flood, (London), xxxii + 464pp; p110.
177. Lyell, C. 1873. The Antiquity of Man, (London), 4th edn, xix + 572pp; see pp113–4.
178. Imbesi, M. 1956. "Sugli elefanti nani della grotto di Luparello (Palermo)", Actes 4th Congr Int Quat, 1953, pp443–7.
179. Adams, A L. 1874. "On the dentition and osteology of the Maltese Fossil Elephants, being a description of the remains dis-covered in Malta between 1860–66", Trans Zool Soc Lond, vol ix, p50.
180. Adams, A L. 1874. Loc cit; pp1–124.
181. Adams, A L. 1874. Op cit; p154.
182. Spratt, T A B. 1867. "On the Bone-caves near Crendi, Zebbug and Melliha, in the island of Malta", Q Jl Geol Soc Lond, vol xxiii, pp283–297; p296.
183. Adams, A L. 1866. "On the bones of fossil Chelonians from the ossiferous caves and fissures of Malta", Q Jl Geol Soc Lond, vol xxii, pp594–5.

184. Adams, A L. 1874. Op cit; p186.
185. Adams, A L. 1874. Op cit; p182.
186. Falconer, H. 1868. Palaeontological Memoirs and Notes, (London), 2 vols, ed R I Murchison; p167 note.
187. Adams, A L. 1874. Op cit; pp183–4.
188. Adams, A L. 1874. Op cit; p235–6.
189. Caruana, A A. 1870. "Further discoveries of the Fossil Elephants of Malta", Geol Mag, vol vii, p238.
190. Parker T J, & W A Haswell. 1966. Op cit; vol 2, p219.
191. Romer, A S. 1945. Vertebrate Palaeontology, 2nd edn, Chicago, viii + 687pp; see p576.
192. Stead, D G. 1963. Sharks and Rays of Australian Seas, (Sydney), x + 211pp.
193. De la Beche H. 1831. A Geological Manual, (London), 564pp; see pp180–196.
194. Cuvier, G. 1823. Recherches sur les Ossemans Fossiles des Quadrupèds, 5 vols, (Paris); see vol iv, p213.
195. Cuvier, G. 1823. Op cit.
196. Bate, D M A. 1905. "Four and a half months in Crete in search of Pleistocene mammal remains", Geol Mag, n s, dec v, vol ii, pp193–202.
197. Bate, D M A. 1905. Op cit; pp197–9.
198. Bate, D M A. 1905. Op cit; vol ii, pp199–200.
199. Hensel, R F. 1856. "Beiträge zur Kenntniss fossiler Säugethiere. Insektenfresser und Nagethiere der Diluvial-formation", Z dt Geo Ges, vol viii, pp279–290, 660–704, 689–703.
200. Depéret, C. 1897. "Étude de quelques gisements nouveaux de Vértebrés Pléistocéne de l'Isle de Corse", Annls Soc Linn Lyon, vol xliv, pp125–6.
     Forsyth-Major, C I. 1899. "On Fossils and Recent Lagomorpha", Trans Linn Soc Lond, vol vii, pp433–520.
     Forsyth-Major, C I. 1905. "Rodents from the Pleistocene of the Western Mediterranean", Geol Mag, n s, dec v, vol ii, pp462–7, 501–6.
     Forsyth-Major, C I. 1913. "Observations sur la faune des mammiféres quaternaires de la Corse et de la Sardaigne", C R Int Con Zool Monaco, vol ix, p594.
     Locard, A. 1872. "Note sur les Bréches osseuses des environs de Bastia (Corse)", Arch Mus Nat Hist Lyons, vol 1, pp48–9.
201. Thomas, P H. 1883. Matér Hist Prim Homme; see vol xviii, p263.
202. Howorth, H H. 1887. Op. cit., p108.
203. Gervais, P. 1867. Recherches sur l'Ancienneté de l'Homme et la période quaternaire, (Paris), 132pp; p91.
204. Howorth, H H. 1887. Op cit; p110.
205. Thomas, P H. 1879. "Le Rhinocéros tichorhinus de Chetma (près Biskra)", Bull Soc Climatol Algér, vol xvi, pp75–8.
206. Gervais, P. 1849. "Sur la présence à l'état fossile dans l'Algérie de deux espéces de mammiféres probscidenas des genre éléphant et mastodonte", C R Acad Sci Paris, vol xxviii, pp362–4.
207. Gervais, P. 1850. "Elephas africanus from Guelma, Algeria", Proc Acad Sci Lett Montpellier, p21.
     Gervais, P. 1850. "Sur des débris fossiles de mastodonte et d'Elephas africanus découverte en Algérie", Mém Acad Sci Lett Montpellier, vol 1, pp415–423.
208. Dart, R A. 1929. "Mammoths and other fossil elephants of the Vaal and Limpopo watersheds", S Afr J Sci, vol xxvi, pp698–731; pp722–3.
209. Arambourg, C. 1954. "Observations sur les Gazelles fossiles du Pléistocène superieur de l'Afrique du Nord", Bull Soc Hist Nat Afr N, vol 48, pp49–77.
210. Sigogneau, D. 1961. "Étude d'un Cervidé Pléistocène de Corse", Annls Paléont, vol 46, (1960), pp49–78.
211. Thomas, P H. 1875. "Ossements du Bubalus antiquus découverte à Djelfa en Algérie", J Zool Paris, vol iv, pp72–8.
212. Gervais, P. 1875. "Une espèce de grand boeuf a Djelfa (Algérie), C R Acad Sci Paris, vol lxxx, p444.
     Thomas, P H. 1876. "Bos (Bubalus) antiquus trouvé aux environs de Sétif (Algérie)", Matér Hist Prim Homme, vol xi, p46.
     Thomas, P H. 1881. "Recherches sur les bovidés fossiles de Algérie", Bull Soc Zool Fr, vol v, pp92–136.
213. Thomas, P H. 1880. "Note sur quelques équidés fossiles des environs de Constantine", Revue Sci Nat Montpelli-er, vol viii, pp335–351.
214. Thomas, P H. 1880. "The Fossil Horses of Constantine", Nature, vol xxi, p309.
215. Königswald, G H R von. 1970. "Hipparion from the Pleistocene of Europe, especially from the Red Crag of East Anglia", Palaeogeogr Palaeoclimat Palaeoecol, vol 8, pp261–4.
216. Prestwich, J. 1895. Op cit; p46.
217. Prestwich, J. 1895. Op cit; pp47–8.
218. Brome, F. 1869. "Report on the animal remains from the caves and fissures of Gibraltar", Int Congr Anthrop Prehist Archaeol, 1861, p131.
219. Brome, F. 1869. Op cit; see p130.
220. Busk, G. 1869. "On the caves of Gibraltar in which human remains and works of art have been found", Int Congr Prehist Archaeol, Trans, 3rd session (Norwich) 20th-28th August 1868 (London 1868), xxx + 419pp: Busk's paper pp106–167; p122.
221. Ramsay, A C, & J Geikie. 1878. "Geology of Gibraltar", Q Jl Geol Soc Lond, vol xxiv, p521.
222. De La Beche, D. 1831. A Geological Manual, (London), 1st edn, 564pp; see pp180–196.
223. Cullingford C H D (ed). 1953. British Caving: an Introduction to Speleology, (London), xvi + 468pp; see p191.
224. Buckland, W. 1823. Reliquiae Diluvianae, (London), vii + 303pp; pp67–8.
     Hodge, H C. 1860. "On the Ossiferous Caverns at Oreston", The Geologist, vol 3, pp26–30, 343–347, 377–379.

Pengelly, W. 1859. "On the Ossiferous fissures at Oreston, near Plymouth", The Geologist, vol 2, pp434–444.

225. MacEnery, J. 1859. Cavern Researches, or discoveries of Organic remains and of British and Roman Relics, in the caves of Kent's Hole, Anstis Cove, Chudleigh and Barry Head, (London), ed E Vivian, 80pp.

226. Carreck, J N. 1955. "The Quaternary Vertebrates of Dorset, Fossil and sub-fossil", Proc Dorset Nat Hist Archaeol Soc, vol 75, pp164–168.

227. Dawkins, W B. 1874. Cave hunting, researches on the evidence of caves respecting the early inhabitants of Europe, (London), xxiv + 455pp.

228. Dawkins W B. 1877. "On the Mammalian-fauna of the caves of Cresswell Crags", Q Jl Geol Soc Lond, vol 33, pp589–612.

Mello J M. 1877. "The Bone-caves of Cresswell Crags – 3rd paper", Q Jl Geol Soc Lond, vol 33, pp579–588.

229. Dawkins W B. 1877b. "The Exploration of the ossiferous deposit at Windy Knoll, Castleton, Derbyshire", Q Jl Geol Soc Lond, vol 33, pp724–729.

Taylor J, 1862, "Bone Caves at Castleton", Trans Manchester Geol Soc, vol iii, pp123–125.

230. Boylan P J. 1981. "A new Revision of the Pleistocene mammalian fauna of Kirkdale Cave, Yorkshire", Proc Yorks Geol Soc, vol 43, pp253–280.

231. Allen E E, & J G Rutter. 1946–48. A survey of the Gower Caves, with an account of recent excavations, (Swansea), pt 1, (1946); pt 2 (1948).

232. Leach A L. 1934. "The Geology and Archaeology of the Island of Caldy", Proc Geol Ass, vol 45, pp189–204.

233. Lomas J, & P F Kendall. 1896. "The Glacial Phenomena of the Vale of Clwyd", Rep Br Ass Advmt Sci, (Liverpool) p801.

Mellard Reade T. 1897. "The Glacio-Marine Drift of the Vale of Clwyd", Q Jl Geol Soc Lond, vol liii, pp341–348, p344.

234. Ramsay A C. 1863. "Bone-cave at Cefn, Flintshire", The Geologist, vol 6, p114.

235. Ramsay A C. 1863. Op cit; p114.

236. Woodward H B. 1887. The Geology of England and Wales, (London), 2nd edn, xv + 670pp; see p543.

237. Harkness R. 1870. "On the occurrence of elephant remains in Ireland", Geol Mag, vol vii, pp253–8; p255.

238. Esper J F. 1774. Description des Zöolites et des Cavernes dans le Margraviat de Bereuth au delà des monts, (Nuremberg), 148pp.

Goldfuss G A. 1810. Die Umgebungen von Muggendorf, (Erlangen).

Rosenmüller J C. 1804. Abbildungen und Beschreibungen der fossilen knochen der Höhlenbaren, (Weimar), 4 + 22pp.

239. Buckland, W. 1823. Op cit; pp133–6.

240. Schlotheim E F. 1820. "Wegen den versteinerten Knochen bei Köstriz", Isis, Oken, vol vii, pp5–8.

241. Buckland, W. 1823. Op cit; pp137–8.

242. Buckland, W. 1823. Op cit; pp117–121.

243. Prestwich J. 1893. "On the Evidence of a submergence of Western Europe and the Mediterranean coasts at the close of the Glacial or so-called Post-Glacial Period, and immediately preceding the Neolithic or Recent Period", Phil Trans R Soc, ser A, 1894, pp903–984, p903.

244. Gaudry A. 1868. "Les animaux Quaternaires de la montagne de Santenay", Bull Geol Soc Fr, ser 3, vol 4, pp304–308.

245. Prestwich J. 1893. Op cit; pp935–937.

246. Tournal M. 1827. "Note sur deux cavernes à ossements, découvertes à Bize, dans les environs de Narbonne", Annls Sci Nat Paris, vol xii, pp78–82.

Tournal M, & M de Serres. 1829. "Fossil antediluvian animals mingled with human remains in the caves of Bize", Edinb New Phil J, vol vii, pp159–161.

Tournal M. 1832. "Cavernes à ossements de Bize (Aude)", Bull Geol Soc Fr, vol ii, pp380–382.

247. Contejean C. 1862. Esquisse d'une description physique et géologique de l'arrondisement de Montbéliard, (Leipzig), 92pp.

Theobald N, & C Szymanek. 1963. "Le crâne de Rhinocéros à narines cloisonnées des grottes de Rigney (Doubs)", Ann Scient Univ Besançon, geol no:17, pp97–113.

248. Astre G. 1963. "Brèche Pléistocène de Peyre, (Averyon), avec Equus hydruntinus et Megaceros", Bull Soc Hist Nat Toulouse, vol 98, nos:3–4, pp321–331.

Christol J de, & A Bravard. 1828. "Mémoir sur de nouvelles espèces d'hyènes fossiles découvertes dans la caverne de Lunel-Viel, prés Montpellier", Mém Soc Hist Nat Paris, vol iv, pp368–378.

249. Moggridge M. 1872. "On bones and flints found in the caves at Mentone and in the adjacent railway cutting", Rep Br Ass Advmt Sci, (Edinburgh), 1871, pp155–6.

Rivière E. 1871. "Sur les cavernes à ossements des Baoussé-Roussé", C R Acad Sci Paris, vol lxxiii, pp351–2.

Rivière E. 1887. "La troglodyte de Menton, ou l'homme primitif de l'âge du grand ours et du mammoth", Ann Sci Indus, vol xvi, pp213–222.

Rivière E. 1887. De l'antiquité de l'homme dans les Alpes-Maritimes, (Paris), xviii + 336pp; p12.

250. Prestwich J. 1893. Op cit; p933.

251. Lumley H de, S Gagniere, L Barral, R Pascal. 1963. "La Grotte du Vallonet, Roquebrune-Cap-Martin (A-M): (Note préliminaire)", Bull Mus Anthrop Prehist Monaco, vol 10, pp5–20.

252. Bonifay M F. 1962. "Sur la valeur spécifique de l'Ursus prearctos, M Boule, de la grotte du Prince (Ligurie italienne)", Bull Mus Anthrop Prehist Monaco, no:9, pp65–72.

253. Prestwich J. 1893. Op cit; see p954.

254. Prestwich J. 1893. Op cit, p953.

Bartolomei G. 1964. "Mammiferi di brecce pleistoceniche dei Colli Berici", Mem Mus Civ Stor Nat Verona, vol 12, pp221–289.

255. Rakovec I. 1960. "The Quaternary Mammalian Fauna from the cave Betalov-spodmol near Postojna", Slov Akad Znan Umetn, Razr Priorod Vede, Razpr, Jugosl, no:4, pp435–440.
256. Prestwich J. 1893. Op cit; p966.
257. Rakovec I. 1961. "The upper Pleistocene fauna from the cave Parska Golobina (in the Pivka basin)". Loc cit, no:6, pp271–349.
258. Prestwich J. 1893. Ibid.
    Fortis A. 1776. Reise in Dalmatien, (London), English edn, 1778; see p440.
259. Adam K D. 1958. "Dicerorhinus kirchbergensis, (Jäger), aus einer Karsthöhle bei Crni Kal (Istria, Yugoslavien)", Slov Akad Znan Umetn, Razr Priorod Vede, Razpr, Jugosl, no:4, pp435–440.
    Crnolatac I, & M Malez. 1961. "Ein neuer Fundort pleistozäner Fauna in Süd-istrien", Bull Scient Cons Acad R S F Yougosol, vol 6, no:2, pp33–4.
    Lomi C. 1963. "La fauna di foresta del Pleistocene antico nella breccia ossifera della cava di Bristi presso Santa Croce di Trieste", Atti Mus Civ Stor Nat Trieste, vol 23, no:4, pp119–146.
260. Malez M, & Z Pepeorik. 1969. "Entdeckung des ganzen skelettes eines fossilien Leoparden in der Vjetrenica-Höhle auf dem Popovo Polje (Herzogowina)", Akad Savet FNRJ Bull Sci, sec A, vol 14, pp144–5.
261. Buckland, W. 1823. Op cit; pp117–121.
262. Malez M. 1964. "Der erste fund der grossen Höhlenkatze Panthera spelaea (Goldf), im Pleistozän von Bosnia und Herzogowina", Bull Scient Cons Acad RSF Yougosl, nos:1–2, pp2–3.
263. Buckland, W. 1823. Op cit; p161.
264. Woldrich J N. 1882. "Beitrage zur Fauna der Breccien und anderer Diluvial-gebilde Oesterreichs", Jb K-K Geol Reichsaust, (Wien), 32Bd, Heft 4, pp435–470.
265. Prestwich J. 1893. Op cit; see p965.
266. Abel O, & G Kyrle. 1931. "Die Drachenhöhle bei Mixnitz – Speläologische Monographien", Öst Staats Wien, 7/9, 953pp.
267. Woldrich J N. 1882. "Über die diluviale Fauna der Hohlen bei Beraun in Böhmen", Verh Geol Reichsanst Wien, pp290–2.
268. Ryziewicz Z. 1962. "Sur la trouvaille du squelette d'un Ours de cavernes (Ursus spelaeus) dans la grotte sous Kopa Magury (Tatra)", C R Soc Sci Lett Pologne, no 5, pp1–22.
269. Kowalski K. 1961. "Pleistocene Rodents from Nietoperzowa Cave in Poland", Folia quatern, no:5, pp1–22.
270. Tattar A V. 1958. "Mammifères et Oissaux du Quaternaire supérieur des grottoes du Don supérieur et de Zhiguli et leurs conditions de vie", Uchen Zap Leningr Gos Ped Inst A I Gercen, vol 179, pp113–189.
271. Botta P E. 1835. "Observations sur le Liban et l'Antiliban", Mém Soc Géol Fr, vol 1, pp135–160; pp148–159.
272. Wolfart, R. 1967. Geologie von Syrien und dem Libanon, (Berlin), xii + 326pp; see pp158–9.
273. Blanckenhorn M. 1906. "Die Steinzeit und die Feuersteinartefakte in Syrien-Palästine", L'Anthropologie, vol 17, pp158–161.
274. Nalivkin D V. 1973. The Geology of the USSR, (Edinburgh), xxviii + 855pp; see pp443–445.
275. Chardin P T de, & C C Young. 1930. "Preliminary Report on the Chou Kou Tien fossiliferous deposits", Bull Geol Soc China, vol 8, pp173–202.
276. Black D. 1934. "Recent discoveries at Chou Kou Tien", Nature, vol 133, p89.
277. Moore R C. 1953. Man, Time and Fossils, (New York), xvii + 411pp; pp274–5.
278. Tokunga S. 1929. "Mammalian fossils found in limestone caves in Korea", Proc Imp Acad Japan, vol 5, pp139–141.
279. Clarke W B. 1875. "Remarks on the Sedimentary Formations of New South Wales", Ann Rep Dept Mines NSW, 3rd edn, pp149–206; p163.
280. Lang Dr. 1831. "Account of the discovery of bone caves in Wellington Valley about 210 miles west of Sydney in New Holland", Edinb New Phil J, vol x, pp364–371; see pp369–370.
281. Woods J E T. 1862. Geological Observations in South Australia, principally in the district SE of Adelaide, (London), xviii + 404pp; see pp335, 385.
282. Clarke W B. 1875. Op cit; see p164.
283. Higgins E T, & W F Petterd. 1884. "Description of a new cave-inhabiting spider, together with notes on mammalian remains from a recently discovered cave in the Chudleigh district", Trans Roy Soc Tasmania, for 1883, pp191–2; see p192.
284. Cockburn-Hood T H. 1874. "On the skin and feathers of a Moa in caves at Otago", Trans N Z Inst, vol vi, 1873, pp387–388; see p388.
    Frazer, Capt. 1873. "A description of the Earnsclough Moa Cave", Trans N Z Inst, vol v, 1872, pp102–105; see p103.
    Haast J. 1872. "Moas and Moa Hunters", Trans N Z Inst, 1871, pp66–110.
285. Reinhardt J T. 1867. "Die Brasilianske Knoglenhuler og de i dem Forekommende Dyrelevinger", Tidsskr Pop Fremst Naturw, ser 3, vol iv, pp193–217, 291–353.
286. Hartt C F. 1870. Geology and Physical Geography of Brazil, (Boston), xxiii + 620pp; see pp286–287.
287. Nadaillac M de. 1885. Prehistoric America, (London), xii + 566pp; see p25.
288. Scott-Elliott G F. 1925. Prehistoric Man and his Story, (London), 398pp; see p259.
289. Stringer, C. 1993. "Secrets of the Pit of the Bones", Nature, vol 362; issue 6420, pp501–502.
    Stringer, C, and C Gamble. 1993. In search of the Neanderthals: Solving the Puzzle of Human Origins, (London), 246pp.
    Trinkaus, E, & P Shipman. 1993. The Neanderthals: Changing the Image of Mankind, (London), 452pp.
290. McDermott, F, R Grün, C B Stringer and C J Hawkesworth. 1993. "Mass-spectrometric U-series dates for Israeli Neanderthal/early Modern hominid sites", Nature, vol 363, issue 6426, pp252–255.

291. Defleur A, O Dutour, H Valladas and B Vandermeersch. 1993. "Cannibals among the Neanderthals?", Nature, vol 362, issue 6417, p214. (Provides useful earlier references to possible Neanderthal cannibalism).
292. Stock C. 1931. "Occurrence of Human Remains in Conkling Cavern, New Mexico", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 42, p370.
293. Stock C. 1931. "Exploration of Gypsum Cave, Nevada", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 42, p364.
294. Guilday J E, & H W Hamilton. 1966. "The bone breccia of Bootlegger Sink, York County, PA", Ann Carnegie Mus, vol 38, no:8, pp145–163.
295. Gidley J W, & C L Gazin. 1914. Explorations and Field-work of the Smithsonian Inst for the year 1913, (Washington DC), pp94–5.
296. Gidley J W, & C L Gazin. 1933. "New mammalia in the Pleistocene fauna from Cumberland Cave", J Mammal, vol 14, pp343–357.
     Gidley J W, & C L Gazin. 1938. "The Pleistocene vertebrate fauna from Cumberland Cave, Maryland", Bull US Natl Mus, vol 171, pp1–93.
297. Gidley, J W. 1918. Ann Rep Smithson Inst, Washington for 1918; see pp281–287.
298. Argyll, Duke of. 1883. "Continuity and Catastrophes in Geology", Trans Edinb Geol Soc, vol 3, pp1–27.
299. Rosenmüller, J C. 1795. Beiträge zur Geschichte und nähern Kenntniss fossiler Knochen (Leipzig), iv + 91pp.
300. Heller, F. 1972. "Die Forschungen in der Zoolithenhöhle bei Burggaillenreuth von Esper bis zur Gegenwart", Erlanger Forsch, vol v, pp7–56.
301. Rupke, N A. 1983. Op cit; pp35–36.
302. Daubeny, C G B. 1869. Fugitive poems connected with Natural History and Physical Science (Oxford), 227pp; pp119–120.
303. Rupke, N A. 1983. Op cit; pp35–36.
304. Orange, A D. 1972. "Hyaenas in Yorkshire: William Buckland and the Cave at Kirkdale", History Today, vol xxii, pp777–785.
305. Buckland, W. 1823. Op cit; p162.
306. Scott, W B. 1930 "The Extinction of Pleistocene Mammals", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol xli, pp104–5.
307. Lyell, C. 1845. Travels in North America 2 vols. (London), vol 1, p55.
308. Warren, J C. 1855. The Mastodon Giganteus of North America (Boston), 2nd edn, 260pp.
309. Warren, J C. 1855. Op cit; p148.
310. Koch, F. 1839. "The Mammoth", Am J Sci, vol xxxvi, pp198–200. p199.
311. Warren, J C. 1855. Op cit; p247.
312. Warren, J C. 1855. Op cit; p247.
313. Warren, J C. 1855. Op cit; p247.
314. Hartnagel, C A, & S C Bishop. 1922. "The Mastodons, Mammoths and other Pleistocene Mammals of New York State", Bull NY St Mus, nos:241–2.
315. Warren, J C. 1855. Op cit; p247.
316. Lyell, C. 1849. A Second Visit to the United States of North America 2 vols, (London & New York), vol 2, pp363–364.
317. Cuvier, G. 1834. Recherches sur les Ossemans Fossiles des Quadrupèds 10 vols. 4th edn, (Paris), vol 1, p222.
318. Southall, J. 1875. The Recent Origin of Man (Philadelphia), 606pp; p327.
319. Warren, J C. 1855. Op cit; pp5–6.
320. Rensselaer, J van. 1827. "Discovery of the Fossil Remains of the Mastodon", Am J Sci, vol xi, pp246–250; p249.
321. De Kay, J E, J van Rensselaer, W Cooper. 1824. "Remains of the Mastodon", NY Lyceum Nat Hist, vol 1, pp145–7.
322. Warren, J C. 1855. Op cit; p183.
323. Rensselaer, J van. 1827. "On the fossil remains of the Mastodon lately found in Ontario County, New York", Amer J Sci Arts, ser 1, vol xii, pp380–1; p381.
324. Warren, J C. 1855. Op cit; p165.
325. Cooper, B N, C E Ray, W S Benninghoff. 1967. "Fossil Mammals and Pollen in a late Pleistocene deposit at Saltville", J Palaeont, vol 41, pp608–622; pp610–611.
326. Leidy, J. 1859. "Remarks on Remains of some extinct vertebrata in Territory of Nebraska", Proc Acad Nat Sci Philad, vol vii, p184.
327. Anonymous. 1894. "Baron von Toll's Expedition to Arctic Siberia and the New Siberian Islands", Geogrl Jl, vol iii, p410.
     Geller, M K. 1967. "Nouvelle découverte de cadavre de Mammoth", Zool Zh, vol 46, no:6, pp964–6.
328. Pfizenmayer, E W. 1939. Siberian Man and the Mammoth tr M D Simpson (London), xii + 356pp, See appendix, pp241–6.
329. Pfizenmayer, E W. 1939. Op cit; pp105–6.
330. Pfizenmayer, E W. 1939. Op cit; p176.
331. Pfizenmayer, E W. 1939. Op cit; p177.
332. Lippman, H E, W R Farrand. 1962. "Frozen Mammoths", Science, vol 137, no:3528, pp449–452.
     Murchison, R I. 1881. "Researches of Russian Geographers", Proc Roy Geogr Soc Lond, vol 3, no:3, pp234–5.
333. Brandt, A F. 1846. "Nachrichten über das Adam'sche Mammuth und das Wilui Nashorn", Proc Berlin Acad, for 1846, pp222–227; p223.
334. Brandt, A F. 1846. Op cit; p224.
335. Pallas, P S. 1788–93. Voyages en Différentes Provinces de l'Empire de Russie, et dans l'Asie Septentrionale 5 vols. (Paris), vol 3, pp124–5.
336. Pallas, P S. 1802. Travels through the southern provinces of the Russian Empire in 1793 and 1794 2 vols, (London), tr F E Blagdon, vol 1, p115.
337. Pallas, P S. 1802. Op cit; see vol 3, p125.
338. Nordenskiöld, N A E. 1881. Voyage of the Vega round Asia and Europe 2 vols. tr A Leslie, (London); vol 1, p523.
339. Richardson, J. 1852. The Zoology of the Voyage of HMS Herald: Fossil Mammals (London), vi + 100pp; p6.
340. Hibben, F C. 1960. Digging up America (New York), xii + 239pp; pp63–4.
341. Guthrie, R D. 1990. Frozen Fauna of the Mammoth Steppe. The Story of Blue Babe, (Univ Chicago Press).

342. Anonymous. 1978. "Baby Mammoth Carcass", New Scientist, vol 77, p215.

343. Anonymous. 1949. "Flesh Remains of Ancient Animals dug up in Alaska", Sci News Letter, no:55, p403.

344. Flint, R F. 1971. Op cit; pp770–771.

345. Pander, C H. 1848. "Geonostische Untersuchungen längs der Petersburg-Moskauer Eisenbahnlinie und in eingen Kreisen der Gouvernements Wladimir und Kaluga", Arch Wiss Kunde Russ, vol vi, pp250–306.

346. Blainville, H M D de. 1864. Ostéographie, ou description iconographique comparée du squelette et du système dentaire des mammifères récent et fossiles pour servir de base à la zoologie et à la géologie, 4 vols (Paris).

347. Rouillier, C F. 1846. "Explication de la coupe géologiques des environs de Moscou", Bull Soc Nat Moscou, vol xix, pt ii, pp359–467; p360.

348. Klein, R G. 1970–71. "The Pleistocene Prehistory of Siberia", Quat Res, vol 1, pp133–158.

349. Merriam, J C. 1911. "The Fauna of Rancho La Brea", Mem Univ California, vol 1, no:2.

350. Lull, R S. 1931. Fossils (New York), iv + 114pp; p28.

351. Stock, C. 1929. "A census of Pleistocene mammals of Rancho La Brea, based on the collections of the Los Angeles Museum", J Mammal, vol 10, pp281–289.

352. Chaney, R W, & H L Mason. 1840. "A Pleistocene Flora from the Asphalt Deposits at Carpinteria, California". Studies of the Pleistocene Palaeobotany of California. Carnegie Instit, Washington.

353. Merriam, J C. 1911. "The Fauna of Rancho La Brea", Mem Univ California, vol 1, no:2.

354. Lull, R S. 1931. Ibid.

355. Price, G M. 1923. A New Geology (Mountain View, Calif), 726pp; p579.

356. Wright, G F. 1890. The Ice Age in North America, and its bearing upon the Antiquity of Man (New York), xviii + 622pp; pp562–3.

357. Winslow, C F. 1873. "Correspondence", Proc Boston Soc Nat Hist, vol xv, pp257–259.

358. Wright, G F. 1890. Op cit; p564.

359. Wright, G F. 1890. Op cit; pp565–6.

360. Blake, W P. 1870. "On a Fossil Tooth from Table Mountain", Amer J Sci, ser 2, vol L, p262.

361. Königswald, G H R von. 1970. "Hipparion from the Pleistocene of Europe, especially from the Red Crag of East Anglia", Palaeogeogr Palaeoclimat Palaeoecol, vol 8, pp261–4.

362. Scott-Elliott, G F. 1925. Prehistoric Man and his Story (London), 398pp; p259.

363. Nadaillac, M de. 1885. Prehistoric America (London), xii + 566pp; p533.

364. Nadaillac, M de. 1885. Op. cit; p534.

365. Hay, O P. 1927. "The Pleistocene of the Western Region of North America and its Vertebrate Animals", Carnegie Instit Washington, publ no: 322B, 346pp, p193.

366. Hay, O P. 1927. Op cit; pp171–174.

367. Duncan, P M. 1883. "On Lakes and their Origins", Proc Geol Ass, vol vii, pp298–315, p313.

368. Joyce, T A. 1912. South American Archaeology (London), xv + 292pp; p3.

369. Leakey, L S B, & H Reek. 1931. "Editorial", Nature, vol 128, no:3241, Dec, p995.

370. Wayland, E J. 1932. "Deinotherium in the Pleistocene", Nature, vol 129, no:3244, Jan, p24.

371. Patterson, B. 1966. "A New Locality for early Pleistocene fossils in North-Western Kenya", Nature, vol 212, no:5062, pp577–8.

372. Romer, A S. 1945. Vertebrate Palaeontology, 2nd edn, (Chicago), x + 687pp; p414.

373. Romer, A S. 1945. Op cit; p413.

374. Watson, D M S. 1946. "The Evolution of the Proboscidea", Biol Rev, vol 21, p1.
Haynes, C. 1991. Mammoths, Mastodons and Elephants: Biology, Behaviour and the Fossil Record, (Cambridge).

375. Dubrovo, J. 1990. The Pleistocene Elephants of Siberia, pp1–8 in L.D. Agenbroad et al (eds.), Megafaunas and Man (Flagstaff, New Mexico).

PART THREE

THE ENDURING MEMORY

1

TRADITIONS AND LEGENDS

In Part One we mentioned that numerous peoples all over the world have preserved ancient accounts apparently describing some of the tremendous catastrophic events which terminated the Pleistocene epoch. The study of such material, however, is fraught with difficulties, especially as it is basically unsusceptible to scientific tests or duplication, and the problem of attaching universally acceptable meanings to it a vexatious one. That alternative avenues of approach exist merely compounds the problem.

Probably the easiest and most naive method is to treat every account as a children's tale or an ingenious fabrication designed simply to instruct or entertain. Another method views all traditions as symbolical, in which case the identification of the symbols will vary from solar deities, nature spirits and guardian entities to rather vague concepts of good and evil reflective of fashions prevailing at different times. Yet another is to evaluate traditions as incredible profane or religious explanations of otherwise normal events inexplicable to early man. Still another approach categorises such material as fragmented memories of once-real people and events, and therefore as genuine echoes of primeval history. It would, of course, be wrong to presume that every tradition falls into just one of these categories. The strongest probability is that all the various approaches just outlined are valid for different groups of traditions.

At this juncture a particularly relevant factor, pinpointed as long ago as 1894 by Ignatius Donnelly, claims attention. Donnelly noted:

> ...we find the legends of the primitive American Indians adhering quite closely to the events of the past, while the myths that survive at all among the civilised nations of Europe are found in garbled forms, and only among the peasantry of remote districts[1].

This distinction between traditions preserved by primitive and cultured peoples is of considerable importance, particularly as many readers will appreciate that:

> Legend has one great foe to its perpetuation – civilisation. Civilisation brings with it a contempt for everything which it cannot understand; skepticism becomes the synonym for intelligence; men no longer repeat – they doubt, they dissect, they sneer, they reject, they invent. If the myth survives this treatment, the poets take it up and make it their stock-in-trade – they decorate it in a masquerade of frippery and finery, feathers and furbelows, like a clown dressed for a fancy ball; and the poor barbarian legend survives at last, if it survives at all, like the Conflagration in Ovid, or King Arthur in Tennyson – a hippopotamus smothered in flowers, jewels and laces...[2].

A further point concerns the superficial simplicity, even naivete, of many traditions. For the initial compilers and purveyors of traditions to convey in clear and unambiguous terms often quite elaborate original concepts and sagas to essentially illiterate mass audiences, it was necessary for these traditions to be presented in simplified or general form. The resultant statements were therefore frequently abrupt or terse, and tended to emphasise the more easily comprehended effects rather than technically complex causes – even assuming that those too were ever understood. Conversely, complicated

Table 3A

Geographical distribution of traditions of the Deluge and Great Catastrophe

A selection of the 500 or more known examples, compiled from numerous sources. The survivors of the Flood in all the legends range from a single individual to a small group. All seemed to have been forewarned of the impending disaster. They escaped by seeking high ground, trees, caves or by means of various objects which would float.

OLD WORLD

EUROPE

Britain: Druidic
Finland: Finns
Germany
Greece: Ancient Greeks
Iceland: Norse sagas
Italy: Romans
Lapland: Lapps
Lithuania
Russa: Voguls
Savoy
Scandinavia: Norse traditions
Sicily
Slavonia: Slavs
Spain
Transylvania
Wales: Druidic Triads
Asia
Afghanistan: Afghans
Andaman Islands
Arabia
Armenia
Assyria
Babylonia: (Hasisadra or Xisuthrus), (Ut-Napishtim)
Burma: Chingpaws, Karens
Cambodia & Lagos: Bahnars, Bannavs
Chaldea: (Hasisadra)
China: Yunnan: Lolos
India: Assam: Ahoms, Anals, Lushais, Singpos; Bengal: Hos (Larka Kols), Kamars, Mumdas (Mundaris), Santahs; Central India: Bhilos, Kamars; Kashmir: Kashmiris
Indonesia: Borneo (Kalimantan): Ot-Danoms, Dusan, Dyaks; Ceram: Alfoors; Sumatra: Bataks, Engano, Nias; Timor: Roth; W. Irian: Mamberano
Japan
Malaysia: Benna Jakim, Kelantan
Mergui Archipelago: Selungs
Mongolia
Palestine: Phoenicians, Hebrews (scriptural sources: Genesis, Exodus, Job, Josua & Revelations)
Persia
Philippines
Phrygia (Anatolia)
Siberia: Buriats, Tatars, Kalmaks
Sikkim
Sri Lanka: Kalyani
Sumer
Syria
Taiwan (Formosa): Ami, Bunun and aboriginal tribes
Tibet: Lepcha
Turkestan: Bokharas, Tatars

AFRICA

Bantu
Basutto (probably borrowed)
Bermagai
Carthaginians
Egyptians (several versions)
Hottentots
Kangas
Loangas
Massai (probably borrowed)
Ovahereros
Somalis
Sudanese
Wanyoros

AUSTRALASIA & OCEANIA

Australia: Queenslandl: Aborigines; Victoria: Kurnai, L. Tyres tribe
New Zealand: Maori
Papua
Ocіania: Micronesia, Melanesia, Polynesia
Fiji: Fijians
Hawaii: Hawaiians
Hudson Islands: Nanumanghan
Leeward Islands (incl. Tahiti)
Mangaia (Hervey) Islands
Marquesas Islands
New Hebrides
Pelew Islands
Samoa
Sandwich Islands
Society Islands

NEW WORLD

NORTH AMERICA

Aleuts (Aleutians)
Algonguins (incl. Foxes & Sacs)
Apaches (Arizona)
Arapaho
Ashochimi (California)
Athabascans (Canada)
Bella Coola (Canada)
Caddoque
Cayus
Cegiha
Cherokee
Chewkee
Chickasaws (Dakotas)
Chimakums (Washington)
Chippewa
Chocktaw (Oklahoma)
Cree (Canada)
Delaware
Dogrids (Canada)
Eskimo (Canada, Alaska, Greenland)
Gros-Ventres (Montana)
Haida (NW Pacific Coast)
Hareskin Indians (Canada)
Hopi (SW states USA)
Iroquois (North-east)
Kaska (Brit. Columbia)
Kathlamet
Kato (California)
Klamath (Oregon)
Kolush (Alaska)
Kinsteneax (Missouri)
Kootenay
Kwakiutls (NW Pacific Coast)
Lenni-Lenapes
Lilluets
Luisenos (California)
Loucheux (Dinjieh) (Brit. Columbia)
Maidu (California)
Maitaquais (Canada)
Makah (Washington)
Mandan
Muskwaki (Canada)
Natchez (Mississippi)
Nez-Perces
Ojidway (Canada)
Oraibi
Papagos (Arizona)
Pawnee
Pima (Arizona)
Quilentes (Washington)
Salishan (Okinagan) (Washington)
Shoshona (Colorado-Utah)
Slave Indians (Canada)
Snolionish (Puget Sound)
Snoqualmi (California)
South River Indians (California)
Southern Ute (California)
Taculli (Takahli) (Canada)
Tahoe Indians (Nevada)
Tchiglit (Tingit) (Alaska)
Thompson Indians (Canada)
Tinneh (several versions)
Tolowa (Oregon)
Tsimshian
Tuleyome Indians (California)
Ute (Colorado)
Washo (California)
Wichita (Oklahoma)
Wintun (California)
Wyandot
Yana (California)
Zuni (New Mexico)

CENTRAL AMERICA

Guatemala: Maya
Mexico: Aztec, Maya, Mixtec, Toltec, Cora, Huichol, Michoacans, Tarahumare, Texpis, Zuni
Nicaragua
Panama: Cunas
Salvador
Caribbean: Caribs, Haitians

SOUTH AMERICA

Argentina: Araucanians, Tierra del Fuegans
Brazil: Aberderys, Bororo, Cabo Frio Indians, Caraga, Cashinaua, Caura, Chincha, Coroado (kainganag) Indians, Guarani, Ipuriana, Kataushy Indians, Maypures, Parray, Timanacs, Tupi
Bolivia: Yurucares
Chile: Araucas
Colombia: Chibcha or Muyscaya, Cuna
Equador: Carari, Jivaro
Peru: Chiriguana, Incas (several versions)
Paraguay: Mbocobi
Venezuela: Tamanaki

VANISHED REGIONS

Atlantic: Atlantis
Central Asia: Gobi Sea
Indian Ocean: Lemuria
Arctic: Hyperborea
Pacific: Mu
North Africa: Tritonis

traditions (usually oriental) apparently developed to satisfy the more sophisticated tastes of court, temple and scholarly audiences – virtually the only educated elements in early societies – and mentioned causes (if at all) usually in allegorical or more specific terms.

Bearing these factors in mind we may now consider the general abundance, distribution and character of these ancient recollections of a huge world disaster. These, we shall find, mention numerous aspects and local details such as could be hardly imagined or invented had they not actually been witnessed or experienced. This feature of the traditions will become particularly prominent in Part Five of this book.

It is uncertain how many separate catastrophe traditions exist, although the total certainly amounts to many hundreds. They are broadly divisible into those which describe a terrible conflagration, and those which record an all-embracing flood, usually identified with Noah's Deluge. In almost every case, the conflagration is said to have preceded the flood, which then extinguished it.

With the exception of Antarctica, catastrophe traditions are known from every continent, the Americas furnishing the largest number and Africa the fewest (table 3A). Their geographical distribution reveals the absurdity of the efforts made in some quarters to show that the Deluge traditions were entirely derived from the scriptural story of Noah as disseminated by Christian missionaries. As a general explanation it fails miserably. Yet the notion of a vast flood was evidently so ingrained in human memory that it could not be forgotten[3]. It must, therefore, have been an event either of the most recent past or of exceptional proportions and severity.

An important feature in many of these traditions is that the cause of these calamities was one or more cosmic bodies, which in simple terms engaged in a 'war in heaven'. That such a seemingly preposterous idea is common in so many different legends raises the question as to why numerous often-unrelated peoples should even share such a remembrance when no such celestial 'war' has been observed in historical times. The only conclusion that can be arrived at is that the disaster described in these traditions did actually occur, and made such an indelible impression upon the few survivors of the event that accounts of it were carefully preserved down to our own times as the most enduring of memories.

In reviewing the cataclysmic saga represented by these legends, we shall briefly examine each of the main themes individually, as exemplified below.

2

CONFLAGRATION

The effects produced by a great world conflagration accompanying huge tectonic upheavals are graphically described in many traditions and written accounts, such as that bequeathed to us by Ovid. Ovid tells how a celestial body, called Phaeton, approaches Earth so that:

> The earth bursts into flame, the highest parts first, and splits into deep cracks, and its moisture is all dried up. The meadows are burned to white ashes; the trees are consumed, green leaves and all, and the ripe grain furnishes fuel for its own destruction... great cities perish with their > walls and vast conflagration reduces whole nations to ashes[4].*

In his work Theogony, the classical Greek writer Hesiod clearly described the effects of this great conflagration which, preceding the Flood, was attributed to a celestial body called Typhon (another name for Phaeton). Another writer, Apollodorus, furnished further details stating that Typhon:

> ...out-topped all the mountains, and his head often brushed the stars... Such and so great was Typhon when, hurling kindled rocks, he made for the very heaven with hissing and shouts, spouting a great jet of fire from his mouth... at Mount Haemus he heaved whole mountains... a stream of blood gushed out of the mountain[5].

The Typhon legend was especially connected with pre-dynastic Egypt, where Typhon was also called Set[6], another name for the biblical Satan. The Roman writer, Pliny, described Typhon:

> A terrible comet was seen by the people of Ethiopia and Egypt, to which Typhon, the king of that period, gave his name; it had a fiery appearance and was twisted like a coil, and it was very grim to behold; it was not really a star so much as what might be called a ball of fire[7].†

Strabo records that the Egyptian shore of the Red Sea was once called Typhonia[8]. Interestingly, an old Arab tradition asserts that: "...the Red Sea is simply water that did not dry up after Noah's Deluge"[9].

Other effects produced by the great heat associated with this conflagration are common to many flood traditions. For example, from Persia, we have the statement that: "The sea boiled, and all the shores of the ocean boiled, and all of the middle of it boiled"[10]. The cause of this heating was ascribed to the 'star' Tistrya, "the leader of the stars against the planets"[11] – note that more than one 'star' is indicated; and it was accompanied by an incredibly violent hurricane[12]. In another tradition, Tistrya: "...let a stream of fire flow toward the earth... (and) filled our world with its devouring heat"[13].

Several North American traditions refer specifically to the phenomenon of superheated water: "Great clouds appeared... such a great heat came, that finally the water boiled. People jumped into the streams and lakes to cool themselves, and died"[14]. Further south, on the Pacific coast, other Amerindian legends state that: "It grew very hot... many animals jumped into the water to save themselves, but the water began to boil"[15]. Although initially somewhat fanciful, these assertions will later be found to be entirely consistent with the chain of physical effects that such an appalling calamity must inevitably have engendered.

---

* See Note 4. † See Note 5.

3

FLOOD

According to several traditions, there were two floods – the Flood of Deucalion and the Flood of Ogyges[16] – and many writers, both ancient and modern, confused by this, have tried to determine when these floods actually occurred. Was Noah's Deluge the Deucalion or the Ogygian Flood? Did the latter occur in the 5th millennium BC, and was the Flood of Deucalion an earlier event? Commyns Beaumont (Appian Way) is emphatic on this point:

> ...The story of Phaeton is undoubtedly the account of a very remarkable celestial event, which left behind it certain terrestrial effects. Tatian, Clement and Eusebius all agreed that the Phaeton event was identical with the Deucalion flood.[17]

The Genesis account of Noah's Deluge is, perhaps, the most familiar of all known Flood traditions, although when compared with other versions of the event it is obviously incomplete. It also gives no inkling as to its real cause, merely stating that it was divinely ordained. The Book of Revelation, however, associates the catastrophe with Satan as the cause of this[18], adding that, after a 'war in heaven', Satan was "cast out of heaven onto Earth", whereupon a great flood issued from his mouth and drowned the whole world.

The great Babylonian epic of Gilgamesh, from which the Biblical account of Noah's Flood is derived, or shared a common origin[19], contains details not included in the Genesis version. It refers to a great "hail from heaven" and a tremendous whirlwind or cyclone which "swept up to heaven" accompanying a flood that "swiftly mounted up... to the mountains"[20]. Sanskrit versions allude to the same effects[21].

Other flood traditions, examined more fully later, describe the Deluge as a veritable water-mountain, as a stupendous wall of water, or as an irresistible foaming watery avalanche. Few, if any, liken it to an ordinary, steadily rising, riverine flood. It was something special.

4

CELESTIAL DISORDER

In Ovid's account of this catastrophe, we learn that the Chariot of the Sun, driven by Phaeton, moved "no longer in the same course as before", that the horses pulling it broke "loose from their course" and "rushed aimlessly, knocking against the stars set deep in the sky and snatching the chariot through uncharted ways", and that the constellations of the Cold Bears tried to plunge into the ocean[22].

This description of stellar movement is exactly what an observer on Earth would see if the geographical poles were moving or, put another way, if an axial tilt was in progress. That this is what Ovid implied, is borne out later in his account when he wrote how Phaeton complained:

> ...the heavens are carried round with a constant rotation, carrying with them the lofty stars, and whirl them with rapid motion. Against this I have to contend; and that force which overcomes all other things does not overcome me, and I am carried in a contrary direction to the rapid world.[23]

Ancient Chinese texts also apparently confirm an axial derangement:

> ...the pillars supporting the sky crumbled and the chains from which the earth was suspended shivered to pieces. Sun, moon and stars poured down into the north-west, where the sky became low; rivers, seas and oceans rushed down to the south-east, where the earth sank. A great conflagration burst out. Flood raged. Wild beasts and terrible birds made men their prey...[24]

On the other side of the world, the Pawnee Indians of America preserved essentially similar memories of a remote time when the North Polar star and the South Polar star "changed places" or "went to visit each other"[25]; while, further north, the Greenland Eskimos informed early missionaries that ages ago the Earth "turned over"[26].

The consequence of a tilting of the terrestrial axis, as suggested in these traditions, would mean the displacement of the world's oceans. Several traditions actually refer to such dreadful effects:

> The ocean, too, is contracted, and that which lately was sea is a surface of parched sand, and the mountains which the deep sea has covered start up and increase the number of scattered Cyclades [islands]; the fishes sink to the bottom, and the crooked dolphins do not care to raise themselves on the surface for air as usual. The bodies of the sea-calves float lifeless on their backs on the top of the water.[27]

And:

> Why do the seas delivered to him by lot decrease, and why do they recede still farther from the sky? ...look around on either side, see how each pole is smoking; and if the fire shall injure them, thy palace will fall in ruins. See! Atlas himself is struggling, and hardly can he bear the glowing heavens on his shoulders.[28]

Another interesting account of world devastation is found in the ancient Norse texts, the Elder Edda and the Prose Edda, in the saga known as Ragnarok. The name itself is significant for, according to Anderson[29], it means 'the darkness of the gods'. However, Donnelly suggested that it could also mean regn = rain, and rok = smoke or dust, hence 'rain of dust' – the rain of dust, ashes, sand and stones mentioned in numerous legends from other countries[30].

This Norse saga implies, like Ovid's account, that at least two bodies were involved in the catastrophe, and passed close to Earth 'devouring' the sun and the moon:

Then happens that which will seem a great miracle;
That the wolf devours the sun, and this will seem a great loss.
The other wolf devours the moon,
And this, too, will cause great mischief.
The stars shall be hurled from heaven.

The effect of this 'mischief' was:

Then it shall come to pass that the earth will shake so violently
That the trees will be torn up by the roots,
The mountains will topple down,
And all bonds and fetters will be broken and snapped.
The Fenris-wolf (the name given to one of the assailants) gets loose.
The sea rushes over the earth,
For the Midgård-serpent (the name of the other assailant) writhes in giant rage,
And seeks to gain the land.

and: "As they ride over Bifrost it breaks to pieces..." (Elder Edda).

The location of Bifrost is uncertain, but later we will suggest its possible former geographical site.

Another important point in Ovid's account concerns Phaeton's direction of flight when nearest Earth:*

> The moon, too, wonders that her brother's horses run lower than her own, and the scorched clouds send forth smoke.[31]

With the result that Phaeton's 'chariot' (apparently a cosmic companion) disintegrates:

> ...But the omnipotent father, having called the gods to witness, and him, too, who had given the chariot to Phaeton, that unless he gives assistance all things will perish in direful ruin, mounts aloft to the highest eminence... from which he moves his thunders, and hurls the brandished lightnings.
>
> He thundered aloud, and darted the poised lightning from his right ear, against the charioteer, and at the same moment deprived him both of life and his seat, and by his ruthless fires restrained the flames. The horses are afrighted, and, making a bound in the opposite direction, they shake the yoke from their necks, and disengage

---

* See Note 6.

> themselves from the torn harness. In one place lie the reins, in another the axle-tree wrenched from the pole, in another part are the spokes of the broken wheels, and the fragments of the chariot torn in pieces are scattered far and wide. But Phaeton, the flames consuming his yellow hair, is hurled headlong, and is borne on a track through the air, as sometimes a star is seen to fall from the serene sky, although it really has not fallen[32].

This disintegration is remembered in many traditions. The Ute Indians of California state that it was the result of a conflict between two brilliant celestial bodies named Ta-vi and Ta-wats. Ta-vi, like Phaeton, is alleged to have roamed the heavens on an erratic course, but when it approached too close to Ta-wats a fight ensued and:

> ...the sun was shivered into a thousand fragments, which fell to earth causing a general conflagration. Then Ta-wats fled before the destruction he had wrought, and as he fled the burning earth consumed his feet, consumed his legs, consumed his body, consumed his hands and arms – all were consumed but the head alone, which bowled across valleys and over mountains, fleeing destruction from the burning earth, until at last, swollen with heat, the eyes of the god burst and the tears gushed forth in a flood which spread over the earth and extinguished the fire.[33]

That portions of objects engaged in celestial conflict fell to Earth is contained in many early traditions and writings. Herodotus states that the final struggle between Typhon and Zeus occurred over the coastal route from Egypt to Palestine[34]. Referring to Syrian memories of this drama, Strabo wrote that Typhon: "...when struck by the bolts of lightning fled in search of a descent underground"[35]. However, Apollonius Rhodius states that: "...smitten by the bolt of Zeus, [Typhon] lies whelmed beneath the waters of the Serbonian lake"[36].

Another facet recorded in some traditions concerns the fearful noise that accompanied this disintegration. A very early Arabian tradition mentions how the legendary 'Irem of the Columns' was, in one fateful day, destroyed by a thunderous noise and fiery blast from heaven[37]. Hindu texts contain another reference to these aerial explosions: "...the 'boar-form' (Phaeton) suddenly uttered a sound like the loudest thunder, and the echo reverberated and shook all the quarters of the Universe"[38].

5

TERRESTRIAL CHAOS

That Phaeton caused major changes to world topography is mentioned by many traditions. The Samoan islanders, for instance, assert that:

> ...The sea ...arose, and in a stupendous catastrophe of nature the land sank into the sea... The new earth [the Samoan Islands] arose out of the womb of the last earth.[39]

Likewise a Tahitian tradition states:

> In ancient times Taaroa, the principal god, according to their mythology, the creator of the world, being angry with > men on account of their disobedience to his will, overturned the world into the sea, when the earth sank into the water, excepting a few aurus [projecting points] which remained above its surface, constituting the present clusters of islands.[40]

The last two traditions suggest that these Pacific islands were once part of a large now-vanished continent. A pre-Columbian Maya manuscript, known as the Troana Codex, apparently describes its destruction:

> ...there occurred terrible earthquakes, which continued without interruption until the 13th Chuen. The country of the hills of mud, the land of Mu, was sacrificed: being twice upheaved it suddenly disappeared during the night, the basin being continually shaken by the volcanic forces. Being confined, these caused the land to sink, and to rise several times in various places. At last the surface gave way and ten countries were torn asunder and scattered. Unable to stand the force of the convulsion, they sank with their 64,000,000 of inhabitants 8060 years before the writing of this book.[41]

Although little credence is usually given to this account, Hawaiian traditions maintain:

> The belief of the Hawaiians of ancient times was that there was one great continent, stretching from Hawaii, including Samoa, Lalakoa (the Hawaiian version of Rarotonga) and reaching as far as New Zealand, also taking in Fiji, and there were some lowlands in between these higher lands. All this was called by one name Ka-houpo-o-Kane, the Solar-Plexus of Kane, and was also called Moana-nui-kai-oo, the Great Engulfing Ocean.[42]*

The Mixtecs of Mexico in their myths speak of a now-vanished land to the east of the present American coast:

> ...In a single day all was lost, even the mountains sank into the water... subsequently there came a great deluge in which many of the sons and daughters of the gods perished.[43]

This reference to the submergence of extensive land in the Atlantic Ocean suggests that it might have been the Atlantis of Plato's Timaeus and Critias. In a lengthy narrative, Plato wrote:

> The ocean (Atlantic) there was at that time navigable; for in front of the mouth which you Greeks call, as you say, 'the Pillars of Heracles', there lay an island which was larger than Libya and Asia (Asia Minor) together; and it was possible for the travellers of that time to cross from it to the other islands, and from the islands to the whole of the continent over against them which encompasses that veritable ocean... Yonder is a real ocean, and the land surrounding it may most rightly be called, in the fullest and truest sense, a continent. Now in this island of Atlantis there existed a confederation of kings, a great and marvellous power, which held sway over all the island, and over many other islands also and parts of the continent; and, moreover, of the lands here within the Straits (of Gibraltar) they ruled over Libya as far as Egypt and over Europe as far as Tuscany...
>
> At a later time there occurred portentous earthquakes and floods, and one grievous day and night befell them, when the whole body of... the island of Atlantis was swallowed up by the sea and vanished; wherefore also the ocean at that spot has now become impassable and unsearchable, being blocked up by the shoal mud which the island created as it settled down.[44]

Referring to this last statement, Babcock remarked: "It must be evident that Plato would not have written thus unless he relied on the established general repute of that part of the ocean for difficulty of navigation[45].

---

* See Note 7.

References to what may also have been a former continent in the Indian Ocean occur in several south Asian traditions. One from Sri Lanka avers:

> ...in a former age the citadel of Rawana, 25 palaces and 400,000 streets were swallowed by the sea... The submerged land was between Tuticoreen and Manaar, and Manaar is all that is now left of what was once a large territory. This legend, notwithstanding the manifest exaggeration as to the extent of the injury, may be founded on fact, as the Hindu and other nations have a similar tradition, and suppose that 'Ceylon was then much larger than it is at present'.[46]

Even the Selungs of the Mergui Archipelago (off southern Burma) refer to such a continent:

> ...formerly their country was of continental dimensions. But the daughter of an evil spirit threw many rocks into the sea. Thereupon the waters rose and swallowed up all the land. Everything alive perished, except what was able to save itself on one island that remained above the waters. The forefathers of the Selungs then practised great magic and this caused the waters to fall. Then other islands arose which the Selungs have inhabited ever since.[47]

The impression gained from reading such traditions is one of actual eye-witness reports of the catastrophe. Thus the Kato Indians of California describe how:

> Every day it rained, every night it rained. All the people slept. The sky fell. The land was not. For a very great distance there was no land. The waters of the oceans came together. Animals of all kinds drowned. Where the water went there were no trees... Human beings and animals alike had been washed away... It was very dark...[48]

Among the Hopi Indians of the American south-west are echoes of a similar memory in which, rather interestingly, there is, as also implied in Genesis[67], mention of violent seismic activity. The account asserts that the 'big water serpent deity' was angry and:

> ...turned the world upside down, and water spouted up through the kivas [sunken sacred dwellings] and through the fireplaces of houses. The earth was rent in great chasms, and water covered everything except one narrow ridge of mud; and across this the serpent deity told all the people to travel. As they journeyed across, the feet of the bad slipped and they fell into the dark water, but the good, after many days, reached dry land...[49]

Although mainly localised, many traditions clearly refer to great seismic activity. For example, from Peru we learn:

> Legend says that in those days of the jaguar-faced gods called huaca, the Andes were split apart and the callejon was formed, when the sky made war on the earth.[50]

And from Brazil:

> The lightnings flashed and the thunders roared terribly and all were afraid. Then the heaven burst and the fragments fell down and killed everything and everybody. Heaven and Earth changed places. Nothing that had life was left upon the earth.[51]

Perhaps the most remarkable of all such records is that of the Zuni Indians, which graphically describes the aftermath of the catastrophe:

> As it was with the men and the creatures, so it was with the world. It was young and unripe. Unstable its surface was, like that of a marsh; dank, even the high places like the floors of a cavern, so that seeds dropped on it sprang forth, and even the substance of offal became growing things.

Earthquakes shook the world and rent it... Creatures turned fierce, becoming beasts of prey, wherefore others turned timid, becoming their quarry; wretchedness and hunger abounded, black magic, war and contention entered when fear did into the hearts of men and creatures. Yea, fear was everywhere among them, wherefore, everywhere the people, hugging in dread their precious possessions, became wanderers... living on the seeds of grasses, eaters of the dead and slain things..!

Dread was the din and stir. The heights staggered and the mountains reeled, the plains boomed and crackled under the floods and fires, and the high hollow places [caves], hugged of men and the creatures, were black and awful, so that these grew crazed with panic and strove alike to escape or to hide more deeply. But erewhile they grew deafened and deadened, forgetful and asleep. A tree lighted of lightning burns not long.

Presently thick rain fell, quenching the fires; and waters washed the face of the world, cutting deep trains from the heights downward, and scattered abroad the wrecks and corpses of stricken things and beings, or burying them deeply. Lo! they are seen in the mountains to this day; and, in the trails of those fierce waters, cool rivers now run, and where monsters perished lime of their bones [aluwe – calcareous nodules in malpais or volcanic tuff: F H Cushing] we find, and use in food stuff. Gigantic they were, for their forms little or great were often shrivelled or contorted into stone. Seen are these also along the depths of the world. Where they huddled together and were blasted thus, their blood gushed forth and flowed deeply [due to sudden raising of temperatures to abnormal levels rupturing blood vessels?], here in rivers, there in floods; but it was charged and blistered and blackened by fires, into the black rocks of the lower mesas apkwina, lava or malpais: F H Cushing].

There were vast plains of dust, ashes and cinders, reddened as in the mud of a hearth-place. There were great banks of clay and soil burned to hardness – as clay is when baked in the kiln-mound – blackened, bleached or stained yellow, grey, red or white, streaked and banded, bended or twisted. Worn and broken by the heavings of the underworld and by the waters and breaths of the ages, they are the mountain-terraces of the Earth-Mother, 'dividing country from country'. Yet many were the places behind and between these – dark canyons, deep valleys, sunken plains – unharmed by the fires, where they swerved or rolled higher – as, close to the track of a forest fire, green grow trees and grasses, and even flowers continue to bloom. Therein... tarried the people. Dry and more stable was the world now, less fearsome its lonely places; since changed to rock were so many monsters of prey, some shrivelled to the size of insects; made precious as amulets for the hunter and warrior, as told in other talks of our ancient speech".[52]

Prof J W Gregory recorded native folklore from all along the Great Rift Valley in Africa, which refers to a remote period characterised by immense physical changes. He observed:

> ...The Somali say that when their ancestors crossed from Arabia to Africa there was a land connection between the two, across the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb. The natives of Ujiji, at the southern end of the line, have a folklore that goes back to the time when Lake Tanganyika was formed by the flooding of a fertile plain, rich in cattle and plantations... There is geological evidence to show that great earth movements have happened along this Rift Valley, as it may be termed, at a recent date, which makes it distinctly probable that these traditions are recollections of geographical changes.[53] (Our italics).

6

DARKNESS

Many catastrophe traditions refer to the coming of unnaturally prolonged darkness. The Central American Aztecs preserved such an account:

> The third sun is called Quia-Tonatiuh, sun of rain, because there fell a rain of fire; all which existed burned; and there fell a rain of gravel. Now, this was in the year Ce Tecpalt, One Flint, it was the day Nahui-Quiahuitl, Fourth Rain. Now in this day, in which men were lost and destroyed in a rain of fire, they were transformed into goslings; the sun itself was on fire, and everything, together with the houses was consumed.[54]
>
> ....a tremendous hurricane that carried away trees, mounds, houses and the largest edifices, notwithstanding which many men and women escaped, principally in caves and places where the great hurricane could not reach them. All this time they were in darkness, without seeing the light of the sun, nor the moon, that the wind had brought them.[55]

And:

> After the destruction of the fourth sun, the world plunged into darkness during the space of twenty-five years. Amid this profound obscurity, ten years before the appearance of the fifth sun, mankind was regenerated.[56]

In British Columbia, Canada, the Akawais remember in their traditions a period of prolonged darkness, and the intense cold it caused, at the time of an immense world-sculpting flood[57].

Commenting on this phenomenon de Bourbourg remarked:

> A vast night reigned over all the American land, of which tradition speaks unanimously: in a sense the sun no longer existed for this ruined world which was lighted up at intervals only by frightful conflagrations, revealing the full horror of their situation to the small number of human beings that had escaped from these calamities.[58]*

Japanese and Hawaiian traditions recall a time of continuous darkness too[59]. An ancient Hawaiian rhyme runs:

> The earth is dancing...
> Let darkness cease...
> The heavens are enclosing...
> Finished is the world of Hawaii.[60]

In Samoan traditions low clouds appear to have enveloped the world and plunged it into darkness. It was during this period that the islands of Samoa, Tonga, Rotuma, Wallis and Fotuna were upheaved from the bed of the ocean[61]. During these events, the Samoans insist that the "heavens fell down" and were so low that people could not stand upright without touching them – a belief also held by Amerindian nations and the Dusan tribe of Borneo[62].

* See Note 8.

7

HAIL AND FIRE

Several traditions associate great falls of hail, ice, fire, dust and other substances with the aforementioned calamities, and clearly accord them celestial origins. Thus, in one account we read:

> And every island fled away and the mountains were not found. And there fell upon men a great hail out of heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent: and men blasphemed God because of the plague of hail; for the plague thereof was exceeding great.[63]

These were not icy hailstones, but probably the 'stones of barad' crashing out of the sky and mentioned in the Book of Joshua. But the coming of ice is referred to in the Old Testament:

From whose womb did the ice come forth,
And who has given birth to the hoarfrost of heaven?
The water became hard like stone,
And the face of the deep is frozen.[64]

From Finland, the epic Kalevala describes falls of 'hailstones of iron' from the sky when the sun and moon had 'disappeared', and the world was sprinkled with 'red milk'[65]. This 'red milk' or 'blood' appears in many other legends (eg, Mount Haemus) relating to this catastrophe and appears to have a scientific explanation, which will be referred to later.*

It would seem that the ancients considered the destruction of Adamite man to have come from heaven in the form of fire, torrential rain, stones and ice.

---

* See Note 9.

8

ICE-BOUND

As previously mentioned, the formation of widespread ice was indicated in the Old Testament. More interestingly the Norse sagas provide fuller details of the onset of such conditions following the departure or demise of the Fenris Wolf and Midgård Serpent:

> First there is a winter called the Fimbul winter, the mighty, the great, the iron winter, when snow drives from all quarters, the frosts are so severe, the winds so keen, that there is no joy in the sun. There are three such winters in succession, without any intervening summer... as soon as the streams that are called Elivogs [rivers from under ice] had come so far that the venomous yeast which flowed with them hardened, as does dross that runs from the fire, then it turned into ice. And when this ice stopped and flowed no more, then gathered over it the drizzling rain that arose from the venom and froze into rime, and one layer of ice was laid upon another clear into Ginungagap. All that part of Ginungagap that turns to the north was filled with thick and heavy ice and rime, and everywhere within were drizzling rain and gusts. But the south part of Ginungagap was lightened up by the glowing sparks that flew out of Muspelheim. (Prose Edda).

Again, the location of Ginungagap is uncertain. It may, however, have stretched from Norway to the north and west, or connected Greenland and Vinland (North America)[66].*

Numerous other traditions could be cited which refer to a period of sudden grim cold afflicting early Man, although those mentioned must suffice.

* See Note 10.

9

THE TRADITIONS ASSESSED

Undoubtedly the scientific acceptability of these ancient recollections as genuine evidence for the reality of former events is decidedly limited, since by their very nature they are inherently unscientific. Nevertheless, these same memories, when assessed collectively, consistently appear to describe a most amazing episode of Earth history upon which orthodoxy, represented by astronomy, geology and archaeology, has so far remained largely silent. It is, in fact, this internal consistency of these memories which – irrespective of the original geographical or cultural source of the material – is so impressive. Whatever else may be thought of these traditions it is certain that they cannot just be swept aside as being of no consequence, for, within their limitations, they constitute an eloquent testimony to a truly momentous chapter of events. Consider, for example, the Deluge.

It has often been argued that the many Deluge traditions actually derive from a single original version, later disseminated worldwide. As shown more fully in Part Four, several accounts, referring to either Autumnal or Vernal elements, indicate the season of the Deluge's occurrence. Autumn in the northern hemisphere is Springtime in the southern. Only truly independent recollections would contain such superficially contradictory yet geographically correct details. Records of this kind also strongly emphasise the genuinely global extent of this watery calamity.

Table 3B summarises major issues traceable in the traditions globally. If these traditions constitute racial memories and eye-witness accounts of the same enormous topographical changes as have been discussed in Part One, and the terrible biological extinctions and decimations reviewed in Part Two, they represent highly important supplementary records of those calamitous events. Indeed, they form the third prong of a trident-like register comprising geology/palaeontology, botany/zoology and tradition/legend. That all three tell virtually the same story is surely not fortuitous!

Table 3B

Traditions specifying particular catastrophic effects. Europe and Asia

Aerial falls: hail, gold, gravel, stones, dust	Aerial falls: combustible/resinous materials	Aerial falls: ferruginous substances	Effects on vegetation	Axial/rotational changes	Boiling rivers/lakes/oceans	Break-up and fall of celestial visitor	Collapsed sky	The coming of ice	Conflagration/firestorm	Cyclonic winds	Deluge/flood	Description of celestial visitor	Lightning	Poisoned atmosphere	Prolonged darkness	Steam	Stellar derangement	Thunder/noise/din	Topographical changes	Records of lost lands and lakes	References to pre-Diluvian civilisation
☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	BRITAIN: Druids	EUROPE
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	RUSSIA: Voguls
■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	FINLAND: Finns
■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Apollodorus
☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	■	■	■	☐	☐	Hesiod	HELLENIC authors
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	■	Plato
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	various
■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	ICELAND: Voluspa
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	IRELAND
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	■	☐	■	☐	■	■	■	■	■	ITALY: various authors
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	LAPPLAND: Lapps
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	LITHUANIA
■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	■	■	■	■	■	■	■	■	■	☐	☐	SCANDINAVIA: Eddas
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	SPAIN
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	TRANSYLVANIA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	WALES: Triads
■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Coptic	RELIGIOUS SOURCES
■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Hebrew
■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Muslim
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	AFGHANISTAN: Afghans	ASIA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	ANDAMAN ISLANDS
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	ARABIA
■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	BABYLONIA & ASSYRIA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	BORNEO
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	BURMA: Chingpaws
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	CAMBODIA/LAOS
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	CHINA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	TAIWAN: Banum
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	INDIA: several accounts
☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	INDONESIA: Dusan
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	CERAM
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	FLORES
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	SUMATRA: Bataks
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	TIMOR
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	W. IRIAN
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	JAPAN
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	MALAYSIA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	■	MERGUI ARCH: Selungs
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	MONGOLIA
■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	PALESTINE: Jews
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	■	■	■	■	■	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	PERSIA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	PHILIPPINES
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	SIBERIA: Buriats
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	SIKKIM
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	SRI LANKA: Kalyani
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	SUMER
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	TIBET: Lepcha

Table 3B (Continued)

Traditions specifying particular catastrophic effects.

The Americas

Aerial falls: hail, gold, gravel, stones, dust	Aerial falls: combustible/resinous materials	Aerial falls: ferruginous substances	Effects on vegetation	Axial/rotational changes	Boiling rivers/lakes/oceans	Break-up and fall of celestial visitor	Collapsed sky	The coming of ice	Conflagration/firestorm	Cyclonic winds	Deluge/flood	Description of celestial visitor	Lightning	Poisoned atmosphere	Prolonged darkness	Steam	Stellar derangement	Thunder/noise/din	Topographical changes	Records of lost lands and lakes	References to pre-Diluvian civilisation
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	ALASKA: Kolushes	NORTH AMERICA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Tlinkits
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	ALEUTIAN Is
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	ARIZONA: Papagos
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	Pawnees
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	Pimas
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	BR COLUMBIA: Kaska
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Loucheux
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	Okanagan
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	CALIFORNIA: Katos
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Southern Utes
☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	■	☐	■	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	Wintun
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	COLORADO: Utes
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	DAKOTAS: Chickasaws
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Delaware Indians
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	GREENLAND: Eskimos
☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	NEVADA: Tahoe Indians
■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	NEW MEXICO: Zunis
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	N.W. PACIFIC COAST: Haida
☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	OKLAHOMA: Chocktaws
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	S.W. STATES: Hopi
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	WASHINGTON: Chimakums
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Chippewas
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Makahs
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Mandans
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Quilentes
■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	MEXICO/: Aztec	MESO-AMERICA
☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	■	■	■	GUATEMALA: Maya
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	■	Mixtec
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	CARIBBEAN: Caribs
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	NICARAGUA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	ARGENTINA: Araucanians	SOUTH AMERICA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	BRAZIL: Aberdervs
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	Botocudos
☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	Cashinaua
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Coroado
☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	Ipurianas
☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	Kataushi
☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	■	■	☐	☐	Parrays
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Tupis/Guaranis
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	BOLIVIA: Yurucares
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	COLOMBIA: Chibchas
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	EQUADOR: Cararis
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	GUIANAS: Caribs
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Macusis
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	PANAMA: Cunas
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	PARAGUAY: Mbocobi
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	PERU: several accounts
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	VENEZUELA

Table 3B (Continued)

Traditions specifying particular catastrophic effects. Australasia, Oceania and Africa

Aerial falls: hail, gold, gravel, stones, dust	Aerial falls: combustible/resinous materials	Aerial falls: ferruginous substances	Effects on vegetation	Axial/rotational changes	Boiling rivers/lakes/oceans	Break-up and fall of celestial visitor	Collapsed sky	The coming of ice	Conflagration/firestorm	Cyclonic winds	Deluge/flood	Description of celestial visitor	Lightning	Poisoned atmosphere	Prolonged darkness	Steam	Stellar derangement	Thunder/noise/din	Topographical changes	Records of lost lands and lakes	References to pre-Diluvian civilisation
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	AUSTRALIA: Aborigines	AUSTRALASIA & OCEANIA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Kurnia
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Lake Tyers Tribe
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	FIJI
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	■	☐	HAWAII
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	LEEWARD Is: Tahitians
☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	NEW ZEALAND: Maoris
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	PAPUA
☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	■	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	SAMOA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	POLYNESIA: general
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	Bantus	AFRICA
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Bermagai
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Egyptians
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Hottentots
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Kangas
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Loangas
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	Masai & Basutos
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Ovahereros
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	Somalis
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	■	☐	■	☐	☐	Sudanese
☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	■	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	☐	Wanyoros

REFERENCES

1. Donnelly, I. 1894. Ragnarok: The Age of Fire and Gravel (New York), vi + 452pp; p117.
2. Donnelly, I. 1894. Ibid.
3. Kalisch, M M. 1858. A Historical and Critical Commentary on the Old Testament: Genesis (London), viii + 780pp; p205.
4. Miller, F J (transl). 1916. Ovid, P. Metamorphoses (London & New York); see Book 11, fable 1.
5. Frazer, J G (transl). 1921. Apollodorus Mythulogica, 2 vols (London).
6. Babbitt, F C. 1936. Plutarch Isis and Osiris, 5 vols, (London & Harvard Univ Press); vol 5, pp41,49.
7. Rackham, H (transl). 1938. Pliny the Elder Natural History, 10 vols, (London); vol ii, p91.
8. Jones, H L (transl). 1924. Strabo The Geography, 8 vols, (London); vol vii, 3, 8.
9. Gregory, J W. 1896. The Great Rift Valley (London), xxi + 422pp; p325.
10. Darmesteter, J (transl). 1883. Zend-Avesta: The Vendidad, 3 vols, (Oxford); pt 11, p95.
11. Darmesteter, J (transl). 1883. Op cit; p95.
12. Gray, L H (ed). 1917. A J Carnoy in The Mythology of All Races, 13 vols, (Boston); vol vi, pp268ff.
13. Cumont, F. 1931. "La Fin du monde selon les mages occidentaux", Rev de l'histoire des religions, p41.
14. Teit, J A. 1917. "Kaska Tales", J Am Folk, vol xxx, p440.
15. Alexander, H B. 1916. North American Mythology (New York), xxiv + 325pp; p25.
16. Eusebius, P. 1913. Werke (Leipzig), tr by R.Helm, 8 vols; vol v, "Die Chronik".
    Frazer, J G. 1918. Folklore in the Old Testament (London), 3 vols; vol 1, p159.
17. Way, A. 1924. The Riddle of the Earth (London), 251pp; chap xi, pp160–161.

18. Book of Revelation. Chap 6, v12–16; Chap 7, v2; Chap 8, v5, 7–12; Chap 9, v1–13, 17–19; Chap 10, v6; Chapt 12, v7–9, 15–16.
19. Kellett, E E. 1927. The Story of Myths (London), 275pp; p27.
20. Gadd, C J. The Babylonian Story of the Deluge and the Epic of Gilgamesh (Brit Mus, London), 57pp.
21. Suryakanta, S. 1950. The Flood Legend in Sanskrit Literature, 4 vols (Delhi).
22. Miller, F J (transl). 1916. Ibid.
23. Miller, F J (transl). 1916. Ibid.
24. Chi, T. 1946. A Short History of Chinese Civilisation (London), 335pp; pp14–15.
25. Dorsey, G A. 1906. Pawnee Mythology (Washington), 546pp; pt 1, p35.
26. Olrik, A. 1922. Ragnarok (Cologne), German edn, xvi + 484pp; p407.
27. Miller, F J (transl). 1916. Loc cit.
28. Miller, F J (transl). 1916. Ibid.
29. Anderson, R B. 1888. Norse Mythology (Chicago), 473pp; p416.
30. Donnelly, I. 1895. Op cit; see p141.
31. Miller, F J (transl). 1916. Ibid.
32. Miller, F J (transl). 1916. Ibid.
33. Powell, J W. 1879. Pop Sci Mon.
    Powell, J W. 1881. "Sketch of the Mythology of the North American Indians", Rep Bur Am Ethnol, Washington, 1st report 1879–1880; pp17–56.
34. Rawlinson, H (transl). 1889. Herodotus Historia, 4 vols, (London); vol iii, p5.
35. Jones, H L (transl). 1924. Op cit; see vol vii, 3, 8.
36. Apollonius Rhodius. 1912. Argonautica (London), 454pp; book ii.
37. Koran. Sura 89, v.5 etc.
    Lenormant, F. 1869. Manual d'Histoire Ancienne de l'Orient, 3 vols, (Paris); vol iii, p295.
38. Maurice, T. 1799. The Ancient History of Hindustan, 2 vols, (London); vol 1, p304.
39. Williamson, R W. 1933. Religious and Cosmic Beliefs of Central Polynesia, 2 vols, (Cambridge); see vol i, p8.
40. Ellis, W. 1829. Polynesian Researches, 2 vols, (London); vol ii, pp57f.
41. Le Plongeon, A. 1896. Queen Moô and the Egyptian Sphinx (London), lxv + 277pp.
42. Spence, J L. 1933. The Problem of Lemuria, the sunken continent of the Pacific (London), 249pp; p54.
43. Bancroft, H H. 1875–6. The Native Races of the Pacific States of North America, 5 vols, (London); see vol 4, p306.
44. Bury, R G (transl). 1929. Plato Timaeus (Loeb Classical Library, New York), vol 7, 24E, 25 B-D.
45. Babcock, W H. 1922. Legendary Islands of the Atlantic (New York), 196pp.
46. Spence, H R. 1866. Legends and Theories of the Buddhists (London & Edinburgh), lvi + 244pp; p6.
47. Bellamy, H S. 1949. Moons, Myths and Man (London), 312pp; p108.
48. Gray, L H (ed). 1916 in H B Alexander (ed) in The Mythology of All Races, 13 vols, (Boston); vol x, p222.
49. Lockett, H G. 1933. "Unwritten Literature of the Hopi", Univ Okla Soc Sci Bull, no:2, May 15th, pp69–70.
50. McDowell, B, & J E Fletcher. 1962. "Avalanche: 3500 Peruvians Perish in Seven Minutes", Natn Geogr Mag, June 1962, p871.
51. Bellamy, H S. 1949. Op cit, p80.
52. Cushing, F H. 1896. "Outlines of Zuni Creation Myths", Rep Bur Am Ethnol, Washington, pp388–390.
53. Gregory, J W. 1896. Op cit; pp325–326.
54. Short, J T. 1880. The North Americans of Antiquity (New York), 2nd edn, xviii + 544pp; p499.
55. Short, J T. 1880. Op cit; p239.
56. Gomara, F L de. 1553. Conquista de Mexico (Madrid), 2 vols; vol II, p261.
    Humboldt, A von. 1814. Researches (London), 2 vols; vol ii, p16.
57. Bellamy, H S. 1945. In the Beginning God (London), 212pp.
58. Bourbourg, Brasseur de. 1864. Sources de l'histoire primitive du Mexique (Paris), 146pp; p47.
59. Aston, W G (transl). 1956. The Nihongi: Chronicles of Japan from Earliest Times to AD 697 (London), xx + 443pp; pp46, 110.
60. Williamson, R W. 1933. Religious and Cosmic Beliefs of Central Polynesia, 2 vols, (Cambridge); vol i: p30.
61. Williamson, R W. 1933. Op cit; p37.
62. Gray, L H (ed). 1916. H B Alexander in The Mythology of All Races, 13 vols, (Boston); vol iv, p362.
    Williamson, R W. 1933. Op cit; p41.
63. Book of Revelation. Chapt 16, v20–21.
64. Book of Job. Chap 38, v.22–23, 29–30.
65. Crawford, J N (transl). 1888. Kalevala, 2 vols, (New York); p xiii.
66. Anderson, R B. 1888. Norse Mythology (Chicago), 473pp; see p447.
67. Riem, J. 1925. Die Sintflut in Sage und Wissenschaft (Hamburg), 196pp.; see p32, 99.

PART FOUR

THE COSMIC CONFLICT

1

AN 11,500 YEARS OLD TRAIL

Earlier pages have presented massive geophysical, biological and climatological evidence which, together with certain subsidiary traditional material, indicates that a major catastrophe struck this planet approximately 11,500 years ago. Quite a large number of details indicative of such a date have been cited to provide a general temporal framework within which other associated aspects of the event and its apparent geological youthfulness can be better assessed. Yet is the message of these cited dates actually true or mere deception? Indeed, what evidence if any genuinely exists which validates even a general date for this calamity?

Several avenues of approach exist which permit us to pinpoint with reasonable confidence not only the probable century but, rather surprisingly, the time of year when this debacle occurred.

Viewed scientifically, the most reliable line of enquiry involves our ability to Carbon-14 date with very fair accuracy the remains of countless animals and plants overwhelmed by the event. Conventionally, of course, these remains are commonly assigned a 'late Pleistocene' antiquity and the many radiocarbon dates they have yielded (see Appendix B) are usually regarded as marking the final Weichselian/Wisconsinian phase of alleged 'Ice Age' times (see table 1A).

What, however, are radiocarbon dates?

In 1939, Serge Korff discovered the existence of radiocarbon. He noticed that cosmic neutrons, on reaching Earth's upper atmosphere from outer space, produced secondary neutrons on their initial collision with the naturally pre-existing nitrogen occurring at high altitude. Korff predicted that the neutrons, on colliding with the abundant isotope Nitrogen-14, would react to release a proton and form radioactive Carbon-14 (C^{14}). This carbon, he reasoned further, would then combine with oxygen to produce $C^{14}O_2$, which is ultimately absorbed by all living matter. Plants absorb it through photosynthesis, and animals (if they are herbivorous) by consuming plant-food or (if they are carnivorous) by devouring herbivores who habitually ingest Carbon-14-impregnated plant-food. New C^{14}, furthermore, is continuously added to the Earth's supply about as rapidly as the old dissipates.

During the years immediately following World War II, Dr W F Libby developed and refined Korff's method, one of the fundamental premises of which is the assumption that, when an organism dies, it ceases to assimilate C^{14}, and the radiocarbon already present within it decays without further C^{14} replacing it.

The rate of decay, or number of disintegrations per minute when measured by a Geiger counter, decreases with the increasing age of the sample concerned, with only one half of the original number occurring when the C^{14} is 5,568 (±30) years old. This is the 'half-life' of Carbon-14. With so brief a half-life it is obvious that the process represents a radioactive clock, of enormous importance and value to the prehistorian concerned with events no older than about 50,000 years. As geological phenomena and organic remains relegated to late 'Ice Age' times mostly fall within a span of time appreciably younger than this critical 50,000-year datum, C^{14} is clearly an exceptionally useful tool for determining with fair precision the actual ages of the remains of individual plants and animals collected from this segment of Earth history.

While C^{14} appears, theoretically, to be an ideal dating technique, it has not always proved so in practice. It has certain drawbacks. Far from being a simple laboratory process, various factors exists which sometimes profoundly affect results, particularly those concerning material older than 5,000 years or so ago. Originally it was assumed that the rate of cosmic neutron arrival was constant. If that were so, then the rate of C^{14} production and the rate of C^{14} decay would have reached a natural balance long ago. This has not occurred. It has, in fact, been established that C^{14} production has fluctuated appreciably during the last 6,000 years[1], even though the rate of decay has probably remained unchanged. Similar fluctuations may also have occurred at other times during the last 50,000 years before the last six millennia.

Hence, organic remains relegated to the aforementioned period quite often exhibit significant discrepancies between the C^{14} levels they contain, with consequent effect on the dates derived from these. Not unexpectedly, the variation becomes progressively larger the older the material involved. Notwithstanding such factors, many previous writers used C^{14} dates to determine the time when the 'Pleistocene' epoch ended and the Holocene began. Broadly speaking, the resultant dates exhibit remarkable general unanimity.

Those obtained for late Weichselian terrestrial plants and marine shells from various localities in north-western Europe by Mangerud and Gullikson all fell within the period (13,000–11,000 years BP[2]), while a strikingly similar date – 13,500–11,000 years BP, based solely upon an interpretation of C^{14} dated geological features – was established for the demise of a 'late Pleistocene' mastodon discovered in peat-bog deposits near Michigan City, Indiana, USA[3]. (These 'Before Present' dates are measured, more precisely, from AD 1950, the date chosen by a Cambridge conference in 1962). These agreed closely with the average C^{14} date – 11,335 (±170 years) BP – of organic remains collected from the basin of the Yenisei River in Siberia, and thought to possibly date from earliest Holocene times[4].

Although nineteen C^{14} dates, ranging from 12,168 (±1,500 years) BP to 10,090 (±140 years) BP yielded by animal and plant remains scattered across the northern hemisphere gave a mean age of 10,918 years BP for the end of the Ice Age in which the original organisms supposedly lived, this date was felt to be "probably about 300 years too low"[5]. The appropriately adjusted date, 11,218 years BP, compared favourably with the 'average' Siberian date noted above, and suggests that the latter was probably very 'late Pleistocene' rather than early Holocene.

11,218 years BP also agrees well with the "within a few centuries of 11,300 BP" date advocated by Webb and Bryson for important climatic and botanical changes traced at the end of the supposed 'late glacial' episode in northern Mid-West USA[6]. Again, the final 'deglaciation' of Airport Lake on Unmak Island in the Aleutians has been likewise dated as occurring between 12,000 and 11,000 years BP[7], and of the southern flanks of the Brooks Range on mainland Alaska at approximately 11,800 years BP[8].

Almost identical 'general' C^{14} dates have been obtained for a variety of significant physical and biological changes traceable all over the southern hemisphere. Thus, a sea level rise around Nelson Bay, Cape Province, South Africa, coincided with the disappearance of dominant grassland on the adjacent hinterland sometime between 12,000 and 11,000 years ago[9]. Further eastward, during the same time interval, rain forests rapidly expanded across north-eastern Queensland, Australia, simultaneously with an increase in rainfall (100–175% more than experienced there today) which also affected West Irian (New Guinea) to the north, and the east African countries of Uganda and Kenya[10].

Not surprisingly, such climate changes induced variations in growth patterns among various organisms. Thus, very 'late Quaternary' marine bivalves from Arctic Canada exhibit marked variations in the oxygen and carbon isotopic compositions of their shells[11], signifying the occurrence then of profound sea-temperature changes too[12].

Suffice it here to say that globally scattered datable material, universally regarded as of terminal 'Pleistocene' or earliest Holocene age, and as diverse as the remains of vertebrates, molluscs, plants, geological features, climatic and oceanic changes, so-called 'deglaciation' processes, and isotopic growth patterns in bivalves, everywhere points to the same 'general' date of 11,500 years BP. The additional evidence comprising the bulk of Appendix B substantiates that conclusion very forcefully.

Of special importance is the fact that the host of individual studies which have contributed to this 'general' date have been conducted independently on different material from widely-sundered localities over a period of several decades in different continents, both north and south of the equator. The result are thus not only broadly-based but stress the remarkable consistency of this class of evidence.

Yet, irrespective of the enormous scientific promise of radiocarbon dating generally, the very process embraces special problems. One of these is the contamination of samples worldwide by the release of atomic particles into the atmosphere since nuclear bomb tests began in 1945. Allowances have therefore to be made for the fact that "since 1962 atomic bomb testing has completely disturbed the natural C^{14} activity"[13]. Today, this element has always to be allowed for when new radiocarbon datings are calculated[14]

Other anomalies also sometimes occur. The following selection of these is worth considering, if only to demonstrate the many difficulties confronting scientists specialising in Quaternary chronologies. Some of the details are most instructive.

Certain mammoth remains from gravel deposits in east Norway have furnished C^{14} dates ranging from 19,000 years BP to more than 46,000 years BP. The gravels, however, apparently date from so-called terminal 'Pleistocene' times, so the interpretation of evidence like this must be that "...all the remains have been redeposited and lie in young deposits"[15]. Again, foraminifera in organically-rich 'late Pleistocene' mud cored at Santa Cruz, California, are seemingly much older than the mud itself. The conclusion must be that these organisms were entombed in it by an agent which eroded them out of some older stratum and reburied them when it deposited the mud[16].

Analogous cases involve timber debris. Radiocarbon dated wood from channel infill deposits on the floor of the North Sea, for example, appear to be considerably older than the host sediments[17]. In USA, coniferous wood from 'drift' deposits at Appleton, Wisconsin, yielded a date of 12,000 ±300 years BP when processed in 1965, whereas earlier attempts to date the same piece of wood produced entirely different dates – 10,856 ±410 years, 11,471 ±500, 10,241 ±650 and 11,830 ±100 years BP[18].

A comparable instance concerned wood collected from late Wisconsonian silt at Ready Bullion Creek, Alaska. One piece of wood was dated at 11,000 ±350 years BP, while a tree-root found at the same horizon at the same site turned out to be appreciably younger – 10,450 ±150 years BP[19] – younger in fact than the supposed antiquity of the deposits enveloping it. Theoretically the dates of remains occupying the same geological horizon at the same site should have been much closer than those actually determined.

Reviewing examples of anomalous botanical C^{14} dates like those just noted, Dr George Carter once observed that terrestrial plants differ in their carbon intake according to their individual ecological situation. Forest plants, for instance, differ from those in open countryside in their amount of isotope carbon. He also wondered if different parts of a plant differ in the amount of Carbon-14 that they naturally absorb[20]. The evidence of the various plant remains just listed suggests that this might very well be the case and that it could also have been so in the distant past as well.

Pollen sequences are often regarded as providing an unambiguous climatic record over the last 15,000 years or so. There are, however, definite limitations to the accuracy of its actual dating[21]. Between 1,500 and 20,000 years the accuracy of its dating is usually held to be ±250 years[22], although this may be an optimistic assessment. For example, pollen found in an area of West Angle Bay, Ireland, indicated cool conditions, whereas pollen taken from the same deposit in a nearby area indicated fully temperate conditions[23].

Other anomalous results involving dated pollen samples are known. One instance, a bog sample procured from below remains of a Romano-British archaeological site of known date gave a C^{14} date one thousand years too old[24]. This result was probably generated by the presence of an unknown quantity of 'dead' Carbon-12 (C^{14}) in the sample tested, which is liable to dilute the equilibrated mixture of C^{14} and C^{14} [25]. Variations in such mixtures within individual samples could, as at West Angle Bay, produce contradictory results. It is still a matter of debate whether the Irish deposit was formed under cool or fully temperate conditions, an uncertainty inevitably having a bearing upon the precise character of the former environmental background of that region. Radiocarbon dates can not only spring surprises but sometimes multiply uncertainties.

Again, aquatic plants and land, freshwater and marine shells are prone to providing misleading radiocarbon dates due to the fact that they may incorporate, through the watery media in which they live, deficient (old) C^{14} as all or part of their original carbon content, thus giving dates which are too old[26]. The distribution of radiocarbon in the oceans lies in the mixing zones between the upper and deeper water layers, which exhibit great differences in carbon dioxide content. This category of material can even be contaminated in laboratories from foreign carbon in the atmosphere and water supply[27], so that, due to these and possibly yet other variables, "...with samples older than 15,000 BP, errors in dating and correlations are so large that errors in apparent ages of some hundreds of years are of minor importance"[28]. At least one case is known where the error amounted to no less than 12,000 years!

Worse still, shells taken from the same vertical section of an infinitely more recent burial mound in south-eastern USA produced dates which "came out in the reverse order of age"[29].

The shells of molluscs also sometimes yield wildly incompatible dates. Separately C^{14}-dated fractions of the outer shell of a so-called 'late Pleistocene' pelecypod from Furry Creek, British Columbia, for example, turned out to be 11,080 ±160 years old, whereas fractions of the inner shell of the same specimen gave a C^{14} date of 11,300 ±190 years BP[30], a difference of approximately 300 years – for the same specimen!

Significant differences unquestionably exist between the isotopic composition of plants and animals, and C^{14} dating of their remains generally reflects this (see Appendix B), even when applied to contemporary biota.

Thus, blood and fat from the celebrated frozen mammoth cadaver found at Beresovka in Siberia afforded a C^{14} date of about 39,000 years BP[31], whereas pollen and plant fragments taken from its stomach (logically, the remains of its last meal) gave an unexpectedly young date somewhere between 7,000 and 6,000 years ago[32]. It is probable that both these seriously-conflicting dates are erroneous, and that the mammoth and the remnants of its last meal are of the same general antiquity as the frozen mammoth carcass from the Taimyr Peninsula in Arctic Russia, whose sinews have been C^{14} dated at 11,450 ±250 years BP[33].

Unlike ancient plant debris, fossil and subfossil bones are composed primarily of calcium mineral and C^{14}, little of the latter if they represent old individuals and more of it if they belong to younger animals. By testing collagen – the protein found in bones – it is possible to obtain C^{14} dates. This, however, becomes difficult when the collagen decreases with age to low concentrations. Moreover, it has been established that the environment of a burial can materially affect the apparent 'age' of the specimen being examined[34]. This, then, is yet another variable.

It is obvious from the foregoing that, despite their apparent accuracy, radiocarbon dates are actually anything but precise (although still a great advance on nearly all previous methods of dating ancient material) and that each example should be evaluated relative to the various factors and constraints just highlighted. For these reasons, therefore, the formulation of even a general date for the tremendous disaster under consideration is possible only by taking a large number of published dates from the relevant literature, and distilling the mean average of these. This is attempted in Appendix B, which lists over 200 samples from 574 separate C^{14} dates lying between 13,000 and 10,000 years BP.

Botanical dates have been segregated from their zoological equivalents, and New World from Old World examples. The resultant averages of each of these groupings is given separately, and the final mean of these submitted as the likely general date – 11,577 BP – of this great event. However, allowing for, say, a cumulative error of around 50 years either way, it is perhaps safest to settle on 11,500 BP as the best 'approximate' date yet available to us. Future research will doubtless refine this considerably.

A quite different avenue of enquiry concerns Plato's date for the cataclysmic foundering of the legendary island of Atlantis, said to have occurred 9,000 years before his own day[35]. Adding these 9,000 years to the 400 separating Plato's time from the time of Christ, and both of those to the 2,000 which have elapsed since then, we obtain another 'general' date of 11,400 years. This is remarkably close to that derived from averaging the C^{14} dates just discussed.

Plato, of course, spoke in comparatively vague terms, and Atlantis, if it ever existed, almost certainly did not sink precisely 9,000 years before Plato wrote. Significantly, augmentation by only a few score years brings Plato's date extraordinarily close to that suggested by C^{14} dating methods for the onset of some terrible worldwide catastrophe. Can this be wholly coincidental?

Focusing now on the likely time of the year when this disaster took place, palaeontological evidence seemingly provides the most reliable clues as to the actual month or months when it occurred. Plant remains in the stomachs of the refrigerated Siberian mammoth carcasses, and the amazingly well-preserve flowers and fruits discovered almost undisturbed on dead trees and bushes in Arctic lands (see Wood Hills of the North in Part Five) show that early summer was the season when this event erupted.

Just as telling are the vast numbers of very young animals which, with their elders, were chaotically entombed within the 'drift' deposits in caves, rock-fissures and depressions in open country. We immediately recall the numerous afore-cited reports specifically mentioning the indiscriminate slaughter of young and old alike, including foetuses. The presence at that time of so many juvenile animals indicates that the annual spring births, so general among mammals and birds, had only lately been achieved.

Other clues are contained in various traditional recollections of this event. Ovid, for example, refers to ripe grain being consumed by immense heat directed at Earth by a rampant celestial agent he referred to as Phaeton. Other accounts mention fruit being shrivelled by a tremendous world-enveloping heat. Ripe grain and well-formed fruit, and the acorns and nuts recorded from many 'drift' deposits in high latitudes all indicate late summer or early autumn season. Late summer or early autumn in, say, the northern hemisphere (where many singularly preserved fruits and nuts have been discovered) would give late Spring as its equivalent in the southern hemisphere (where many examples of juvenile animals have been met with, although not exclusively so. The probability that Earth, prior to this terrible event, revolved daily in a tholiform or more upright manner would, of course, have lessened the difference between the seasons hemispherically, or resulted in 'breeding' and 'harvest' seasons overlapping more extensively than at present. If so, that would account for the widespread contemporaneous burial of so many now seasonally separated strands of biological evidence in the same globally-distributed 'drift' and analogous deposits.*

Yet another line of approach concerns the ancient Persian tradition that a devastating conflict between Earth and a rampaging celestial object called Tistrya (Ovid's Phaeton) occurred when the latter was in the zodiacal constellation Cancer[36]. According to these records Tir was the name of the fourth month of the year, and as Cancer is the fourth constellation from Aries (when the ancient Persian year began, the celestial conflict took place in the fourth month. By modern reckoning this would make April the month when this event occurred, as in April the Sun is in the constellation of Cancer. However, in the ancient Persian scheme, Tir and the zodiacal sign of Cancer actually extended from 21st June to 21st July[37]. A high summer date, adequately encompassing recent 'breeding' and 'harvest' seasons north and south of the equator, thus appears to have been the date when this disaster (not just the Deluge) first unfolded. It is, therefore, seemingly easier to fix the time of year than to identify the actual year when this calamity occurred.

* See Note 11.

We are, then, about to follow a trail at least 11,500 years old, which, though dead and cold in many places, is elsewhere still plainly discernible and provides valuable insights into what really must have happened all those centuries ago.

2

AN UNKNOWN ASSAILANT

The traditions briefly reviewed in Part Three, which describe a major catastrophe having struck and devastated this planet long ago, in the childhood of humanity, expressly and consistently state that the calamity was due to a confrontation between Earth and one or more errant celestial bodies of immense power. In short, external agencies are unmistakably invoked.

Several authorities who have closely studied the geophysical features which, temporally at least, appear to naturally fall within the time span of that dreadful event, have independently concluded that these can only have resulted from influences exerted uniformly on the globe as a whole. Such conclusions also necessitate one or more external agencies. We have, in fact, already seen that this very suggestion has been raised with regard to the aforementioned world fracture complex, and the extensive mountain-building activity which characterised much of 'late Pleistocene' times. It was postulated in the early 1910s by Prof Rudolf Hauthal and Prof Hans Meyer after studying 'ice age' phenomena in Andean Peru and Bolivia with regard to an even wider range of geological factors. They stated that:

> Taken in conjunction with the accumulating evidence that the Ice Period occurred simultaneously over the whole globe, the facts lead to the conclusion that the cause is to be sought outside the globe – that is, it was of a cosmic nature. No cause having a local effect on special regions of the globe can account for all the phenomena.[38]

We previously advanced a similar genesis for the coeval biological extinctions detailed in Part Two. There, we saw that animals (often conventionally but mistakenly regarded as Ice Age forms) and plants of 'late Pleistocene' age were, regardless of size, age, sex or natural adaption, suddenly and violently slaughtered indiscriminately on all continents, Antarctica excepted. That factor alone confirms the global nature of the disaster involved and that the resultant extinctions occurred far beyond the boundaries set for Ice Age regimes by orthodox glacialism. The recorded despair of even dispassionate biologists contemplating the sobering scale of these frightful extinctions has already been noted, surely itself a matter of much significance.

The very immensity and obvious violence of operation exhibited by all these changes unerringly indicates that forces of staggering power brought them about with alarming speed globally.

The numerous traditions descriptive of a vanished genial prehistoric world – the Golden Age of the classicists – terminated abruptly by world-embracing disturbances, are remarkably accurate accounts of the very conditions required by the relevant fossil and geological evidence generally. This can hardly be another coincidence. Something, or some particular set of circumstances, quite literally brought to a sudden and violent end a long-established, environmentally equable regime worldwide. Viewed collectively, the known evidence admits of no other model. Lyellian 'uniformitarian' cycles were not involved, but catastrophic processes were. Indeed, only very exceptional circumstances could have produced them.

The question, then, is what actually caused such profound, widespread and swift changes if, apparently, the Earth is itself incapable of generating them on such a grand scale unaided? Precisely what external influences could have been brought to bear on our planet and simultaneously engendered so many striking results?

Traditionally, the principal celestial agent responsible for this disaster was remembered internationally by a plethora of names. Several of these have already been mentioned, although Phaeton[39], Typhon[40] and the Midgård Serpent[41] are probably the best known. The agencies represented by these names were anciently mythologised and were regarded as deities or terrible monsters to be revered, feared and placated. Almost always they were recollected as having been fiery, wayward and the bringers of pestilence and death. Surviving accounts of their visual appearances and their activities in the heavens – one interesting account which we shall consider more fully later details the main object's journey among the planets before reaching Earth's vicinity – present problems for modern scholars desirous of accurately identifying it. Was it, for instance, a comet, an asteroid, a giant meteorite or what?

That question occupies many pages soon to follow: but before grappling with its complexities we must first consider more closely what kind of agent or agencies would be needed to wreak so much havoc on Earth and cause our planet to react as it did. And we also need to take a more detailed look at the structure and motions of the Earth itself in order to appreciate how these would have to respond to acute external influences. These, in turn, should enable us to gauge the general level of severity needed to effect the structural and biological disruptions of the magnitude highlighted in parts one and two. Several recent discoveries have cast considerable light on these factors.

At this juncture, however, we are faced with a highly destructive agency of cosmic origin which, though traditionally remembered by a great variety of names, is as yet of undetermined identity. As an 'assailant' it is indeed 'unknown'.

3

EARTH STRUCTURE

The average person takes the Earth on which they live, its natural motions and the regular passing of successive days and nights more or less for granted. Blissful ignorance of the interplay of the complex processes which regulate Earth's seemingly orderly behaviour, and of its precise location in space, is not uncommon, while among others such factors are but very dimly understood. Here, however, such luxuries cannot be afforded if we are to accurately trace the outline of the tremendous event we will henceforth refer to as the Phaeton Disaster. At the very least we need a basic overview of Earth's general structure, motions and planetary status to accomplish our goal. A simple summary of these, designed to put into perspective the many details which follow, is given below.

The Earth is one of the minor members of the family of planets comprising the solar system (see fig 4.1) – enjoying, insofar as planetary scales are concerned, a modest status only. It is, however, a very well-developed 'water' planet (Venus is another), as against 'waterless' planets like Mercury and Mars, or gaseous planets like Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus and Neptune.

Orbiting the Sun at a mean distance of 93,000,000 miles (148,800,000km), once every 365 days (one Earth year) of 24 hours apiece, the Earth pursues an orbit which is not circular but an immense ellipse. The Earth is nearer the Sun at some months of the year than others, approaching closest to the Sun in late December each year, and its furthest distance in late June each year.

Earth's configuration resembles that of a flattened globe, where the equatorial diameter exceeds the polar by 26.70 miles (42.72km). The Earth has an axis around which it rotates once in every 24 hours. This axis, however, is not 'upright' (ie, at right-angles to the plane of the Earth's orbit) but inclined at an angle of 23.5° from the vertical – thereby explaining why the number of daylight hours in any given day varies in different parts of the Earth. Combined with the revolution of the Earth around the Sun, this axial tilt accounts for the four seasons – spring, summer, autumn and winter – which, of course, are reversed north and south of the equator. Thus, as the Earth moves along its orbit inclined at an angle of 23.5°, and because the orbit is elliptical, summers in the northern hemisphere occur when the Earth is furthest from the Sun and those in the southern hemisphere when it is nearest the sun.

It is important to grasp the above details because, as seen earlier, both the fossil evidence and various traditional accounts suggest a more vertically aligned axis prior to Phaeton's visit. If true, a vertical axis would have produced days of equal length all the year round, and the seasons (assuming they were distinguishable) would not have been so marked as at present.

Particularly critical is the fact that if the Earth were a true sphere it would have no stability of its axis of rotation, and:

> ...the smallest beetle walking over it would be able to change the axis of rotation relative to markings on the sphere by an arbitrarily large angle; the axis of rotation in

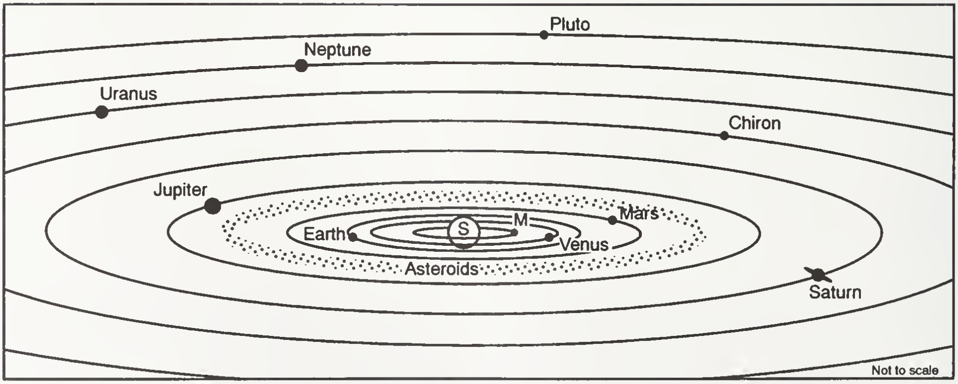

Fig 4.1. Schematic diagram of the solar system. The orbits of the planets are shown on the same plane – most planets orbit approximately so, except for Chiron and Pluto. Not to scale.

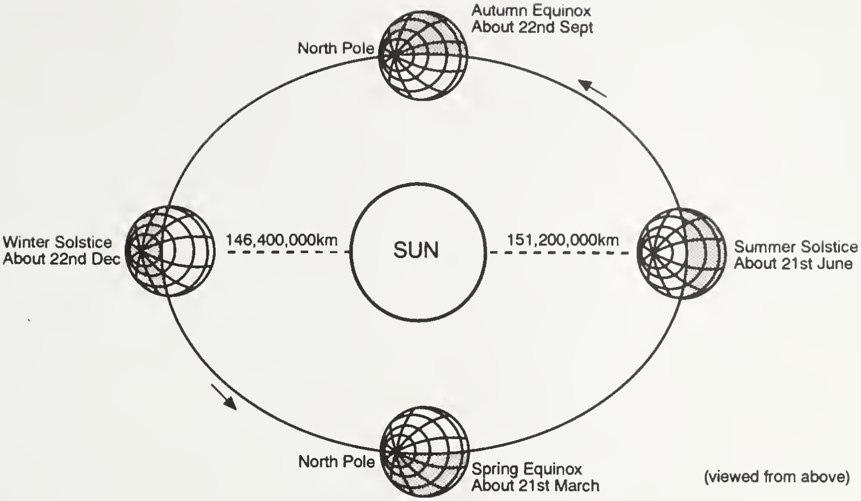


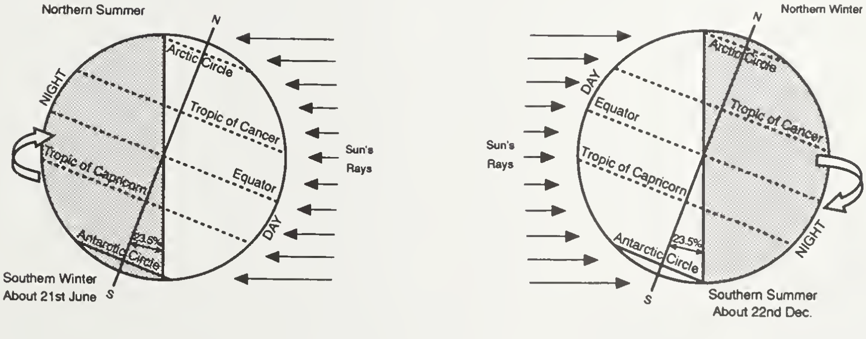
Autumn Equinox
About 22nd Sept
North Pole
Winter Solstice
About 22nd Dec
146,400,000km
SUN
151,200,000km
Summer Solstice
About 21st June
North Pole
Spring Equinox
About 21st March
(viewed from above)

Fig 4.2. The attitude of the Earth to the Sun. Viewed as from above. Not to scale.

> space would change by a small angle only. What stability the Earth's axis possesses against movement relative to the solid Earth is derived from the geoidal shape... This complete stability against a secular change is therefore dependent upon the stability of the shape...[42].

The geoidal shape, of course, is the equatorial bulge, which, stabilising the Earth as it rotates, prevents it turning over pole to pole. This equatorial bulge also allows the application of torques by the Sun and Moon, which cause the Earth to wobble like a top and produce thereby a slow precession of the equinoxes[43]. We shall meet this latter effect again shortly in connection with the density of the Earth. "...At present the solid part of the Earth is very nearly the equilibrium shape appropriate to the present speed of rotation"[44].

If, however, some external body could exert a sufficient influence upon the Earth – for example to induce a fast torque, thereby altering its angle of rotation by a significant amount, changing the axial tilt – then the newly formed equatorial bulge would force Earth's crust to adjust itself to



Northern Summer
N
NIGHT
Arctic Circle
Tropic of Cancer
Tropic of Capricorn
Equator
DAY
Sun's Rays
23.5°
Antarctic Circle
Southern Winter
About 21st June
S
Northern Winter
N
DAY
Arctic Circle
Equator
Tropic of Cancer
Sun's Rays
Tropic of Capricorn
23.5°
Antarctic Circle
NIGHT
S
Southern Summer
About 22nd Dec.

Fig 4.3. The tilt of the polar axis.

that bulge. This raises the question of whether there is a permanent stiffness or an absence of stiffness in the main geoidal shape. Certainly any severe departure either way from its present shape would betray itself very simply by a displacement of the oceans, for:

> ...the oceans which take up the equilibrium shape instantly would then dominate either at the poles or in equatorial regions. In fact, the distribution of land and water shows no significant tendency of such a type. On the other hand, the Earth's speed of rotation is believed to have changed significantly in geological time. It has been changed either by giving up angular momentum to the Moon through the agency of tidal friction – and the Moon shows signs of a tidal bulge appropriate to a greater proximity to Earth – or the speed of rotation may be determined by the resonance with atmospheric tides, in which case it must have changed substantially with changes in the structure of the atmosphere.[45]

Here, then, we find that, although the Earth's present configuration is close to the equilibrium shape appropriate to the planet's rotational speed any serious departure from that shape would generate all kinds of catastrophic physical effects. Similar dire results would occur if the speed of rotation were greatly slowed or accelerated by some means. It has been noticed that the present axis of rotation is decidedly unstable, and not apparently of any great geological age. Gold's observation that changes in the structure of the atmosphere may have altered the speed of rotation is particularly interesting for, as we shall presently see, such an atmospheric change did indeed occur as part of the Phaeton disaster. That the Moon also exhibits signs of having previously been closer to Earth is another noteworthy point, for, if nothing else, it suggests a definite though not fatal former disruption of the present Earth/Moon system. The significance of this possibility will shortly become all too apparent. We must now resume, however, our survey of the Earth's structure.

Earth's mass or weight is estimated to be about 6.6 x 10^{21} tonnes (66 followed by 20 zeros), and its density to be a value of about 5.519[46]. Such figures immediately raise problems of crucial import, for typical rocks, such as granite, underlying the dry land surface of the Earth, possess a density of only 2.7. As Putnam once commented:

> Where is this additional heavy material to be found to give such a high average value for the whole Earth? Does the density of the Earth increase at a constant rate from the surface to the centre? Or does the Earth have lighter material in its surface layers and then have extremely heavy material concentrated in some kind of central core?[47].

This last possibility is generally considered to be the most likely, although some have urged that a uniformly increasing density from the surface down to the centre rather than a concentration of denser materials near the centre is more probable. Certainly other lines of evidence suggest that the specific gravity near the Earth's centre may be 15 and possibly as high as 18[48].

Compared to any single object on its surface, then, the Earth is enormously heavy and gives most observers a reassuring impression of vast strength and permanence. Viewed from a planetary standpoint, however, this is somewhat illusory, for the Earth's crust is comparatively very thin, varying in thickness from a mere 5–30 miles (8-48km)[49], with the thickest portions believedly underlying the mountain ranges. Proportional to the Earth as a whole, the crust is therefore scarcely any thicker than an onionskin is to an onion.

The crust itself consists of three main layers. An uppermost one of loose or unconsolidated deposits, such as gravel or ooze, in many places comprises the actual crustal surface. Below this is a layer of moderately hard consolidated rocks, such as limestone and sandstone, which are often stratified and fossiliferous; and lowest of all is a layer extending downwards to the lowermost portions of the crust, composed of very hard crystalline rocks, such as granite and serpentine, of igneous (volcanic) origin, and devoid of fossils.

Most of the depressions caused by the inequalities of the Earth's surface are occupied by water, so that only a mere 29.22% of land actually appears above sea level. This unequal division of land and sea leads to some very interesting statistics concerning the distribution of water on Earth. Thus:

Water	Cubic Miles
in the oceans	329,000,000
in the atmosphere	3,600
in glaciers and ice fields	3,250,000
in lakes and rivers	55,000
in the Earth's crust	20,780,000
Total	353,088,600

These figures show that the oceans constitute close to 95% of the total amount of water on the Earth and existing snowfields and glaciers only about 1%[50].

Despite their relatively great overall volume and the tremendous pressure they exert upon the crust, compared to the size of the Earth the oceans are little more than puddles occupying hollows on its surface, and immeasurably smaller than the oceans of semi-fluid molten magma that underlie the crust. Indeed, the estimated total amount of magma within the Earth exceeds the oceans in volume 1000:1 and in mass 5000:1[51]. The genesis of magmatic fluids, however, remains unknown, nor is it known at what depth in the planet's interior they originate[52]. It was once believed that the whole interior below the crust was molten, and that volcanoes, being points of crustal weakness, were surface outlets for this fiery incandescent material which, on exposure to air, cooled as lava. This is now known to be untrue.

> The data available to us indicate that the depth of the source for most volcanoes is shallow. Furthermore, the magmatic source for a volcano is very localised, compared to the total area of the Earth...[53]

A shallow origin for the source of the magma appears to be exactly that required by those Earth models which postulate that the 'mantle' – the material, solid or otherwise, underlying the crust but above the Earth's core – is multi-layered and visco-elastic[54]. In such models it is believed that these layers move at slightly different speeds from one another as the Earth rotates once every 24 hours, the resultant friction between them being a source of heat and magma. We shall discover the great significance of these possibilities when, shortly, we identify the external influence which so catastrophically brought 'Pleistocene' times to an end.

Nevertheless, quite prodigious quantities of magma can be ejected even by a moderate volcanic eruption. Thus, in 1887 Mauna Loa in Hawaii produced roughly 5,000,000 cubic yards (about 2,500,000 tonnes) of lava per hour[55]; and considering the lava erupted continuously for approximately 150 hours, some idea of the immense volume of magma which reached Earth's surface on that occasion is easily formed. Moreover, the lava was of a very heavy basaltic type, and was apparently lifted a minimum height of 20,000ft (6,250m) to the surface from its source within the Earth.

Deep fissures in the lithosphere (Earth's crust and mantle) also sometimes permit magma to reach the Earth's surface. In several regions, as in the Deccan of western India, the Columbia Plateau of the north-western United States and the Parana River region of South America, vast floods of basaltic lavas, predating Phaeton's visit, have welled up through fissures, and overspread huge areas as accumulations often hundreds of feet thick. These magmatic outpourings significantly altered local topographies.

Forces exerted on the magma include, along with the natural gravitational ones of the Sun and the Moon, the Earth's speed of rotation (a centrifugal force) which creates the equatorial bulge mentioned previously. These pressures exert great thrust, since the viscous or semi-fluid magma, unlike the ocean waters, is totally enclosed. Evidence suggests that the magma directly under the crust rotates at a similar speed to the crust, but that all the magma in specific vertical areas will, depending on densities, pressures and temperatures, possess an angular momentum – 0 at the poles to 1,000mph (1,600kph) at the equator. The speed of rotation probably varies also at different depths within the Earth's interior. These magmatic movements may conveniently be referred to as the magma tide.

Any sudden or marked realignment of the Earth's axis or in Earth's speed of rotation would induce changes in the magma tide as it adjusted to the new equator or altered rotational speed. Such changes, however, might not be uniform throughout, owing to a 'drag' factor deep in the magma itself, although overall they would certainly impose terrible strains on the lithosphere generally. That widespread magmatic adjustments occurred at the time of Phaeton's visit must be obvious from the evidence presented earlier. The actual operation and the effects generated on that occasion will be discussed shortly.

Still deeper within the Earth is the core. This believedly consists of an inner and an outer core. Nobody, of course, has ever seen Earth's core, but the general consensus of opinion is that it is a solid or near-solid mass with a high metallic content. There is, however, a sizable body of opinion which prefers to regard it as a largely liquid core of immense density. The core's actual diameter is also as yet undetermined, and may indeed be undeterminable if it is not spherical, but it is thought to be many hundreds of miles, and perhaps to be very much greater. As a unit, the core is extremely important and is intimately connected with the Earth's magnetic field, to which we must now give attention.

4

GEOMAGNETISM

The Earth possesses an electrically-charged magnetic field, referred to simply as geomagnetism. Earth is not alone in possessing such a field, as essentially similar ones exist on the Moon[56] and on Mercury[57], to name just two other bodies in the solar system. Not improbably such fields are commonplace throughout the Cosmos generally.

Laboratory experiments have shown that a rotating spherical magnet takes with it a magnetic induction field which, in turn, gives rise to an induced electromagnetic force (EMF) in a connecting circuit. Interestingly, the EMF formed by the Earth's field tends to slow down the planet's rotation, a factor of much significance.

The Earth being a rotating, approximately spherical, electrically-conducting magnetic body, is thus a kind of gigantic equivalent of the rotating magnet in the laboratory mentioned above. The Earth's magnetic poles, which, when united, form a di-pole (two oppositely-charged separated poles), are slightly off-centre (ie, they do not coincide with the geographical poles). They are aligned approximately along the axis of rotation but in the opposite direction to that of the angular velocity vector (see fig 4.4). As early as 1803, it was demonstrated conclusively that the Earth is negatively charged[58], a finding amply confirmed by many further experiments. From these discoveries and the Earth's present electrical condition, the magnetic di-pole is known to be similarly charged[59].

Being electrically-charged, the Earth will attract to it and accelerate positively-charged particles in the solar wind flow[60]. This positive charge even manifests itself in the atmosphere and causes a downward electric field of between 100 and 500 volts per metre at ground level on a clear day[61].

R E Juergens has noted that, as space is now known not to consist of a near-vacuum as previously thought, but is a plasma of dissociated ions and electrons, electrically-charged bodies such as planets could, in certain circumstances, perturb each other, and that, in order to shield themselves, possess a space-charge sheath capable of assembling a sufficient charge to match the electrical potential of the surrounding plasma. Juergens suggested that this charge is actually the magnetosphere (fig 4.4), and that a body which has either orbited the Sun far out in the solar system or which has traversed interstellar space may have thus acquired an exceedingly high electrical potential. He further suggested that such a body, if or when passing on an intersecting orbit with a planet in the solar system would probably not collide, due to the cushioning effect of the space-charge sheaths of the bodies involved. However electrical discharges could be expected to occur between them as the bodies endeavoured to equalise their electrical potential. The discharges could assume enormous proportions and produce catastrophic effects on both bodies[62].

Earth's electromagnetic field, therefore, apparently performs a function of great importance, inasmuch as, in the event of the near approach of some highly-charged celestial body, it acts as a shield to minimise the cataclysmic results that would otherwise occur. Any breach of the field would, of course, be disastrous.

All authorities agree that the Earth's electromagnetism is generated in the Earth's core, and emanates from the movements of the molten fluid (assuming that this is what the core consists of). This motion is created by the effects of the Earth's precession on the solid crust and on the core itself. Indeed: "The relevance of precession to the geomagnetic field is that the rate is determined by the magnitude of the equatorial bulge"[63].

It is therefore widely believed that electric currents are a major component of the geomagnetic field, with the dynamo being driven by the combined gravitational influence of the Sun and Moon – the cause of precession in the first place. Thus, any serious distortion (up or down) of this Solar/Lunar gravitational pull would disrupt the precession to such an extent that Earth's magnetic field would drop (weaken) due to a reduction in the electric current being produced – even to the extent of causing the dynamo to go into reverse for a short period. This would amount to a magnetic reversal! As we shall now see, good evidence exists for such a reversal having occurred at the time of the Phaeton disaster.

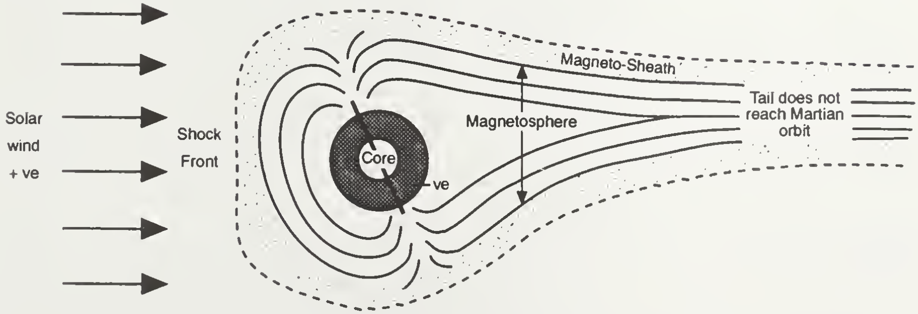

Fig 4.4. The space charge-sheath and magnetosphere of the Earth. After P Dyal and C W Parkin.

5

REVERSED POLARITY

While in liquid condition igneous rocks are non-magnetic, but when cooling to about 580° Celsius, or Curie Point, acquire and retain a magnetic state, the orientation of which reflects the magnetic polarity of the Earth at the time the cooling takes place. This is often referred to as palaeomagnetism. The magnetised rocks may later become displaced, or the orientation of the Earth's magnetic field altered. The widespread occurrence of solid rocks possessing a reversed polarisation has long interested geophysicists, who have spent many decades investigating the causes and significance of this apparent anomaly. Certainly there is now universal agreement that the only plausible explanation for the phenomenon is: "...that the Earth's magnetic field was itself reversed at the period when the rocks were formed"[64].

Researches have also shown that: "The north and south geomagnetic poles reversed places several times"[65]. And the process is envisaged to have been abrupt: "...the field would suddenly break up and reform with opposite polarity"[66]. Moreover, as the source of terrestrial magnetism is believed to lie in electric currents on the surface of the Earth's core:

> ...substantial changes in the speed of Earth's rotation become easier to explain... Whatever the mechanism, there seems no doubt that the Earth's field is tied up in some way with the rotation of the planet. And this leads to a remarkable finding about the Earth's rotation itself... the Earth's axis of rotation has also changed. In other words, the planet has rolled about, changing the location of its geographical poles.[67] (Our italics).

Reversed polarity in rocks, therefore, is apparently connected with catastrophic conditions like those previously described in this book, and very definitely with some type of axial shift. But the intensity of such polarity greatly exceeds the norm and strongly suggests the involvement of non-terrestrial influences – although under normal circumstances the intensity of magnetism acquired by cooling rocks depends on the speed with which the original molten material cools and on the size, composition and form of its constituent particles. Thus, although some variability in the intensity of the magnetism acquired by igneous rocks under normal conditions is predictable, rocks exhibiting reversed polarity possess magnetic charges ten times and often up to one hundred times stronger than could have been produced by known terrestrial conditions. As Manley has observed:

> This is one of the most astonishing problems of palaeomagnetism, and is not yet fully explained, although the facts are well attested"[68].

Despite the demonstrated occurrence of an unexpectedly large number of magnetic reversals throughout Earth history, it cannot be mere coincidence that a particularly well marked reversal took place around the general date (11,500 years BP) advocated in this book for the Phaeton disaster. Reversedly magnetised sediment near Gothenburg in southern Sweden, for example, has been dated as being between 12,600 and 8,600 years old[69]. The mean average of these dates falls surprisingly close to 11,500 years BP, and within the so-called Laschamp geomagnetic event (17,000 to 7,000 years ago)[70], which latter also suggests that the inclination of the Earth's magnetic axis at that time may have been 30° from its present orientation. Such possibilities have prompted various authorities to enquire whether, at times of polarity reversals, the magnetic pole follows the polar axis, or vice versa, and Cox and Doell to remark that, although unlikely:

> It is, of course, possible that the coincidence of the palaeomagnetically-determined di-pole axis and the present rotational axis is fortuitous.[71]

The geological youthfulness of these polarity reversals not only finds correlations with the comparable modernity of many of Earth's present topographical features, as specified in Part One, but is also strongly suggested by the clusters of palaeomagnetic anomalies discovered in north and central Europe, eastern Canada, the Gulf of Mexico and New Zealand, centred around the date 12,500 BP[72]. These are widely regarded as representing a global magnetic reversal about that date, which has come to be named the 'Gothenburg flip'. Significantly, a drop in the strength of the Earth's entire magnetic field appears to have occurred sometime between 13,750 and 12,350 years ago[73]. This was attended by various other important changes, including earthquakes, vulcanism, water table fluctuations and large scale climatic variations. Of these, severe earthquakes in particular may even induce axial wobble, and polarity reversals. Discussing such possibilities, Kennett and Watkins noted that:

> Heirtzler has recently speculated on a relationship between earthquake activity (and by implication upper mantle activity) and geomagnetic polarity change. He reasons that because there is evidence to show that earthquakes of magnitude 7.5 or greater may cause wobble of the spin axis, it is therefore conceivable that an Earth wobble may be of a magnitude sufficient to cause reversal of the geomagnetic field[74].

Inevitably such axial wobbles and crustal strains generate both seismic and volcanic activity. It is not surprising, therefore, that a relationship has been traced between periods of severe vulcanism and geomagnetic changes, and that these have, in turn, greatly influenced climatic regimes and caused widespread biological extinctions. Indeed, as Kennett and Watkins have observed:

> Of eight observed micro-faunal extinctions and appearances in the Southern Ocean, six either occurred during or very close to geomagnetic polarity changes. We suggest that the climatic changes which can result from volcanic maxima are much more plausibly the cause of such extinctions and appearances than increased radiation at the water surface during any di-pole collapse accompanying a polarity change...[75].

It will be recalled from Part Two that the annihilation of the Siberian and Alaskan mammoths and their contemporaries, approximately 11,500 years ago, was accompanied by massive vulcanism and that similar coeval evidence has been noted from California, South America and several other localities. Innumerable other regional changes of varying intensity and longevity occurred coincidentally in different parts of the world, and combine to produce an overall picture of epic turmoil. And since vulcanism and earthquakes frequently go hand-in-hand, of what magnitude were the earthquakes and eruptions which accompanied the latest uplift of the Rockies, Alps, Himalayas and many other prominent mountain ranges? As seen in Part One, these attained their present elevations at the very close of so-called 'Pleistocene' times. Consider R T Chamberlin's description of the rise of the Andes in South America:

> Hundreds, if not thousands, of cubic miles of the body of the Earth almost instantaneously heaved upward produced a violent earthquake which spread... throughout the entire globe. Many world-shaking earthquakes must have been by-products of the rise of the Sierras.[76] (Our italics).

Another celebrated authority, Eduard Suess, wrote in much the same vein when he said:

> The earthquakes of the present day are certainly but faint reminiscences of those > telluric movements to which the structure of almost every mountain range bears witness. Numerous examples of great mountain chains suggest by their structure... episodal disturbances of such indescribable and overpowering violence, that the imagination refuses to follow the understanding.[77].

Here, surely, were earthquakes and eruptions that far transcended those which, according to Heirtzler, would be needed to cause wobble of the spin axis – a wobble which, in Kennett and Watkins' opinion, would conceivably have been large enough to have reversed Earth's magnetic field.

Thomas G Barnes has examined another aspect of reversed polarity. He noted that all available data show an exponential decay in the Earth's magnetic field, with a half-life of only 1,400 years. This led him to conclude that:

> It is obvious that this magnetic decay phenomenon could not have been going on for more than a few thousand years, as the magnetic field would have been implausibly large for the Earth. This is strong physical evidence that there must have been a relatively recent origin of this electromagnet or some unknown catastrophic (our italics) 're-energising' event.[78].

This re-energising event was presumably that which imparted magnetic charges to igneous rocks ten to one hundred times stronger than normal. In our submission this was the Phaeton visitation which, as we have seen, was catastrophic. We must mention, however, that some authorities have suggested that the process of polarity reversals actually occupies a very considerable period of time, the reversal itself perhaps as long as 1,000–3,000 years, the decay from 2,000–3,000 years, and the recovery of the magnetic field a further 2,000–3,000 years.

Such views reflect a 'uniformitarian' approach requiring the Earth's magnetic field to be self-reversing under specific conditions – and that it does this without outside influence. It has, for example, been pointed out that the Sun's magnetic field reverses itself during each 11-year solar cycle[79]. No evidence exists, however, for any such regular reversal of Earth's magnetic field. Nevertheless, as indicated above, it is entirely possible that abrupt reversals could conceivably occur under catastrophic conditions. The extremely highly-charged igneous rocks mentioned earlier are apparently examples of such reversals. Certainly, one or more highly-magnetised errant celestial bodies of great density, or large mass, making a close approach to the Earth, could produce exactly the above described effects.

Like many of his imitators, the leading modern 'catastrophist', Immanuel Velikovsky, has urged that the near-approach to Earth of some such large celestial body (in his opinion a comet which became the planet Venus) would have caused the Earth to cease rotating[80]. Velikovsky's conclusions were largely based upon the Old Testament story of Joshua which, with equivalent legends from other sources, asserted that in early historical times the Earth actually stopped rotating. Viewed scientifically, the braking to a halt of the Earth in space is theoretically possible, but only if a sufficiently massive external influence is involved. The internationally famous astronomer, Dr Carl Sagan once devoted considerable time analysing Velikovsky's arguments[81]. Although concluding that Velikovsky's concepts were very probably erroneous, Sagan found that a cessation of Earth's rotation was certainly feasible given the right combination of circumstances. He especially discussed the thermal energy produced by any slowing of the Earth's natural rotation, observing:

> ...thermal considerations are in fact fatal to the Joshua story. With a typical specific heat capacity of $c_p \sim 8 \times 10^6$ erg gm^{-1} deg^{-1}, the stopping and restarting of the Earth in one day would have imparted an average temperature increment of... 100°K, enough to raise the temperature above the normal boiling point of water. It would have been even worse near the surface and at low latitudes... 240°K. It is doubtful that the inhabitants would have failed to notice so > dramatic a climatic change. The deceleration might be tolerable, if gradual enough, but not the heat.[82].

Elsewhere, Sagan states that a gradual deceleration of the Earth's rotation could take place over a period shorter than a full day[83], and that the minimum time for an external influence to make itself felt upon the Earth as a whole is just 85 minutes[84]. Sagan, who concluded that no cometary influence like that envisaged by Velikovsky could have slowed or halted the Earth's rotation, was, of course, considering comets as the disruptive agents since this was Velikovsky's thesis. If, however, comets were not the culprit bodies, but some other body or group of bodies acting in concert, then Sagan's conclusion, while correct relative to Velikovsky's arguments, may very well be inapplicable to the great world disaster highlighted throughout this book. As we shall see shortly, Phaeton was almost certainly not a comet but some other type of celestial object.

6

THE THERMAL FACTOR

Geomagnetic changes involve vast quantities of thermal energy already possessed by the Earth. Much of this is caused by internal tidal friction – magmatic flow versus the semi-rigid outer crust, resulting from the planet's natural rotation. The outcome of this is to convert rotational and/or orbital energy to thermal energy. Any alteration to Earth's present modus operandi would, if it involved a rotational or orbital change arising from tidal friction, lead to a loss of orbital energy accompanied by either a loss of, or no change to, angular rotational momentum. Dr Harold Urey, investigating this matter relative to the hypothetical near-approach to the Earth of a large comet, concluded that the loss of thermal energy amounted to 10^{31} ergs[85]. Others have suggested still higher figures and, again, have usually postulated the close approach of at least one sizable celestial object as being necessary to cause such a loss.

Influenced by the ideas of writers like Whiston, Donnelly, Beaumont and Velikovsky, this object has usually been thought of as a large comet, although, as shown later, its identity was almost certainly not cometary. At least one leading authority on celestial mechanics, J Derral Mulholland, has examined the validity of Velikovsky's ideas and of possible collisions between Earth and other planet-sized celestial bodies. Although not specifying the size of his hypothetical planet, it may be safely presumed that Mulholland had in mind one the size of Venus or Mars, since these two planets featured so prominently in Velikovsky's writings. Accordingly, Mulholland wrote:

> If a planet-sized object were to pass close to the Earth, then giant tides would be raised; there would be global earthquakes; the north pole would change direction; the day, the month, the seasons, the year would all change. Faith is not involved here; these are unavoidable consequences of the laws of motion as we presently know them. We must accept that the dynamical aspects of Velikovsky's visions of hell on Earth are largely acceptable. This is not to admit that the events he described ever happened... today the celestial mechanics of Sir Isaac Newton and Simon Newcomb are no longer the ultimate measure. Today, celestial mechanics is a living, vital science that > admits of non-gravitational effects, of electromagnetic interactions, of flexible astral bodies and of statistical descriptions of some types of occurrences involving large numbers of bodies. In spite of our new knowledge, some unrecognised influences may yet remain.[86].

Obviously, any near-approach to the Earth of a massive celestial object possessing high electromagnetic potential would, through slowing or halting Earth's rotation and generating internal tidal friction, greatly increase the natural level of Earth's thermal energy.

In such circumstances, therefore, frightful earthquakes (as Mulholland admits) leading to axial wobble (as Kennett and Watkins postulate), an abrupt geomagnetic reversal and a change in the location of the geographical poles (as Runcorn, Kennett and Watkins, Mulholland and others have concluded), as well as dramatic climatic changes and a general rise in temperatures – especially near the surface and at low latitudes (as Sagan admits) – could be expected to occur concurrently on a global scale.

It can hardly be coincidence, therefore, that all these derangements appear to have occurred more or less simultaneously on Earth – geologically very recently.

Nor can it be coincidence that these same physical changes are remembered graphically in a host of legends, traditions and ancient texts the world over. Even Sagan's deduction that world temperatures would have risen above the boiling point of water finds confirmation in various traditional accounts, a particularly telling point when it is realised that this was a transient phenomenon incapable of leaving in the geological record much in the way of permanent evidence for its actual occurrence. Summarising many original sources,[293, 294] Bellamy has noted:

> The reports of a flood of 'hot' water are rather numerous. Various North American tribes, such as the Makah, Quileute and Chimakum Indians, mention in their myths the surprising temperature of the waters which, as they correctly report, were surging towards the north.[87]

Elsewhere, Bellamy provides further examples of these singular ancient recollections: the Voguls of Finland believed that a great Deluge of boiling water once roared over the world; the Salinas Indians of California describe a flood of hot water which anciently overwhelmed the entire globe; the Ipurinas of northwestern Brazil tell how the Earth was once drowned by a tremendous flood of hot water because the Sun tipped over; and Talmudic records report how the antediluvians perished in boiling water at the time of Noah's Flood[88].

It is difficult to see how numerous isolated peoples, sharing a common memory of a vast global inundation long ago, could have independently invented the idea of its waters being hot. Their accounts, scattered and variable though they are, must refer to the former real existence of such waters and to the real occurrence of the physical conditions necessary for their production.

The normal friction between Earth's semirigid outer crust and its viscous magmatic interior, as well as the thermal energy naturally generated by it, would have been greatly intensified during any event like a Phaeton disaster. Viscosity of magma is profoundly affected by stress or removal of stress, while the magma's centrifugal speed as Earth rotates, and the drag that would be imposed upon Earth by any closely-approaching celestial gravitational influence, are other factors governing the behaviour of hot plastic-like magma under cataclysmic conditions[89]. Under stressful conditions, such as Phaeton's visit engendered, the magma tides must have reacted very much along the lines postulated by Donald Patten when he wrote:

> Based on spherical volumes, with the diameter of the Earth about 8,000 miles, it can be seen that the oceans of magma are infinitely greater than the relatively thin and shallow pools of water lying on top of the Earth's crust.
>
> Hence the tidal upheaval from within the Earth must have been very much greater than the tidal upheaval on the Earth's surface, involving her relatively minute oceans. Therefore upheaval or thrust internally and compression externally must have been > simultaneous; only their proportions were different. With this volume of magma in tidal upheaval, the Earth's crust acted something like a bellows. And the Earth's relatively shallow oceans merely washed around as the Earth's crust heaved and sagged[90].

Continuing his theme with reference to the conclusions of geologists like Dr George Gamow[91] and Dr Adrian Scheidegger[92], Patten added:

> Any fluid, when constricted, will exhibit a greater thrust... The fluid ocean is unconfined; the fluid magma is completely confined. This affects the gathering or concentration of thrust in certain belts or regions. Also the nature of water is somewhat different than magma as a fluid. At high temperatures, magma becomes increasingly fluid, and at lower temperatures, it becomes increasingly viscous... At the high temperatures inside the Earth, magma has a nature which is neither exactly like a fluid, nor exactly like a solid. It is described as 'plastic-like'. It is something like asphalt, beeswax, honey or molasses. It will flow, but at retarded rates[93].

Clearly the hotter magma becomes the more easily and quickly it will flow and the more responsive it would be to any approaching external gravitational influence. Under such conditions, the thermal energy resulting from the enhanced friction between it and the confining terrestrial crust would be truly enormous, leading in time to the magma becoming a very mobile mass within the Earth's shell. It is thus not unduly difficult to see how, or why, in the Arctic, the depth of the Eurasian Basin is anomalous, and:

> ...represents a regional collapse of the Earth's surface due to material being removed from the lower mantle.[94]

Or why there was an apparently coeval collapse of a huge tract of the old landmass of Beringia (see map 1C) immediately east of the present Kamchatka peninsula, or why there were partially compensatory massive up-wellings of magmatic lava then elsewhere.

It is especially noteworthy, therefore, to find references in the Phaeton cycle of legends to the rocks boiling and melting at the time of that disaster. Many instances, particularly from mountainous districts, of rocks recently folded, bent and warped while clearly still in a molten state were highlighted in Part One. There, also, consideration was given to the almost unimaginable heat generated by colossal rock masses sliding juggernaut-like over one another when the Alps, Rockies and Himalayas, in attaining their present elevation, were moved long distances laterally in various geographical directions. With so much thermal energy unleashed by these and other related causes, it is little wonder that so many nations possess recollections of a terrible world conflagration and of boiling flood waters at the time of the Phaeton disaster.

The association of a worldwide conflagration and a global deluge, however, has proved especially vexatious for classicists because this reported juxtaposition seemingly makes little or no sense. These scholars perceive no underlying calamity capable of producing both types of destruction on a planetary scale more or less simultaneously. The otherwise excellent mythologist G Knaack, for example, found himself supposing that the linking of the two agents was due to an invention of some later compiler, thus:

> Mention of the rivers that Zeus unleashed gave the later reviser the idea of the deluge.[95]

Such interpretations ignore the fact that: numerous independent accounts repeatedly insist that a terrible world conflagration was extinguished by an immense deluge which also destroyed that untouched by the fire; and that the association of the two motifs is embedded in traditions far older than the classical Greek and Roman Phaeton accounts. Englehardt recognised this when he remarked:

> The very fact that several sources report on a link between Phaeton's destruction and > the Deucalion flood, or more generally, between catastrophes of fire and water, in spite of the difficulty in rational explanation, favours the fact that it is not a matter of later constructions but that here, via mythological hypotheses, a part of stubborn reality comes to light from under a veil. Therefore we shall have to conclude from the sources that the fiery catastrophe that was interpreted as Phaeton's fall was really followed by a short-lived but extensive inundation which ended the lives of so many men that one could talk of a destruction of mankind.[96]

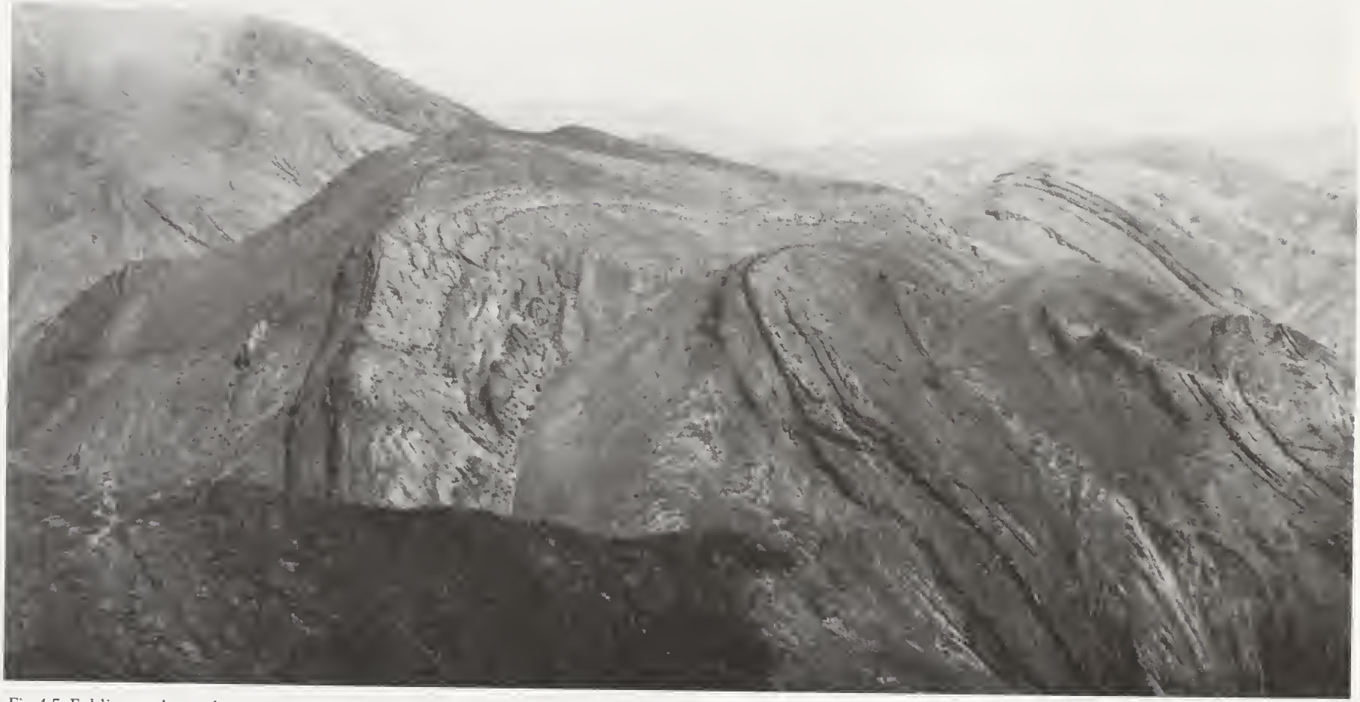

Fig 4.5. Folding and overthrusting. Limestones and shales over 12,000ft (3,750m) above sea level at Cortadera, Peru, exhibiting three repeated overthrusts. Official photo: Portrerillos Company. Extracted from F A Perret's "The Eruption of Mont Pelée", by permission of the Carnegie Inst, Washington DC 1929, and R S L, Oxford.

Today, our possession of knowledge unknown to the earlier classicists and mythographers permits a better understanding of how the Earth would react physically if subjected to a catastrophe like the Phaeton disaster and its attendant stresses.

Is it not, therefore, exceedingly remarkable that many of the physical effects mentioned in the catastrophe legends exactly reflect the physical conditions deducible from detailed analyses of the interplay of the relevant natural forces activated by a hypothetical near-collision between Earth and a sizable celestial object; or that the field evidence for the former real occurrence of such an event and its effects is both abundant and incontrovertible? The coincidences are surely too numerous to be products of mere chance.

7

INSTABILITY

The reality of a geologically recent alteration to the inclination of Earth's axis of rotation which, as indicated in parts one and two, can be repeatedly inferred from abundant geophysical and biological evidence associated with the end of the so-called Ice Age, is a matter of prime importance to a proper understanding of what happened to our planet about 11,500 years ago.

As noted earlier, an axial change may have occurred coincidentally with the last great polarity reversal known to us, the 'Gothenburg Flip', and that earthquakes of 7.5 or more on the Richter scale of severity – such as those recorded in Part One as having attended the gigantic crustal disturbances, extensive mountain building and intercontinental rifting characteristic of 'late Pleistocene' times – are sufficient under - particular circumstances to generate axial instability[97]. As concurrently-operating phenomena, these 'late Pleistocene' dislocations could not have arisen of their own volition, but can only have been initiated by some external cause.

Thus, the genesis of several singular axial and orbital fluctuations exhibited by Earth even today can be traced back directly to the tremendous events of 11,500 years or so ago. A brief survey of some of these provides a clearer picture of how and why Earth presently functions as it does.

Contrary to popular belief, neither Earth's elliptical orbit round the Sun[98] nor its daily speed of axial rotation[99] is absolutely fixed. Both have varied, sometimes quite appreciably, over a period of time and may yet do so again.

Many authorities have linked these orbital and rotational fluctuations to the onset[100] as well as the melting[101] of the alleged 'Pleistocene' ice-sheets, with climatic changes[102], migrating monsoonal regimes[103], and with increases in solar radiation reaching the Earth's upper atmosphere[104]. Stated bluntly, the Earth's orbit (although not depicted as such in diagrams of the solar system) 'wanders' somewhat erratically along its course, and the Earth itself spins irregularly and 'wobbles' as it moves round the Sun. Such instabilities are symptomatic of a flawed equilibrium. Their connections with so many aspects of present and recent world climates illustrates their crucial role in initiating and maintaining those regimes.

By human standards fluctuations in the earth's daily speed of rotation appear to reflect a longterm disorder exhibiting an approximate 10-year cycle of operation[105], and is seemingly the result of a combination of imperfectly balanced features deep within the Earth itself[106], including core-mantle coupling[107] – of which more shortly. In reality, however, the origin of these fluctuations appears to be remarkably youthful.

The rotational irregularities in particular are intimately linked with the 'Chandler Wobble', caused by the fact that Earth's axis of rotation fails to coincide with its axis of inertia. Of these, the former describes around the latter a cone-like motion – a small rapid wobble[108] – known as nutation, which it performs over a more or less set period. The period has been termed the Chandler or Newcombe Period and the resulting unbalanced motion the 'Chandler Wobble'. The relationships between these motions have been investigated by several astronomers and geophysicists in recent years[109], while others have explored not only additional excitations of the wobble by various climatic factors, such as atmospheric changes[110], but, subscribing to Earth models requiring a multi-layered visco-elastic core, that viscosity of the deep mantle[111] and core region[112] can also enhance wobble and its speed of action. Yet others have studied the apparent connections between large earthquakes and excitations of the Chandler Wobble[113], complementary to Heirtzler's calculations respecting the degree of seismic intensity needed to induce, theoretically at least, polarity reversals and a change in the location of Earth's geographical poles or spin axis.

Significantly, one of the most marked orbital changes yet traced, and certainly the one so far most studied, occurred at the end of the 'Pleistocene' epoch between 11,000 and 11,500 years ago. It was virtually coincident with the inauguration of the climatic and atmospheric changes just listed, and with the advent of the environmentally-disturbed Younger Dryas episode referred to earlier. This, it will be recalled, was epitomised by singular and abrupt alterations to oceanic circulation, wind intensities, northern snowfall levels and to large segments of the plant and animal kingdoms. These all were changes, it was also suggested, conceivably generated by some sort of adjustment to the tilt of the Earth's spin axis.

Orbital and rotational changes, of course, could be expected if the tilt of Earth's spin were altered – although that could probably only occur as a response to some powerful influence outside Earth itself.

Be that as it may, all these changes are unquestionably interrelated, while their direct association with the end of the alleged Ice Age times and the onset of the highly variable Younger Dryas episode indicates that many if not all the effects developed more or less synchronously about 11,500 years ago, through arising from a common cause.

In the general scale of geological events they occurred but yesterday.

It is thus scarcely surprising that Earth is far from being the most perfectly functioning planet that a surprisingly large number of people assume it to be. On the evidence of its fluctuating motions and behaviour patterns, it has not merely recently sustained serious disruption to many of its natural physical and atmospheric features but is still slowly recovering from the traumatic event which imparted them.

In that connection it must also be significant that analogous planetary instabilities of apparently recent date, and which will be considered in greater detail shortly, are traceable elsewhere in the solar system. Before dealing with that evidence, however, we should contemplate the far-reaching implications of the further aspects of pole-shift set out below.

8

POLE SHIFT

Among the terrestrial effects listed by almost every investigator of a theoretical near-collision has been a shift in the inclination of Earth's axis. Authorities of the calibre of Runcorn and Mulholland have admitted that axial shifts could be expected to occur on such occasions. This subject, however, was debated far earlier, although usually in connection with a specific event – a great world catastrophe during the infancy of mankind. The ancient Egyptian Ipuwer Papyrus, for example, describes terrible devastation created by an early cataclysm which "turned the Earth upside down"[114]. The Ermitage Papyrus, now preserved in St Petersburg, refers to a similar ancient world convulsion[115]; while a third Egyptian papyrus tells how the Earth was nearly destroyed by fire and water during a tremendous celestial upheaval long ago when the south became north and the world turned over[116]. The celebrated Greek philosopher Plato described a similar axial dislocation, caused by a vast flood "which foamed in and streamed out" and made the Earth move irrationally:

> ...forwards and backwards, and again to right and left, and upwards and downwards, wandering every way in all six directions.[117]

Not only does Plato's remarkable statement remind us of Runcorn's conclusion that Earth 'rolled about' on the occasion of a massive magnetic reversal, but it suggests that the Earth wobbled wildly in many directions. It also reminds us of the Greenland Eskimo belief that Earth formerly turned over, and that the Andaman Islanders fear a repetition of a great natural disaster that occurred in the days of their remote ancestors when the world capsized[118]. Also it is significant that, on viewing a comet in the heavens, the peasantry of Menin in Flanders used to exclaim: "The sky is going to fall; the Earth is turning over"[119].*

We are also reminded here of the aforementioned ancient Chinese and other early traditions describing a time when the stars poured across the heavens and Earth settled down to a lower position than it had previously occupied. All these apparently refer to an axial change witnessed by early Man.

Modern interest in such momentous events revived last century. The then-recent Spitzbergen discoveries, for example, suggested to some that those islands must have once lain 20° nearer the equator than they do today[120] – and as the modern theories of continental drift and plate tectonics had not then been formulated, it was considered that a change in the position of the poles (an axial tilt), causing profound climatic alterations, must have occurred. This explanation was usually that offered to account for the obvious very rapid refrigeration of the hairy mammoth and woolly rhinoceros cadavers found in northern Siberia.

Geologists were asked by mathematicians and astronomers what geological conditions would be necessary to cause such polar shifting. The most likely cause, the geologists opined, was a redisposition of the weight of the Earth's surface. This possibility was closely analysed by Sir George Airy, then astronomer royal, who assumed a sudden elevation of a mountainous mass in latitudes "most favourable for production of a large effect", that would prevent the axis of rotation from coinciding with the axis of the globe geoid. This, he argued, would cause the Earth to wobble and the poles to wander. The smallness of the inferred effect was, however, discouraging and Airy concluded that:

* See Note 12.

> ...the shift of the Earth's pole would be only two or three miles, and this, though it would greatly surprise astronomers... would produce no such changes of climate as those which it desired to explain.[121]

A reinvestigation of the problem by Sir George Darwin using the same formula was hardly more encouraging: only a relatively small amount of polar shift was possible, a mere two degrees in fact. But serious objections to the validity of this approach were voiced, even in the 1870s. One mathematician emphasised a particularly important point – one still crucial to any modern assessment of the problem. He advised:

> Mathematicians may seem to geologists almost churlish in their unwillingness to admit a change in the Earth's axis. Geologists scarcely know how much is involved in what they ask. They do not seem to realise the vastness of the Earth's size, or the enormous quantity of her motion. When a mass of matter is in rotation about an axis, it cannot be made to rotate about a new one except by external force. Internal changes cannot alter the axis, only the distribution of the matter and motion about it. If the mass began to revolve about a new axis, every particle would begin to move in a different direction.[122] (Our italics)

The geologists' specifications had proved too imprecise, and Airy, Darwin and others had assumed a 'uniformitarian' solution apparently incapable of actually occurring.

A much better explanation of climatic changes attendant upon markedly reoriented geographical poles, was advanced by the Austrian meteorologist Julius Hann, who was quoted by W B Wright as follows:

> The simplest and most obvious explanation of great secular changes in climate, and of former prevalence of higher temperatures in northern circumpolar regions, would be found in the assumption that the Earth's axis of rotation has not always had the same position, but that it may have changed its position as a result of geological processes, such as extended rearrangement of land and water.[123]

As seen in Parts One and Two, a radically different disposition of land and water evidently existed until Phaeton's visit. Large continental landmasses such as Fennoscandia, Appalachia, Beringia, Tyrrhenia and others in the southern hemisphere existed in regions presently occupied by oceans now often miles deep. Their combined weight was stupendous and its redistribution through crustal collapse catastrophic.

We have also seen that many of these changes occurred around 11,500 years ago at the onset of the Younger Dryas episode, when, among other effects, large-scale northern ice-sheets are said to have abruptly melted and snowfalls suddenly intensified. Seemingly contradictory (and certainly at odds with our contention that the ice age of conventional geological doctrine never actually existed), these effects are actually explicable if the surface erosion (and deposition of extensive 'drift' deposits) usually but mistakenly attributed to massive glaciation were really legacies of the naturally violent action of immense volumes of water displaced by enormous sudden rearrangements of Earth's crust due to extensive subsidence of landmasses like those just mentioned.

It can be no coincidence that several recent studies of precisely these factors have linked, on the one hand, continental lithospheric thickness[124], and, on the other, widespread deglaciation of supposed northern ice-sheets[125] to the probability of 'polar wandering' during alleged 'Ice Age' times. Replacing finite ice-sheets (and subsequent deglaciation) with finite regions of lithospheric thickness (and the subsequent collapse or subsidence of these), would appear to engender the same general effects if subjected to some external force disrupting the inner workings of Earth as a planet. Not only has all this a further bearing on the chimerical nature of the celebrated 'Ice Age', but it is related to viscosity of the Earth's mantle and core and the likely behaviour under stress of both these aspects of Earth's structure. As we shall now see, the Earth's crust could actually slide or slip to a catastrophic degree.

9

CRUSTAL SLIPPAGE

It may be erroneous to argue that a relocation of Earth's spin axis would necessitate the pulling over of the entire globe into a new orientation. In 1952, K A Pauly revived a theory previously developed by the astronomer A E Eddington, purporting to explain the cause of the 'Ice Age' as due to the sliding of the lithosphere over the viscous magma underlying it through tidal friction originating from the Moon[126]. This is tantamount to saying that crustal slippage had occurred.

We have noted that the hotter magma becomes the more viscous and asphalt-like is its condition. Oceans of highly heated magma would provide an excellent fluid surface over which comparatively solid crustal rocks could theoretically slide. Obviously a lesser force is needed to produce crustal slippage than to tilt the whole globe in some new direction, for the crust is only a portion – and a comparatively small one at that – of the Earth's total mass, and the momentum required to achieve this is directly dependent upon that mass.

To ensure that the axis of the Earth's core is that of the planet generally, while simultaneously permitting the crust to slide over the magma, the friction between these two layers (the source of much thermal energy) must be obviated – and in order to alter the position of the crust relative to Earth's spin axis, the regions comprising the equatorial bulge must be stretched while polar territories must be at least partially truncated or compressed. Significantly, both phenomena occurred at the close of 'Pleistocene' times.

In the concept of a rotating multi-layered visco-elastic planet like that referred to earlier, the arguments that the irregular coupling of Earth's differentially-revolving viscous core and mantle, even now producing variations in the length of day, begins to look like an after effect of geologically recent crustal slippage. Normal mantle viscosity enhanced by powerful external influence, combined with sudden 'deglaciation'[127], thus seemingly caused not only extensive crustal slippage and fracturing, vulcanism, seismic activity and orogeny, but also a change in the actual inclination of the Earth's spin axis. Acting in concert, such phenomena would have been sufficient to produce all the geophysical changes enumerated up to this point.

Nevertheless, although Eddington's theory unquestionably contains several attractive features, such as accounting for warmer areas formerly existing at the poles and vice versa in other latitudes, it has certain serious drawbacks.

Thus, as early as the 1920s, another authority, Harold Jeffreys, highlighted a flaw in Eddington's theory. He wrote:

> Has the inclination of the Earth's axis to the plane of its orbit varied during its history? The answer... is a definite 'Yes!' The theory of tidal friction... assumes the equator and the plane of the Earth's and Moon's orbits to coincide... they do not.[128]

This difference between the plane of the Earth's and the Moon's orbits strongly suggests, however, that it is the terrestrial axis that has altered. We have, moreover, previously noted that the Moon was apparently once closer to Earth, so it is conceivable that, even if displaced, the Moon may have still retained the original plane of its orbit.

Did these apparent changes result from the same cause? We may never know the answer to this question although, while it is theoretically possible to interpret these displacements as due to two entirely separate events, perhaps aeons apart, it surely overstretches credulity to argue that any influence powerful enough to have altered the inclination of Earth's axis would have somehow contrived to exclude such a near celestial neighbour as the Moon from its sphere of action.

Jeffreys was another authority who concluded that only an external force could induce a change in the orientation of the terrestrial axis. He remarked:

> If we consider the axis of the Earth's angular momentum, this can change in direction only through couples acting on the Earth from outside.[129]

Almost all authorities are as one, therefore, in concluding that only a powerful external agent could have altered the inclination of Earth's axis. We have outlined the principal hypotheses advanced from time to time purporting to explain how this could or might have happened dynamically. Broadly speaking, these advocate that either the entire globe was realigned axially, or that only the Earth's crust changed position by sliding over the underlying viscous magma. Since, however, Earth's axis has obviously changed, and geologically very recently at that, the first group of explanations concern the very heart of the problem, and indicate that the entire Earth has indeed assumed a new axial inclination. This does not exclude crustal sliding as having occurred simultaneously with axial displacement.

The aforementioned crustal deformations, especially the crustal foreshortening around the present polar regions, as well as the extensive rifting and fracturing – as Hobbs[130] and others have concluded – occurred on a planetary scale everywhere at about the same time. As others have contended, the Earth's axis must have been inclined in a more vertical plane than today[131]. These crustal deformations collectively constitute excellent evidence that crustal sliding occurred in at least some regions concurrently with an axial realignment.

In this respect the precession of the equinoxes and the Chandler Wobble – a circle that the polar axis describes about itself every 432 to 436 days[132] – may represent not only further results of a recent perturbation of Earth by some massive external influence but also 'hunting' by the Earth as a unit in its endeavours to regain complete stability.

It seems, therefore, more than likely that both the above categories of explanation are essentially correct, that they are not mutually exclusive, and that both planetary and crustal changes of the magnitude discussed took place simultaneously.

Finally, is it not interesting to find accredited authorities suggesting that global fracture patterns, such as would occur at the time of crustal slippage and axial realignment, indicate that, immediately prior to the time of fracturing, the inclination of the terrestrial axis was more vertical than at present?

If so, it is surely important to consider the following points very carefully. The present plane of the equator to the orbital plane (the obliquity of the ecliptic) is currently 23°27'8", and has been calculated to vary between 21° and 24° over a period of 40,000 years[133]. This governs the seasons as they now occur, and provides the one day/one night per year presently experienced at the poles. If the obliquity were nil, however (ie, if the plane of the equator and the orbital plane coincided), and the rotational axis were vertical, the following effects would dominate:

- Day and night would be of equal length everywhere on Earth.
- Environmental conditions would differ profoundly from those of today, with a widening of the temperate zones and a marked narrowing of the cold and torrid zones.
- Milder polar conditions would prevail and the present ice caps would not exist, or would exist only very feebly, at the poles.
- The differences in the seasons would diminish with fewer extremes of climate everywhere, with some regions never experiencing a proper winter.

These factors, and the aforementioned fact that virtually all the world's major mountain ranges were appreciably lower before the 'Pleistocene' Phaeton visitation, enable us to readily appreciate how such conditions can only have been conducive to vigorous plant growth on almost every land area; that deserts can only have been small or non-existent; and that ocean currents must inevitably have been generally warmer. The further possibility that, before this terrible event, Earth may have rotated more slowly – with a day lasting perhaps as much as 30 hours – also means that there would have been longer growing-time for plants, both daily and seasonally; and that any disruptive external influence, of the magnitude necessary to enforce a shift in the orientation of the geographical poles, would have braked the Earth to a halt more rapidly than seems possible with its present rotational speed. The corollary to this would be that the resultant crustal dislocations and worldwide increase in thermal energy would have occurred somewhat more quickly, and certainly at a catastrophic pace.

All the details, therefore, begin to come together. Facts which at first sight appear anomalous, and ideas that initially seem fanciful or unlikely, now interlock like pieces of a giant jigsaw. Dare we ignore the significance of such a pattern?

10

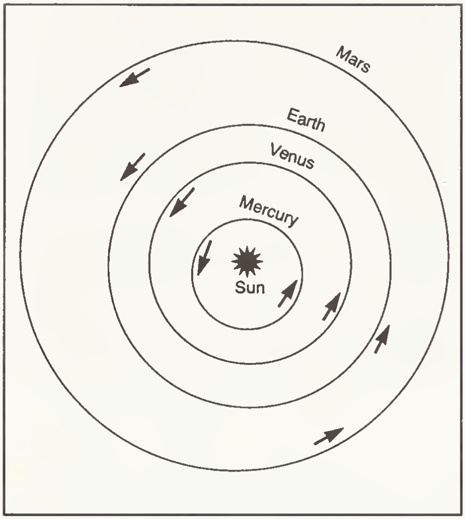
THE SOLAR SYSTEM

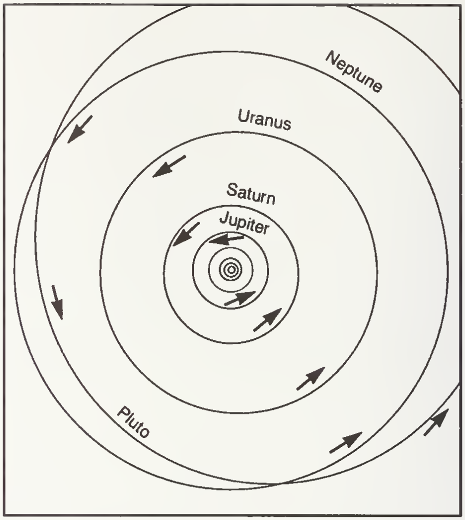
Accepting for a moment the reality of a near-collision between Earth and one or more sizable astronomical objects approximately 11,500 years ago, it follows that such an event could scarcely have been confined to just the Earth/Moon system, or failed at some stage to involve at least some of the other planets and bodies comprising the Sun's family. Indeed, even a general survey of that family discloses some very remarkable details which collectively suggest that, in the comparatively recent past, several of those bodies were subjected to and partially deranged by some powerful influence of unknown origin and identity.

As detailed description of the constituent members of the solar system would make rather tedious reading here, the salient statistics are better comprehended in comparative tabular form.

The huge astronomical distances cited are utterly meaningless, of course, to all save mathematicians, and fail to convey either the immensity of space occupied by the solar system or the isolated position of this system in the immeasurably grander vastness of the Cosmos. It is, however, important to grasp the enormity of this backdrop, for it was against this that the Phaeton disaster occurred; and since, as will shortly be shown, Phaeton traversed the solar system before reaching the environs of Earth and took an appreciable while to cross the distances involved, early humans possibly had sufficient time to perceive that a major catastrophe was approaching and make organised preparations to save themselves from the impending destruction. It must, therefore, be extremely significant that ancient records have come down to us actually describing the awesome cosmic drama produced by Phaeton during its passage through the solar system. These will be considered shortly.

If, therefore, we make a scale model of the solar system small enough to be readily understood, it will have to be the size of Piccadilly Circus in London (some 150yds or metres across), and we must use a marble-





Left: Fig 4.6. The eccentricities of the orbits of the inner planets, drawn to scale.

Right: Fig 4.7. The eccentricities of the orbits of the outer planets, drawn to scale. This diagram is eighteen times smaller in scale than fig 4.6. The orbit of Chiron is not shown, since, due to its recent discovery (1976), little is yet known about its eccentricity.

sized object to represent the Sun. This we will place in the centre of the model. On the same scale, the planets will be small seeds, grains of sand, and specks of dust, and the model will be only just large enough to accommodate Pluto's orbit. On this scale virtually all the satellites become invisible. Yet, as Sir James Jeans once observed[134], at this scale the nearest star, represented by another marble, will be somewhere near Birmingham or, if we go in the opposite direction, somewhere near Calais – some 100 miles or 160km distant. We can see, therefore, that although the Phaeton disaster was a gigantic affair here on Earth, in the context of the solar system it was a much more modest event, while in that of the Universe generally it amounted to little more than a ripple.

Before reviewing the evidences of apparently recent celestial disruption in the solar system, it will be important to note that, contrary to popular belief, the planets do not orbit the Sun on a common plane or follow exactly concentric paths. Indeed, table 4A shows that Neptune and Pluto, for instance, orbit on extremely different planes, and (figs 4.6 and 4.7) the eccentricities of the planetary orbits generally.

Also of relevance is the path taken annually by the Sun through the twelve zodiacal constellations as viewed from Earth. Traditionally these constellations are those of Aries, Taurus, Gemini, Cancer, Leo, Virgo, Libra, Scorpius, Sagittarius, Capricornus, Aquarius and Pisces. They form "...a band about 8° wide on the celestial sphere, centred on the ecliptic"[135] or plane of the Earth's orbit around the Sun, in which the Sun, Moon and planets appear from Earth to move from west to east[136] (not to be confused with the daily apparent rotation of the heavens as a whole from east to west – the former being due to the orbital motion of Earth and planets, and the latter being due to the rotation of the Earth). Strictly speaking, "...the ecliptic is a mathematical fiction corresponding not to the actual plane of Earth's orbit, but to one with all minor irregularities smoothed out"[137].

Although the Greek astronomer Aristarchus of Samos is generally credited with having discovered the obliquity of the ecliptic[138],

Table 4A.

Planetary statistics Based on the latest available information

PLANET	Mean distance from the Sun in millions of miles (kms)	Equatorial diameter in miles (kms)	Volume (Earth =1.0)	Mass (Earth =1.0)	Density (Water =1)	Surface Gravity (Earth =1.0)	Direction of axial rotation	Period of equatorial rotation	Period of revolution	Orbital velocity (km/sec)	Inclination of equator to orbital path	Inclination of ordit to plane of ecliptic	Eccent-ricity of orbit	Satellites
Mercury	36 (57.6)	3029 (4847)	0.056	0.055	5.4	0.380	W-E	59 days	87.97 days	47	<30°0'	7°0'	.206	-
Venus	67 (107.2)	7700 (12,320)	0.857	0.816	5.2	0.890	E-W	243 days	224.70 days	36	117°0'	3°04'	.007	-
Earth	93 (148.8)	7926 (12,682)	1.0	1.0	5.5	1.0	W-E	23h56m	365.26 days	30	23°05'	0°0'	.017	1
Mars	142 (227.2)	4215 (6744)	0.150	0.107	3.9	0.380	W-E	24h06m	687.0 days	25	24°0'	1°08'	.093	2
Jupiter	483 (772.8)	89,000 (142,400)	1318.0	317.9	1.3	2.6	W-E	9h8m	11.86 years	13	3°01'	1°03'	.048	16
Saturn	880 (1408)	74,100 (118,560)	769.0	95.2	0.7	1.1	W-E	10h4m	29.46 years	9	26°7'	2°5'	.056	17
Chiron	1282 (2052)	?	?	?	?	?	?	?	50.68 years	?	6°54'	?	.38	-
Uranus	1800 (2880)	32,000 (51,200)	59.0	14.5	1.2	0.960	W-E	15-17h	84.01 years	6	90°0'	0°8'	.047	15
Neptune	2755 (4408)	41,000 (65,600)	72.0	17.4	1.7	1.5	W-E	15h7m	164.8 years	5	28°8'	1°8'	.009	2
Pluto	3687 (5900)	3250 (5200)	0.1	?	?	?	E-W	153h0m (6dy 9h)	249.9 years	4	?	17°2'	.249	1

Metric values, where appropriate, given in parentheses.

the Greeks did not, as is often stated[139], devise the zodiac about 2,000 years ago, although they probably were responsible for allotting each sign a width on the celestial sphere of 30°. References to zodiacal constellations in the earlier records of the Babylonians, Egyptians, Chaldeans and ancient India[140] show that, as a device, the zodiac was much older than classical Greek culture, being of very great antiquity indeed.

But irrespective of when the zodiac was first devised something noteworthy happened to it subsequently.

> Because of the effects of precession and as a result of the International Astronomical Union's (IAU) adoption of constellation boundaries which are not exactly 30° long, the Sun's passage through the constellations does not correspond to its passage through the signs of the zodiac. According to the IAU boundary definitions, the Sun travels 44° through Virgo, only 7° through Scorpius [both zodiacal signs], and 18° through Ophiuchus, a constellation for which there is no zodiacal sign.[141]

This suggests that a change has occurred in the inclination of Earth's terrestrial axis – like that previously discussed – since the zodiac was first invented. In that connection it is also interesting that certain ancient traditions aver that Libra was a sign added to the zodiac following the Deluge.* If true, that would imply an antediluvian origin for the zodiac. The traditional association of the Deluge event with Phaeton's visit gains added interest when we recall that ancient Persian accounts specify that the visit occurred when the Sun was in the zodiacal constellation of Cancer, a detail indicative of the existence even then of some type of zodiacal device or gauge.

Thus, from a quite unexpected quarter we encounter further apparent confirmation of the recency of a profound terrestrial disruption which, occurring after people had reached a fair degree of civilised existence, among other things altered an early device created, presumably, to measure time and predict seasonal cycles. That people attained such advanced knowledge so early is strongly supported by their coeval possession of the astonishing mathematical expertise highlighted in later pages.

---

* See Note 13.

Any celestial intruder arriving from more remote cosmic regions would tend to encounter or pass close only to planets nearest its line of advance at that specific time. Those planets which happened to be orbiting the far side of the Sun might, in such circumstances, remain comparatively unaffected by the intruder. This, we shall find, appears to be precisely what occurred during the Phaeton event.

11

THE MAVERICKS

In addition to the planets and their satellites, there are other celestial bodies and substances in the solar system, which pursue erratic paths or are unpredictable in their actions. Accordingly, they may be conveniently dubbed celestial mavericks. Some of their recorded characteristics suggest that they may have had direct connections with the Phaeton disaster.

Asteroids

The genesis of asteroids is uncertain, and has long been a subject for speculation[142]. The asteroid belt lies between the Jovian and Martian orbits and, because some attain appreciable size, are sometimes referred to as planetoids. Irregularly shaped, apparently rocky, bodies, asteroids range in size from Ceres, Pallas, Vesta, Iris and Juno – the largest, with estimated diameters up to 625 miles (1000km) – to others perhaps just metres across. Calculations suggest that up to 80,000 asteroids may actually exist[143], although most are too small to detect by present means.

Approximately three thousand asteroids have now been discovered and awarded names or numbers; others have been briefly sighted only to be 'lost' again. No asteroid is big enough to retain an atmosphere, although it has been postulated that a few of the largest may possess frozen ones represented by a coating of ice.

One of the largest, the irregularly-shaped Vesta, which has an average diameter of 325 miles (520km), is of particular interest here on several counts. Close-up photographs of it taken by a recent NASA space probe shows that Vesta has an astronomically and geologically very youthful basaltic surface, and two even younger large craters believed to have resulted from a "single great impact"[144] – although with what is as yet undetermined.

Although the origin of many asteroids is still unknown, opinions have lately been offered that at least some asteroids may represent all that remains (ie lower mantles and core) of "catastrophically ruptured" formerly larger bodies[145]. The significance of that interpretation will become apparent later.

Many similar asteroids appear to be free-moving pieces of some of the larger asteroids. Vesta, for instance, appears to have spawned a small family of lesser asteroids and another family of small basaltic meteorites, called eucrites[146]. Analyses of several eucrites which have fallen to Earth show that not only is the basalt of which they are made apparently the same as that forming Vesta's surface, but that it is likewise exceedingly youthful[147]. It has been suggested that these eucrites represent fragments of Vesta's surface blasted out radially into interplanetary space by whatever impacted with it and endowed it with two craters.

Numbers of other asteroids circle the Sun on highly eccentric orbits, several occasionally approaching closer than Mars – and at least eight cross Earth's orbit. Of the latter, Eros, with a diameter of a mere 16 miles (25km) has been known to approach to within 14,000,000 miles (22,400,000km) of Earth. Viewed astronomically this is rather close.

Collectively, the behaviour patterns of these objects are highly suggestive of some geologically recent disruption of an older, more orderly asteroid regime, or that the asteroids en masse (eucrites included) are themselves remnants of one or more catastrophically disintegrated bygone worlds.

Comets

Over a thousand comets have been reported since modern records were first begun, and on average six or seven new ones are discovered every year. It has been suggested that their number is in the order of 100,000, but even this huge figure may fall short of the real total.

Although various hypotheses have been formulated, comet origins are unknown[148]. Some authorities suggest the existence of cometary material far beyond the solar system, which is periodically disrupted causing pieces to be drawn off; others, like Clube and Napier[149], suggest they originated through the destruction of one gigantic object some 10,000–20,000 years ago; and Opik has wondered about comets and planets having a common origin[150]. Van Flandern has even discussed the possibility of comets being remnants of a former asteroid planet[151]. But, whatever their source, they are apparently true members of the solar system, revolving round the Sun on elongated, elliptical orbits[152].

The period of these orbits varies considerably, with 40 or so comets circling the Sun with orbital periods of 100–1,000 years, while the majority take considerably longer. Some, it has been estimated, take as long as 40,000 years[153].

There are also short-period comets and those which return at erratic intervals. For instance, Encke's comet orbits the Sun every 3.3 years, but has been known to arrive

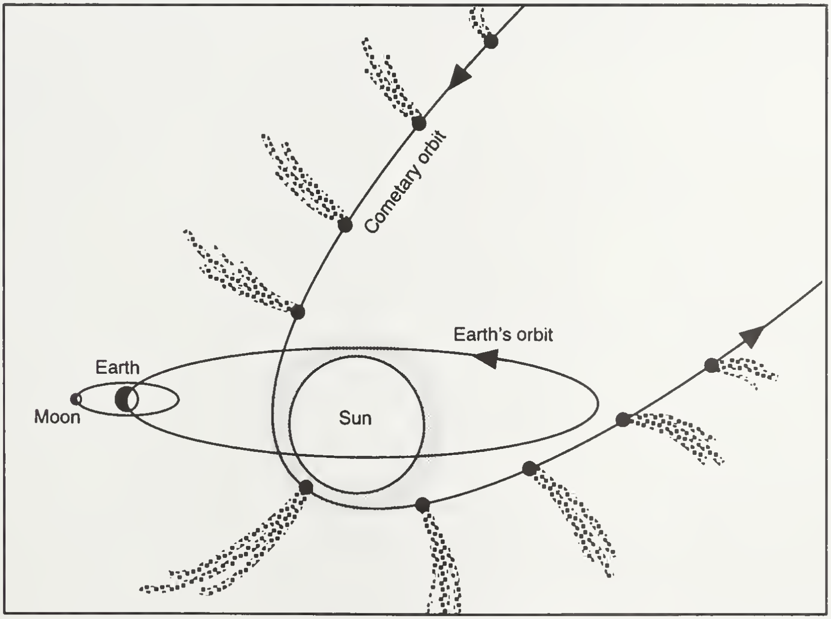

Fig 4.8. Schematic diagram showing a typical path of a comet round the Sun. Note how the comet's tail always points away from the Sun.

'early' on several occasions[154]; while Biela's comet, orbiting every 6.6 years, arrived late three times before finally disintegrating in 1852[155]. About 20 comets have been seen to divide since Biela's break-up. A photograph of Morehouse's comet of 1902 shows what seems to be the comet's tail fragmenting (fig 4.9).

Additionally, there are occasional interstellar comets which do not orbit the Sun. One such was Bronsen's comet of 1846, which arrived from remote cosmic regions, crossed the solar system, and travelled on into interstellar space, never to return[156].

While the Sun acts as a focus for all cometary orbits, Jupiter appears to act as another focus for short-period comets. Lexell's comet of 1770 and Brook's comet of 1889 both actually passed through the Jovian satellite system and almost grazed the surface of Jupiter and split in two[157]. Yet, despite such close encounters, no comet is known to have seriously affected the motions of the Sun, the planets, or their satellites. Indeed, it is the planets which affect the comets, not the reverse, with the larger planets such as Jupiter and Saturn capable of altering the comet's orbit and speed[158].

This is due to the fact that comets have insufficient mass to perturb the planetary bodies in the solar system gravitationally[159]. Even though the coma or 'head' surrounding the nucleus of a comet may attain a diameter of about 20,000 miles (32,000km) or even 200,000 miles (320,000km) – thus exceeding the Sun in volume but not in mass – it is actually very thin and seemingly composed largely of dust, for all but the dimmest stars can be seen through it[160].

The actual mass of a comet lies in its nucleus, the latter varying in its diameter from less than a mile (1.6km) in small comets to as much as 10 or 20 miles (16–32km) in large ones. The composition of the nucleus is still not clear, but it is thought by some to be aggregates of stones loosely held together by gravity – the equivalent of a flying gravel-bank. It has also been referred to as a 'dirty snowball' on the assumption that it is composed of 'interstellar dust' made up of compounds of hydrogen, carbon, nitrogen, oxygen, methane, ammonia and water – the last three as ice particles[161]. Another opinion postulates that frozen water is the main constituent[162]. It is also widely thought that ices compose 70–80% of all cometary nuclei[163]. It is this insubstantial mass of the comet's nucleus which makes it an unlikely candidate to be Phaeton, for while a collision would cause some planetary damage, almost certainly such limited mass would fail to perturb Earth's motion, fracture its crust, retard its rotation, engender a magnetic reversal or affect the polar axis.

Meteors

Literally billions of these rocky objects seem to be loose in interplanetary space. Many theories have been formulated to account for their existence. An early idea regarded meteors as the remnants of orbiting trains left by both existing and defunct comets, mainly because of the occurrence on particular dates of meteor swarms. Some meteors, however, are so large – up to a mile (1.6km) or so in diameter – that it seems unlikely that they were ever parts of comets. More recently, different explanations have been advanced. One is that meteors normally orbit in the asteroid belt but that hypothetical collisions between asteroids from time to time disrupt meteor orbits and move them into new ones across the solar system. Meteor orbits, however, are unknown, and according to some may differ appreciably from those of asteroids. Another theory postulates that meteors are fragments of parent meteoric planets which pass through the solar system[164], although nobody has so far knowingly sighted such a planet. Trains of meteors have been observed, however, which possibly support this theory – an especially memorable one occurring on February 9th, 1913, travelling NW-SE at a speed of 6 mps (9.6 kps), some 30 miles (48km) above the ground over a large area of North America[165].

A third theory postulates that meteors are slowly drawn in on spiral orbits towards the Sun from various regions of the solar system, due to the Poynting-Robertson effect[166]. This effect is relatively weak, however, and hardly strong enough to affect the largest meteors, which are actually quite massive bodies. The origin of meteors, therefore, is currently uncertain, and a satisfactory explanation of their existence well overdue.

The advent of satellite space photography has revealed numerous previously unsuspected land-forms suggestive of impact by very large meteors on various occasions throughout Earth history[167]. These features, which have constituted the central theme of at least two full-length books[168], clearly show that on impacting these meteors perpetrated widespread damage, and that while some are geologically ancient others are surprisingly recent.

Although fallen meteors (meteorites) vary in composition, 96% of all known specimens contain Chondrites (silicate and other minerals) which are absent from terrestrial rocks but are present in the atmosphere around the Sun; and they also contain iron[169]. Meteorites composed of iron or a high percentage of nickel are known as Siderites to distinguish them from non-metalliferous meteorites which are called Aerolithes. Some Siderites are of great size.[295] One, which fell near Elbogen in Bohemia, in 1400 AD, weighed 235lbs (105kg)[170], while another, not observed to fall, has been discovered in Oregon and weighs no less than 14 metric tonnes[171]. Some meteorites are also unexpectedly young[172], and cosmic-ray exposure ages of meteorites generally suggest an astronomically recent disintegration of the original body[173].

In connection with metalliferous meteorites, it is interesting that Jews call iron nechoshet. This literally means 'droppings of the serpent'[174]. This is a meaningless term until we recall that, in Jewish traditions, the 'serpent' was another name for Satan, the old dragon, remembered elsewhere by a great variety of other names including Typhon and Phaeton. The fact that ancient Midrashic and Talmudic accounts of the Phaeton visitation mention a celestial bombardment of hot stones occurring then, that the early Egyptians called iron the 'bones of Typhon'[175], and that Finnish traditions refer to a prodigious fall of huge 'iron hailstones' occurring when the world was once almost drowned by a great flood, all seem to be echoes of what, to modern man, would be falls of meteors. The falls of gravel featured in various Central American traditions seem to be recollections of the same general event. It must, furthermore, be relevant that the ancient Greek word for iron was sideros: this, when combined with the obviously related Latin word for star, sidus (genitive sideris, plural sidera)[176], as 'iron star', lends new meaning to the concept of a large partially-metalliferous body which, when close to Earth, showered it with loose pieces in the form of meteor-like iron hailstones.

The singular theme common to all these ancient traditions concerns the fact that these falls of metalliferous meteor-like bodies were inextricably part and parcel of a terrible cosmic visitation which almost destroyed Earth long ago. Significantly, the sizes and quantities of many modern meteorites and those mentioned in the traditions just cited, were such that they cannot be cometary debris. On this point alone it follows that the celestial marauder we have been calling Phaeton was not the comet that many earlier investigators of the Phaeton cycle of traditions have supposed.

Ice and Methane

The final class of celestial mavericks considered here concerns icy substances. We have already noted that various types of ice believedly exist in cometary nuclei. Several planetary satellites may also possess outer coatings of ice or may consist totally of ice, and it is also thought that much ice exists on the four largest planets – Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus and Neptune – which some astronomers believe are composed mostly of hydrogen and ices of carbon, nitrogen and oxygen enveloped by an extremely cold deep atmosphere of ammonia and methane[177]. All these substances, it will be remembered, are present in comets. The conclusion that supercooled ice (at –200°F or more) is a relatively common substance throughout the solar system[178] finds positive support from recent discoveries establishing that ice particles definitely occur in comets and compose much of the rings of Saturn, and that sizable quantities of ice exist on at least three Jovian moons[179].

Fig 4.9. Comet Morehouse. By permission of Yerkes Observatory, Wisconsin, USA.

With these details before us, identification of the innumerable unheralded falls of blocks of ice, peculiar icy hailstones and glutinous substances, which have descended upon Earth from time to time as examples of further celestial mavericks may not be wholly irrelevant (see Appendix C). These disparate yet seemingly related objects may actually constitute vestiges of some infinitely greater masses of similar material that fell upon Earth at the time of Phaeton's visit. This is certainly suggested by the following details respecting the formation of hydrocarbons in space.

As previously noted, methane is one of the most abundant molecules in the solar system. It is well-known that high temperatures are required to reduce methane to aromatic hydrocarbons[180]. Interestingly, therefore, in ten Recent era (Holocene) sediments from Texas and Louisiana, both aromatic and aliphatic hydrocarbons have been found, aged somewhere between 14,600 and 11,800 BP (±1,400 years)[181]. Their origin is uncertain, but, considering the dates obtained for them, it is not impossible that they were formed about or during the time of the Phaeton upheaval, a 'hot' event falling within the same time scale. Furthermore, hydrocarbons of high molecular weight – of which petroleum is one – comprise up to half the carbon content of carbonaceous chondritic meteorites.

The presence in varying quantities of such hydrocarbons in both comets and meteors strongly suggests that, as noted above, while the latter are almost certainly not derived from comets, the two classes of objects somehow share a common origin. One of the substances apparently linking these objects and perhaps indicating their joint original source is methane.

Petroleum is commonly thought of as having an organic (biogenic) origin, but it is now accepted that hydrocarbons, petroleum included, could be synthesised in space by a free-radical mechanism from methyl radicals, in which:

> Methyl radicals themselves could be produced from solar photons on methane.[182]

Non-biogenic petroleum thus formed might, on reaching Earth, form lakes or ponds wherever dense underlying strata prevented its natural absorption. Natural evaporation of this volatile liquid would leave behind it a skin of crude oil or asphalt. Quite conceivably, the asphalt lakes of Trinidad and Venezuela and the tar seeps of California originated in this way – particularly as all are intimately associated with the remains of late-'Pleistocene' animals and plants, victims of a much wider calamity that appears to have erupted about 11,500 years ago. That the mean average of the dates obtained for petroleum-bearing sediments in Texas and Louisiana falls remarkably close to this date is surely no coincidence.

Thus, whatever its real nature, if fiery ('hot') Phaeton was either itself partly composed of inflammable hydrocarbons developed from methane, or had, during its journey through the solar system, encountered a planetary body having, like Jupiter and Saturn[183], a largely methane-dominated atmosphere, a part of which it had perhaps captured or acquired. Its late arrival in the vicinity of the Earth/Moon system as (so numerous traditions aver) a flaming object of endlessly changing image, is at last explicable as that of an errant celestial visitor wreathed in constantly shifting, igniting and exploding clouds of methane. The aforementioned electromagnetic exchanges which would have naturally occurred between Earth and Phaeton, and were part of the electrical phenomena accompanying the attendant geomagnetic reversal[184], could also have served to ignite any hydrocarbon-laden atmosphere of the approaching astronomical visitor. In that connection readers will recall those traditions given in Part Three describing vast inflammable clouds, tremendous aerial explosions and terrible streams of fire directed upon Earth as leading elements in humankind's collective memory of the Phaeton disaster.

But if, as we shall shortly see, Phaeton apparently explosively destroyed a medium-sized planet beyond Mars, in all likelihood equipped with an atmosphere having a sizable methane content, then any dispersed portions of that body, such as the iron hailstones of Finnish lore, and many hydrocarbon-permeated meteors and comets, are respectively the stony and icy/gaseous remnants of the same now-vanished methane-pervaded world. The general location of this lost planet is that now loosely occupied by the asteroids, so Flandern's arguments about comets being remnants of a bygone asteroid world, and Opik's suggestion that comets and planets may have had a common genesis accordingly increase in interest.

12

SIGNPOSTS TO A COSMIC BATTLE

It is unnecessary here to list all the many scholars who have investigated the problems of axial shifts, changes in rotational speeds and polarity reversals, since thoroughly representative selections have been given on preceding pages. Significantly, most of these authorities agree that such changes could only be produced by enormously powerful forces acting upon Earth externally. Given that these changes really occurred, then quite literally, a war between worlds must have taken place. That, of course, is precisely what the traditions reviewed in Part Three assert.

Our survey of the solar system recorded various anomalies, several of which appear in table 4A and figs 4.6 and 4.7. Thus the Moon formerly circled the Earth more closely than it does now; Mercury's orbit is not circular; Venus rotates extremely slowly for its size, and in the opposite direction to all the other planets except Pluto; Earth has a non-circular orbit; Mars rotates too slowly for its size, and has a decidedly eccentric orbit. It also has two small irregularly-shaped satellites, Deimos and Phobos, hurtling round it at exceptionally high speed. Jupiter rotates extremely quickly for its size and mass, and, unlike all other planetary satellites, its two outermost known moons orbit it from pole to pole, each in opposite directions. Its third largest satellite, Callisto, exhibits unusually low density, suggesting to some that it possibly consists almost entirely of ice – over 10 billion cubic miles of it (if true, this makes Callisto the largest known single piece of ice anywhere).

Saturn also rotates unusually rapidly, follows a non-circular orbit, and is distinguished by its wonderful ring system held by many to be the debris of one or more fragmentised satellites. It, too, has several satellites consisting mostly of ice, as well as one, Phoebe, which orbits in a retrograde direction.

Uranus, which follows a non-circular orbit, is another rapidly-rotating planet, and has its equator inclined at an extreme angle (NNW-SSE). The axis of Uranus' magnetic dipole field is not only offset from the planet's centre, but, relative to the planet's axis of rotation, is located at the unexpectedly large angle of 60°. It has been suggested that this possibly exemplifies a polarity reversal in operation and that this has conceivably arisen from "a catastrophic collision event subsequent to the formation of the planet, intimately related to its large and anomalous obliquity to the ecliptic"[185]. Several of the Uranian satellites, which also possess equatorial tilts of 90°[186], show topographic features suggestive of catastrophic alterations; Umbriel, for example, exhibits a surprisingly "young fresh surface", and Titania a global network of geologically very young faults[187].

Although still quick, Neptune rotates more slowly and pursues an eccentric orbit. Both its moons orbit in a retrograde direction, of which the smaller, Nereid, following an enormously elongated orbit, takes no less than 359 days to complete just one circuit. Pluto rotates rather slowly, is a double planet with its satellite Charon, and has an orbit so highly eccentric that it intersects with that of Neptune. We have seen, too, that the origin of the asteroid belt between Mars and Jupiter is debatable, and that many of its constituent members orbit the Sun eccentrically. Meteors exhibit behaviour patterns which are even more eccentric; yet, although regarded by some as remnants of cometary tails or dead cometary nuclei, their origins are still unknown. Notwithstanding that, they clearly represent the debris of something. We have suggested, however, that, along with blocks of celestial ice which occasionally fall to Earth and the likelihood that non-biogenic petroleum can be produced from methane by natural chemical methods in space, meteors could be surviving fragments of one or more large solid bodies which have disintegrated.

The overall picture thus presented by the solar system shows that its principal members comprise a basically orderly assemblage of rotating and orbiting objects that have apparently experienced various derangements resulting in all kinds of aberrant and anomalous motions which, although of comparatively minor importance for the working of the solar system as a whole, have apparently been caused by one or more unknown influences in the past.

The outstanding question here, of course, is whether all these anomalies have accumulated over aeons of time – as the result of many essentially isolated disturbances, each of relatively local extent – or whether they represent the outcome of a single larger disruptive event affecting the solar system generally. The forces which generated the larger anomalies – for example, the acute tilting of Uranus, and the warping of Pluto's highly eccentric orbit – must have been so powerful that it is difficult to see how this could have also failed to affect other bodies in the solar family.

If the former interpretation of these anomalies is adopted, then it follows that various disruptions of the solar system are, by astronomical standards, comparatively frequent, and the history of the solar system could justifiably be said to be recurrently catastrophic. If, on the other hand, a single large disturbance – responsible for all, or at least the majority of, the observed anomalies – is the preferred interpretation, then the history of the solar system can be best defined as normally quiet and orderly but punctuated recently by a single tremendous cataclysm. The following details indicate that the latter interpretation, though startling, is almost certainly correct.

According to observations made by Mariner-4, the Martian orbit has apparently been seriously disturbed and the planet's structure severely strained at some time in the past. Aligned stress fractures observed on the Martian crust have led to the conclusion that:

> ...such a lineament system is caused by stresses in the planet's crust produced by changes in the planet's rotational equilibrium figure... The changes in angular velocity caused by tidal interaction of Mars with Phobos and Deimos are completely negligible and that of the Sun is a few percent at most: thus other mechanisms must be sought[188].

These observations appear to go hand-in-hand with the fact that the Martian magnetic field is presently no greater than 3×10^{-4} and has apparently been reduced by some means[189]. Moreover, calculations made of the mass and angular momentum of Mars when compared with other members of the solar system, result in an ideal axial rotation of 8 hours. Actually the rotation is slightly over 24 hours, so Mars has somehow slowed considerably, an anomaly which has prompted the question:

> How could its rotation have been slowed in the absence of substantial tidal effects? Loss of a massive Martian satellite – greater than the mass of Ceres would be needed – but where is it now?.[190]

F F Fish was equally puzzled when he concluded:

> Mars... either must have lost considerable angular momentum or never possessed the initial angular momentum that would be inferred.[191]

We have previously mentioned that Earth's axial rotation may have been speeded up from a possible former 30-hour day to its present 24-hour day, so it is entirely conceivable that the Martian day has somehow slowed down, and perhaps from the same underlying cause.

Turning now to asteroids, we may note the fairly widespread view that they are the degassed relict nuclei of comets captured by Jupiter over aeons of time – although this is admittedly debatable[192]. The rocky composition and great relative size of some of the asteroids suggests that a cometary origin for them is unlikely, so their genesis must lie elsewhere. Efforts have been made to calculate the original mass of a single body to which all the asteroids might have once belonged, but this proved to be only 0.03 of that of the Moon[193], so either a very small hypothetical world formerly orbited where the asteroid belt now exists, or numerous fragments of it are now absent from the belt – in which case that world must have been correspondingly larger. It is surely significant that some asteroids appear to exist as families through the break-up of a larger body, whereby the relevant pieces now orbit close together. The Koronis family of 18 separate pieces is one such group.

Some of these groups orbit the Sun very eccentrically. The Apollo family, for example, overlaps Earth's orbit at perihelion (the closest part of the orbit to the Sun), and of its 40-odd members, over 15 are continuous crossers of Earth's orbit. The 10 strong Amor group although only occasionally crossing Earth's orbit always crosses the Martian orbit. Both these asteroid groups follow orbits that actually pass obliquely through the main asteroid belt. This suggests that they have been pulled out from the main asteroid swarm by some passing gravitational force, or ejected as a result of a collision with some larger body. Alternatively, they may not be true asteroids at all.

Hidalgo is the name of another eccentrically-orbiting body. Although usually classed as a minor planet, this small rocky object has a Jupiter-crossing orbit, and may actually be a large asteroid[194]. Interestingly, when it was first discovered by Baade, doubt arose as to whether it was a genuine minor planet or a comet because it exhibited diffuseness. Similar uncertainty attended the discovery of Comet Arend-Rigaux, because, although its orbit resembled that of a minor planet, it appeared to be very diffuse[195]. Irrespective of their real identities, both objects have clearly been deranged at some time in the past.

Yet other eccentrically-orbiting objects of doubtful origin, but clearly pulled out of kilter from some now-altered earlier regime, and apparently in the not-too-distant past at that, are the recently discovered Pholus and object 1992 QB. Pholus lies beyond Saturn's orbit and 1992 QB lies beyond Neptune's[196]. The latter appears to be connected in some manner with the Kuiper Belt, which lies at or near the edge of our solar system, which we shall consider again shortly.

All these eccentrically orbiting objects have led some to speculate whether asteroids and meteors, despite now following widely varying orbits, once shared a common origin. Both are almost invariably stony, meteors frequently characterised by a high iron or iron-nickel content – a detail suggesting to Sears that iron meteorites conceivably formed in the asteroid belt[197]. Van Flandern has examined the possibility that comets may have originated from the disintegration of a solid planet-sized body formerly existing where the asteroid belt now occurs[198]. Presumably the aggregations and groups of stony debris that would form in free space after the fragmentation of such a solid body would, as they settled down into orbits, form their own weak but distinctive gravitational fields and attract dissociated ions and electrons from the plasma now believed to pervade interplanetary and interstellar space. By such means, it was suggested, comets could be born.

The erstwhile existence of a planet orbiting where the asteroid belt now lies has been discussed by many writers, including Ovenden, who examined the proposition in relation to Bode's Law[199], first formulated in 1772. Johann Bode observed the regularly increasing distances of the planets from the Sun, and noted that there was a vacant orbit between Mars and Jupiter. It was, of course, the search for the planet thought to follow this orbit that led to the discovery of the first asteroid in 1801.

A distinct possibility exists, therefore, that asteroids, meteors and comets share a common origin, and that meteors and the large blocks of free-orbiting celestial ice are the remnants of something larger which broke up. If true, then many comets may be of comparatively very recent origin. Ages ranging from 10 million years or more to 10,000 years or less have been proposed by different authorities for comets, but the fact is, nobody really knows how old comets are. Therefore, the possibility exists – as some have suggested – that comets could be replenished from some source beyond the solar system. Certainly at least a high percentage of, if not all, comets may have formed from the debris of some larger body which disintegrated in the not-so-distant past.

If such an event occurred, then the aforementioned icy missiles presumably represent frozen fluids and gases dispersed in all directions at the time of that disintegration, but which have since settled down into eccentric orbits around the Sun. Such ice masses would imply that the original parent object was sufficiently large to have supported some kind of atmosphere, more akin perhaps to that of Jupiter or Saturn than to that of Earth, and containing more methane than the terrestrial atmosphere. Methane, we have noted, is evidently more common in planetary atmospheres furthest from the Sun – thus any sizable planet formerly orbiting between Mars and Jupiter very possibly possessed an atmosphere containing more methane than those of Earth or Mars, but less than those of Jupiter or the outer planets.

We must also refer here to the anomalous minor planet Chiron, which was only discovered in the late 1970's, orbiting between Saturn and Uranus. Chiron appears to be either a very large satellite which has 'escaped' from one of those planets, or is an asteroid or a dead cometary nucleus 'captured' by one of them and diverted into its present orbit[200]. As yet little is known about it, although it is immediately obvious that its size and position violates Bode's Law. But reviewing Chiron in conjunction with the anomalous tilting of neighbouring Uranus' rotational axis, the orbital eccentricity of both Neptune and Pluto and the retrograde motion of Neptune's two moons, it is equally obvious that something out of the ordinary has occurred in the far confines of the solar system and disturbed the outer planets and their satellites. Others have noted this state of affairs as well[201, 296].

All the foregoing, therefore, are apparently signposts to what seems to have been a celestial calamity which affected the greater part of the solar system at some time in the past, and which, as we shall later see, left free-moving debris ranging over wide areas of it.

13

THE CANDIDATES

We have seen that any external agent capable of slowing or halting Earth's rotation, or of tilting the terrestrial spin axis to some new angle, would necessarily have to be exceedingly powerful. If a lone agent or influence was involved, it would have to possess large mass and high electromagnetic potential. If several agents acted in concert, then their collective mass and electromagnetic fields would still need to be sufficiently powerful to produce such radical Earth changes. Our search, therefore, will be for some agency capable of fulfilling these rather special requirements.

The foregoing survey of maverick objects in the solar system clearly shows that, despite the relatively great size of the largest of them, none remotely possesses the mass needed to materially affect Earth's rotation or engender an axial shift. On the contrary, nearly all these objects themselves suffer perturbation, division or destruction if they venture too close to even the smallest planets.

Thus, unless there formerly existed maverick objects which were literally thousands of times more massive than the largest examples known today, no such object can have radically affected Earth. Although this observation also applies to conventional comets, so little is yet known about the recently discovered giant interstellar comets[202] that inevitably the possibility persists that such objects possess sufficiently massive nuclei as to cause the tremendous physical disturbances detailed in this book. Conceivably these objects may not, in fact, be true comets at all, but merely resemble them superficially.

We may, therefore, dismiss those earlier theories which postulated an asteroid or giant meteor, or a bolide[297], as the cause of the disaster. Similarly, those which ascribe the calamity to a comet may also be discarded, since conventional comets lack the mass required to effect the relevant physical changes, either terrestrially or elsewhere in the solar system. We may note, however, that Velikovsky, who advocated a comet as the causal agent, recognised the necessity of involving a planet-sized object (which he went on to identify as the present planet Venus).

Having eliminated meteors, asteroids and conventional comets from our list of candidates, we proceed to the next largest class of celestial objects – the satellites. These exist in almost all sizes in the solar system, ranging from small irregularly-shaped moons, like those orbiting Mars, to the huge satellites (Ganymede, Titan and Triton) larger than our Moon. The composition of the satellites varies considerably. Rocky and comparatively heavy examples, like the Moon, are known while others, such as Callisto, are surprisingly lightweight and probably consist mostly of ice. Obviously only the most massive satellites (those as large as our Moon) qualify for consideration here.

Yet, although Bellamy has attempted to explain the great physical disturbances of 11,500 years or so ago as the result of the disintegration of an earlier Tertiary satellite of Earth, and the subsequent capture of our present Moon[203], the existence of the former was actually never more than hypothetical, and the Moon itself is insufficiently massive to have perpetrated the immense upheavals characterising those disturbances. Nor are any other satellitic bodies known which could have produced those violent events. It thus follows that satellites can be safely eliminated from our list of candidates too.

Planets constitute the next group of candidates. We have seen that, although most circle the Sun on what may be conveniently termed 'fixed orbits', certain small planets – notably Hidalgo and Pluto – pursue highly eccentric orbits, or, like Chiron, have apparently been displaced and forced into new orbits which now confound Bode's Law. The orbital stability of the planets is therefore far from being immutable, although only very powerful forces could cause orbital changes or propel even small (let alone large) planets into new ones. No evidence exists for Hidalgo or any other minor planet having ever approached Earth close enough to affect its rotation or axial tilt, or that Mars or Venus ever caused or contributed to the widespread terrestrial changes previously mentioned[204]. Nevertheless, many ancient records repeatedly refer to the involvement of those two planets in a celestial drama coincident with great physical upheavals on Earth. However, Mulholland has stated that:

> ...The available observational data suggest strongly that no planet-sized object has passed near Earth in historic time, and probably not for a much longer time...[205].

Nonetheless, something capable of exerting a tremendous influence approached Earth closely about 11,500 years ago and left many mementos of the encounter. The accomplishment of these effects necessitated the interaction of an influence approaching planetary dimensions – something close either to Earth's mass and density (see table 4A), or of smaller mass and greater density. It seems unlikely that a larger object was concerned, for had that been the case then the Earth would probably have disintegrated according to Roche's Law, which we will examine shortly.

We have exhausted all possible candidates (likely and unlikely) within the solar system and are left to consider others which, perforce, would have possessed more distant origins. Of these, the idea of a passing star (sun) is too unlikely, for it would have incinerated the entire planetary concourse – thus, like Patten[206], we dismiss it. Yet, we should not overlook the fact that specialist studies of stars nearest the solar system indicate that relatively close stellar encounters are not only much more frequent than generally believed, but occur near enough astronomically to perturb even very long distance comets[207].

Just conceivably, one of the aforementioned giant interstellar 'comets' traversed the solar system some 11,500 years ago, wreaking havoc among the Sun's family, much as Clube and Napier have suggested[208]. There is, however, no firm scientific evidence for definitely identifying the astronomical visitor as such an object, and one may just as reasonably suppose that a large and highly dangerous supernova fragment entered the solar system at high velocity around that date. It is interesting that about 40 novae erupt annually in our galaxy alone, and a supernova roughly every 30 years[209]. Thus – assuming that these rates have remained more or less constant for, say, the last 15,000 years – no less than 600,000 novae and 500 supernovae have occurred in our galaxy during that period.

Supernovae are actually quite common cosmic events, some 600 of them having been observed among the nearer galaxies since the 1930s[210]. Of the supernovae recorded in our galaxy, a surprising number have exploded unexpectedly near the solar system within the last 15,000 years[211] – at least five between 15,000 and 11,500 years BP. Of these, the Vela supernova – an exploded star (G263.9–3.3) situated at the unusually close astronomical distance of d=500pc from the solar system – could be a likely candidate, as recent calculations suggest that it erupted either some 14,300 years[212] or about 11,000 years ago[213]. Both these dates fall within the 'right' interval before the onset of the Phaeton disaster.

It should, however, be remembered that if this particular scenario has any merit at all, then the velocity at which the Phaeton 'object' traversed the intervening regions of interstellar space would be the most critical factor. Certainly, on such a lengthy journey through an all-pervading plasma of dissociated ions and electrons, any such high-speed object could be expected to acquire a high electromagnetic potential in addition to any electrical or magnetic field it already possessed. Such an object would be extremely dangerous.

Although it is impossible at this juncture to positively pinpoint Phaeton's real identity, and we can merely state what it was not, it must surely transcend coincidence that the gamma-ray spectrometer on the Third High Energy Astronomical Observatory satellite (HEAO 3) has lately detected a high concentration or cloud of Aluminium-26 (^{26}Al) in space, surrounding the solar system. ^{26}Al is a radioactive isotope with a half-life of about one million years, and, according to theoretical studies, is readily produced in supernova explosions. Ultimately ^{26}Al decays to Magnesium-26, but as this cloud is apparently still very much Aluminium-26 and not Magnesium-26, its decay is not very far advanced and suggests that the cloud may be as young as a mere 10,000 years[214].

If the cloud truly represents supernova debris, then the original explosion must, by astronomical standards, have occurred very close to the solar system. An original source no more distant than 45 light-years has, in fact, been proposed for this cloud[215].

The location of this high concentration of Aluminium-26 on the outer edge of the solar system is of special interest in relation to the location of the Kuiper Belt mentioned earlier. Recent observations made from universities in California and Hawaii have confirmed the reality of this Belt, the existence of which was first proposed by the astronomer Gerard Kuiper in 1951[216]. The Belt has been shown to be composed of numerous (probably thousands) of tiny planetoid objects – not unlike those comprising the Asteroid Belt considered earlier. Most of the objects appear to be very small, but two at least are apparently as large as 150 miles (240km) across, and still larger ones may well await future discovery. Actually locating and identifying such small objects across the enormous distance separating them from Earth is extremely difficult, so the discovery of larger bodies in this Belt may not occur for years. Nevertheless, the apparent orbit of these objects brings them for a while inside that of eccentrically orbiting Pluto, and some astronomers have already begun to wonder if the Kuiper Belt represents the disintegrated remains of a once much larger object formerly orbiting the Sun far out on the edge of the solar system as we know it.

It has been noticed that Uranus seems to have changed its speed round the Sun in June 1987, and at least one astronomer has theorised that this may have resulted from Uranus colliding with an unknown object which, to have achieved that effect, would have had to have had a diameter of some 600 miles (960km) – small by astronomical standards but considerably larger than any Kuiper Belt object yet recorded. Pluto's lone satellite, Charon, is only 700 miles (1,120km) or so in diameter, and thus scarcely larger than the object supposed to have speeded up Uranus' motion around the Sun. But Pluto's orbit is twice crossed by that of the Kuiper Belt objects, so Charon being a captured body from the Kuiper Belt is not unreasonable. Likewise the aforementioned object 1992 QB, presently orbiting eccentrically between the orbits of Neptune and Pluto, is also quite possibly a small world which has broken away from the main swarm of Kuiper Belt objects. Certainly the removal from the Kuiper Belt swarm of several objects of 700 miles (1,120km) diameter or larger renders the possibility that the size of the original object now represented by the Kuiper Belt swarm, Charon, 1992 QB and the theoretical 600 mile (960km) object which affected Uranus' speed, was appreciable and large enough to be regarded as a true planet. This, we shall discover, is a significant possibility when, shortly, we discuss Phaeton's recorded movements among the outer planets.

On the basis of the above-mentioned details, we suggest that Phaeton was spawned in an astronomically-near supernova explosion, and that Phaeton was a portion of exploded astral matter. We further suggest that, being of that nature, Phaeton precipitated a second astronomically far smaller explosion, on coming into confrontation with the combined gravitational and electromagnetic fields of the huge outer planets of the solar system, and that this produced the Aluminium-26 cloud now known to exist on the edge of the solar system. The above-cited detail that the astronomically-close Vela supernova exploded some time between 14,300 and 11,000 years ago indicates that, allowing for the time taken by Phaeton to traverse interstellar space between the point of its original disruption – 45 light years distant – and the outer confines of the solar system, the planetary derangements under discussion probably took place approximately 11,500 years ago!

Assuming for the moment that Phaeton, after initially disrupting, subsequently travelled at high velocity on a course destined to bisect the solar system, it need not have actually moved at more than one fiftieth of the speed of light to have covered the distance represented by 45 light years in just a few hundred years. If proceeding at only one hundredth the speed of light it would still have completed the distance in slightly less than one thousand years, and it would have been within the time-frame calculated for the Vela supernova event generally. Viewed from this aspect, the possibility of Phaeton having been an astral body, a remnant of a supernova, becomes entirely plausible.*

The apparent youthfulness of the cloud of Aluminium-26 suggests the astronomically-close occurrence of a major cosmic event like a supernova within geologically recent times. Phaeton certainly entered and caused havoc throughout the solar system during times which, though ancient in terms of human endeavour, were geologically very recent.

---

* See Note 13.

There are, therefore, good reasons for supposing that all these seemingly disparate details are actually pieces of the same tremendous drama – one which embraced the entire solar system and left as its legacy after effects that still affect the Earth.

14

PHAETON – AN EXCEPTION TO THE RULE

A further avenue of approach respecting the real identity of Phaeton comes from the eye-witness descriptions of it preserved in the numerous traditions and legends mentioned in Part Three. A supplementary survey of these follows below, during which we shall generally refer to Phaeton by that name irrespective of the plethora of other appellations by which it has been remembered.

Firstly, in the surviving original fragmentary accounts by Hyginus, Euripides and Ovid, Phaeton is specifically called by that name and always described as a bright fiery body. The name actually signifies 'the shining one', an appropriate title for an entity anciently regarded as the son of the sun-god Helios. Referring to Phaeton as Typhon, the Roman writer Pliny tells us much the same thing:

> ...it had a fiery appearance and was twisted like a coil, and it was very grim to behold: it was not really a star so much as what might be called a ball of fire...[217].

The seventeenth century savant, Adam Rockenbach, who claimed to have drawn upon the most reliable of the earliest writers (including works now lost), added:

> It was fiery, of irregular circular form, with a wrapped head; it was in the shape of a globe and was of terrible aspect... in the form of a disc...[218].

Significantly, Avienus likened it to a great sickle[219], perhaps a description of a globular body illuminated on one side only.

An ancient Jewish tradition states that the Deluge was caused by: "...the Lord God changing the places of two stars in a constellation"[220], thus specifically identifying Phaeton as a fiery star-like body rather than a comet. The same idea was embedded in Persian legend. The bright fiery Tistrya was styled: "...the leader of the stars against the planets"[221].* This stars-versus-planets conflict was obviously witnessed by early people and we shall have more to say about it shortly.

The Salishan Indians of North America mention a pre-catastrophic period when the Sun was no bigger than a star[222], presumably an allusion to the small size of the Sun-like Phaeton when still far distant from the Earth.

This closely parallels the ancient Hindu account of Brahma and his attendants observing the arrival in the heavens of "an exceedingly small" white boar-shaped body which: "...in the space of an hour, grew to the size of an elephant of the largest size, and remained in the air"[223], prior to it plunging to Earth and causing a worldwide flood. Chinese traditions similarly tell how, during the time of the legendary emperor Ya-hou: "...a brilliant star issued from the constellation of Yin"[224], prior to a tremendous global upheaval.

---

* See Note 14

Again, Ta-vi is described in tribal legends from southern California as a star-like or sun-like body rather than a cometary object. It allegedly roamed the skies at will and sometimes came close to Earth in its heavenly wanderings, scorching it, like Phaeton, in the process[225]. And correctly-interpreted observations of unusually moving 'stars' permitted the Peruvian deluge-hero to seek a mountain refuge prior to the advent of a world-drowning flood[226].

The foregoing makes it perfectly clear that Phaeton was anciently regarded as a generally round, brilliantly fiery body of appreciable size, and much more star-like or sun-like than conventional comets: and it was held to have in some way caused the Deluge.

Many traditions, however, refer to two or more cosmic visitors assailing Earth simultaneously.* The Norse sagas refer to two rampaging celestial 'monsters', the Fenris-Wolf and the Midgård Serpent, that brought death and ruin to the ancient world. Described as coursing through the heavens side by side, they acted in concert, and reputedly sired the equally dreadful 'sons of Muspelheim' – Surt, Loke and Garm – a detail shown later to be of considerable significance. Old Persian texts mention an essentially similar pair of ravaging marauders, Ahriman and its snake-like offspring Azhidhaka[227], or, in other versions, Zohak and Iblis[228], which subjected Earth to all kinds of disasters. The reported serpentiform or dragon-like aspects of these assailants is noteworthy.

Even scriptural literature refers to a great war anciently fought in heaven between Lucifer (Satan) and his hosts and Michael and his angels. The former were ultimately vanquished by the latter and "cast down onto Earth"[229]. The Book of Revelation specifically identifies Lucifer with: "...the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil and Satan"[230].

Other biblical sources award different names to these antagonists, sometimes simultaneously furnishing additional details. Thus, in a prophetically phrased passage we read:

> In that day the Lord with his sore and great and strong sword shall punish Leviathan the piercing serpent, even Leviathan that crooked serpent; and He shall slay the dragon that is in the sea[231].

Elsewhere we find:

> Art thou not it that hath cut Rahab, and wounded the dragon?[232].

In Psalms we hear of Rahab (evidently another name for one of the assailants) again: "Thou hast broken Rahab in pieces"[233], and: "...thou didst break the heads of the dragons on the waters"[234].

Traditionally, the destruction of these cosmic 'monsters' was almost always associated with water in one form or another. Thus, such phrases as 'in the sea' and 'on the waters' immediately remind us of Apollonius Rhodius's statement that, after being felled by Zeus's thunderbolts, Typhon lay beneath the Serbonian Lake; and the tremendous flood that allegedly issued from Satan's mouth after he had fallen to Earth; and the flood that reputedly gushed out of Tawats 'eyes' on coming to pieces after careering madly over the burning Earth. Despite their internal differences, these accounts clearly refer to the same original event.

The changing and varied visual appearances of these extraordinary visitors also provides further insights into the apparent nature of these bodies. Most often, they are described as writhing dragons or coiling serpents, and are sometimes said to have been multi-headed, to have displayed wide-gaping jaws, tusks, horns, sparkling crowns, or glowing manes and hair-like appendages, to have had speckled bodies and to have jetted great streams of fire from their imagined mouths. Other accounts mention the emission of pestilential clouds, poisonous blasts and rains of 'red milk' or 'blood'; while yet others refer to their production of

---

* See Note 15.

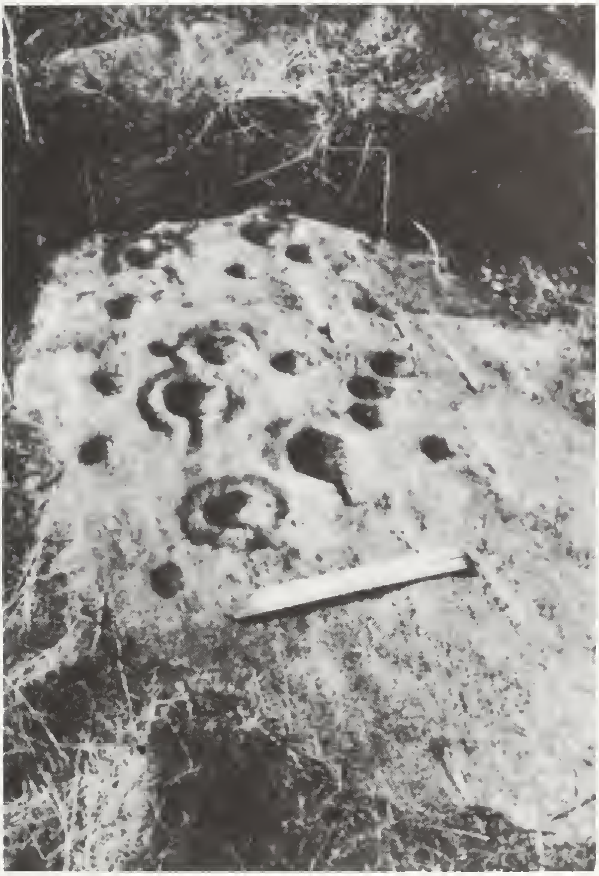

Fig 4.10a. Carved Neolithic 'cup-and-ring' motifs at Ardmarnoch, Scotland. After R W B Morris, 1977, "The Pleistocene Rock Art of Argyll", by permission of Blandford Press and Bodleian Library, Oxford.

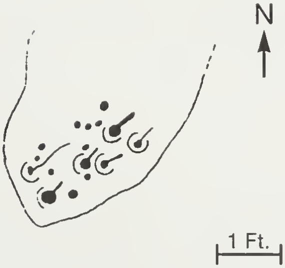

Fig 4.10b. Scale diagram showing the disposition of the Ardmarnoch rock motifs.

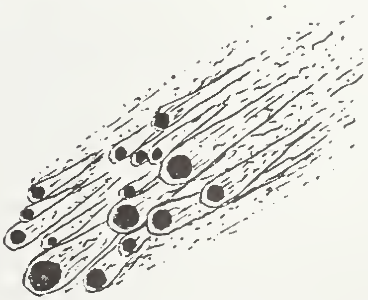

Fig 4.10c. The Ardmarnoch rock motifs redrawn to represent a similarly-arranged group of fiery celestial objects. This representation, although agreeing well with world tradition, is purely hypothetical.

hissing, roaring, thunderous or explosive sounds. It is also clear that each of these cosmic assailants possessed considerable bulk and mass. And since at least one of these objects (Phaeton) was reportedly only a little less brilliant than the Sun, the above descriptions, though diverse, collectively suggest that incandescent, electromagnetically excited bodies of matter were undergoing all manner of ever-changing images and trailing agitated trains of gases and debris.

That such images and descriptions closely mirror those forecastable for a 'stellar' visitor which, making a hypothetically close approach to Earth, was wrapped in igniting and exploding methane clouds productive of great jets of fiery hydrocarbons and poisonous blasts, is yet another aspect of this topic which it would be irresponsible to ignore.

Unquestionably the bodies involved were not abnormally large comets, meteors or asteroids familiar to modern astronomers. They were entirely different cosmic visitors. In short, Phaeton and its alleged companions were exceptions to the rule.

To survivors of this catastrophe, the sight of these objects plunging as a group across the heavens – a scene no doubt repeatedly obscured by the chronically deranged terrestrial atmosphere – was a never-to-be-forgotten experience, and appears to have subsequently led people to commemorate them in stone carvings. A possible example of such a carving adorns a large flat rock at Ardmarnoch in western Scotland[235] – at least one scholar[236] likened the sinuous lines streaming out from apparently glowing nuclei of comets (figs 4.10ab). Accepting for the moment that this carving does represent this ancient celestial drama and that it is reasonably accurate, it is possible to reconstruct (fig 4.10c) how these objects may have looked all those millennia ago. Certainly, if interpreted in this manner, the carving transmits precisely the kind of picture or spectacle so often described in tradition and epic literature. Again we ask if this, too, can be mere coincidence?

It is noteworthy that astronomical subjects were seemingly recorded quite often in other European megalithic structures, themselves apparently coeval with the above Scottish example[237], that at least some had lunar and apparently calendrical significance[238], and that, when assessed collectively, such monuments betray a surprising degree of understanding of astronomical phenomena generally among Neolithic peoples who raised the megaliths[239]. In that respect it would therefore have been remarkable had they not attempted to portray Phaeton's visit in their rock carvings.

15

THE MESOPOTAMIAN CONNECTION

Like many other early nations, the ancient Mesopotamians possessed a full account of this celestial war preserved on tablets found in the library of the 7th century BC monarch Assurbanipal in the ruined city of Nineveh[298]. These tablets name the principal antagonists as Tiamat, a 'dragon-monster'[299], and Marduk, an effulgent hero[300] considered to be the most radiant deity after Apsu, the supreme Sun-god[301].

A baked clay cylinder-seal made by the Akkadian civilisation of Mesopotamia, and preserved as specimen VA/243 at the Vorderasiatische Abteilung of the State Museum in eastern Berlin[302], depicts the solar system as known to the Sumerians in the third millennium BC[303]. It shows eleven globes encircling a large rayed star representing the Sun (fig 4.11a). The globes are generally thought to be planets, and their disposition is seen more clearly in fig 4.11b. Other cylinder-seals showing deities (Sun-gods?) orbited by eleven planets are also known. The relevant portions of some of them are given here as figs 4.11c and 4.11d.

Discounting tiny Chiron, modern astronomy recognises only nine planets in the solar system – Mercury, Venus, Earth, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, Neptune and Pluto. If we elevate the Moon to planetary status, as the Sumerians appear to have done, then we have a total of ten planets orbiting the Sun today. On this basis one planet is currently still missing from the earlier Sumerian total. Why, therefore, do the modern and Sumerian totals differ? Is this difference real or imaginary? Did the original seal-makers err in showing eleven planets? Could there really have been another planet known to the Sumerians, as yet unknown to us or lost since their day? If so, when and how was this planet lost? Could its disappearance, if real, be connected in any way with the Phaeton event? Such questions demand answers.

It is especially noteworthy that the most accomplished astronomers of antiquity were the Sumerians and Chaldeans[304] (early Babylonians) of the third and fourth centuries BC, from which it hardly seems likely that they would repeatedly depict one planet too many on their cylinder-seals. Once, just possibly; repeatedly no. The level of astronomical knowledge in the ancient Near East[305] more than confirms the apparent accuracy of these cylinder-seals and that no error was committed.

That the ancients recognised the existence of at least six planets – Mercury, Venus, Luna (Moon), Mars, Jupiter and Saturn – in addition to the Sun, is well known, and some also knew that the Earth was a planet too. These bodies, of course, were known by different names among different nations, several of which we shall have occasion to mention.

It was not until 1781 that modern astronomy discovered Uranus, 1846 Neptune and 1930 Pluto. Many early astronomers, however, apparently knew that these planets existed and even had names for them.

While Nicolaus Copernicus is justly called the 'Father of Modern Astronomy', in reality he only *re*discovered (in 1543) the central position of the Sun in the solar system, for the same celestial arrangement was apparently known to Aristarchus of Samos in the third century BC, and to others before him[306]. Two hundred years earlier, for instance, the Greeks had listed the planets in their correct order from the Sun, thereby acknowledging that the Sun, not Earth, was the centre of the solar system. In discussing the exactness and accuracy of Mesopotamian astronomy generally, Diodorus Siculus, who lived in the first century BC, noted:

> ...the Chaldeans named the planets. In the centre of their system was the Sun, the greatest light, of which the planets were 'offspring', reflecting the Sun's position and shine... Each of the planets according to them has its own particular course, and its velocities and periods of time are subject to change and variation... the Moon's light is reflected and her eclipses are due to the shadow of the Earth[240].

The orbital and velocity variations mentioned by Diodorus are strongly suggestive of the fact that Chaldean astronomers knew of the equivalent terrestrial variations highlighted earlier in IV:7 on Stability. Possession of such advanced knowledge at so early a date would not have been unlikely among a race also cognisant of the precession of the equinoxes and the Great Year[307]. These same Chaldeans are also accredited by Geminus of Rhodes as having been the first to determine the exact motions of the Moon[241].

Hipparchus, during the second century BC, knew of and understood the precession of the equinoxes[308]. These are inexplicable unless 'spherical astronomy' is subscribed to, and only after the arrival in a given zodiacal sign (constellation) of Spring in relation to the Sun's position (as seen from Earth). The slow shift of the equinox point from one zodiacal constellation to another requires 2,160 years to complete, a period far too long to permit any one astronomer to make the relevant observations himself[309]. Hipparchus evidently inherited detailed information amassed in earlier times,

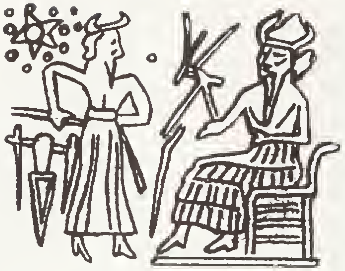

Fig 4.11a. Outline MS tracing by R. Verrill (1955) of part of Akkadian cylinder-seal VA/243 in the State Museum, Berlin.

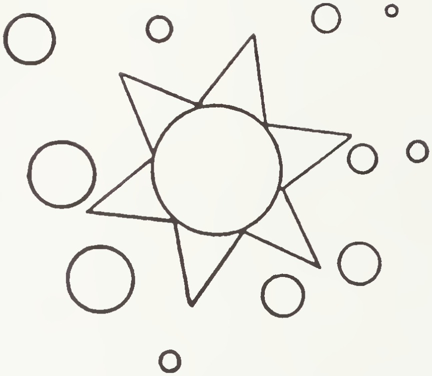

Fig 4.11b. Original MS reconstruction by F.G. Hehr (c. 1954) of the 'planetary' system indicated on, and enlarged from, VA/243.

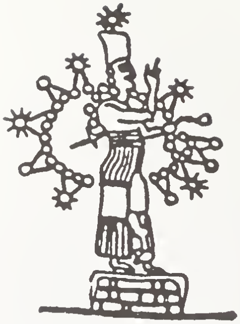

Fig 4.11c. Outline drawing in W. Hayes Ward[310] of an apparent 'planetary' system on Babylonian cylinder-seal VA/508.

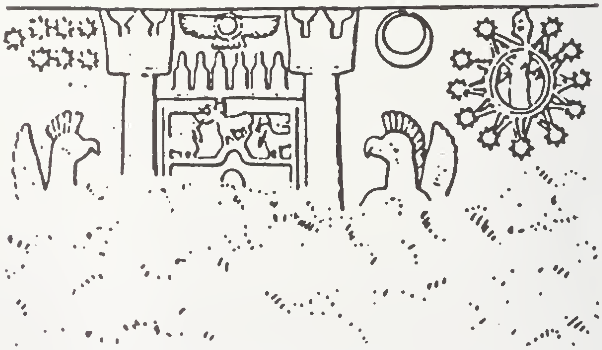

Fig 4.11d. Assyrian cylinder-seal impression, VAT.8872 in the State Museum, Berlin, showing the same 'planetary' system, and, at top left, the seven 'suns' or 'burning mountains' (see pp12, suprà). After E.D. Van Buren[311].

and actually acknowledged that his mentors were "Babylonian astronomers of Erech, Borsippa and Babylon"[242].

The zodiacal signs themselves date from extreme antiquity[312], for Prof Alfred Jeremias found evidence that a Sumerian clay tablet in the Berlin Museum (VAT 7847) begins a list of named zodiacal constellations with the name Leo (the Lion), which projects us back to 11,000 BC or thereabouts – the time when the equinox point was in the constellation Leo[243]. This suggests that the zodiac had been devised even before the Phaeton disaster.

Professor Herman Hilprecht investigated the subject still further. After analysing thousands of baked clay tablets bearing mathematical tabulations he concluded that:

> ...all the multiplication and division tables from the temple libraries of Nippur and Sippar, and from the library of Assurbanipal are based upon 12960000[244].

Analysing the significance of this number, Hilprecht decided that it could relate only to the precession of the equinoxes and that the Sumerians knew of the Great Year of 25,920 years[313]. This is sometimes called the Platonian Year, for apparently Plato, too, was aware of the phenomenon[314].

Assyrian, Chaldean and Sumerian astronomers accurately monitored the movements and positions of many celestial bodies relative to Earth and to one another, and kept precise ephemerides – tables that predicted and listed the future positions of the celestial bodies[315]. These tables were examined by Prof George Sarton[245]. He found that they were computed by two methods[316] which, as Prof Neugebauer subsequently discovered, were based not on observations by the astronomers who produced them but compiled "...from some fixed mathematical schemes... which were given and were not to be interfered with"[246].

These mathematical schemes were very old, for even the Assyrian astronomers did not fully comprehend them and were able to use them only with the aid of "procedure texts"[317] which provided "the rules for computing ephemerides step by step" according to some "strict mathematical theory"[318]. This proved to be so advanced or obscure that, as Neugebauer admitted, its "...empirical and theoretical foundation"[319] largely escapes modern scholars as well.

A clay tablet from Ur, dating from the third millennium BC, lists and describes a series of celestial bodies so carefully and accurately, that modern astronomers have had little hesitation in recognising the text as a classification of the constellations, which, in addition to the twelve zodiacal groupings, include the northern constellations of Draco, Ursa Major, Lyra, Cygnus, Cepheus and Triangulum, and the southern ones of Canis Major, Orion, Centaurus, Corvus and Hydra[320]. This is interesting because, so far as is known, the Sumerian astronomers were the first to divide the heavens into three regions or 'ways'[321]. Of these, the northern 'way' was named after Enlil, the southern after Ea and the central one (which contained the zodiacal constellations) after Anu. Rather soberingly we have to record here that it was not until 1925 that modern astronomers, after much discussion, decided to divide the heavens, as seen from Earth, into three regions[322]. The modern and the ancient tripartite divisions are remarkably similar.

The names Ea, Anu and Enlil are especially interesting here for they provide further indications of the advanced levels attained by the early Mesopotamian astronomers and suggest that they knew a great deal about what actually happened at the time of Phaeton's visitation. Ea and Anu were the Sumerian names for the planets respectively known today as Neptune and Uranus. The existence of these planets was known to these astronomers and is presumably the reason why both appear on the aforementioned cylinder-seals.

Enlil is a particularly interesting name, for Sykes[247] has noted that: Lil meant 'demon' in several ancient Middle East dialects, whereby Enlil may have signified something like 'Demon Lord'; and that the Assyrians often referred to Enlil as Bel, who, in turn, was almost certainly identical with the heavenly-hero Marduk (alias Phaeton).

In Sumerian mythology Enlil was regarded as Anu's eldest son and the prince of the Sumerian pantheon, being second only in rank to the supreme Sun-god Apsu.

Later, Enlil appears to have transgressed divine laws, whereupon he was banished to the 'underworld'. Can it be coincidence that Lucifer (Satan), who was originally second only to God, was eventually thrown out of heaven and cast down into a 'bottomless pit', or that Phaeton, who was nearly as radiant as Helios (the Sun), was ultimately destroyed and his remains thrown down from the skies and buried under the Earth? The same theme recurs in Norse mythology about the primeval giant, Ymir, who, formed of fire and water, once waged war against the whole world and was only overcome by the gods Odin, Vili and Ve who flung his body into Ginungagap, a vast chasm which Ymir in his rage had caused to open in the Earth's crust[248]. The belief that a universal Deluge arose after Athrajen, hero of the North African Kabyles, had slain a marauding giant named Ferraun and hurled his carcass into a lake called Thamgurth[249], strongly suggests that he and Ymir were identical with the Deluge-inducing Lucifer or Phaeton.

Ginungagap is reminiscent of the great world crack or fissure discussed in Part One, an appropriate 'tomb' for anything consigned to it, and aptly described in later times as the 'underworld' or 'bottomless pit'.

Enlil, therefore, seems to be yet another title of Phaeton, while the 'way' of Enlil in the Sumerian tripartite division of the heavens appears to refer to the regions whence Enlil originated or which it traversed after entering the solar system. In that connection it is worth noting that the Phaeton legend refers to the Milky Way as the track taken by the fiery chariot of Helios, the stars being its scattered ashes; that the Brazilian Borros believe the Milky Way to be an ash trail left by a great conflagration (fiery object – Phaeton); that an early Indian name for the Milky Way was 'Path of the Serpent'[250]; and that the Book of Job asserts that Leviathan – a dragon-like attendant of the Phaeton-like Rahab – "maketh a path to shine after him"[251].

Interestingly, in considering cosmic causes for certain mass extinctions of terrestrial life in the past, Stothers concluded that: "...the most important perturbing objects must not only have a high mass density but must also be concentrated strongly towards the galactic plane"[252]. The Milky Way marks the galactic plane, as viewed from Earth! Did Phaeton, therefore, emanate from the direction of the galactic plane?

Astronomical knowledge in the ancient Near East was thus clearly far more advanced than is commonly supposed, but although much of it was apparently derived from yet earlier but unknown sources, considerable confidence can be placed in the veracity of even those records which depict additional worlds or planets in the solar system. Does some amazing truth lie behind these apparent discrepancies, a truth which involved large scale planetary disturbances like those suggested by our previous survey of the present solar system?

16

WAR IN HEAVEN

No names are given on the Mesopotamian cylinder-seals for the celestial bodies depicted on them, but the central rayed object is almost certainly the Sun and the remaining bodies are planets. The absence of distinguishing names, however, inevitably makes planetary identifications debatable, even though it would be reasonable to assume that the larger images represent the larger planets and the smaller images the smaller planets. We shall also shortly see that, on cylinder-seal VA/243, they have been placed around the rayed Sun in more or less correct orbital sequence (not distance). There is, however, one extra body, which, because it is not rayed, is presumably also planetary.

Various ancient Near Eastern cosmologies have come down to us, although often in rather fragmentary condition. Studies of them clearly show that all were based on some original prototype which evidently incorporated not only surprisingly advanced concepts but, in simplified form, the idea of the evolution of worlds in much the same general way as astrophysicists do today. Of these cosmologies, the version favoured by the early Mesopotamians is probably the best known and the most completely studied. It is a veritable epic, and, in its latter stages, describes the Marduk/Tiamat confrontation. It is thus directly concerned with the main theme of this book.

Three variants of this cosmological saga exist, in which the names of the principal characters often vary or are occasionally interchangeable. Oldest of the three is the version inscribed on clay tablets dating from about 650 BC, found in Assurbanipal's palace library at Nineveh. The next was written by Berosus about 280 BC, and the third, bequeathed us by Damascius, dates from the sixth Christian century. As Berosus' and Damascius' accounts are unhelpful here, we quickly turn to the oldest version.

The first studies made of the Nineveh tablets showed that they dealt with an Akkadian creation epic in many ways closely parallelling that given in Genesis. Accordingly, the first translation of it into English highlighted this similarity[253], later studies merely reinforcing this point[254]. Most scholars have come to regard the epic as a philosophical work emphasising the eternal struggle between good (light) and evil (darkness), or as an allegorical story of Nature's alternating summer and winter; yet, in view of current astronomical knowledge, it is comparatively easy to 'read between the lines', and reconstruct from the epic's text the outlines of what can only have been a monumental war in heaven. Indeed, in this connection, one cannot help but agree with Farnell who, in 1919, correctly observed:

> What is quite normal in nature and society rarely excites the myth-making imagination, which is more likely to be kindled by the abnormal, some startling catastrophe, some terrible violation of the social code.[255]

The Marduk/Tiamat confrontation combined all those deviations from the norm.

The epic, of which Prof Leonard King's translation is used here, and in which immense periods of time are truncated and telescoped, begins with a picture of the primeval universe. It then continues with an account of what may be regarded as the evolution of the planets (called 'gods' in the epic) and some of the satellites comprising the solar system. Together with the Sun, these bodies are awarded distinctive names in the Akkadian text, which, because we will repeatedly refer to them in the following paragraphs, are listed below with their modern counterparts.

Table 4B. Suggested identification of objects on Babylonian cylinder-seal

Akkadian Names	Modern Names
Apsu	The Sun
Mommu	Mercury
Lahamu	Venus
Lahmu	Mars
Tiamat	no equivalent now – perhaps Electra of Greek legend.
Kishar	Jupiter
Anshar	Saturn
Gaga	Chiron
Anu	Uranus
Nudimmud (or Ea)	Neptune
Gibil[256]	no equivalents known, but possibly Triton or Pluto.
Nusuku[257]

The above list suggests the probable identities (Akkadian and modern) of the celestial objects featured on the aforementioned cylinder-seal in the East Berlin State Museum. The seal apparently shows the planets in more or less their correct order, in an anti-clockwise direction (that in which they naturally orbit the Sun) commencing with Mercury. The large relative size of the body identified as Tiamat is interesting. It suggests that Tiamat physically resembled Jupiter and Saturn more than any of the inner planets. With that possibility in mind, it follows that Tiamat probably possessed a deep atmosphere not very dissimilar from those of the two giant planets just named, and in which methane, ammonia and various ices were comparatively prominent. We shall later find these to be particularly significant points. Ovenden has even suggested that its minimum configuration (distance from the Sun) relative to Earth (1.00) and Jupiter (5.20), was 2.79[258], and Van Flandern that its mass may have been 90 times that of Earth[259]. Opik has also speculated about this missing planet[260].

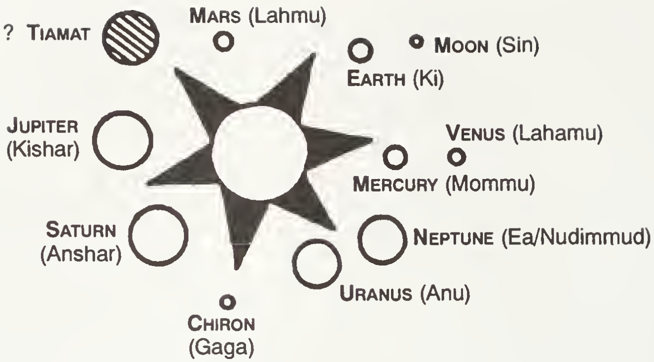

Fig 4.12. Suggested identification of objects on Babylonian cylinder-seal. Tiamat, the lost planet, is shown shaded. Some translations give Gaga as Kakka[323].

At this juncture we must note that the Akkadian epic makes no mention of Earth or the Moon, although Babylonian astronomers knew the planetary nature of these bodies, and apparently included them on the cylinder-seal diagram, calling them Ki and Sin respectively. Throughout most of this epic, Earth is thus conceived of, somewhat curiously, as a kind of unaffected off-stage vantage point from which the celestial dramas were merely observed and recorded.

No mention is made in the epic of how long peace reigned in the solar system before it was shattered by the arrival of a new 'god', Marduk, although we know from other evidence that Marduk (alias Phaeton) rampaged near Earth only some 11,500 years ago, when all the planets were still present in the solar system, orbiting the Sun on regular paths. But, as we shall now see, Marduk's arrival disrupted this order, and this remarkable epic, from this point onwards, traces the resultant havoc among the planets step by step.

The epic states:

In the Chamber of Fates, the place of Destinies,
A god was engendered, most able and wisest of gods;
In the heart of the Deep was Marduk created[324].

The 'heart of the deep' apparently signifies cosmic space beyond the confines of the solar system. Marduk originated there and was, therefore, alien to the solar system. As it neared the system, Marduk began to be attracted by the outermost sizable planet, Ea (Neptune), who could, therefore, be said to have 'begot him'. Marduk's origins are never made very clear, although several early sources provide a variety of scrappy and unhelpful hints that he was born in Aruru, Dauce or El[261]. Be that as it may, Marduk was a spectacular sight.

Alluring was his figure, sparkling the lift of his eyes;
Lordly was his gait, commanding as of olden times...
Greatly exalted was he above the gods, exceeding throughout...
His members were enormous, he was exceeding tall...
When he moved his lips fire blazed forth.

That Marduk was evidently visible from Earth during its initial 'adventures' among the furthest members of the Sun's family again indicates that it was not a comet. Even the brightest comets recorded in astronomical archives are not visible to the unaided eye when traversing the outer limits of the solar system. Yet Marduk is described unambiguously as a huge and radiant visitor from more distant (interstellar) regions, from time to time spewing great jets of fire. We may again emphasise that no comet observed in the outer confines of the solar system has yet been observed to eject great streams of fire like those just mentioned, since by their very nature comets are not actually fiery. Marduk was thus definitely some other kind of celestial visitor.

Of particular interest in the epic is a passage which relates how, after Marduk had entered the solar system, the planets "...heaped upon him their awesome flashes" making him shine with dazzling brilliance[325] as he became "clothed with the halo of ten gods". In other words, Marduk grew markedly brighter, so bright that the ancients considered him second only to the Sun in heavenly brilliance, and, as amongst the Greeks, dubbed him the 'son' of the Sun (Sol or Helios). Clearly something happened to Marduk when far out at the edge of the solar system, something that has never been associated with even the largest known comets.

It would not be unreasonable to account for Marduk's increased effulgence and therefore apparent size by postulating that the planetary 'flashes' 'heaped upon him' were immense thermoelectric (and probably electromagnetic) discharges directed at him by the outer planets whose own electromagnetic fields were by then beginning to react to Marduk's arrival. Yet such effects may have been a part only of what perhaps really happened, and masked what may have been a still more startling scenario.

So far the evidence is inconclusive that the Kuiper Belt objects genuinely represent the assorted remnants of some sizable bygone planetary body. Nevertheless, these remnants do occur astronomically close to a geologically very young Aluminium-26 cloud said to be typical of those associated with supernova explosions. Instead of attributing Marduk's increased brilliancy solely to colossal exchanges of energy between Marduk and the outer planets, however, it should be borne in mind that virtually the same effect could have arisen if Marduk had catastrophically ruptured the remote plane now possibly represented by the Kuiper Belt objects. The resultant explosion would have been enormous and, even from distant Earth, spectacular but soundless. To terrestrial observers, who would scarcely have been able to have actually seen the planet involved, it would have seemed as though Marduk had simply grown in size and brilliance, to become in that respect an apparent rival to the Sun – something no comet has ever been credited with achieving.

The explosion itself, assuming that one really took place, must have resulted from either a physical collision between Marduk and the disrupted planet, or from a concomitant destruction of part of Marduk's 'stellar' substance. This, or some closely similar scenario, must have been the source of the Aluminium-26 cloud.

There is, of course, no question of any supernova event occurring on the outer edge of the solar system. Had one erupted – at any point in geological history – it would have totally incinerated the solar system, the Sun probably being the lone survivor of such an event. Instead, something infinitely smaller (though still huge by Earthly standards) occurred beyond Pluto to create the Aluminium-26 cloud, something which had to have partly involved 'stellar' matter.

The inherent violence of such an explosion naturally flung dismantled pieces of the destroyed planet in all directions, and it is possible to interpret the eccentrically orbiting object 1992 QB, possibly the unknown large body which believedly altered Uranus' speed in 1897 and, perhaps, Pholus and Pluto's satellite Charon as some of the larger relics of the now-lost planet. Such a concept would also account for Pluto's own highly eccentric orbit.

After entering the solar system, Marduk first encountered Ea (Neptune), the gravitational field of which was sufficient to determine Marduk's future course, "making it good for its purpose". Neptune's gravitational pull was also powerful enough to cause Marduk to grow a second 'head', an indication of Marduk's molten, plastic, condition.

As Marduk reaches Anu (Uranus), however, great pieces of him are torn off and form into four attendants which commence to circle around Marduk "swirling as a whirlwind". Again, no cometary body has been observed to produce revolving satellitic objects; only an object possessing appreciable mass could have established and maintained such a situation. As previously noted, conventional comets lack mass of any consequence. (see also Note 5)

Also of interest is Marduk's direction of flight. Its passing of first Neptune and then Uranus strongly suggests that Marduk's flight-path was contrary to that of the planets, a factor which, in the case of a large and apparently highly-charged visitor like Marduk, must have been very disruptive for smaller bodies encountered en route. Could this, for example, be the reason why the small planet Pluto and Neptune's two satellites (Triton and Nereid) orbit so strangely? It will be recalled from Part Three that Ovid stated that Phaeton flew among the planets the 'wrong way'.

Marduk then passes Anshar (Saturn), so perhaps it is no coincidence that this planet, together with Anu (Uranus) and Ea (Neptune), rotates at a surprisingly fast speed, that Saturn's satellite Phoebe has a retrograde orbit, and that Uranus (Anu), which was responsible for distorting Marduk and detaching four 'satellites' from it, now rotates on an axis uniquely tilted NNW-SSE.

Marduk apparently became trapped by the gravitational fields of the three large outer planets for some appreciable time. This also began to affect the orbit of Tiamat and its satellite Kingu, with the former adopting an erratic orbital path, and the latter being pulled free of Tiamat's gravitational attraction and acquiring a "Tablet of Destiny".

At this point, Kishar, Anshar, Anu, and Ea asked themselves by what right Tiamat had to elevate Kingu to the status of a god – one who orbited freely (the Tablet of Destiny). Anshar (Saturn) asked first Ea (Neptune) and then Anu (Uranus) to slay Kingu, but neither could do so, whereupon Anshar conceived the idea that this could be achieved by the approaching Marduk, an idea eagerly agreed to by the other gods. Thus we find Marduk, approaching close to Saturn ("kissed the lips of Anshar"), agreeing to undertake this task. Anshar then instructed his emissary, Gaga (Chiron), to:

Be on thy way Gaga,
Take the stand before the gods, seemingly a clear reference to Marduk pulling Chiron free of the gravitational field of Saturn and causing it henceforth to move in free orbit. The presence of such a small planet orbiting among the giant outer planets is one of the anomalies of the solar system, and could well be accounted for by the scenario unfolding before us.

Marduk plunged on and began to approach glistening[326] and brilliant[327] Tiamat:

He produced streams, disturbed Tiamat;
The gods were not at rest, carried as in a stream.

Tiamat is described as having "paced about distraught" as Marduk also affected the inner planets and "diluted their vitals... pinched their eyes". Such phrases convey a scene in which the powerfully-charged Marduk, a molten fiery object, emitted vast electromagnetic charges that, as well as causing Tiamat to orbit erratically, affected the equivalent fields of Tiamat and the inner planets. In this connection, could it be significant that for some while before the onset of the Phaeton disaster, increased heat and a terrible drought was allegedly experienced on Earth?

Encouraged by Marduk's willingness to destroy Kingu, the gods then exhort Marduk to go a step further and "cut off the life of Tiamat" as well. In the epic, Marduk agrees to do this on one condition, with the words:

If I, as your Avenger
Am to vanquish Tiamat, save your lives –
Convene an Assembly to proclaim my Destiny supreme.

This passage seemingly relates to the stage when Marduk, having apparently already approached near enough to Tiamat to derange its orbit and detach its satellite ('first-born') Kingu, found itself still struggling in the grip of the combined gravitational fields of the outer planets which, in the guise of gods, were anxious to be rid of him. Eventually they ejected Marduk from their sphere of gravitational influence straight towards Tiamat with 'destiny supreme'.

The epic then tells how, deranged by Marduk, Tiamat began to break-up; from her midst, there emerged eleven "monsters", styled elsewhere as "eleven mighty helpers", which "separated themselves" from her body and "growling, raging... marched at the side of Tiamat". Tiamat is said to have "crowned them with halos". According to Babylonian texts, these "helpers" were armed with thunderbolts and included Lakhmu the shining snake, the Great Lion, the Viper, the Ravening Dog, the Scorpion Man, the Storm Winds, the Goat Fish, the Fish Man and Kingu[262] – Tiamat's "first-born" (satellite) – who commanded them. Among these names we quickly recognise the Midgård Serpent and the Fenris-Wolf of the Norse Eddas.

The epic then describes how Marduk filled himself with "blazing flame" – increased in radiance – "constructed a bow... attached thereto an arrow", "set lightning" in front of him, and made "a net to enfold Tiamat therein". These phrases can only signify that Marduk developed a coma ('bow'), emitted flashes ('lightning') and gave off electrical discharges all round ('net') as it coursed across the heavens. It must have been an awesome and terrifying spectacle. The four whirling satellites ('winds') detached from him by Anu (Uranus) fly by Marduk's side, and to these he adds three more (pieces which break-off from him) called Evil Wind, Whirlwind and Matchless Wind. All head straight for Tiamat and "her host".

> The Lord went forth, followed his course;
> Towards the raging Tiamat he set his face...
> The Lord approached to scan the innerside of Tiamat –
> The scheme of Kingu, her consort, to perceive.
> As he looks on, his course becomes upset,
> His direction is distracted, his doings are confused.
> When the gods, his helpers,
> Who were marching at his side,
> Saw the valiant Kingu, blurred became their vision.

Marduk and his satellites were clearly deranged in flight as they neared Tiamat and Kingu, while the blurring of the satellites' 'vision' may refer to the blinding flashes of the electrical discharges that almost certainly must have occurred between all three bodies then. We have already noted how the electrical fields of closely approaching large bodies would try to equalise through repeated discharges of this kind.

Celestial battle, however, was now joined.

> Tiamat and Marduk, the wisest of the gods,
> Advanced against one another;
> They pressed on to single combat,
> They approached for battle.

Marduk "raised the flooding storm, his mighty weapon" (an electromagnetic storm of unimaginable violence?). "Tiamat emitted a roar" and, as her "fury" grew, "the roots of her legs shook back and forth" (Tiamat's magnetic poles repeatedly reversed with – surprisingly for earthly viewers – thunderous acoustics as the planet's structure endured appalling strain). Marduk then:

> ...spread out his net to enfold her;
> The Evil Wind, the rearmost, he unleashed at her face.
> As she opened her mouth, Tiamat, to devour him -
> He drove the Evil Wind so that she closed not her lips.
> The fierce storm Winds then charged her belly;
> Her body became distended; her mouth had opened wide.
> He shot there through an arrow, it tore her belly;
> It cut through her insides, tore into her womb.
>
> Having thus subdued her, her life-breath he extinguished.

In this remarkable passage, we literally read of the terrible destruction of a planet. At this point we must assume from the foregoing passage and from its alleged position in the solar system that Tiamat was a fairly large planet possessing a lithosphere like that of Earth. After unleashing his 'flooding storm', Marduk then enveloped Tiamat in constant electrical discharges ('net') which so disrupted the planet's electrical mechanism that Tiamat's rotation was retarded or braked to a halt. This resulted in the planet's outer shell or crust splitting open ("opened her mouth"). While this crack was still open ("closed not her lips"), Marduk poured further electromagnetic charges ("fierce... winds") into it ("charged her belly"), so that "her body became distended" (internal magmatic material continued to rotate, causing the remaining portions of Tiamat's crust to bulge and/or sag locally). This, in turn, caused the crack to gape ever more widely ("her mouth had opened wide"), and it faced directly at Marduk as Tiamat "opened her mouth... to devour him".

Some bolt ("arrow") of electricity or similar matter was then shot by Marduk into this crustal aperture which "tore her belly... cut through her insides" (magmatic interior) and "tore into her womb" (penetrated to the planet's core). This was tantamount to a gigantic electrical 'short-out' between the two internal dynamos of the respective antagonists, and must have resulted in one of two things: either Tiamat's entire natural electromagnetic field was neutralised, this being drawn off and absorbed by Marduk, or Tiamat broke-up. That Tiamat seemingly suffered the latter fate is suggested by the following passage, in which Marduk:

To divide the monster he then artfully planned.
Then, as a mussel, he split her into two parts.
The Lord trod upon Tiamat's hinder part;
With his weapon the connected skull he cut loose;
He severed the channels of her blood;
And caused the North Wind to bear it
To places that have been unknown.
The half of her he set up as a screen for the skies;
Locking them together, as watchmen he stationed them...
He bent Tiamat's tail to form the Great Band as a bracelet.

Tiamat's split crust still hung partially connected, any surviving remnants of the stricken planet's atmosphere, liquids, ices and gases, no doubt smoking and steaming as a result of the immense heat generated throughout Tiamat's structure by Marduk's onslaught. With his weapon (electromagnetic), Marduk then dismembered the planet completely, one half of which, presumably the upper, being termed Tiamat's skull. The "channels of her blood" were severed (Tiamat's polar axis no longer existed), whereby the "skull" portion of the planet – which may have carried an ice-cap – floated freely apart from the rest of the savaged world.

Marduk then appears to have demolished one of these halves, which, because Marduk was still moving sunwards and dragging the remains of Tiamat along with it, formed a "tail" of debris which streamed out behind it. The epic tells how Marduk placed these fragments in the heavens as a "screen", a "bracelet", a "Great Band". Today this may represent either the asteroid belt, which consists mostly of related groups of objects, or the recently discovered circumsolar dust ring (see Appendix C). The scholarly Jewish translation of the Holy Scriptures according to masoretic texts, The Torah, also refers to this, alluding to Marduk simply as 'the Lord':

The Heavens bespeak the glory of the Lord,
The Hammered Bracelet proclaims his handiwork...[263].

and very significantly adds: "From the end of heaven he emanates"[264]. We have already noted that the Babylonian epic states that Marduk came from the 'Great Deep' ('end of heaven').

Meanwhile, the apparently undemolished portion of Tiamat was carried by Marduk towards the Sun and the inner planets. But what of Tiamat's 'helpers'? The epic relates how, after the destruction of Tiamat:

Her band was shattered, her host broken up.
The gods, her helpers who marched at her side,
Trembling with fear,
Turned their backs about so as to save and preserve their lives.

Marduk, however, caused them to be "thrown into a net" (to be captured gravitationally – the combined gravitational fields of Marduk and the remaining part of Tiamat must have been appreciable):

...They found themselves ensnared...

The whole band of demons that had marched on her side
He cast into fetters, their hands he bound...
Tightly circled, they could not escape.

Furthermore, Marduk removed the "Tablet of Destiny" from Kingu's breast and attached it to his own – another reference to Kingu being reduced to a satellite, this time of Marduk. The gravitational field of Marduk thus continued to be enhanced.

Tiamat was no more. If early humanity had ever gazed at Tiamat as a distant planet circling the heavens (as the Babylonian epic clearly implies that they did), they could no longer locate it. It had disappeared. Interestingly, the ancient Greeks also speak of a time of celestial strife between the gods Ares (Mars) and Athene (Venus) when a planet, Electra by name and one of seven sisters, all sired by Atlas – and no longer able to watch the conflict – departed from the heavens never to be seen again[265].

In Part Three we found Plato's account of the loss of the legendary continent of Atlantis (the empire of Atlas) to be but one recollection of the occurrence of radical worldwide topographical changes some 11,500 years ago initiated by powerful and violent celestial agents.

So were Electra and Tiamat simply different titles of the same lost (destroyed) planet? Did Tiamat, like Electra, perish at a time when the planets Ares (Mars) and Athene (Venus) were also disturbed? Indeed, was their derangement merely part and parcel of the same cosmic drama which, in causing a vast conflagration, a tremendous flood, and major tectonic upheavals here on Earth, affected the entire solar system?

17

PHAETON'S WRATH

So far as our theme is concerned, the Babylonian epic finishes with the subjugation of Tiamat's attendants by the fiery Marduk. The epic has outlined an extraordinary celestial event in which the solar system was visited by a dangerous assailant from more distant cosmic regions, which thereupon wandered erratically among the planets in a sunwards direction, generating havoc as it did so. None of the described planetary reactions basically infringe known astronomical laws, although the account of the destruction of Tiamat is certainly startling. In 1950, however, Velikovsky – who hardly did more than acknowledge the existence of the Tiamat/Marduk epic – argued that the planet Venus was originally a comet which had been ejected from the giant planet Jupiter during the second millennium BC, and that, after erratic wanderings among the inner planets Mars and Earth, it eventually settled down as a candescent 'hot' object into its present near-circular orbit round the Sun[266]. Unlike the Babylonian epic, Velikovsky's hypothesis – at which most astronomers voiced incredulity – required Mars to leave its previous stable orbit and to approach closely both Earth and the then still errant Venus on several occasions during the eighth century BC, a requirement necessitating a violation of the accepted laws concerning the motions of large celestial bodies[267].

Recent studies of Venus, however, show the planet to possess a bulk and composition very unlike that of Jupiter, so much so that there is absolutely no likelihood of it ever having issued from the giant planet[268]. For example, in table 4A (Planetary Statistics), we saw that Jupiter's density is only $1.3 g/cm^{-3}$ and that Venus' is $5.1 g/cm^{-3}$, or similar to that of Earth.

Jupiter's atmosphere is dominated chemically by hydrogen and its most abundant simple compounds – methane and ammonia, as well as water. Recently, some higher hydrocarbons have also been detected in it[269]. In contrast, the Venusian atmosphere is oxidised[270]. Direct sampling by the Venera series of atmospheric probes disclosed that Venus' atmosphere consists almost entirely of carbon dioxide, with small quantities of nitrogen, argon, water and hydrochloric and hydrofluoric acids[271]; while analyses of infrared reflection spectra of Venusian clouds showed beyond all reasonable doubt that the visible clouds in the upper atmosphere of Venus are composed of sulphuric acid droplets[272]. Earlier announcements that the Mariner 2 space probe had detected hydrocarbons in the Venusian atmosphere were spurious and should be ignored[273]. Measurements taken by the Mariner 10 flyby of Venus highlighted another reason why the planet cannot have emanated from Jupiter, for they showed that:

> ...the total energy radiated by Venus is equivalent to that from a black body of about 230°K, or just what one would expect in the absence of any internal source. Thus there is no evidence that Venus radiates more energy than it receives from the Sun[274].

The possibility that Venus may have cooled from a candescent (1,100°C) state to its present much lower temperature during the thirty-five centuries or so since, according to Velikovsky, it ceased to be a marauding comet, has been ably investigated by Morrison[275] and others, who found that there exist no scientific grounds for supposing this to have occurred. In conclusion, therefore, no demonstrable evidence exists that it was ever a comet or has ever seriously departed from its present orbit.

Nevertheless, numerous references occur in the ancient writings of the Hindus, Persians, Babylonians, Chinese, Mexicans and others averting to a time when Venus apparently battled in the sky against Mars. Much of Velikovsky's argument respecting the alleged former derangement of the Martian and Venusian orbits relied on these references. Thus, if modern astronomy conclusively demonstrates that Venus cannot have been a comet, then either these ancient assertions are somehow factually correct or they really allude to one or more other celestial objects which, in later days, were erroneously confused by scribes, redactors and commentators with Mars and Venus.

In view of all the foregoing, it is exceedingly difficult to see how these ancient, and in many cases quite independent writings can be factually correct, and everything points to the second alternative as being the most likely. Indeed, we shall shortly find this to have almost certainly been the case. Firstly, however, we must take a closer look at Mars.

Table 4A shows that Mars takes slightly over 24 hours to rotate. Ideally it should take only 8 hours. This comparatively slow rotation is somehow connected with a past change in the planet's rotational equilibrium figure. In turn, this appears to have caused extensive fracturing of the Martian crust, and a reduction of the theoretical norm of the Martian magnetic field. We have also noted that Mars follows a decidedly eccentric orbit. Astronomers have admitted that the known observational data fails to satisfactorily explain these anomalies and that something quite profound has happened to Mars in the not so distant past.

This Martian fracture complex is especially noteworthy for resembling the equivalent lineament system characterising the terrestrial crust. This latter, which some have categorically stated was producible only by external rather than local agencies, resulted from massive crustal dislocations seemingly coincident with magnetic reversals, widespread orogeny, vulcanism, flooding and biological extinctions approximately 11,500 years ago, and for all of which a celestial initiation has been repeatedly advocated.

Can it be coincidence, therefore, that: the Babylonian epic describes how Marduk similarly split Tiamat's outer shell; that the Martian crustal fractures resemble Earth's; that a planet (Electra) allegedly disappeared at a time when Mars and Venus are said to have fought in heaven; and that when, on Earth, immense changes engendered by Phaeton (alias Marduk) occurred to topographical features ever associated with Electra's mythological father Atlas (eg, Atlas mountains, Straits of Gibraltar, and Atlantis)? Surely these similarities are too close to be products of totally separate events, for all are seemingly united by the insistent underlying theme of a powerful and destructive cosmic assailant.

If, therefore, neither Mars nor Venus can have strayed sufficiently far from their usual orbits to have engaged in 'celestial combat', early Man, who watched but misidentified the contestants, must have observed some other sizable object become embroiled in 'heavenly strife' with Mars. In one account from the third century BC, Mars is pursued and attacked while apparently still on its normal orbit:

> ...the star of Mars... was pursued by the star Venus; then Venus took hold of him and inflamed him with ardent passion.[276]

Something bright and star-like caught up with Mars as it travelled along its solar orbit and, having done so, began to heat it up ('inflamed him') just as Tiamat had been previously. Was this star-like body Marduk wending its way sunwards? We submit that it was. So, if any significance can be attached to the old Persian description of the "bright and glorious Tistrya" as the "star that attacks planets"[277], we see that the Venus which allegedly inflamed Mars' 'passions' was none other than Marduk (alias Phaeton). Enhanced radiance due to thermal energy (heat) may well have made Mars appear starlike (flashing) or sun-like (fiery) to Earthbound observers. Much of significance may underlie the following statement in a Chinese chronicle describing an abnormal celestial event said to have occurred in the reign of Emperor Kwei (Koei-Kie):

> At this time the two suns were seen to battle in the sky. The five planets were agitated by unusual movements. A part of Mount T'ai-chan fell down[278].

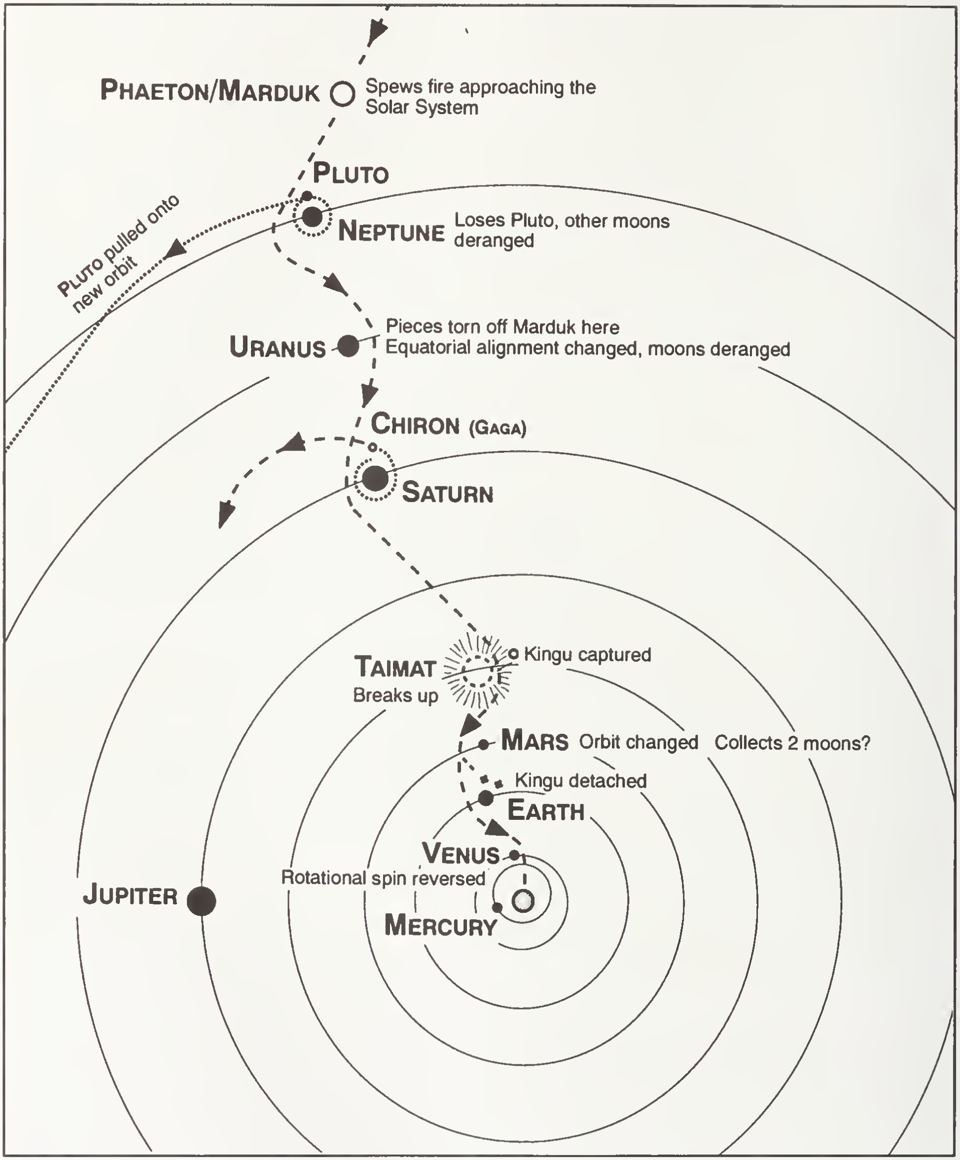
In the Indo-Iranian Zend-Avesta, these planets: "...ran against the sky and created confusion"[279], and: "...The celestial sphere was in revolution... The planets, with many demons, dashed against the celestial sphere and mixed the constellations.."[280]. These 'demons' were presumably the debris of Tiamat and her 'helpers' still accompanying Marduk at that time.

The ancient Chinese expressly associated these cosmic dramas with vast terrestrial floods, for they believed that "...if the five planets err on their routes", the land will be engulfed by a great flood[281]. This belief is unquestionably a memory of the Deluge occurring at the time of Phaeton's visit.

The Aztecs of pre-Columbian Mexico referred to Mars, which they called Huitzilopochtli[282], as being "...like live-fire, greatly feared by his enemies..."[283]. They also revered a hero-god called Quetzalcoatl, "the feathered serpent", the priest of whose cult, in one of the Aztec ceremonies, shot an arrow into an effigy of Huitzilopochtli, who was then considered to be dead[284]. Does this not recall Marduk firing the fatal 'arrow' (discharge) into Tiamat? And is it not a little curious that the Aztecs always conceived Quetzalcoatl as a serpent, albeit a feathered one? Could it be that Marduk (alias Quetzalcoatl) discharged a similar 'arrow' at Mars when those two bodies neared one another? Classical Greek texts indicate that this almost certainly occurred.

Homer's famous Iliad[285], though primarily concerned with the equally famous Trojan war, contains a lengthy account of a celestial battle between the deities Ares and Pallas-Athene, and in which Aphrodite (goddess of the Moon) and Hera (goddess of the Earth) also become involved. Ares, of course, is Mars, and Pallas-Athene (Velikovsky's Venus) is Marduk. Homer makes Ares patron of the Trojans and Pallas-Athene protectress of the Greeks; but this was clearly a literary device. The confrontation between these two entities was originally a separate and much older interplanetary event.

That this is the correct interpretation is seemingly confirmed by the fact that, in the so-called Homeric hymns[286], Ares is called a planet, whereas Pallas-Athene is not, even though various earlier commentators have assumed that it must have been. The somewhat nebulous but nevertheless discernible distinction in the Homeric hymns is actually consistent with the description of Ishtar – the Babylonian name for Pallas-Athene – as 'the fearful dragon' inscribed on tablets retrieved from Assurbanipal's ruined library at Nineveh[287].



PHAETON/MARDUK
Spews fire approaching the Solar System
PLUTO
PLUTO pulled onto new orbit
NEPTUNE
Loses Pluto, other moons deranged
URANUS
Pieces torn off Marduk here
Equatorial alignment changed, moons deranged
CHIRON (GAGA)
SATURN
TAIMAT
Breaks up
Kingu captured
MARS
Orbit changed
Collects 2 moons?
Kingu detached
EARTH
VENUS
Rotational spin reversed
JUPITER
MERCURY

Fig 4.13. Schematic diagram of the path apparently taken by Phaeton/Marduk through the solar system. Not to scale. Based on the Sumerian texts and recent astronomical data discussed on preceding pages, and on the main effects attributable to its passage. Orbital positions of the planets approximately correct only at the times when Phaeton/Marduk reached their individual vicinities.

Paraphrasing Homer's account we find that Pallas-Athene first of all removes Ares from the field of battle (perturbs Mars' orbit), only for both entities to meet again – this time "furious Ares abiding on the left of the battle" (Marduk evidently passes round behind Mars and crosses inside Mars' orbit). This is consistent with the aforementioned 'pursuit' in Eratosthenes' account. At this stage, Aphrodite (the Moon) tries to enter the fray (the Moon affected gravitationally?). Ares then darkens the battlefield (the Martian atmosphere becomes disturbed?) and Pallas-Athene is seen to retreat (Marduk moves away from Mars). Hera, the goddess of Earth then complains at this celestial turmoil (Earth is affected electromagnetically?).

Pallas-Athene then turns on Ares and hurls a "spear" (discharge) "mightily against his nethermost belly" (this instantly reminds us of the "fierce storm winds" Marduk discharged at Tiamat's "belly"). Ares emits a "loud bellow" (thunderous roar) and Pallas-Athene a great cry (another roar) as "over against her spouted Ares, dread as a dark whirlwind" (innumerable lightning bolts discharged by Mars makes the planet appear to spout), and "together then they clashed with a mighty din...". At this juncture, Hera spread a thick mist about herself (though yet millions of miles distant, various physical effects of the conflict begin to be felt on Earth).

Ares strikes Pallas-Athene with his long "spear" (more electrical discharges), but although the latter "gave ground" (retreated), it retaliates by heaving a gigantic stone, "black and jagged and great" (the remaining portion of the dead Tiamat?), at Ares and thereby "loosed his limbs" (caused Mars to become unsteady – to oscillate). Simultaneously "round about Great Heaven pealed as with a trumpet". Aphrodite then came to Ares' assistance, whose "hand" she took and "sought to lead away" (lunar gravitational pull caused Mars to move further away from Marduk); but Pallas-Athene "sped in pursuit and smote Aphrodite on the breast... and her heart melted" (Marduk discharged an electromagnetic bolt at the Moon, which had the effect of causing the Moon to either move back towards the Earth or of nullifying its gravitational influence, or both).

As the battle, in which Marduk appears to have failed to overcome Mars, seems to have effectively come to an end at this juncture, it may be surmised that, in pursuing Aphrodite and smiting her on the breast, Marduk was now clear of Mars' immediate gravitational pull and was ominously heading towards the Earth/Moon system.

Several questions arise at this point. For example, did the remnant of Tiamat hurled by Marduk at Mars (if that is what the "black and jagged and great" stone really was) disintegrate amid tremendous din in Mars' Roche Limit? In its dismembered condition, this remnant would have been structurally weak with no controllable gravitational or magnetic field of its own, yet would still have possessed inherently destructive mass. It is, perhaps, highly significant that Mars is orbited today by two irregularly shaped ("jagged") satellites which, by common consensus, are peculiar objects from every point of view. Are they fragments of Tiamat acquired from Marduk? Tolson has already suggested this with regard to Phobos[288].

The two irregularly-shaped Martian moons, therefore, could indeed be captured fragments of the unfortunate Tiamat, while the aforementioned slow rotation of Mars, its unaccountably reduced magnetic field, its distorted orbit, the inferred past changes to its rotational equilibrium figure, and its crustal fracture complex, could well have resulted from its alleged encounter with Pallas-Athene (Marduk/Phaeton) and from an actual or near collision with the "black and jagged and great" stone (a remnant of Tiamat?). Roche's Limit would have ensured the inevitable break-up of that object.

Briefly, the Roche Limit is the zone which surrounds any large object of appreciable mass possessing a gravitational field, at a distance of 2 to 3 radii of the object concerned. In effect it is a danger-zone, and any object with a smaller mass or weaker gravitational field entering it will be either swiftly expelled from it electromagnetically, or, more commonly, be subjected to intolerable tidal stress and disintegrated. Disintegration is practically guaranteed if the smaller object remains within the zone indefinitely, but less so if it rapidly passes through only a limited area of the zone at high speed.

It is also more than probable that the disintegration of a large body (say, one the size of the Moon) would involve an explosion at some relatively early stage, with consequent high-velocity dispersal in literally all directions of the resultant debris. The blast occasioned by a sufficiently large explosion would, no doubt, extensively modify any atmosphere enveloping the larger host object, could alter its composition, and might even lead to permanent dissipation and attenuation of a sizable percentage of it. This, in turn, could alter the planet's thermal balance, and induce new climatic regimes. These, or closely similar effects, appear to have been experienced by Mars. Or are they captured asteroids?

Discussing the Velikovskian notion of former celestial confrontations between Earth, Mars, and Venus, relative to the problem of disposal of planetary energy, Rose and Vaughan concluded that:

> The participation of at least one other body besides Venus, Earth and Mars in the encounters that have occurred since Venus' final departure from the vicinity of Jupiter could provide a easy solution to this energy-disposal problem.[289]

This is a most interesting statement, for, although we do not accept that Venus was ever ejected from Jupiter (as Rose and Vaughan believed), the object that they, and Velikovsky, called Venus appears to have indeed been present in the celestial encounters they discuss. It was Phaeton. Very pertinently, Rose and Vaughan added:

> ...if we permit this 'other body' to interact with Mars... then the problem of (orbital) eccentricity-damping will evaporate as well.[290]

As the probable sequence of the physical changes sustained by Earth during the Phaeton disaster are discussed in Part Five of this book, those details can be temporarily side-stepped here, and we pick up the saga of this 'war in heaven' at the point where Phaeton vacates the environs of Earth.

Upon leaving the vicinity of Earth, Phaeton apparently headed sunwards once more, for vague human memories have come down to us of a great 'dragon' or fiery 'monster' coursing across the heavens towards the Sun just after the Deluge. Evidently brief glimpses of it were afforded isolated Deluge survivors through occasional gaps in the deranged and rapidly thickening atmosphere (the 'collapsed sky'). Thereafter, the gloom persisting for decades afterwards, the collapsed sky undoubtedly curtailed observations of this celestial spectacle. Very little was seen of what happened to Phaeton as it neared Venus or crossed its orbit on its sunward journey. Nevertheless, various post-diluvian beliefs and ancient astronomical texts suggest the outlines of what apparently occurred. Accordingly, we now examine these.

The worship of Venus as either the Morning Star or the Evening Star was extremely widespread in post-diluvian times, and many propitiary cults to Venus existed among numerous classical and pre-classical civilisations in both hemispheres. Clearly some deep significance underlay these beliefs and was seemingly due to the fact that, when Venus becomes the Morning or Evening Star, it can become the brightest object after the Sun. As a result of its increasing brilliance at those times, it may have instantly reminded catastrophe survivors of the steadily increasing brilliance of the fiery Phaeton in the weeks when it approached ever nearer to Earth.

If so, this suggests that, before the Phaeton disaster, Venus shone less brilliantly and was seasonally a less conspicuous object. This, in turn, might indicate that the albedo (reflectivity) of the Venusian atmosphere had been enhanced during the intervening period and that its orbital motion may have changed.

That something rather unusual has indeed happened to Venus may be inferred from the relevant statistics noted in table 4A. Compared with nearly all those for other planets in the solar system, these reflect decidedly aberrant motions. Could a near-collision with a sizable celestial object, such as Phaeton, have produced such anomalies? Theoretically at least, the answer is yes. It is, of course, unscientific to assert categorically that Phaeton caused these anomalies.

Nevertheless, it is germane that ancient Persian texts declare that Mievish-Muspar, a fiery object, "provided with tails" and which had assaulted Earth long ago, had been "attached" by the Sun: "...to its own radiance by mutual agreement, so that he (Muspar) may be less able to do harm"[291].

In other words, Muspar – alias Phaeton – had eventually plunged into and been absorbed by the Sun. Its journey towards the Sun must, therefore, have carried it past Venus or across its orbit, whereby the likelihood of Venus acquiring anomalous motions then is a distinct possibility. Any such encounter, however, would have been largely invisible to Deluge survivors who for months could see nothing through the impenetrable gloom of the 'collapsed sky'.

It was only with the dissipation of this thick cloud cover that Venus, now perhaps on a newly-inclined orbit and possibly still trailing wisps or portions of its own disturbed atmosphere (likened in ancient texts to 'hair', 'tails', 'horns', etc), became conspicuous in the clearing terrestrial heavens. Its surprising brilliance and unexpected appearance at the time perhaps naturally led confused and terrified Deluge survivors to suppose that Venus was the vanished Phaeton, and that its possible return was something to be avoided at all costs. The Venus cults of antiquity probably arose then.

18

PHAETON'S SIGNIFICANCE

We have repeatedly seen that, during its devastating progress through the solar system, Phaeton was apparently attracted to nearly all the planets in turn. Jupiter and Mercury seem to have been the exceptions. Conceivably these were in the 'wrong part' of the solar system at the time, that is, they were orbiting the far side of the Sun relative to Phaeton's course. Phaeton's predilection for planets strongly suggests that it possessed an abnormally intense electromagnetic field which was naturally attracted to the equivalent fields of the planets it encountered and disturbed.

Eventually, the overwhelmingly greater electromagnetic and gravitational fields of the Sun pulled it unerringly to a fiery grave in the solar furnace. Phaeton's impact upon the enormously larger Sun would, of course, have been negligible.

It is possible, therefore, to conceive of Phaeton pursuing a meandering course through the solar system as it moved sunwards from planet to planet, resulting in a pin-ball effect. Phaeton also apparently entered the solar system from a direction opposite to that in which all the planets orbit the Sun. As mentioned before, old Persian texts expressly state that Tistrya, the "leader of the stars against the planets", proceeded "along his winding course"[292] (our italics), a point mentioned in several ancient texts and traditions. Fig 4.13 conveys this concept diagrammatically.

With the demise of Phaeton, the 'war in heaven' was effectively over, although innumerable examples of the wreckage it produced throughout the solar system are yet traceable and many legacies of the phase which involved Earth are still being experienced today.

Despite its awesome destructive powers, however, the disaster was essentially a solitary event punctuating the uniformitarian normality of the solar system and which, among other effects, terminated a long and idyllic terrestrial regime anciently remembered as a 'Golden Age'. This had been an excellent expression of Lyellian uniformity on Earth. Now it was shattered and gone. Long aeons would and are to pass before such conditions become general once more.

Incomplete, dim and scattered though they now are, the aforementioned legends and traditions and the abundant geophysical and biological evidences relating to the Phaeton disaster represent, of course, mere highlights of that appalling event – and essentially localised ones at that. They scarcely convey the full enormity of the overall catastrophe and seldom the actual order in which the constituent calamities occurred. Insofar as this is possible, an attempt will therefore now be made to trace the probable sequence of these, their consequences at the time, and their subsequent longer-term effects.

REFERENCES

1. Morrison, R B. 1969. "The Pleistocene Boundary: an evaluation of the various criteria for determining it on a provincial basis, and establishing it worldwide", Geol Mijnb, vol 48, pp353–371.
2. Mangerud, J, & S Gullikson. 1975. "Apparent Radiocarbon Ages of Recent Marine Shells from Norway, Spitzbergen and Arctic Canada", Quat Res, vol 5, pp263–273; see p270.
3. Turnbull, W D. 1958. "Notice of a Late Wisconsin Mastodon", J Geol, vol 66, pp96–97.
4. Klein, R G. 1971. "The Pleistocene Prehistory of Siberia", Quat Res, vol 1, no 2, pp122–161; see pp141–142.
5. Woodford, A D. 1965. Historical Geology (San Francisco & London), 512pp; see p437.
6. Webb, T, & R A Bryson. 1972. "Late and Post-Glacial Climatic Changes in Northern Midwest USA: Quantitative Estimates Derived from Pollen Spectra by Multivariate Statistical Analysis", Quat Res, vol 2, no 1, pp70–115; see pp99, 103.
7. Vasari, Y, & S Hicks. 1972. Climatic Changes in Arctic Areas during the last 10,000 Years, (Oulu Univ, Finland); see p269.
8. Hamilton, T D. 1982. "A Late Pleistocene Glacial Chronology for the southern Brooks Range: Stratigraphic Record and Regional Significance", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 73, pp700–716; see p700.
9. Klein, R G. 1972. "The Late Quaternary Mammalian Fauna of Nelson Bay Cave: Its Implications for megafaunal extinctions and environmental and cultural change", Quat Res, vol 2, no 2, pp135–142; see p140.
10. Rognon, P, & M A Williams. 1977. "Late Quaternary Climatic Changes in Australia and North Africa: a preliminary interpretation", Palaeogeogr Palaeoclimat Palaeoecol, vol 21, pp285–327; see pp298–299.
11. Andrews, J T. 1973. "Late Quaternary Variations in Oxygen and Carbon isotopic compositions in Canadian Arctic Marine Bivalves", Palaeogeogr Palaeoclimat Palaeoecol, vol 14, pp187–192.
12. Andrews, J T. 1972. "Recent and Fossil growth Rates of Marine Bivalves, Canadian Arctic and Late Quaternary Arctic Marine Environments", Palaeogeogr Palaeoclimat Palaeoecol, vol 11, pp157–176.
13. Mangerud, J, & S Gullikson. 1975. Op cit, p263.
14. Morrison, R B. 1969. Op cit.
15. Denton, G H, & T J Hughes. 1981. The Last Great Ice Sheets (New York), 464pp; see p28.
16. Various. 1960. Radiocarbon, vol 2, p104.
17. Denton, G H, & T J Hughes. 1981. Op cit.
18. Radiocarbon, 1965, vol 7, p202.
19. Radiocarbon, 1965. Vol 7, p203.
20. Carter, G F. 1953. "Physical Geography", Geogr Rev, vol 43, pp121–124.
21. Morrison, R B. 1969. Op cit.
22. Harley, L S. 1954. "Concerning the Age of Things", Essex Nat, vol 29, pp129–141.
23. Bowen, D G. 1973. "The Pleistocene Succession of the Irish Sea", Proc Geol Assoc, vol 84, pp251–272.
24. Godwin, H. 1951. "Comments on Radiocarbon Dating for samples from the British Isles", Amer Journ Sci, vol 249, pp301–307.
25. Anonymous. 1951. "Errors in the C-14 Method of archaeological Dating", Nature, vol 168, pp725–726.
26. Morrison, R B. 1969. Op cit.
27. Olsson, U, & K G Erickson. 1965. Progress in Oceanography, ed M Sears; see vol 3, p253.
28. Morrison, R B. 1969. Op cit.
29. Carter, G F. 1953. Op cit.
30. Radiocarbon, 1965. Vol 7, p34.
31. Radiocarbon, 1962. Vol 4, p180.
32. Heintz, A. 1958. "Om pollenanalyse av mageinholdet fra Beresovka-mammuten", Blyttia, vol 16, pp122–142.
33. Radiocarbon, 1962. Vol 4, p179.
34. Libby, W F, A G Homey & R Berger. 1964. "Radiocarbon Dating of Bone and Shell from their organic compounds", Science, vol 144, pp999–1001.
35. Taylor, A E (tr). 1929. Plato's Timaeus and Critias (London), vii + 136pp.
36. Maunder, A S D. 1912. "The Zoroastrian Star-Champions: Part Two", Observatory, vol xxv (December), pp438–443.
37. Maunder, A S D. 1912. Op cit.
38. Hauthal, R, & H Meyer. 1910. Reisen in Bolivien und Peru, Gesellschaft für Erdkunde (Leipzig).

39. Miller, F J (tr), 1916. Ovid: Metamorphoses (London & New York); see book 2, fab 1.
40. Frazer, J G (tr), 1921. Apollodorus: Mythulogica, 2 vols (London).
41. Olrik, A. 1922. Ragnarök, German edn (Cologne), xvi + 484pp.
42. Gold, T. 1955. "Instability of the Earth's Axis of Rotation", Nature, vol 175, pp526–5.
43. Warlow, P. 1978. "Geomagnetic Reversals", J Phys A, vol 11, pp2107–2130.
44. Gold, T. 1955. Op cit, p527.
45. Gold, T. 1955. Op cit, p527.
46. Putnam, W C. 1964. Geology (New York), xii + 480pp; see p8.
47. Putnam, W C. 1964. Op cit, pp8–9.
48. Putnam, W C. 1964. Op cit, pp8–9.
49. Scheidegger, A E. 1963. Principles of Geodynamics (Berlin), 362pp; see p50.
50. Putnam, W C. 1964. Op cit, pp11–12.
51. Scheidegger, A E. 1963. Op cit.
52. Putnam, W C. 1964. Op cit, p39.
53. Putnam, W C. 1964. Ibid.
54. Sabadini, R, D A Yuen & E Boschi. 1982. "Polar Wandering and the forced responses of a rotating, multilayered, viscoelastic planet", Journ Geophys Res, vol 87, pp2885–2903.
55. Stearns, H T, & W O Clark. 1930. "Geology and water resources of the Kau District, Hawaii", US geol Surv, Water Supply Paper 616.
56. Dyal, P, & C W Parkin. 1971. "The Magnetism of the Moon", Scient Am, (Aug), pp62–7.
57. Djuric, J. 1976. "Suggestions for an experiment with a unipolar generator and its bearing on the Earth's magnetic field", J Phys, D, Applied Phys, vol 9, pp2623–2637.
58. Erman, G A. 1803–4. "Kritische Beiträge zur atmosphärischen Electrometrie", Annln Phys, vol 15, pp385–418; see p386.
59. Djuric, J. 1976. "Suggestions for an experiment with a unipolar generator and its bearing on the Earth's magnetic field", J Phys, D, Applied Phys, vol 9, pp2623–2637.
60. Djuric, J. 1976. Op cit.
61. Moore, A D. 1972. "Electrostatics", Scient Am, (March), pp44–59.
62. Juergens, R E. 1978. "Plasma in interplanetary space: reconciling celestial mechanics in Velikovskian catastrophism", pp148–165 in Velikovsky Reconsidered, Collective, (London), 274pp.
63. Tucker, R H, A H Cook, H M Iyer, F D Stacey. 1970. Global Geophysics (London), vi + 196pp; see p154.
64. Manley, H. 1949. "Palaeomagnetism", Sci News, (July), p44.
65. Runcorn, S K. 1955. "The Earth's Magnetism", Scient Am, (Sept), pp152–162.
66. Runcorn, S K. 1955. Op cit.
67. Runcorn, S K. 1955. Op cit.
68. Manley, H. 1949. Op cit, p59.
69. Anonymous. 1971. "A New Magnetic Reversal at 12,500 Years?", Nature, vol 234, p441.
70. Noel, M, D H Tarling. 1975. "The Laschamp Geomagnetic Event", Nature, vol 253, pp705–6.
71. Cox, A, & R R Doell. 1960. "Review of Palaeomagnetism", Bull Geol Soc Am, vol 71, pp645 et seq.
72. Verosub, K L. 1975. "Palaeomagnetic Excursions as Magnetostratigraphic Horizons: a cautionary note", Science, vol 190, pp48–50.
73. Fairbridge, R W. 1977. "Global Climatic Change during 13,500 BP Gothenburg Geomagnetic Excursion", Nature, vol 265, pp430–1.
74. Kennett, J P, N D Watkins. 1970. "Geomagnetic Polarity Change, volcanic maxima and faunal extinction in the South Pacific", Nature, vol 227, pp930–4.
75. Kennett, J P, N D Watkins. 1970. Op cit.
76. Chamberlin, R T. 1937. "The Origin and History of the Earth", in The World and Man, edited by F R Moulton (Univ Chicago Press), xix + 533 pp; see p87.
77. Suess, E. 1904. The Face of the Earth, 2 vols. (London), see vol 1, pp17–8.
78. Barnes,T G. 1977. "Recent Origin and Decay of the Earth's Magnetic Field", Review, vol 2, pp42–46.
79. Smith, B A et al. 1986. "Voyager 2 in the Uranian System: Imaging Science Results", Science, vol 233, pp43–64; see p58.
80. Velikovsky, I. 1950. Worlds in Collision (London), xxi + 401pp; see chap 5.
81. Sagan, C. 1977. "An Analysis of Worlds in Collision", pp41–104 in Scientists Confront Velikovsky edited by D Goldsmith, (Ithaca & London), 184pp.
82. Sagan, C. 1977. Op cit, App 2 "Consequences of a Sudden Deceleration of the Earth's Rotation", pp99–100.
83. Sagan, C. 1977. Op cit, p64.
84. Sagan, C. 1977. Op cit, p65.
85. Urey, H C. 1973. "Cometary Collisions and Geological Periods", Nature, vol 242, p32.
86. Mulholland, J D. 1977. "Movements of Celestial Bodies – Velikovsky's Fatal Flaw" in Scientists Confront Velikovsky edited by D Goldsmith, (Ithaca & London), 184pp; see pp105–106.
87. Bellamy, H S. 1945. In the Beginning God (London), 212pp; see p133.
88. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Moons, Myths and Man (London), 351pp; see pp127–8.
89. Scheidegger, A E. 1963. Op cit, pp160–1.
90. Patten, D W. 1966. The Biblical Flood and the Ice Epoch (Seattle), xvi + 336pp; see p66.
91. Gamow, G. 1960. Biography of the Earth (New York), 242pp.
92. Scheidegger, A E. 1963. Op cit.
93. Patten, D W. 1966. Op cit, p67.
94. Herman, Y (ed). 1974. Marine Geology and Oceanography of the Arctic Sea (New York), 376pp; see p100.
95. Knaack, G. 1884–6. Article on Phaeton in Lexicon der Griechisch-Romischen Mythologie edited by W Roscher, 2 vols, (Leipzig).
96. Engelhardt, W V. 1979. "Phaetons Sturz – Ein Naturereignis?", Sber heidelb Akad Wiss Math, nat Kl, 2Abh.

97. Kennett, J P, & N D Watkins. 1970. Loc cit.
Smylie, D E & L Mansinha. 1968. "Earthquakes and the observed motion of the Rotation Pole", J Geophys Res, vol 73, pp7661–7673.

98. Hays, J D, J Imbrie & N J Shackleton. 1976. "Variations in the Earth's orbit: Pacemaker to the Ice Ages", Science, vol 194, pp1121–1132.

99. Lambeck, K. 1980. The Earth's Variable Rotation: Geophysical Causes and Consequences (Cambridge), xi + 449pp.
Munk, W H, & G J F MacDonald. 1960. The Rotation of the Earth: a Geophysical Discussion (Cambridge), 323pp.

100. Hays, J D, J Imbrie & N J Shackleton. 1976. Loc cit.

101. Lehman, S. 1993. "Climate Change: Ice Sheets, Wayward Winds and Sea Change", Nature, vol 365, issue 6442 (Sept 9th), pp108–110.
Nakiboglu, S M, & K Lambeck. 1980. "Deglaciation Effects of the Rotation of the Earth", Geophys J, vol 62, pp49–58.

102. Lambeck, K, & A Cazenave. 1976. "Long Term Variations in Length of Day and Climate Change", Geophys J, vol 46, p555–573.
Kuttzbach, J E, & P J Guetter. 1986. "The Influence of Changing Orbital Parameters and Surface Boundary Conditions in Climate Simulations for the past 18,000 Years", J Atmosph Sci, vol 43, pp1726–1759.
Imbrie, J, & J Z Imbrie. 1980. "Modelling the Climatic Response to Orbital Variations", Science, vol 207, pp943–953.

103. Kutzbach, J E, & B L Otto-Bleisner. 1982. "The Sensitivity of the African-Asian Monsoonal Climate to Orbital Parameter changes for 9,000 years BP in a low-resolution general circulation model", J Atmosph Sci, vol 39, pp1177–1188.

104. Redfern, M. 1991. "Climate and Climate Change", Science & Public Affairs, vol 6, pt 3, pp53–63; see p55.

105. Morrison, L V. 1979. "Re-determination of the Decade Fluctuations in the Rotation of the Earth in the period 1861–1978", Geophys J, vol 58, pp349–360.

106. Rochester, M G. 1984. "Causes of Fluctuations in the Rotation of the Earth", Phil Trans Roy Soc Lond, vol A313, pp95–105.

107. Hide, R. 1977. "Towards a Theory of Irregular Variations in the length of Day and Core-Mantle Coupling", Phil Trans Roy Soc Lond, vol A284, pp547–554.

108. Jeans, J H. 1945. The Stars in their Courses (Cambridge), xii + 199pp; see p17.

109. Mandelbrot, B B, & K McCamy. 1970. "On the Secular Pole Rotation and the Chandler Wobble", Geophys J Roy Astr Soc, vol 21, pp217–232.
Guinot, B. 1972. "The Chandlerian Wobble from 1900–1970", Astr Astrophys, vol 19, pp207–214.
Smith, M L. 1977. "Wobble and Nutation of the Earth", Geophys J Roy Astro Soc, vol 52.
Dahlen, F A. 1979. "The Period of the Chandler Wobble", Geophys J Roy Astro Soc, vol 52.
Chao, B F, W P O'Connor, A T C Chang, D K Hall & J L Foster. 1987. "Snow-Load Effect on the Earth's Rotation and Gravitational Field, 1979–1985", J Geophys Res, vol 92, pp9415–9422.

110. Barnes, R T H, R Hide, A A White & C A Wilson. 1983. "Atmospheric Angular Momentum Fluctuations, Length-of-Day Changes and Polar Motion", Proc Roy Soc Lond, vol A387, pp31–73.
Wilson, C R & R A Haubrich. 1976. "Atmospheric Contribution to the Excitation of the Earth's Wobble, 1901–1970", Geophys J Roy Astr Soc, vol 46, pp745–761.

111. Dicke, R H. 1969. "Average Acceleration of the Earth's Rotation and the Viscosity of the Deep Mantle", J Geophys Res, vol 74, pp5895–5902.

112. Yatskiv, Y S, & T Sasao. 1975. "Chandler Wobble and Viscosity in the Earth's Core", Nature, vol 225, p655.

113. Dahlen, F A. 1971. "The Excitation of the Chandler Wobble by Earthquakes", Geophys J Roy Astr Soc, vol 25, pp157–206.
Kanamori, H. 1976. "Are Earthquakes a Major Cause of the Chandler Wobble?", Nature, vol 262, pp254–255.
O'Connell, R J, & A M Dziewonski. 1976. "Excitation of the Chandler Wobble by large Earthquakes", Nature, vol 262, pp259–262.
Mansinha, L, D E Smylie and C H Chapman. 1979. "Seismic Excitation of the Chandler Wobble revisited", Geophys J, vol 50, no 1, pp1–17.

114. Lange, H O (transl). 1903. "Papyrus Ipuwer", Sber preuss Akad Wiss, p610.

115. Gardiner, A H. 1914. "New literary works from Ancient Egypt", J Egypt Archaeol, vol 1, pp100–6.

116. Lange, H O (transl). 1927. "Der Magische Papyrus Harris", K dansk Vidensk Selsk Skr, p58.

117. Bury, R G (transl). 1929. Plato Timaeus, (Cambridge), 635pp; see 43b, 43c.

118. Hastings, J. 1908–26. "Eschatology" in Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics, 13 vols, (Edinburgh & New York).

119. Anonymous. 1902–3. Revue des traditions populaires, vol xvii, p571.

120. Kropotkin, P. 1900. "Baron von Toll on New Siberia and the Circumpolar Tertiary Flora", Geogr J, vol xvi, (1), pp95–98.

121. Airy, G B. 1860. "Change of climate", Athenaeum, (Sept 22nd), p384.

122. Hill,E. 1878. "On the Possibility of Changes in the Earth's Axis", Geol Mag, ns, dec 2, vol v, pp262–6; see p265.

123. Wright, W B. 1937. The Quaternary Ice Age (London), xxv + 478; see p313.

124. Peltier, W R, & P Wu. 1983. "Continental Lithospheric Thickness and Deglaciation-induced True Polar Wander", Geophys Res Lett, vol 10, pp181–184.

125. Sabadini, R, D A Yuen & E Boschi. 1983. "Dynamical Effects from Mantle Phase Transitions on True Polar Wander during Ice Ages", Nature, vol 303, pp694–696.

126. Pauly, K A. 1952. "The Cause of the Great Ice Ages", Scient Mon, (August).
127. Sabadini, R, & W R Peltier. 1981. "Pleistocene Deglaciation and the Earth's Rotation: implications for mantle viscosity", Geophys J Roy Astr Soc, vol 66, pp553–578.
128. Jeffreys, H. 1929. The Earth, its origins, history, and physical constitution (Camb Univ Press), 2nd edn, ix + 346pp; see p303.
129. Jeffreys, H. 1929. Ibid.
130. Hobbs, W H. 1905. "The Correlation of Fracture Systems and the Evidence for Planetary Dislocations within the Earth's Crust", Trans Wis Acad Sci Arts Lett, vol xv, (Aug), pp15–19.
131. Vening Meinesz, F A. 1947. "Shear Patterns of the Earth's Crust", Trans Am geophys Union, vol 28, no 1, pp1–61.
132. Lambeck, K. 1980. The Earth's Variable Rotation (Cambridge), ix + 346pp; see p271.
133. Lambeck, K. 1980. Ibid.
134. Jeans, J. 1945. Op cit, p50.
135. Hopkins, J. 1980. Glossary of Astronomy and Astrophysics, 2nd rev edn, (Chicago), x + 196pp; see p196.
136. Zeilik, M, & E v P Smith. 1987. Introduction to Astronomy and Astrophysics, 2nd edn (Philadelphia), viii + 503pp; see p4.
137. Hopkins, J. 1980. Op cit, p56.
138. Deils, H. 1929. Doxographi Gracci (Berlin), x + 854pp; see pp340–341.
139. Illingworth, V (ed). 1985. Macmillan Dictionary of Astronomy, 2nd edn (London), 437pp; see p423.
140. Bullabh, R. 1962. "Research in Ancient Indian Mathematics and Astronomy in India", Isis, vol 53, pp502–504.
141. Roy, A E, & D Clarke. 1982. Astronomy: Principles and Practice, 2nd edn (Bristol), xvi + 342pp; see p58.
142. Gehrels, T (ed). 1979. Asteroids (Univ Arizona Press); see pp253–283.
143. Gallant, R. 1964. The Bombarded Earth (London), 256pp; see p59.
144. McKinnon, W B. 1993. "Vestal Voyagers Unveiled", Nature, vol 363, issue 6426 (20th May), pp211–213; see pp211–212.
145. Bell, J F, D R Davies, W K Hartmann & M J Gaffey. 1989. In Asteroids II, ed by R P Binzel, T Gehrels & M S Matthews (Univ Arizona Press).
146. Binzel, R P, & S Xu. 1993. "Chips off of Asteroid 4 Vesta: Evidence for the Parent Body of Basaltic Achondrite Meteorites", Science, vol 26, pp186–191.
147. McKinnon, W B. 1993. Loc cit; see p211.
148. Bailey, M E, S V Clube, W M Napier. 1986. "The Origin of Comets", Vistas in Astronomy, vol 29, pp53–112; see p102.
149. Clube, V, & W Napier. 1982. The Cosmic Serpent (London), 299pp; see p133.
150. Opik, E J. 1970. "Comets and the formation of planets", Moon, vol 1, pp487–493.
     Opik, E J. 1975. "Comets and planets, their interrelated origin", Irish Astron, vol 12, pp1–48.
151. Van Flandern, T C. 1978. "A former asteroidal planet as the origin of comets", Icarus, vol 36, pp51–74; see p51.
152. Brandt, J C (ed). 1981. "Comets", (San Francisco), Scient Am, p29.
153. Brandt, J C (ed). 1981. Op cit, p36.
154. Brandt,J C (ed). 1981. Op cit, p31.
155. Clube, V, & W Napier. 1982. Op cit, p133.
156. Brandt, J C (ed). 1981. Op cit; see p36.
157. Clube, V, & W Napier. 1982. Op cit, p134.
158. Brandt,J C (ed). 1981. Op cit, pp35.
159. Brandt,J C (ed). 1981. Op cit, p37.
160. Brandt,J C (ed). 1981. Op cit, p30.
161. Brandt,J C (ed). 1981. Op cit, p30.
162. Brandt, J C (ed). 1981. Op cit, p53.
163. Brandt,J C (ed). 1981. Op cit, p30.
164. Middlehurst, B M, G P Kuiper (eds). 1963. The Moon, Meteorites and Comets (Univ Chicago Press), pp357–393.
165. Mebane, A D. 1956. "Observations of the great fireball procession of 1913, Feb 9th, made in the United States", Meteoritics, vol 4, pp405–421.
166. Harwitt, M. 1967. "The Cloud of Interplanetary Boulders", NASA Sp Publ No:150, pp307–313.
167. Kellaway, G A, & E M Durrance. 1978. "Circular structures of large scale and great age on the Earth's surface", Nature, vol 273, p75.
     Saul, J M. 1978. "Circular structures of large scale and great age on the Earth's surface", Nature, vol 271, pp345–9.
168. Gallant, R. 1964. Ibid.
     Savage, H. 1982. The Mysterious Carolina Bays (Univ Carolina Press), 121pp.
169. Middlehurst, B M, & G P Kuiper (eds). 1963. The Moon, Meteorites and Comets (Univ Chicago Press), see p393.
170. Gallant, R. 1964. Op cit, p41.
171. Gallant, R. 1964. Op cit, fig 3 opp p32.
172. O'Keefe, J D & T J Ahearns. 1986. "Oblique Impact: A process for obtaining meteorite samples from other planets", Science, vol 234, pp346–9.
173. Van Flandern, T C. 1978. Op cit; see p51.
174. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p84.
175. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Ibid.
176. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p85.
177. Kennon, W L. 1948. Astronomy (Boston), vii + 737pp; see p368.
178. Kennon, W L. 1948. Op cit.
179. Smith, B A, et al. 1982. "A New Look at the Saturn System: the Voyager 2 images", Science, vol 215, (Jan), pp504–537.
180. Oro, J, & J Han. 1966. "High Temperature Synthesis of Aromatic Hydrocarbons from Methane", Science, vol 153, pp1393–5.
181. Smith, P V. 1952. "The occurrence of hydrocarbons in Recent sediments from the Gulf of Mexico", Science, vol 116, pp437–9.
182. Wilson, A T. 1962. "Origin of Petroleum and the composition of the Lunar Maria", Nature, vol 196, pp11–13.
183. Jeans, J H. 1946. The Universe Around Us, 4th edn (Cambridge), x + 297pp; see p273.
184. Durrani, S A, & H A Khan. 1971. "Ivory Coast Microtektites: fission-track age and geomagnetic reversals", Nature, vol 232, pp320–322.

185. Ness, N F et al. 1986. "Magnetic Fields at Uranus", Science, vol 233, pp85–9; see p89.
186. Davies, J. 1986, "Voyage to the tilted planet", New Scientist, vol 109, no 1492, pp39–42.
187. Saul, J M. 1978. "Circular structures of large scale and great age on the Earth's surface", Nature, vol 271, pp345–9.
188. Binder, A B. 1966. "Mariner IV: Analysis of preliminary reports", Science, vol 152, pp1053– 1055.
189. Binder, A B. 1966. Op cit.
190. Hartman, W K, S M Larson. 1967. "Angular Momenta of Planetary Bodies", Icarus, vol 7, pp257–260.
191. Fish, F F jr. 1967. "Angular Momenta of the Planets", Icarus, vol 7, pp251–6.
192. Gehrels, T (ed). 1979. Asteroids (Univ Arizona Press); see pp253–283.
193. Sears, D W. 1978. The Nature and Origin of Meteors (Bristol), 187pp; see pp161–2.
194. Kuiper, G P, B M Middlehurst (eds). 1961. Planets and Satellites (Chicago Univ Press), xx + 601pp; see pp576–7.
195. Roemer, E. 1961. "Astrometric observations and orbits of comets", Astron Jl, vol 66, pp368–371; see p368.
196. Jewitt, D, & J Luu. 1993. "Discovery of the Candidate Kuiper Belt object 1992 QB", Nature, vol 362, issue 6422, pp730–732.
197. Sears, D W. 1979. "Did Iron Meteorites form in the asteroid belt? Evidence from thermodynamic models", Icarus, vol 40, p471.
198. Van Flandern, T C. 1978. "A former asteroidal planet as the origin of comets", Icarus, vol 36, pp51–74; see p51.
199. Ovenden, M W. 1972. "Bode's Law and the Missing Planet", Nature, vol 239, pp508–9; see p508.
200. Oikawa, S, E Everhart. 1979. "Past and Future Orbit of 1977 UB, object Chiron", Astron Jl, vol 84, p134.
201. Forward, R L. 1962. "Pluto, Last Stop Before the Stars", Sci Digest, (Aug), p73.
202. Clube, V, & W Napier. 1982. Op cit, p134.
203. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p85.
204. Mulholland, J D. 1977. "Movements of Celestial Bodies – Velikovsky's Fatal Flaw", pp105–115 in Scientists Confront Velikovsky edited by D Goldsmith, (Ithaca & London), 184pp; see p114.
205. Mulholland, J D. 1977. Op cit, p114.
206. Patten, D W. 1966. Op cit, p287.
207. Sekanina, Z. 1968. "On the Perturbations of comets by nearby stars", Bull Astron Inst Czch, vol 19, pp291–301.
208. Clube, V, & W Napier. 1982. Op cit, p134.
209. Clube, V, & W Napier. 1982. Ibid.
210. Clube, V, & W Napier. 1982. Ibid.
211. Clark, D H, W H McCrea, J R Stephenson. 1977. "Frequency of nearby supernovae and climatic and biological catastrophes", Nature, vol 265, pp318–9.
212. Milne, D K. 1979. "A new catalogue of galactic SNRs corrected for distance from the galactic plane", Aust J Phys, vol 32, pp83–92.
213. Brackenridge,G R. 1981. "Terrestrial Palaeoenvironmental Effects of a late Quaternary-Age Supernova", Icarus, vol 16, pp81–93.
214. Brackenridge,G R. 1981. Op cit.
215. Brackenridge, G R. 1981. Op cit.
216. Kuiper, G P. 1951. In Astrophysics, ed by J A Hynek (New York), xii + 708pp; see pp357–424.
217. Rackham, H (transl). 1938. Pliny, the Elder, Natural History (London); see vol ii, p91.
218. Rockenbach, A. 1602. De cometis tractatus novus methodicus (Wittenberg), no pagination.
    Müller, P. 1619. De Cometâ anni M.DC.XVIII commentatis physicomathematica. Accessit A. Rockenbachi Tractatus de Cometis, 2 parts (Lipps), no pagination.
219. Avenius, R. 1788. Orbis Terrae, transl by J Schraderi, (Altenburg).
220. Gorion, M J ben. 1919. Sagen Juden, 5 vols, (Frankfurt).
221. Darmesteter, J (transl). 1883. Zend Avesta: The Vendidad (Oxford); see pt 11, p95.
222. Bancroft, H,H. 1875–6. The Native Races of the Pacific States of North America, 5 vols, (London); see vol 3, p149.
223. Maurice, T. 1799. The Ancient History of Hindustan, 2 vols, (London); see vol 1, p304.
224. Legge, J (transl). 1876. "The Annals of the Bamboo Books", vol 3, pt 1 of The Chinese Classics (Hong Kong); see p112.
225. Powell, J W. 1879. "Sketch of the Mythology of the North American Indians", Pop Sci Mon, p799.
226. Nadaillac, M de 1885. Pre-Historic America (London), xii + 566pp; see p530.
227. Poor, L E. 1880. Sanskrit and Kindred Literature: Studies in Comparative Mythology (Boston), iv + 468pp; see p144.
228. Poor, L E. 1880. Op cit, p158.
229. Book of Revelations. Chaps 6–10 and 12.
230. Book of Revelations. Chap 20.
231. Isaiah. Chap xxvii, 1.
232. Isaiah. Chap li, 9.
233. Psalms. Chap lxxxix, 10.
234. Psalms. Chap lxxiv, 13.
235. Morris, R W B. 1977. The Prehistoric Rock Art of Argyll (Poole), 128pp.
236. Hadingham, E. 1975. Circles and Standing Stones (London), 240pp.
237. Thom, A, & A S Thom. 1977. "Rings and Menhirs: Geometry and Astronomy in the Neolithic Age", chap 2 of In Search of Ancient Astronomies, ed by E C Krupp (New York).
    Wood, J E. 1978. Sun, Moon and Standing Stones (Oxford).
    Brennan, M. 1983. The Stars and the Stones: Ancient Art and Astronomy in Ireland (London).
238. Stooke, P J. 1994. "Neolithic Lunar Maps at Knowth and Baltinglass, Ireland", J Hist Astr, vol xxv, pp39–55.
239. Heggie, D C. 1981. Megalithic Science: Ancient Mathematics and Astronomy in North-West Europe (London).

240. Oldfather, C H (transl) 1933. Diodorus Siculus Library of History (London), ii, 31.
241. Geminus. 1630. Uranologion Introduction aux Phenomenons (Paris), 424 + 338pp.
242. Langdon, S. 1912. Tablets from the Archives of Drehem (Paris), 25pp.
243. Jeremias, A. 1913. Handbuch der Altorientalischen Geisteskultur (Lepizig), 218pp.; see p.133.
244. Hilprecht, H V. 1893–1911. The Babylonian Expedition of the University of Pennsylvania (Philadelphia), vol 20, ser.A (1906); see p31.
245. Sarton, G. 1955. "Chaldean Astronomy of the last three centuries BC", J Am Orient Soc, vol 75, pp166–173; see p167.
246. Neugebauer, O. 1955. Astronomical Cuneiform Texts, 2 vols, (Princeton); see vol I, p11; vol II, p281.
247. Sykes, E. 1952. Everyman's Dictionary of Non-Classical Mythology (London), xviii + 262pp; see p71.
248. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p178.
249. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p179.
250. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p96–7.
251. Book of Job. Chap xli, 32.
252. Stothers, R B. 1984. "Mass Extinctions and Missing Matter", Nature, vol 311, p17.
253. Smith, G. 1876. The Chaldean Account of Genesis (London), xvi + 319pp.
254. King, L W (ed). 1902. The Seven Tablets of Creation (London), 2 vols.
255. Farnell, L R. 1919–1920. "The value and methods of mythological study", Proc Br Acad; see p47.
256. Sykes, E. 1952. Op cit, p85.
257. Sykes, E. 1952. Op cit, p157.
258. Ovenden, M W. 1972. Loc cit.
259. Van Flandern, T C. 1978. Loc cit.
260. Opik, E J. 1978. "The Missing Planet", Moon and Planets, vol 18, pp327–337.
261. Sykes, E. 1952. Op cit, pp18, 58, 69.
262. Sykes, E. 1952. Op cit, p69.
    Dalley, S. 1989. Myths from Mesopotamia: Creation, The Flood, Gilgamesh and Others (Oxford), xx + 337pp; see pp238–239 where Kingu is spelt Qingu.
263. Collective. 1962. The Torah (Jewish Publishing Society of America: New York), see Psalms 19, 1.
264. Collective. 1962. The Torah, see Psalms 19, 6.
265. Way, A S (transl). 1912–1916. Euripides Electra (London), 11, 727ff.
266. Velikovsky, I. 1950. Op cit, chap 5.
267. Mulholland, J D. 1977. Op cit, p114.
268. Morrison, D. 1977. "Planetary Astronomy and Velikovsky's Catastrophism", pp145–176 in Scientists Confront Velikovsky edited by D Goldsmith, (Ithaca & London), 184pp; see p154.
269. Gehrels, T (ed). 1976. Jupiter (Tucson); see contributions of R G Prinn and T Owen (p319), and S T Ridgway, H P Lawson, and U Fink (p384).
270. Morrison, D. 1977. Op cit, pp154–5.
271. Hansen, J E (ed). 1975. "The Atmosphere of Venus", NASA Space Publ No: 382; see contribution by M J S Belton, p114.
272. Martonchik, J V. 1974. "Sulfuric Acid cloud interpretation of the infrared spectrum of Venus", Astrophys J, vol 193, pp495–501.
    Young, A T. 1973. "Are the Clouds of Venus Sulfuric Acid?", Icarus, vol 18, pp564–582.
273. Morrison, D. 1977. Op cit, p155.
274. Morrison, D. 1977. Op cit, p159.
275. Morrison, D. 1977. Op cit, pp160–6.
276. Robert, C (ed). 1878. Eratosthenes (Weidmannos), 254pp.
277. Darmesteter, J (transl). 1883. Zend Avesta: The Vendidad (Oxford); see pt 11, p93.
278. Wieger, L. 1922–23. Textes historique, 2nd edn; 3 vols, (Hienhiem), see vol. 1, p50.
279. Hertel, J. 1935. "Der Planet Venus in Avesta", Ber Sächsischen Akad d Wiss phil hist Klasse, vol lxxxvii.
280. West, E W (transl) 1880. "Pahlavi Texts: The Bundahish", in The Sacred Books of the East, (Oxford); see chap 3, sect 19–25.
281. Harlez, C de (transl). 1891. Textes Taoistes (Paris), vii + 391pp; see Hoei-nan-tze.
282. Spence, L. 1907. The Mythologies of Ancient Mexico and Peru (London), 80pp; see p13.
283. Sahagun, B de. 1932. A History of Ancient Mexico, translated by F R Bandelier, (1932: Fisk Univ Press); see p25.
284. Sahagun, B de. 1926. Historia general de las cosas de la Nueva Espana, 3 vols, (Madrid); see vol III, chap 1, sec 2.
285. Murray, A T (transl) 1924–5. Homer The Iliad (London), Bks v, xx, xxi.
286. Buckley, T W A (transl). 1899. The Odyssey of Homer with the Hymns (New York), xxx + 432pp; see p399.
287. Langdon, S. 1914. Tammuz and Ishtar (Oxford), vii + 196pp; see p67.
288. Tolson, R H et al. 1978. "Viking first encounter with Phobos: Preliminary Results", Science, vol 199, pp61–4.
289. Rose, L E, & R C Vaughan. 1976. Velikovsky and the Sequence of Planetary Orbits; pp119–143 in S L Talbot (ed); see p138.
290. Rose, L E, & R C Vaughan. 1976. Op cit, pp138–9.
291. West, E W (transl) 1880. Pahlavi Texts: The Bundahish, in The Sacred Books of the East, (Oxford), chap 5 sect 1.
292. Darmesteter, J (transl). 1883. Op cit, pp94ff.
293. Boklen. E 1903. "Die Sintflutsage. Versuch einer neuen Eridarung", Archiv. fur Religionswiss., vol 6, pp1–61, 97–150p; vp40.
294. Frazer, J G 1919. Folklore in the Old Testament, 3 vols. (London), v. vol 1, p227.
295. Mason, B 1962. Meteorites (New York), xii + 368pp.
296. Stern, S A 1995. "Chiron Illuminated", Nature, vol 373, pp23–24; vp23.
297. Tollmann, A, and E Tollmann. 1993. Und die Sintflut gab es doch (Munchen), 560pp; vp210.
298. Budge, E A W, and L W King. 1902. Annals of the Kings of Assyria: the cuneiform texts with translations, transliterations, etc. from the original documents in the British Museum (London), lxxvi + 300pp; see p xxi.

Budge, E A W 1921. The Babylonian Legends of Creation, and the Fight between Bel and the Dragon, as told by Assyrian Tablets from Nineveh" (London), 68pp; see p1.

299. Bellamy, H S 1936. Op cit, pp170–171.
Leach, M (ed.) 1951. Standard Dictionary of Folklore, Mythology, and Legend, 2 vols. (New York); see pp323–324, 677.
300. Heidel, A 1951. The Babylonian Genesis, the Story of Creation, 2nd. edn. (Chicago), x + 153pp; see p101.
301. Sykes, E 1952. Everyman's Dictionary of Non-Classical Mythology (London), xviii + 262pp; see pp26, 32, 140.
302. Meissner, B 1920. Babylonien und Assyrien, 2 vols. (Heidelberg); see fig 78.
303. Kramer, S N 1944. "Sumerian Mythology: a study of spiritual and literary achievement in the Third Millennium B.C.", Amer. Philos. Soc. (Philadelphia), vol 21, xiv + 125pp; see pl xi, 2nd fig. from top, opp. p51.
304. Sarton, G 1927–1948. Introduction to the History of Science. 3 vols. (Baltimore), Carnegie Inst. Publ. no. 376; see vol 1, p71.
Neugebauer, O 1975. A History of Ancient Mathematical Astronomy, 3 vols. (Berlin and New York); see vol 1, p348.
305. Sarton, G 1954. The Study of the History of Mathematics, (New York), 113pp.
Neugebauer, O 1935. Mathematische Keilschrift Texte (Berlin), xii + 516pp.
306. Heath, T 1913. Aristarchus of Samos, the Ancient Copernicus (Oxford), vi + 425pp.
307. Hilprecht, H V 1906. Mathematical, Meteorological, and Chronological Tablets from the Temple Library of Nippur, Babyl.Exp.Univ.Pennsylv., vol 20, ser A, "Cuneiform Texts" Philadelphia), xvii + 70pp; see p34.
Sarton, G 1953–1959. A History of Science, 2 vols. (Cambridge, Mass.); see p71.
308. Moore, P. 1988. The Guiness Book of Astronomy, 3rd. edn. (London), 288pp; see p272.
Langdon, S H. Die Neu-Babylonischen Königsinschriften (Leipzig), vi + 376pp; see pp103-104.
Neugebauer, O. 1950. "The Alleged Babylonian Discovery of the Precession of the Equinoxes", Journ. Amer. Orient. Soc., pp1–18.
Sarton, G. 1955. "Chaldean Astronomy in the last Three Centuries B.C.", Journ. Amer. Orient. Soc., vol 75, pp166–173; see p169.
309. Neugebauer, O. 1955. Astronomical Cuneiform Texts, 3 vols, Inst. Adv. Stud. (Princeton); see vol 1, p38.
310. Hayes Ward, W. 1910. The Sea Cylinders of Western Asia, Carnegie Inst. (Washington), Publ. no: 100, xxxi + 428pp; see p384, fig. 51a.
311. Van Buren, E D. 1939–41. "The Seven Dots in Mesopotamian Art and Their Meaning", Archiv. Für Orientforschung, vol 13, pp277–289; see p283, fig. 13.
312. Sarton, G. 1927–1948. Ibid.
313. Hilprecht, H V 1906. Loc cit, pp34–35.
Sarton, G. 1953–1959. Op cit, p71.
314. Jeremias, A. 1909. Das Alter der Babylonischen Astronomie, Kampfe un den Alten Orient (Leipzig), 92pp; see pp73, 75.
315. Neugebauer, O. 1951. The Exact Sciences in Antiquity (Princeton, Copenhagen, Oxford), xvi + 191pp; see pp96, 98.
Epping, S.J. 1889. Astronomisches aus Babylon oder das Wissen der Chaldaër über den gestirnten himmel (Freiburg), ii + 190pp.; see pp109f.
Neugebauer, O. 1975. Op cit, vol 1, p351.
316. Sarton, G. 1955. Op cit, p167.
317. Neugebauer, O. 1951. Op cit, vol 1, pp136–139, 210a–212, vol 2, p279.
Sarton, G. 1955. Op cit, p166.
318. Neugebauer, O. 1951. Op cit, vol 1, p1.
319. Neugebauer, O. 1951. Op cit, vol 2, p281.
320. Jeremias, A. 1929. Handbuch der Altorientalischen Geisteskultur, 2nd. Edn. (Berlin and Leipzig), xviii + 508pp; see pp228-235.
Weidner, E F 1914. Alter und Bedeuten der Babylonien Astronomie under Astrallehre Nebst Studien über Fixsternhimmel und Kalender, (Leipzig), iv + 96pp.
Brown, R jr. 1899 Researches into the Origins of the Primitive Constellations of the Greeks, Phoenicians and Babylonians, 2 vols. (London); see vol 1.
Whyte, C. 1928. The Constellations and their History (London); see pp4, 213.
321. Kugler, F X. 1909–1924. Sternkunde und Sterndienst in Babel, 2 vols., with the 1935 supplement (no: III) Erganzungen Zum, (Münster).
Weidner, E F. 1915. Handbuch der Babylonischen Astronomie (Leipzig), 146pp; see pp47, 76.
Hooke, S H. 1953. Babylonian and Assyrian Religion (London), xii + 128pp; see pp26-27.
Meissner, B. 1920. Op cit, vol 1, p408.
322. Sarton, G. 1952. A Guide to the History of Science (Waltham, Mass.), xviii + 316pp; see p295.
323. Dalley, S. 1989. Myths from Mesopotamia: Creation, The Flood, Gilgamesh, and Others (Oxford), xx + 337pp; see pp244, 246.
324. Speiser, E A. 1969. "Akkadian Myths and Epics", pp60–68 in J B Pritchard (ed.). Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, 3rd. edn., (Princeton), xvi + 395pp.
325. Rogers, R W. 1908. The Religion of Babylonia and Assyria, especially in its relations to Israel (London), xiv + 235pp; see p123.
326. King, L W. (ed.) 1902. Op cit, vol 1, p9.
327. Rogers, R W. 1908. Op cit, p110.
328. McSween, H Y jr. 1987. Meteorites and their Parent Planets (Cambridge), xii + 237pp; see pp71–72, fig3.3.

PART FIVE

ANATOMY OF A DISASTER

1

THE ANTEDILUVIAN WORLD

As demonstrated in Part One, the geological youthfulness of much of Earth's present land and submarine topography, together with the late existence of now-vanished landmasses and migratory routes, points unmistakably to the fact that, before the onset of the Phaeton cataclysm, world geography differed markedly from that now familiar to us.

Previously reviewed biological evidence also suggests that before that event Earth's climate was almost certainly more genial than at present, and was conducive to remarkable proliferation of plant and animal life – even in latitudes now decidedly polar. Luxuriant vegetation, clothing extensive tracts in all hemispheres, was home to a fauna infinitely richer and more abundant than that of today.

Also noted was the fact that such a regime could have existed only if Earth rotated more perpendicularly and, as emphasised in Part Five:4 on Earth Fracture, appreciably slower than today. Days must have been correspondingly longer virtually all the year round, and the seasons mainly undifferentiated climatically, especially in tropical and subtropical latitudes. Theoretically at least, the result would have been 'uniformitarian' conditions like those traditionally ascribed to the legendary 'Golden Age' alluded to earlier.

But the evolution and maintenance of such conditions necessarily involved several other important factors which, although individually the outcome of the regime itself, also collectively ensured its continued existence. We may infer with reasonable confidence that:

- Earth must have been a stable planet and had been so for a long span of geological time;
- The relative disposition of land and sea must have differed considerably from that of today;
- Mountains were lower and deserts, where they existed, were less extensive than their modern counterparts, while seas were generally shallower;
- Polar ice-caps, if they existed, must a priori have been of modest dimensions.

Momentarily assuming the validity of these inferences we can further deduce therefrom that drainage systems were generally sluggish and largely silt-free; that sedimentary surface deposits predominated; that such uplands as existed were ancient and eroded vestiges of once much higher features; that from long continuing natural dissolution caves and subterranean rivers were common wherever limestone strata existed. From this it may also be inferred that the atmosphere possessed more carbon dioxide and oxygen (one of the by-products of vigorous plant-cover) and more helium (see Part Five:3 on Collapsed Sky); that storms were comparatively infrequent; that a high humidity prevailed over much of the globe; that both night-time and day-time skies were relatively cloudless, high-altitude thin clouds being the norm; and that precipitation over most land areas must have consisted chiefly of heavy nightly dews.

Under such conditions vegetation inevitably proliferated vigorously, while the inferentially high volume of fertilising excrement deposited daily on land by huge coeval animal populations also undoubtedly played a major role in promoting this botanical luxuriance.

It was against this topographically and climatically different background that the Phaeton disaster commenced, and the collective experience of the human survivors of that event accumulated. Later, we shall see that this latter factor had a profound bearing on the ability of individual survivors to adjust to the drastically remodelled world into which they had been so roughly catapulted.

A mere handful of traditions exist which allude to what may be termed antediluvian geography. Interestingly these are essentially consistent not only with each other but also with the general world picture inferred above. Thus, the Lushai people of Assam state that before the Deluge their homeland had been level or plain-like, a physical condition also mentioned by such widely-sundered tribes as the Bununs of Formosa (Taiwan) and the Tsimshian tribe of British Columbia[1].

Other traditions, however, refer to a great 'world mountain' called Meru, so upland regions and various peaks evidently existed then as well. The Atlas mountains of northwest Africa, for instance, may be such a precataclysmic chain – with its south-western extremity and a sizable portion of the former adjacent African mainland now partially submerged below the eastern North Atlantic. Classical Greek references to antediluvian times contain vague references to an as yet unidentified antediluvian range known as the Riphaean Mountains. The possible location of these will be considered more fully shortly.

Again, if we admit the emotive cycle of Atlantis legends as valid but distorted memories of some bygone reality, a large island existed somewhere characterised by both lofty mountains and a wide plain. Furthermore, numerous Deluge legends refer specifically to mountains as sanctuaries for animal and human survivors, while as many others mention caves in or under mountains as places of refuge.

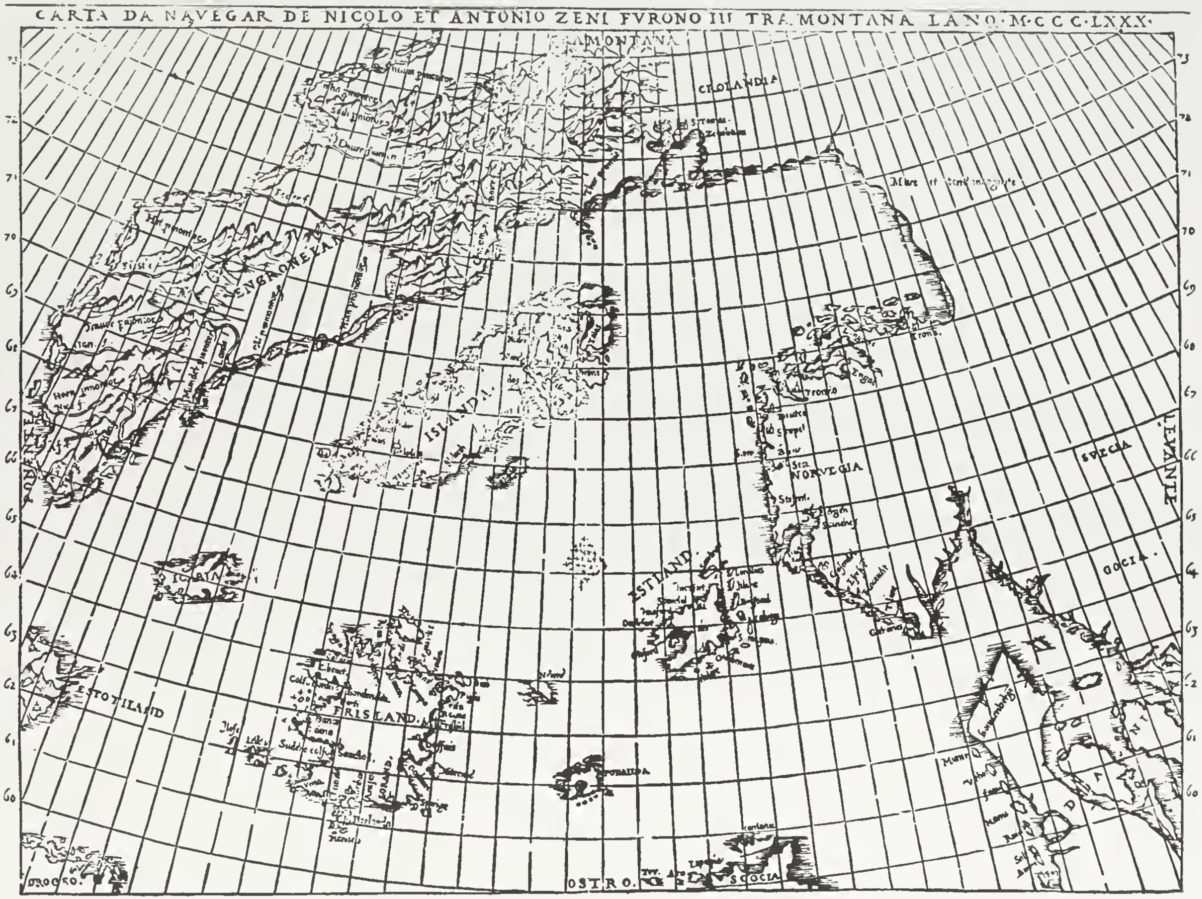
The survival in inland Borneo (Kalimantan) of certain topographical names which. according to the names assigned them, were anciently coastal features (capes, promontories etc), suggests that they also are fragmentary reminders of some long-vanished antediluvian coastline[2].

Thus, while some antediluvian coastlines were up-heaved and now lie far inland from present shores, others, together with their hinterland, were deeply submerged by the Phaeton calamity. Before that event, however, all marked the outlines of landmasses of very unfamiliar configuration.

The Mediterranean region generally and extensive areas of the North Atlantic were also apparently very different topographically before Phaeton's visit. Numerous living and recently extinct biota recorded from those regions testify strongly to this. The geographical distribution of the freshwater sponge (Heteromeyenia ryderi), presently confined to opposite sides of the North Atlantic and incapable of spreading except via freshwater habitats[3], is a case in point. Continuous land, having freshwater lakes and rivers, must have united these now widely-separated habitats until geologically recent times. In Part Two we instanced many further similar biological examples, which do not need detailing again here. Their collective testimony, however, is most eloquent.

From these and the many additional details cited earlier we may reasonably deduce that, under essentially genial climatic conditions, antediluvian land surfaces were generally rather flat or undulatory, and that cave-perforated uplands and eroded mountain systems existed in various districts. Certainly lakes and marshes existed in areas now devoid of those features, and the long axes of the oceans apparently ran in an east-west direction rather than the north-south direction that they do today.

But other evidence indicative of this vanished earlier geography also exists. It consists of some very unusual maps depicting unexpected information of special interest to us here. Space precludes our consideration of more than one of them – a truly remarkable map showing, among other things, an ice-free Greenland and what appears to be the now-sunken landmass of Fennoscandia. This map (map 5A), which along with many others of generally similar import is considered by us in another book, is generally



CARTA DA NAVEGAR DE NICOLO ET ANTONIO ZENI FVRONO III TRAMONTANA LANO·M·CCC·LXXX· TRAMONTANA
GROLANDIA
ENGRONELANT ISLAND
ESTLAND
NORVEGIA
SVECIA
GOCIA
LEVANTE
ICARIA
FRISLAND
ESTOTILAND
DROGEO
OSTRO
SCOCIA
PONENTE

Map 5A. Zeno map of the North. Map 29, "Nordenskiöld Facsimile Atlas", 1973, by permission of Dover Publishers Inc, New York.

known to scholars as the Zeno map, since it was compiled in 1380 AD from observations allegedly made by the Zeno brothers during a northern voyage they are reputed to have undertaken earlier that century.

The map's history is interesting. The original compilation lay unpublished until, in the 16th century, G Ruscelli, a descendant of the Zenos, discovered it among old family papers and printed it in 1558. This was followed by a revised copper-engraved version (1561–1558) which appeared in a Venetian edition of Ptolemy's celebrated 'world' atlas.

Although active around 150 AD, Ptolemy, an Egyptian whose main studies had been made at Alexandria, was still regarded by 16th century geographers as the foremost geographer of all time, and whose maps – updated sporadically by later scholars with the then-latest geographical discoveries and information – formed the basis of the atlas of the world (as then known) at the time in common use. The Venetian printing incorporating the Zeno map was one such edition. The map also appeared in other editions, but, as far as is known, was not seen by Ptolemy and probably never existed in his day in the version familiar to us, since this latter is itself a compilation of several older and quite separate cartographic documents. For that and other reasons several later cartographic authorities have regarded the map as entirely fictitious[4]. Others, however, have concluded that the map reveals the Zeno brothers to have been "honest and reliable observers"[5].

Notwithstanding such conflicting opinions, all published versions of the Zeno map depict Greenland, Iceland, Scandinavia and northern Scotland (Scotia) very clearly, yet simultaneously show several supposedly imaginary islands (Frisland, Icaria, Droggo etc) in the North Atlantic absent from modern maps of the same area, and portray Greenland united to Scandinavia by an extensive northern landmass.

Babcock suggested that the outline of Greenland on the published versions of this map may have been taken from an early map of the region by Claudius Clavus (1427) or from another by Donnus Germanus (1466), and that Frisland was meant to represent the Faeroes, Icaria the Shetlands, and Estotiland eastern Labrador[6]. Be that as it may, the Zenos showed Greenland unambiguously and provide it with an island-girt coastline virtually devoid of the fiords now so characteristic of it, and with named mountain ranges and rivers.

Today, Greenland has practically no rivers of any consequence – the courses of those which do exist are very short – and its mountains are all but buried under an enormous ice-cap which, in places, reaches a thickness of 6,000ft (1,850m).

At this juncture two problems confront us: firstly, in view of the possibly imaginary status of some of the islands on the Zeno map, can we accept as genuine the unexpected topographical details depicted on Greenland?; and secondly, how could surface features – rivers and mountain ranges – now deeply buried under huge accumulations of ice, have been mapped at all if, according to conventional hypothesis, Greenland has been ice-mantled for scores of millennia ever since the inception of the assumed 'Ice Age'? Apart from recalling our previous conclusion that no 'Ice Age' of the kind envisaged by orthodox glacialists apparently ever existed, it should be mentioned that the cartographic accuracy of the Zeno map has been investigated on several past occasions largely in connection with the original projections employed by the map's compilers.

Various cartographic authorities have drawn attention to the apparent lack of accuracy in the positioning of certain topographical features, for example Cape Farewell, which on the original map is at 65°N. (whereas it should be at 60°N.), and suggested that the whole of the coastline had simply been skirted by ancient mariners and mapped by using only the very primitive sailors' compass of that period[7]. This conclusion, of course, completely ignored the detailed hinterland of Greenland exhibited by the Zeno map.

It was, in fact, completely demolished when Hapgood, who undertook a detailed analysis of this and other early maps, found that when the polar projection and the reconstructed grid were applied to the Zeno map and oriented to the correct north, Cape Farewell was actually located at 59°N, 44°W (its true co-ordinates being 60°N, 44°W)[8]. This remarkable accuracy was repeated for four other geographical features on both the east and west coasts of Greenland and for others on the coasts of Iceland, Norway and western Europe, where bearings seldom deviated from the true by more than one degree, and often by less. Hapgood's investigations also revealed that the Zeno map was actually a compilation of four separate distinct maps drawn at different scales and oriented to different norths which had later been combined to make a larger map[9].

When placed on a reconstructed Polar projection (figs 5.2abcd), the relative longitudinal and latitudinal positions of identifiable features on the Zeno map turn out to be extraordinarily accurate, and show that

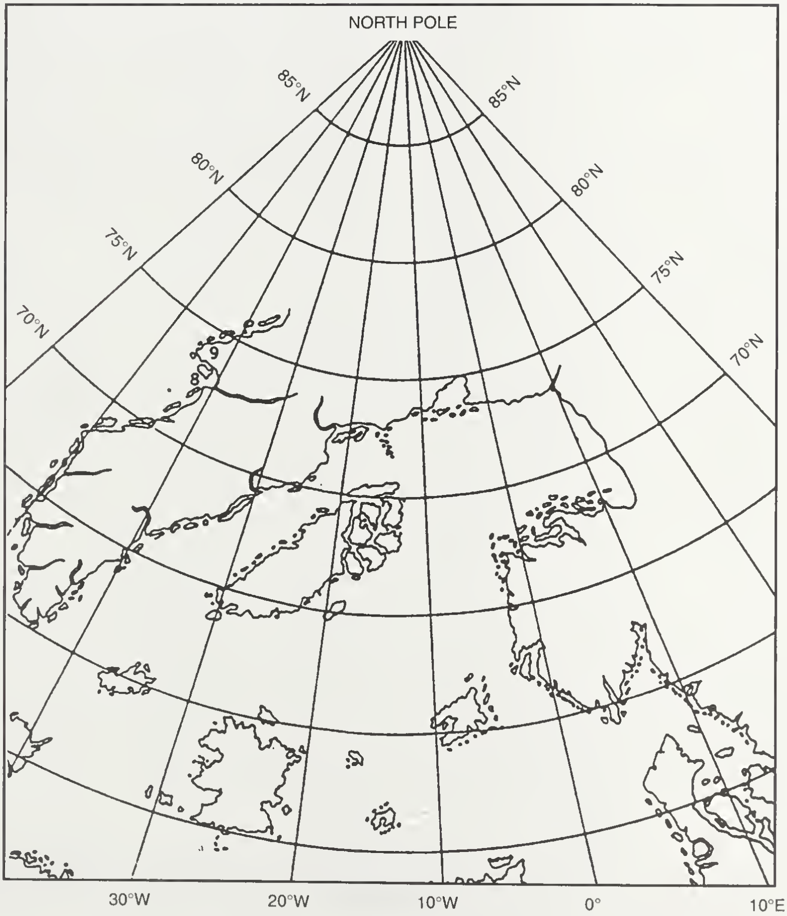

Fig 5.1. The Zeno map of AD 1390 plotted on a reconstructed polar projection. The latitudes of southern Greenland have been corrected but not the longitudes of its western coastline (see also fig 5.2).

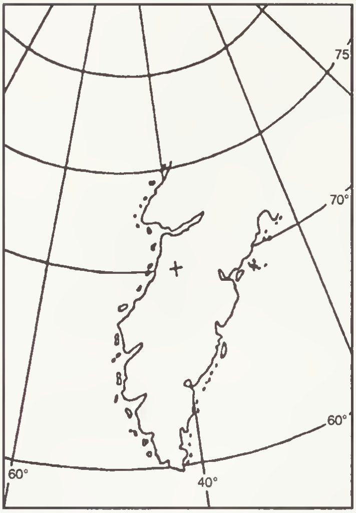
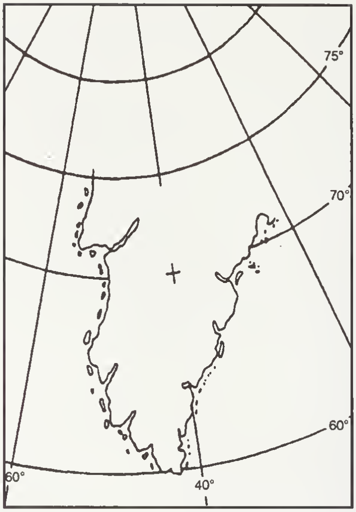


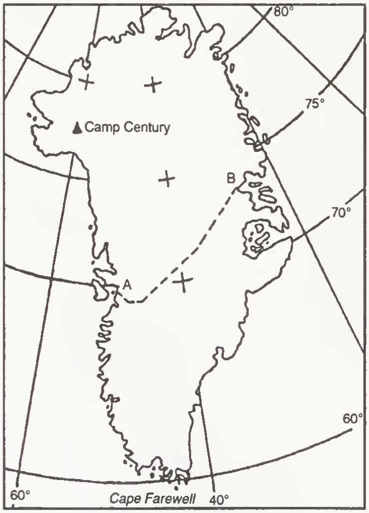
75
70°
60°
60°
40°
B

Fig 5.2a. Uncorrected western coastline of Greenland on the Zeno map.



75°
70°
60°
60°
40°

Fig 5.2b. Western coastline of Greenland on the Zeno map replotted to the correct degrees of longitude.



80°
75°
Camp Century
B 70°
A 60°
60°
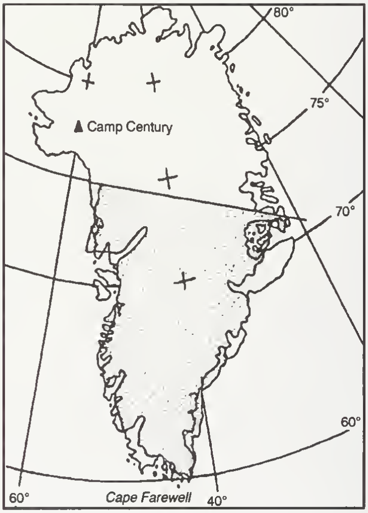
Cape Farewell
40°

Fig 5.2c. Modern map of Greenland showing Camp Century, and the line (A-B) of the seismic profile of the sub-ice topography (see fig 5.2e).



80°
75°
Camp Century
70°
60°
60°
Cape Farewell
40°

Fig 5.2d. Corrected version of the Zeno map of Greenland superimposed on a modern map of Greenland.

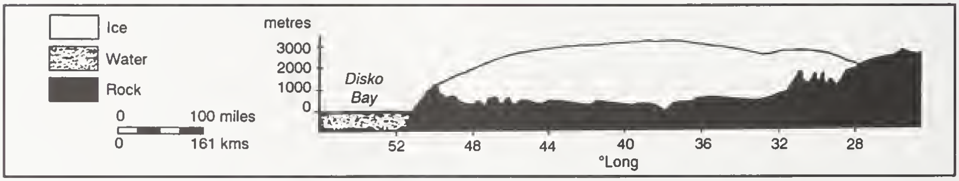


Fig 5.2e. Seismic profile across central Greenland (see fig 5.2c).

neither the Zeno map nor the four earlier maps from which it was compiled could have been drawn in the 14th century, when this type of projection was not used. Consequently, these maps and the information portrayed on them must date from much earlier times.

Compared with modern maps, however, the western coast (only) of Greenland on the Zeno map, even when placed on a reconstructed Polar projection, is found to be located 18.5° of longitude too far to the east. We have replotted the Zeno version of this coastline in its correct modern position (map 5.B) – that is, 18.5° further west – the resultant configuration of which (map 5.D) proves to be amazingly close to that of western Greenland today (map 5.C). Such close resemblances suggest that the rivers and mountains shown by the Zenos in the interior of Greenland are not, as some have speculated, purely imaginary features invented by medieval map makers. Closer examination of these details highlights some very significant facts.

The whole of Greenland slopes from east to west, with a belt of folded mountains having an average height of 7,000ft (2,150m) lying along the eastern seaboard. Greenland is also tilted from south to north, so that strata in the extreme south reach elevations of several thousand feet before abruptly plunging into the sea. The Zeno map appears to suggest precisely this topography.

The large central plain shown on the Zeno map is known to actually exist beneath the present ice-cap in the region indicated, and is apparently a portion of the crust now depressed below sea level by the enormous weight of the superincumbent ice[10].

In order to determine the age of the Greenland ice-cap, a borehole was sunk at Camp Century (77°N, 61°W), which reached bedrock at a depth of 4,705ft (1,387m). The contents of the extracted core was analysed using the theoretical age-depth scale from the 'glacier-flow' theory. This scale estimated that ice bored 3,705ft (1,140m) below the surface was probably 10,000 years old, while that at the very bottom of the core must be about 120,000 years old. This latter date is commonly accepted as the age of the Greenland ice-cap generally. From these details it was concluded that ice moving from the centre of Greenland would take 20,000 years to reach the west coast[11].

There are, however, reasons for doubting the validity of these estimated dates and of the methods used for interpreting the Camp Century core sample, for it has been established that ice streams off Greenland at the rate of some 100ft (30m) per day, that even over a broad shallow front of 21 miles (4km) the daily speed is still 9ft (3m), and that the ice-discharge from the huge Humboldt Glacier, with its 60 mile (96km) wide front, is 31ft (9.5m) a day[12]. This rate of flow is attributable to the fact that on floating away seawards a lack of friction between detached and still-descending ice-masses enables the speed of discharge to be higher than that of a mountain glacier, where such friction persists. Thus, the Mer de Glace on Mt Blanc only proceeds at 1.6ft (0.5m) a day. Furthermore, experiments conducted to establish the age of ice-layers which had moved from the centre to the coast of Greenland showed that the ice accomplished this in only 3,100 years[13]. Everything now points to the Greenland ice-cap being much younger than the 120,000 years estimated above.

The fact that northern Greenland was apparently never glaciated has already been emphasised. This is further confirmed by the dating of ground features found there and interpreted as being end moraines. These assumed moraines, which are associated with uplifted marine terraces 200ft (62m) above sea level, have proved to be only 8,000–6,000 years old. Indeed:

> No marginal moraines that are definitely older than Holocene have been found in northern Greenland[14].

The late age of these moraines reappears on the east Greenland coast, where examples are only between 11,000 and 9,500 years old; and then, on the west coast, both to the north and south of Disko Bay, upraised terraces show that the area was ice-free even before Holocene times. Other moraines at Taserqat date from some 10,000 years BP, at Avatdleq from 8,700 years BP, and those at Mt Keglen between 7,200 and 6,500 years BP[15].

It is certainly relevant that it was at Atanekerdluk, near Disko Bay, that, last century, an ancient tree, with a trunk "thicker than a man's body"[16], was found still standing erect on a hill at an elevation of 1,080ft (332m) by Capt Inglefield. Had this region ever been glaciated in the manner commonly supposed by orthodox glacialists, this tree could never have flourished, while if it was the remnants of a 'pre-glacial' tree, it would have been demolished and completely removed by the advancing ice of the supposed 'Ice Age'.

This is the conclusion already reached for so much of the present North Polar region – no significant quantities of ice existed there until after the Phaeton disaster. Thriving vegetation, including sizable trees, could reasonably be inferred as normal land-cover for territory featuring prominent rivers and mountains like those on the ice-free Greenland shown on the Zeno map.

Interestingly, expeditions made in the late 1940s to study the sub-glacial topography of Greenland produced seismic profiles showing not only the thickness of the ice but also the contours of the underlying land. This also confirmed the existence of the central flat plain depicted on the Zeno map[17].

The unexpected modernity of the moraines of northern Greenland – clearly accumulated by bygone glaciers -, the 'short' apparent period (3,100 years) needed by ice to move naturally from central Greenland to the coast, and Capt Inglefield's remarkable discovery of a long-dead erect tree in alleged 'glaciated' country at Atanekerdluk, are all details which, with several others mentioned earlier, suggest strongly that Greenland's present ice cover is an exceedingly youthful geographical feature – no more, perhaps, than 10,000–11,000 years old. If true, this means that the original field surveys embodied in the Zeno map may not, after all, be impossible. Man's ability to map ground features so early, and in such detail and with such accuracy is not as yet an achievement accorded him in orthodox history books – despite the stunningly advanced astronomical and mathematical knowledge obviously known to several of the oldest of all known civilisations (see especially section IV:15 on The Mesopotamian Connection. All these aspects are discussed in our forthcoming book The Maps which Leapfrogged History).

But a 'young' age for Greenland's ice-cover contrasts sharply with the 120,000 years estimated as the general age of ice at the bottom of the aforementioned Camp Century ice core. So also do the dates calculated for some of the lowest (oldest) ice cored recently at inland Greenland localities code-named Dye (1981), Renland (1987), GRIP and GSIP2 (1991–2)[18]. Collectively these indicate that the oldest ice averages around 100,000 years BP, while their general consistency with one another suggests that they cannot all be erroneous. A contradiction respecting the age of the Greenland ice-cover seemingly arises here. It would be reasonable to assume that one or other of these two sets of 'young' and 'old' dates is wrong, for surely they cannot both be right. Or can they?

Plotting of the geographical coordinates of the sites of the Camp Century, Dye, Renland, GRIP and GSIP2 cores on the 'corrected' Zeno Greenland (map 5.B) shows each positioned over or upon the flanks of mountainous terrain; and because these ranges are given specific names on the Zeno map, they must have been regarded as real ranges by someone at some distant time in the past. Today they are smothered under thick snow and ice.

Even in supposedly genial pre-cataclysmic times these lofty mountains must have naturally attracted some rainfall which, if the peaks were sufficiently high, would have fallen as sleet or snow (as on equatorial Mt Kilimanjaro today) and turned to ice on reaching actual land surfaces. The local development of glaciers – perhaps not of great size but certainly of great longevity, given the general stability of meteorological regimes then – even in such a benign era, would have been far from unnatural, and it may well be that 'old' ice studied at the bases of the above-mentioned cores is actually ancient glacier ice rather than ice indicative of a general glaciation at least 100,000 years old. The apparently incompatible ice dates and associated data from Greenland may thus not be contradictory after all, both these 'old' and 'young' sets being equally valid. Interestingly, if interpreted along these lines, neither jeopardises the main thesis advanced in this book, or the essential validity of the Zeno map's portrayal of Greenland.

Just conceivably these ice-blanketed mountains of Greenland are the aforementioned Riphaean Mountains of early Greek writers. Though possibly replete with glaciers, such once-accessible far distant ranges known via traditions from times so ancient that even the classical Greeks regarded them as legendary and no longer reachable, bespeaks of some now all but lost geographical knowledge first accumulated by an early forgotten race capable of land mapping ice-free (but now glaciated) regions to standards epitomised by the so-called Zeno map – the originals of which apparently antedate Greenland's present glacial regime.

While it might perhaps be imprudent here to pursue these lines of enquiry further, certain other aspects of the Zeno map also merit attention.

A further detail of the Zeno map concerns the absence of fiords presently characteristic of both the east and west coasts of Greenland. Although the map shows a heavily-indented Norwegian coastline and apparently emphasises an intricate archipelago along the northern Norwegian seaboard, neither the depicted bays and inlets nor the islands readily conform to Norway's present coastal topography. Additionally, the map fails to include the Scandinavian plateau which, in southern Norway, contains peaks as high as 8,000ft (2,450m) or more. This omission conceivably reflects a lack of data available to the Zeno brothers – or the map's Scandinavian sector is possibly unfinished. It is difficult to imagine that such topographical features would have been deliberately ignored or omitted had information about them been available.

Notwithstanding such possibilities, however, we have previously seen that the origin of the Greenland and Norwegian fiords apparently lies more with orogenic upheavals than with massive ice-sculpturing, and that it is unnecessary to ascribe great lengths of time to their formation by ice action. This conclusion accords well, of course, with what we have just learnt about the geologically youthful nature of the present Greenland ice-cap, and its inferred absence before Phaeton's lithospherically-disruptive visit.

It is interesting, therefore, that several authorities have recognised the geological modernity of the Scandinavian mountains, some even advocating a post-'glacial' (ie, early Holocene) uplift[19]. Forrest suggested that during the so-called 'Ice Age' they were less than 3,000ft (923m) high[20]. The fact that the Scandinavian uplands tilt downwards into the North Atlantic[21] also correlates with the previously discussed data respecting the geologically recent collapse of the old northern land of Fennoscandia which united North America and northern Europe. The Zeno map appears to show such a northern land-connection, not very dissimilar from that suggested from biological evidence by Scharff[22] and others over ninety years ago.

There are, therefore, apparently no genuine arguments for regarding the Zeno map – curious though it may seem to modern eyes – as portraying anything but that which actually once existed on Greenland in the not so very remote past. All in all, the Zeno map strongly suggests that it constitutes a precious record of a portion of antediluvian geography – a geography which initially formed the terrestrial backdrop to the celestial drama dominated by Phaeton, and which was largely destroyed and remodelled by that event.

It is upon the modus operandi and actual sequence of the events, which wrought such changes on Earth, that we must now focus attention.

2

CONFRONTATION

In Part Four we left Phaeton (Marduk) and its attendants departing from the vicinity of Mars and heading for Earth, with Phaeton beginning to discharge electromagnetic bolts ('lightning') at the Moon. The subsequent interactions between Phaeton's entourage and the Earth and Moon amounted to a confrontation of epic proportions. The gigantic physical changes sustained by Earth were both startling and sobering, and the accompanying annihilations not less so. At this juncture, however, we confine ourselves to merely outlining the main phases of this confrontation, reserving for later pages more detailed examination of the modus operandi of the calamity and the sequence of the different phases comprising it.

The enormous scale of this catastrophe and the relative positions of the participants as it unfolded are probably most simply conveyed by a series of schematic diagrams (fig 5.3ab, cd, ef). Primarily these show the changing relative positions of the principal antagonists at given phases of the drama, while almost certainly the participants moved, at least initially, on different orbital planes. In order to better comprehend the suggested sequence of events and the relevant interactions involved, each diagram has been provided with a brief commentary tracing the most likely developments or those which can be inferred as having almost certainly occurred. Generally speaking, these formed an identifiable chain reaction.

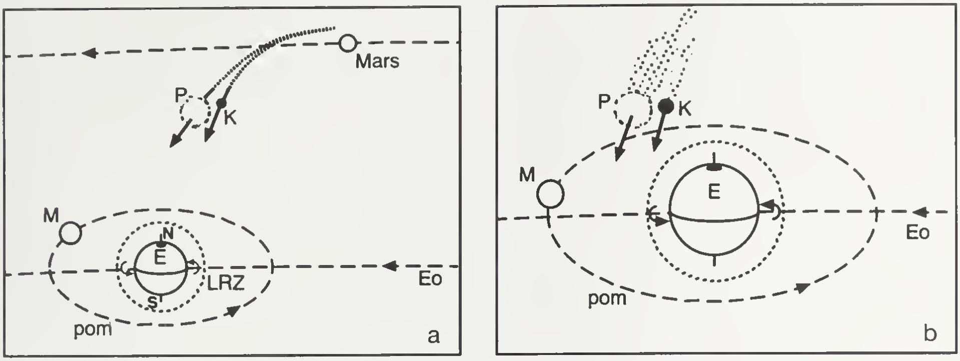
We have previously noted that the Moon appears to have formerly circled Earth more closely than it does today – probably at no very remote time either. Fig 5.3a shows the Moon moving along this nearer orbit round an Earth spinning from west to east on a nearly vertical axis. Phaeton and the smaller Kingu approach the Earth/Moon system from the direction of Mars on their disruptive journey. For the sake of clarity, the minor but still dangerous lesser objects accompanying Phaeton and Kingu are omitted from this and the following diagrams.

Special note should also be taken of the Roche zone shown enveloping Earth. In due course, we shall see how the zone played a very important part towards the later stages of the Phaeton disaster.

Fig 5.3b, which represents a temporal interval of several days, shows a still largely unchanged Earth circled by the Moon on its pre-catastrophic orbit, but with Phaeton and Kingu now nearing Earth as they attempt to fly past the Earth/Moon system on their sunwards journey. Electromagnetic exchanges between all these bodies would have steadily increased from this point, resulting in an electrically enhanced terrestrial atmosphere, an intensification of magnetic storms, and a general rise in the temperatures of both Earth's atmosphere and hydrosphere.

Ancient Persian traditions are especially noteworthy in mentioning that Phaeton (Tistrya or Tistar) repeatedly changed shape as it approached Earth. Thus, for ten nights Tistrya moved "with light in the shape of a man", that for the next ten nights it assumed the shape of a "golden horned bull", and that for a further ten nights it appeared as a "white horse with golden ears"[23].

From these descriptions – which interestingly span an entire month – one might reasonably conclude that such shape changes were largely caused by the electromagnetic activity occurring within Phaeton's entourage, that several radiant bodies streaming lengthy tails were heading earthwards in comparatively tight formation, and that from time to time these either altered position relative to one another or, as the



Mars
P
K
M
N
E
S
LRZ
Eo
pom
a
P
K
M
E Eo
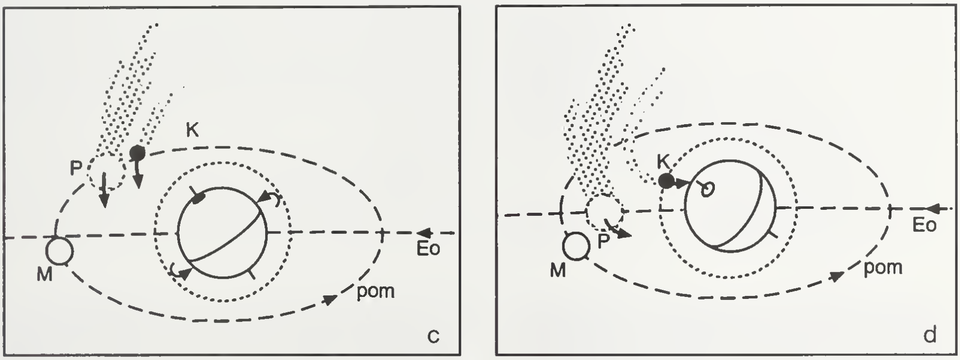
pom
b

Fig 5.3ab. Phaeton's path close to the Earth.



K
P
M Eo
pom
c
K
P
M Eo
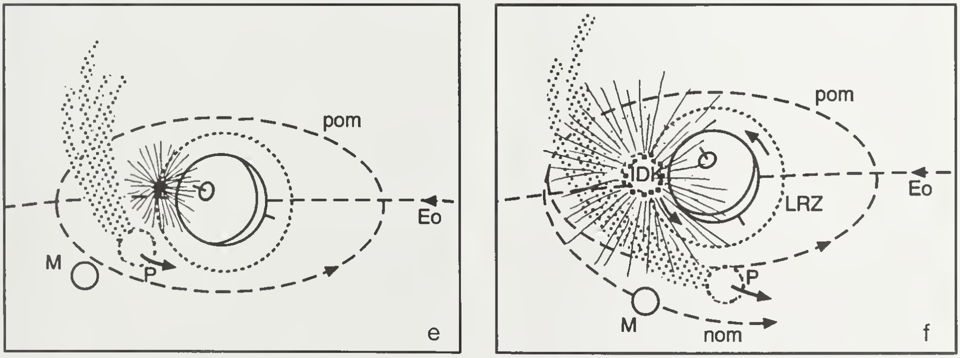
pom
d

Fig 5.3cd.



pom
Eo
M
P e pom
IDK
LRZ
Eo
P
M nom
f

Fig 5.3ef.

E	Earth	Eo	Earth's orbit round the Sun	LRZ	Limited of Roche Zone of Earth
K	KIngu	pom	pre-catastrophic orbit of Moon	IDK	Ionized debris of Kingu
M	Moon (Lunar)	nom	New orbit of Moon
P	Phaeton (Marduk)

objects proceeded across the heavens, the overall perspective of the group repeatedly changed for terrestrial viewers. The Persian account strongly suggests this scenario. Certainly, shape changes like these are not novel. In just twenty-four hours, the configuration of some cometary heads has been observed to alter markedly. Fig 5.4 shows an example observed in 1862.

Ancient descriptions which likened Phaeton to a serpent, a wolf, a horned bull, a horse, a lion's head, a boar, a giant bird, or to some mythological creature like a dragon, the behemoth, or the leviathan; or which refer to dusky tongues, manes, bristles, and gleaming eyes are obviously allusions to the ever-changing fantastic image of Phaeton during its awesome progress across the firmament, a progress that in its later stages appeared to swing alternately towards the zenith or low to, or even below, the horizon, as Earth yawed unstably.

As Hindu traditions correctly affirm, Phaeton was "a dreadful spectacle". Multifarious changes could, of course, be expected in an object like Phaeton. Traditional references to them, far from being fanciful, are almost certainly genuine if poetic accounts of what was actually seen. The following conjectural interpretations (figs 5.3c and 5.3d) graphically outline what may have been observed in Earth's skies then.

Fig 5.3c, which represents the probable situation after a further interval of a day or two, shows Phaeton and Kingu set on a path that will take them inside the Moon's orbit and to one side of the Earth's northern zenith. To Earthbound observers their course was running contrary to Earth's rotation – as specifically mentioned in Ovid's account of the disaster. Earth/Moon gravitation now begins to affect the course of the intruders, while Earth, tilting axially from the vertical, starts to align itself towards Phaeton and Kingu.

Terrestrial wobble and axial shift will also have been exacerbated by the alarmingly fast increase in seismic activity occasioned by the steadily nearing Phaeton and its entourage – activity which, dislocating the lithosphere worldwide, has been authoritatively described as being of "...indescribable and overpowering violence"[24]. Its magnitude far transcended the 7.5 shown by Heirtzler's researches as the minimum for generating not only axial wobble and polar shift but also for causing a geomagnetic reversal[25]. Magnetic charges imparted to igneous rocks during this reversal are, as previously noted, known to have been from ten to one hundred times stronger than any suppliable by unaided internal terrestrial mechanisms – Phaeton was the only co-existing close source capable of furnishing such massive charges!

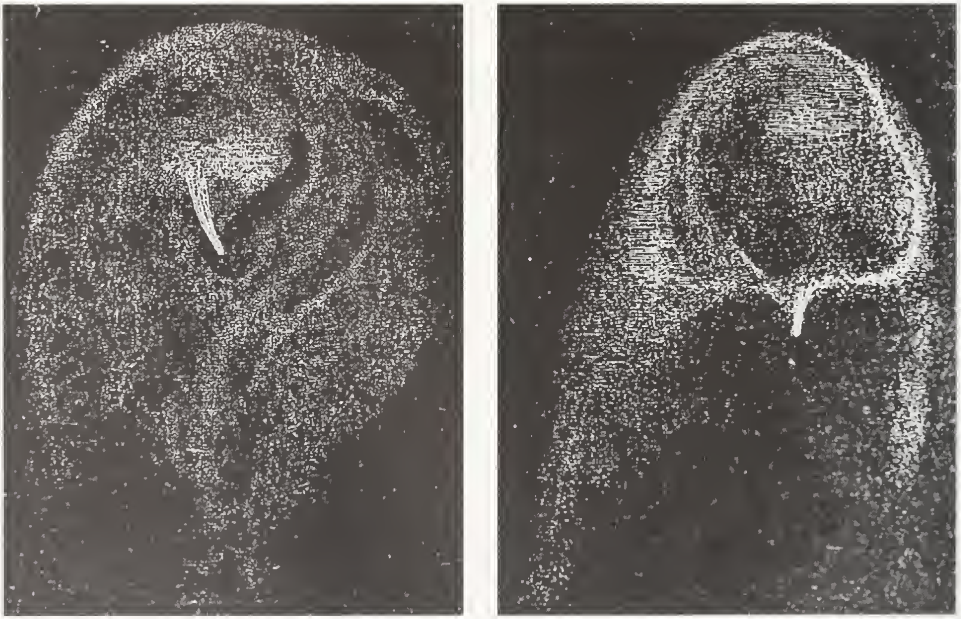

Fig 5.4. The head of a comet observed in August 1862. On the left, its aspect at 9pm on August 23rd, and on the right its aspect exactly 24 hours later. After A Guillemin.

Fig 5.3d indicates the probable position after a similar interval of time. The Moon is shown still moving along its pre-catastrophic orbit as Earth's rotation either ceases or is severely retarded by Phaeton and its attendants – now even closer to Earth. At this point, the combined gravitational pull of Earth and the Moon apparently began to prize Kingu away from Phaeton's embrace

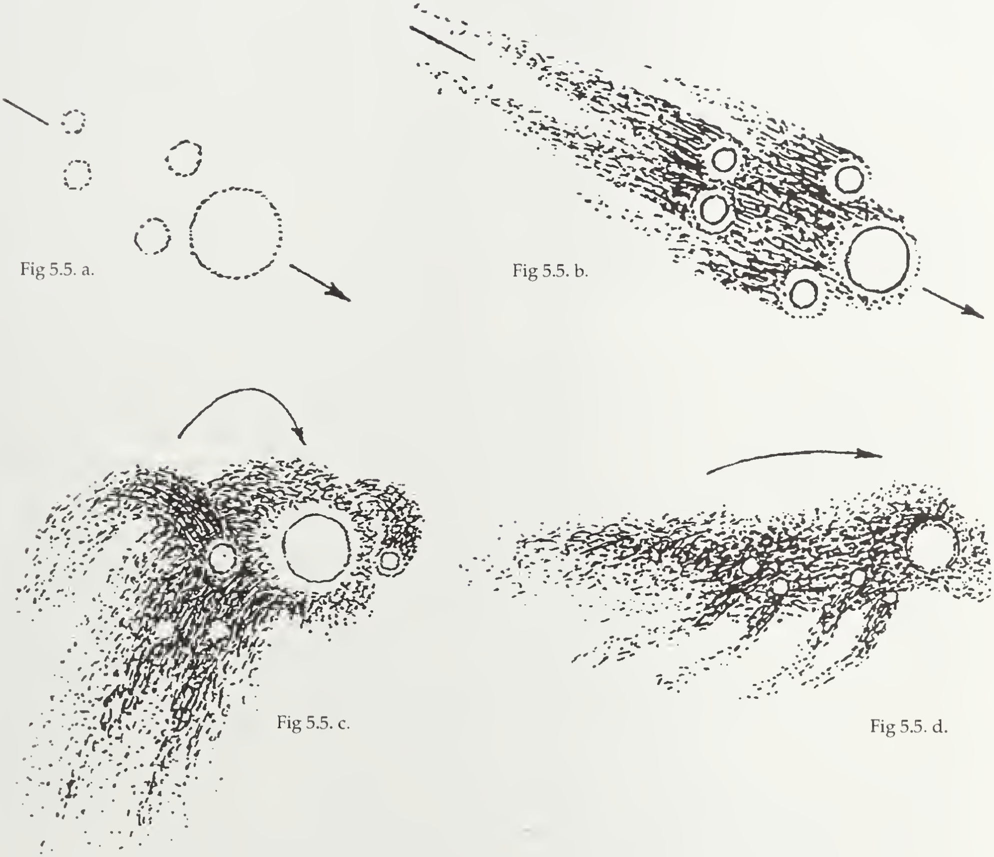

Fig 5.5. a.

Fig 5.5. b.

Fig 5.5. c.

Fig 5.5. d.

Fig 5.5. a. Schematic diagram of the probable early disposition of Tistrya (Phaeton) – the largest object – and its four largest satellittes.
b. The same group shown in probable flight formation, broadly resembling a human shape.
c. The same group at a later stage seen three-quarters head-on, broadly resmbling a 'golden horned bull'.
d. the same group seen later still when broadly resembling a 'horse'.

and drag it inexorably towards Earth's Roche zone and ultimate destruction. Colossal electromagnetic exchanges must have continued unabated between Phaeton, Kingu, Earth and the Moon during this phase of the drama, as each object sought to stabilise its own electromagnetic potential.

The combined separation of Kingu from Phaeton and the stopping or slowing of Earth's axial spin caused terrible havoc on Earth. The waters of the world's rivers, lakes and oceans were drained from their original basins and drawn gravitationally to the point on Earth nearest (opposite) Kingu and Phaeton. Worldwide traditions remember this awesome effect.

The retarding of Earth's rotation also resulted in the world's winds blowing with a ferocity and intensity never experienced by modern people – winds which flattened whole forests, whipped ocean billows to mountainous heights, moved giant rocks and removed incalculable volumes of loose surface materials to very great distances. It was, in fact, remembered as a veritable diluvium venti.

Meanwhile, the internal magma tides continued to flow below the tormented terrestrial crust. Through the united gravitational influence of Kingu and Phaeton, they will have been slowly pulled towards that aspect of Earth nearest those celestial bodies. This inevitably resulted in geoidal deformation, huge portions of the lithosphere buckling, fracturing, subducting, collapsing or overriding one another as simultaneously numerous mountain ranges were up-heaved. Rivers of molten lava, rains of red-hot ash, and vast clouds of volcanic dust and gas swirled over enormous regions. Elsewhere rampant fires will have consumed all living things in their path.

At some localities volcanic gas clouds – nuées ardentes – transported large boulders many miles, scored rock surfaces with striae closely resembling those often ascribed elsewhere to glacial action, and, in company with high pressure grit-charged steam, polished and carved rock surfaces and excavated entire valleys. Concomitantly, avalanches of boiling mud ejected from volcanic vents and fissures poured down hillsides and along valleys transporting more boulders and producing further rock striations.

Numberless burrowing creatures sought sanctuary from these scourges in their underground dens – refuges which, though temporarily successful, proved to be fatal traps. Indeed, the mortality rate at that time among animals and plants of all kinds was frighteningly high.

Proceeding now to fig 5.3e, which represents a few hours later, we find Phaeton, unable to break the combined Earth/Moon gravitational field and so unable to 'capture' the Moon, displacing it to a new (its present) orbit. Slav traditions mention a 'star' or 'planet' named Gokihar ('Wolf-progeny') as the special "disturber of the Moon" at a time of great changes on Earth long ago[26]. Gokihar was presumably Phaeton.

Kingu, however, now trapped in Earth's Roche zone, had begun to disintegrate. Such frozen liquids and atmosphere as Kingu may originally have possessed will have become detached first, plummeting to Earth as blocks of ice, hail and gigantic masses of water (the pre-Deluge rain?). This process must have accelerated progressively, culminating in a mighty explosion, which hurled burning debris literally in all directions at high velocity and produced a blast which, among other things, caused the 'sky' or 'heavens' (actually the thick clouds of the 'collapsed sky') to open or part like a 'scroll'. Through this opening some of the largest fragments of Kingu – the Norse sagas called them the 'sons of Muspelheim' – plunged earthwards.

Accompanying these were immense masses of smaller fragments – the rains of gravel, showers of rocks and iron blocks, and falls of sand and dust of worldwide traditions. Fire (ignited gases?), burning fluids (hydrocarbons?), and sticky ferruginous fluids reportedly fell with them, adding to the prevailing chaos. Although the overwhelming majority of these fragments ignited on entering Earth's 'collapsed sky', either vaporising or exploding varying distances above ground level, the so-called Carolina 'bays' of the eastern United States, the smaller but otherwise closely similar 'bays' of Holland, and the aligned 'lakes' of north-eastern Siberia, Alaska, northern Yukon and north-eastern Bolivia were apparently produced then. The dominant NW/SE orientation of all of these structures strongly suggests a common origin, and that aerial agents formed them.

As Phaeton's influence began to wane, Earth's rotational speed started to increase again, although the planet generally still continued to suffer the calamities outlined in our explanation of fig 5.3d.

Fig 5.3f depicts the final phase of this terrible confrontation. The Moon is shown setting out on its new orbit. Earth has received Phaeton's legacy of an altered axial tilt and obscuring 'collapsed sky' conditions worldwide. Numerous fragments of the disintegrated Kingu continue to bombard Earth as concurrently, another of Phaeton's legacies, the Deluge, wreaks further havoc.

With the destruction of Kingu and the sunwards departure of Phaeton, the deranged atmosphere and the gravitationally heaped-up terrestrial waters strove to regain normality. Terrific gales continued to blow as Earth's atmosphere adjusted to changing topographical conditions, and both piled-up waters and the internal magma tides began to return to equatorial regions. Numerous surviving accounts describe the waters advancing like a colossal wave, or wall of stupendous height and irresistible power. The relatively abrupt release of the waters piled-up by Kingu's and Phaeton's combined gravitational influence will have inevitably produced a Deluge having precisely these characteristics. That the Deluge at many localities indeed assumed these proportions is confirmed not so much by the traditional descriptions but by the numberless physical evidences of its massive charge across the landscape.

The Deluge, careering headlong over hill and dale alike, charging up mountainsides and pouring down valleys, was checked only by the largest mountain ranges or deflected by the mightiest cliffs. With the force of ten thousand Niagaras it will have poured precipitously into those collapsed portions of the Earth's crust destined henceforth to be the present ocean basins. Amid prevailing gloom it roared across the open countryside obliterating or gathering up all organic matter in its path, carrying it long distances in battered and dismembered condition before depositing it along with incalculable volumes of sand, silt, gravel and stony debris in caves and rock-fissures on every continent, often in the wildest disorder, as densely-packed confused masses. Its waters extinguished innumerable fires and crushed or transported every movable object they encountered. They swamped caves, burrows and other underground refuges, drowning all creatures which had sought safety within them.

The magnitude of the biological extinction achieved by the Deluge almost transcends the imagination. It annihilated literally billions of biological units of both sexes and every age indiscriminately. Only incredibly powerful flood-waters operating worldwide could have achieved such results, and only a flood produced by the means previously suggested could have operated globally.

Finally, some thought should be given to the scale, rapidity and violence with which the successive phases of this confrontation took place, for not only are these factors consistently confirmed wherever physical traces of their former action are yet discernible, but they are implicit in their very modus operandi. Giant electromagnetic storms, lightning, earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, crustal dislocations, stupendous hurricanes, abruptly displaced bodies of water, celestial bombardments, rains of astonishing volume, and a mighty flood – all are quick-acting violent events.

Individually, each may have persisted for an appreciable time, although throughout its duration its actions are essentially rapid and impetuous. The elements of speed, great scale and violent power unquestionably rendered the character of each phase as phenomenal and terrible. So too were the extent and effects. In short, the catastrophe was eminently memorable. Nothing like it before or since was known to humanity.

With the draining away of the Deluge waters, Earth's confrontation with Phaeton was over to all intents and purposes, although its tribulations were not. Before considering these, however, we must examine more fully the various component phases of the confrontation itself to appreciate how each formed a logical and coherent link in a progressive chain of horrendous events totally unknown to modern Man.

3

COLLAPSED SKY

One of the earliest physical effects arising from Phaeton's visit was the phenomenon afterwards remembered traditionally as the Age of Darkness. Several accounts state that darkness enveloped the Earth before the onset of the Deluge, lasted throughout its duration, and endured for years after the flood waters had subsided. References to its persistence throughout early post-diluvial times usually associated it with great cold. Its density and longevity were decidedly exceptional, the former characteristic leading to at least one assertion that it was not of an "ordinary earthly kind"[27], and the latter to a general belief that the sky had 'fallen' or 'collapsed'.

It can hardly be coincidence that numerous traditions speak of this 'Collapsed Sky' as having fallen so low that people could not stand upright without touching it[28]; of the darkness being so intense and the atmosphere so thick that birds flew into one another and men and animals stumbled against each other[29]; and that it occurred at a time when the whole world was desolated[30] and a terrible heat enveloped the Earth and made its waters boil[31].

In Brazil, the Cashinaua Indians recall that deafening thunder and lightning accompanied the 'collapsed sky'[32], and many African tribes associated it with widespread biological destruction. Thus the Ovaherero tribesmen assert that when the sky "fell down" long ago "almost all the people were killed", a belief shared, too, by the Kanga people and Loanga tribe; and in Unyoro, the Wanyoro tribe likewise speak of ancient times when the god Kagra threw the firmament upon the earth to annihilate humanity[33].

The duration of the 'collapsed sky' varies considerably in the various surviving accounts of it. Some merely speak of Earth being plunged "in darkness for a long time"[34], or for so long that the period was later regarded as an age of "continuous darkness"[35]. Several imply that the darkness persisted for years, and a Mexican account (mentioned in Part Three) states that it actually lasted for twenty-five years. Certainly its persistence was everywhere traditionally held to have been abnormally long. We may never know its true duration, but this more than likely varied in different latitudes and was governed at different localities by local topography – the probable reason why differing estimates of its duration are given in different traditions. Moreover, if perpetual darkness prevented the distinction of day from night, the true duration of 'collapsed sky' conditions would have been very difficult if not impossible to determine.

The mechanism by which the natural terrestrial cloud cover could 'collapse' appears to necessitate: an initially massive and comparatively rapid evaporation of the Earth's surface waters; the subsequent condensation of those waters; and an equally massive and long-continuing pollution of the terrestrial atmosphere by suitable agencies. All such effects would, of course, result from other, still more fundamental, planetary activities involving among other things the production of great quantities of heat.

We have seen that the pre-catastrophic climate must have been generally warm and devoid of extremes over much of the globe. In such a climatic regime, widespread condensation in the guise of heavy dews must have occurred nightly, with water tables being relatively high. Several traditions independently aver that a terrible drought preceded the most dramatic expressions of the Phaeton disaster – the Conflagration and the Deluge. Fruit on trees shrivelled, crops failed and vegetation withered. Animals and birds migrated en masse from north to south[36]. Rivers and lakes began to dry up and sea temperatures rose. The evaporation of Earth's waters had begun. A blistering heat pervaded everything and a thickening haze formed high in the skies. It was presumably this haze which, according to the Amerindians of the Purus River region of Brazil, made the Sun and Moon turn red, blue and yellow.

Atmospheric distortion must have commenced then, as that part of Earth's atmosphere opposite or nearest the oncoming Phaeton and Kingu was slowly pulled gravitationally towards those bodies. This derangement probably assumed the form of a curved cone or plume which streamed outwards a considerable distance towards the celestial visitors, with the lightest gases (eg helium) being the most affected.

In other words, the terrestrial atmosphere was being held in a distorting pattern while Earth itself continued to rotate normally. Coupled with the intensifying electromagnetic conditions mentioned previously, winds must have been hot and dry in virtually all latitudes, contributing to a massive evaporation of superficial waters generally. Such evaporation inevitably resulted in the formation of a thickening cloud cover. Initially this was presumably the 'thick mist' alleged to have shrouded Hera (Earth) while Pallas-Athene (Phaeton) was still far distant (see Part Four); later it reached 'collapsed sky' proportions.

Even from the onset of the confrontation between Earth and Phaeton violent electromagnetic exchanges between these bodies would have been inevitable. Certainly at later stages of the cataclysm we are told that these exchanges became almost continuous – Pima Indian legends mentioning that even the advancing Deluge waters were cut by incessant lightning. Thus, early atmospheric effects must have included a heavy smell of burnt electricity. Surely significant, therefore, is the Samoan recollection that what we may take to have been just such a smell was noticed before the formation of huge clouds (relatively unfamiliar objects in antediluvian skies) which preceded the great Conflagration.

Unquestionably many of these initial electromagnetic exchanges reached ground level, igniting dehydrated forests or tearing up land surfaces. Numerous well documented modern instances are known of such disturbances, even though these obviously involve discharges infinitely smaller than those which must have passed between Earth and Phaeton. The following example shows how even a minor event of this kind can wreak appreciable damage. After a lengthy drought during August 1900, a thunderstorm arose in the forested Adirondack mountains and passed over Lake Champlain, USA. A lightning discharge occurred, striking the ground on the northern slope of Split Rock Mountain and setting fire to trees so that in under five minutes a "well-developed forest fire was under way". All around the point of impact dirt and rocks had been torn up with such force that rocks had been fractured and shattered, and fragments 110lbs (49.5kg) or more in weight were flung about[37].

V H Barnett has detailed similar cases in this category, which possibly have a bearing on the origin of some of the so-called 'glacial erratics'. He mentions a report of a great mass of rock being broken and thrown down the Llyn Teyrn in North Wales by lightning during a severe thunderstorm in August 1898, and Hibbert described the effects of lightning on the cliffs on the east side of Fetlar Island (Shetland) as follows:

> A rock 105ft long, 10ft broad and in some places more than 4ft thick, was in an instant torn from its bed, and broken into three large and several lesser fragments.

> One of these, 26ft long, 10ft broad and 4ft thick, simply turned over. The second, which was 28ft long, 17ft broad and 5ft in thickness, was hurled across a high point of a rock to the distance of 50 yards. Another broken mass, about 40ft long, was thrown still farther but in the same direction, quite into the sea. There were also many lesser fragments scattered up and down.[38]

If comparatively minor modern lightning discharges can cause damage on this scale, one is certainly left pondering the likely effects of the immeasurably greater examples exchanged between Earth and Phaeton.

Celestial electromagnetic exchanges of the size and frequency suggested must also have generated electrical currents not only on Earth's surface but also deeper, selecting metalliferous (better conducting) strata, following metallic veins – perhaps to great depths within the crust – and producing huge thermal increases worldwide. Repeated discharges on this scale would quickly generate sufficient heat to cause: almost instantaneous expansion of the water naturally locked up in crustal strata, resulting in extensive fissuring and splitting of surface rocks; the upwards flow of magma from the deeper fissures; and the activation of volcanoes. Oceans and seas would have boiled and steamed. In combination, these disturbances would, through a general release of heat, smoke and dust, initiate atmospheric pollution that would last for decades.

On rising into the atmosphere, these pollutants would have begun to seriously impair visibility while their rapid formation as dust or gas would have induced further electrical activity, conditions thereby going from bad to worse.

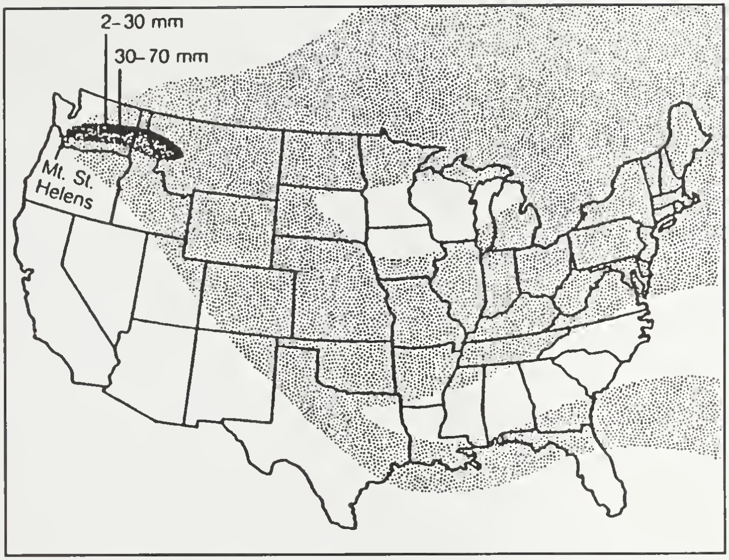
The now famous Mt St Helens volcanic eruption of May 1980 released an immense amount of ash and dust into the atmosphere, which ultimately affected at least two-thirds of North America (map 5B). In some areas it reached as much as 8 tonnes per acre, and that some 300 miles (480km) from the eruption itself[39]. The burial of Pompeii and Herculaneum under prodigious quantities of volcanic ash in AD 79 was a classic example, although only marginally worse than that occurring in 1914 when Sakurajima volcano in Japan all but buried innumerable buildings in its vicinity with similar ejecta (fig 5.6). The still more recent eruption of El Chicon in Mexico on April 4th 1982, hurled into the atmosphere more than five times the amount of material than the Mt St Helens explosion, and ranks as one of the largest of modern times.

Large volcanic eruptions can also seriously lower atmospheric temperatures. Thus, in 1783, Laki volcano erupted in Iceland and Asama volcano erupted in Japan. Though not exceptionally large, in combination they exerted a pronounced cooling effect on the world's atmosphere, not only in that year but also on the two that followed, which: "...were the coldest on record in the northern hemisphere"[40]. They created widespread dense fogs, whereby the Sun remained invisible until it had climbed 17° above the horizon – and that was in southern France in June!

In 1815, one of the most violent eruptions of all time occurred when Mt Tambora threw so much ejecta skywards that even 312 miles (500km) away the dust hung so thickly that: "...there was total darkness for three days – followed by lengthy twilight and brilliant sunsets elsewhere"[41]. Globally, temperatures fell 1.1°C below the annual norm, and 1816 was a year without a summer.

The role played by volcanic ash and dust released into the atmosphere is, even today, a significant one. For example, it has been determined that dust clouds erupted near the equator pollute the atmosphere and endure from 1 to 2 years, those erupted in middle latitudes from 3 to 5 years, and those in polar latitudes for up to 10 years[42].

Particularly intense vulcanism is known to have characterised 'late Pleistocene' times, truly enormous eruptions occurring in the areas embraced by the North Pacific[43], Antarctica and Iceland[44]. Literally thousands of volcanoes were active then (see table 5A). Their collective pollution of the atmosphere must have been colossal. It has been suggested that this 'late Pleistocene' vulcanism may have seriously defiled Earth's atmosphere for up to 100 years[45].



Map 5B. General extent of ash-fall from Mt St Helens over North America, which erupted on May 18th 1980. From G B Griggs & J A Gilchrist, "Geological Hazards, Resources and Environmental Planning", 2nd edn, 1983, reprinted by permission of Wadsworth Inc, Belmont, USA.

The volume of volcanic dust poured skywards at any given time is also important. Large quantities initiate the development of sulphuric acid in the upper atmosphere, leading to the formation of thick cloud cover. Atmospheric pollution is worst and persists longest in high latitudes because, there, the dust veil causes the greatest depletion of the Sun's rays by screening both solar and terrestrial radiation through the formation of the cloud-cover. The resultant lower temperatures accordingly permit an increase in the build-up of snow and ice – the former producing a heat-reflective albedo effect, and the latter an entrenchment of continuously cool or cold conditions, and a weakened circulation[46].

As well as dust particles, volcanic eruptions also release sulphur compounds, potash, potassium, CO_2, and particles of glass[47]. In combination these could lower temperatures globally by up to 3°C, or perhaps even more.

Since it is well known that lightning often accompanies volcanic eruptions it would be reasonable to suppose an atmosphere heavily polluted with volcanic and fissure ejecta would tend to become increasingly electromagnetic. Electrical discharges must, therefore, have steadily increased between the thickening atmosphere and the tormented land surface, as concurrently larger ones generally continued to be exchanged between Earth, Phaeton, and the latter's entourage. The sheer weight of the polluted atmosphere would have forced the cloud base down to unprecedentedly low levels.

There is. therefore, a clear connection between the phenomenon of a 'collapsed sky', repeated electromagnetic exchanges between celestial bodies, and giant crustal dislocations generating both heat and atmospheric pollutants on a grand scale. A similar connection, considered more fully later, is equally discernible between a 'collapsed sky' situation and atmospheric defilement by vast burning forests and ignited petroleum.

It is also more than probable that most of Earth's helium was lost during this disaster.

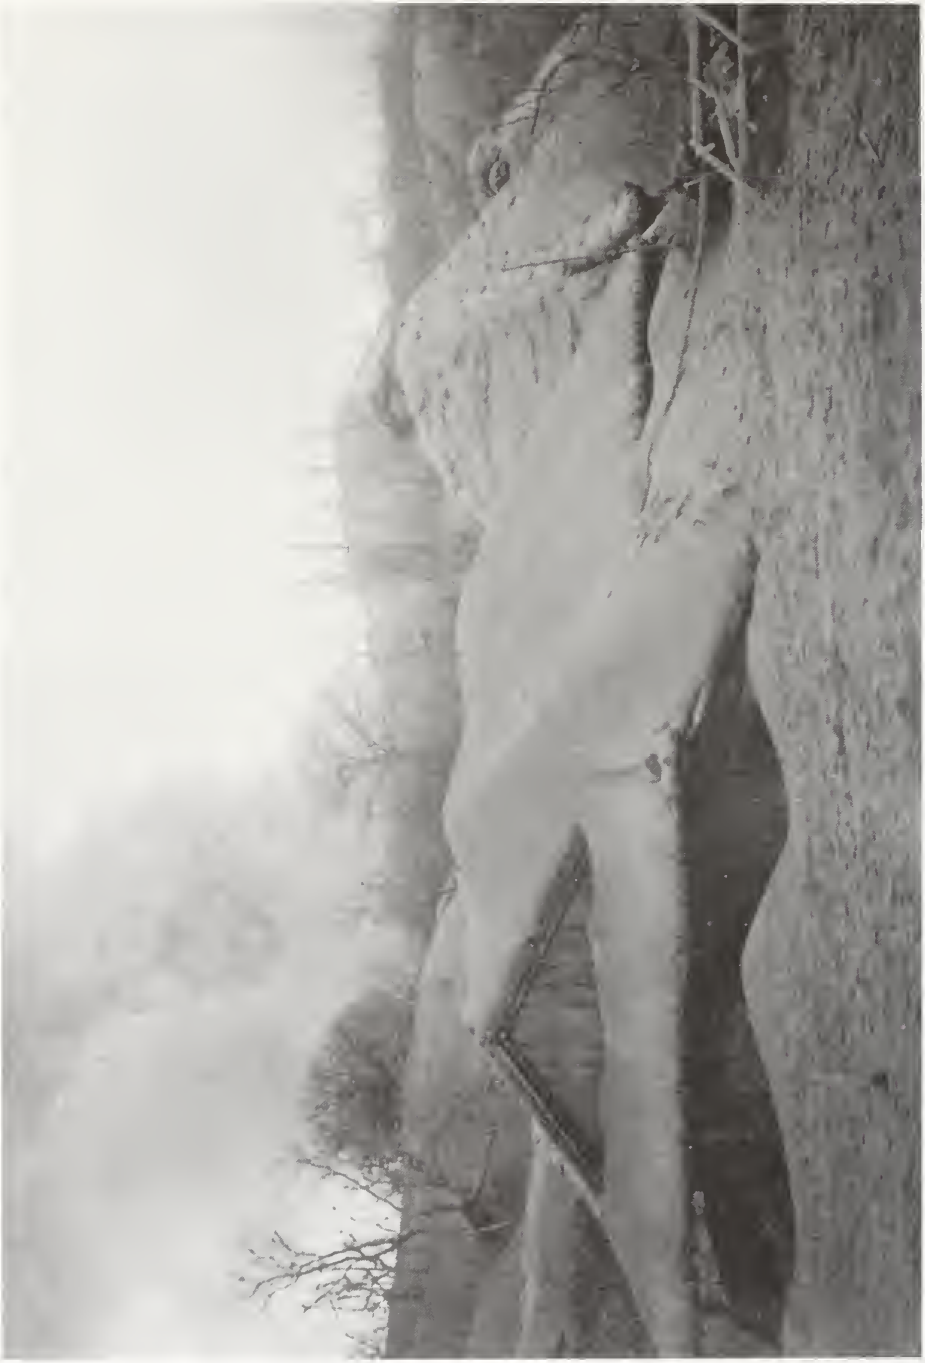

Fig 5.6. Buildings partially buried by volcanic ash during the 1914 eruption of Sakurajima, Japan.

Table 5A

Some areas of major volcanic activity regarded by vulcanologists as being of 'late Pleistocene' or 'late Quaternary' age. Many areas, such as the Aleutians and Andes hosted scores, even hundreds, of simultaneously active volcanoes at that time.

Northern Hemisphere

Gt Khingan Shan Mts
Sikhote-Alin Mts
Taiwan (Formosa)
Ryuku Islands
Kuril Islands
Kamchatka Peninsula
Anadyr Bay
Bering Strait
Seward Peninsula
Gulf of Alaska
Aleutian Islands
Vancouver
Rocky Mountains
Cascade Mountains
Grand Canyon
Sierra Nevada
Columbia Plateau
Idaho
Oregon
Arizona
New Mexico
Mexico
Nicarague
El Salvador
Guatemala
Panama
Clarion Islands
Hawaii
Philippines
Spitzbergen
Novaya Zemlya
Mid-Atlantic Ridge
The Azores
Canary Islands
Atlas Mountains
Hoggar
Ethiopia
Djibouti
Gulf of Oman
Iran
Afghanistan/Pakistan border

Southern Hemisphere

Nigeria
Kenya
Tanzania
Great Rift Valley
Madagascar
Indian Ocean
Burma
Malaysia
Indonesia
New Hebrides
Australia:
    N Queensland
    South-east New South Wales
    West Victoria
Tasmania
Bismarck Sea
New Guinea
New Zealand
Solander Islands
Antarctica:
    South Antarctic Peninsula
    Ellsworth Land
    Marie Byrd Land
The Andes - Colombia to Chile
Brazil - Mato Grosso
Chile (800 recently active volcanoes)

Helium is a light, inert gas normally found in the upper atmosphere. It is produced by the natural radioactive decay of uranium and thorium in the terrestrial crust. Investigations have shown that, at the present known rate of decay, and provided that uninterrupted decay has been going on since time immemorial, there ought to be a thousand times more helium in Earth's atmosphere than there actually is. Scientists at the US National Bureau of Standards who studied this enigma in 1964 concluded that the loss of so much helium could very well have been due to some geologically recent "catastrophic event", in which the gas was "boiled off"[48].* Theoretically at least, the Phaeton disaster provided all the conditions under which this could have occurred.

4

EARTH FRACTURE

The gigantic worldwide tectonic disturbances of 'late Pleistocene' times occurred almost simultaneously on a near-unimaginable scale – precisely what could be expected from a powerful external influence but not from the 'Ice Age' conditions conventionally believed to have existed then. The key factor underlying these tremendous changes was massive crustal fracture.

Interestingly the planetary scale and geological youthfulness of Earth's crustal fracture-complex has encouraged several high authorities to conclude that it resulted from an external rather than internal influence. We also previously noted that the Martian crust appears to have been similarly fractured, and that, in an ancient Babylonian epic, the planet Tiamat was fatally fractured and destroyed during a celestial encounter with a fiery sun-like object called Marduk. And since Marduk was seemingly identical with Phaeton, traditionally remembered as having anciently caused extensive topographical changes on Earth, could the terrestrial fracture-complex have resulted from the same dynamical process that destroyed Tiamat and fissured Mars?

If we examine this possibility further, it is noteworthy that Mars, like Earth, presently rotates once about every 24 hours, that the two innermost planets, Mercury and Venus, rotate much more slowly, but that the outer planets (Pluto excepted) rotate much more rapidly (see table 4A, Planetary Statistics). In the Babylonian epic Tiamat apparently orbited the Sun as an asteroidal planet somewhere between Mars and Jupiter.

We are not told Tiamat's size, however, although an apparent image of it on a Babylonian cylinder seal (fig 4.11c) indicates that it was larger than Earth, and modern estimates of a now-lost asteroidal planet suggest a mass approximately 90 times that of Earth[49]. Thus, as an astronomical body, Tiamat was sizable, although not really large. Due to its likely distance from the Sun, Tiamat could be envisaged as a planet having a solid rocky body not improbably ice- or water-covered, enveloped by an atmosphere more akin to those typical of Jupiter and the outer planets. Quite possibly, Tiamat may have rotated more quickly than Mars and Earth – perhaps in 18 or 20 hours – whereby its rate of spin at its equator (and hence that of any internal magma it may have possessed) was by any standard quick.

A fast-spinning sizable body like this, braked or stopped by a powerful external agent, would – largely because any internal magma would probably continue to rotate within the halted outer crust – literally come to pieces. Intolerable pressures and thermal increments would fracture and disrupt the latter. Faster-spinning larger bodies, such as the outer planets, could through sheer size and rotational speed override all but the very greatest external influences, and crustal and magmatic disruption would be minimal or non-existent. Similarly, a slow-spinning sizable body, externally retarded or braked to a halt, would also probably avoid fatal disruption, since, irrespective of the object's size or bulk, the braking process, while more easily accomplished, would obviously involve less crustal dislocation than if the rotation was speedier.

---

* See Note 17.

This seems to have been the case with Mars and Earth. Although the former evidently suffered orbital distortion and its rotation may have been slowed down, Earth, too, conceivably once rotated more slowly, a day consisting perhaps of about 30 hours.

We suggest, therefore, that at the onset of Phaeton's confrontation with Earth, the Earth's rate of spin was probably the single most important factor which determined its survival as a planet. Had its rotation been more rapid, it could well have shared Tiamat's fate. Combined with its powerful gravitational field occasioned by its essentially solid lithospheric construction, Earth's slower rotational rate prevented it from breaking up – although not, in our submission, by any great margin. Indeed, at the height of the catastrophe Earth's survival apparently came close to a situation best described as 'touch and go'.

As it was, Earth sustained fearful crustal damage during its encounter with Phaeton, and acquired an almost completely rearranged topography. The former disposition of land and sea was changed, a new world mountain system came into being, the number of active volcanoes was augmented enormously, a legacy of seismic activity was bequeathed which is far from over, a new land drainage pattern was instituted, and completely different oceanic and atmospheric circulatory regimes were established. While it is hardly necessary to reiterate the extreme youthfulness of these environmental components, we should stress that from what is known of geophysics and the theoretical interplay of two or more similar-sized confronting celestial bodies, all such planetary changes are exactly what could be expected to occur. Gold[50], Warlow[51] and Sagan[52], to mention just three, have all surmised as much.

A look now at some modern instances of horrendous crustal effects will enable us to better glimpse the sheer enormity and extent of the changes wrought during Phaeton's visit. Even these examples are necessarily pale echoes of those immeasurably greater and still more violent earlier analogies. Earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, tidal waves (tsunamis), mud-slides, avalanches, dust clouds, and various ejecta, will be among those examined. This evidence, when magnified to the probable scale and intensity of the equivalent events during the Phaeton disaster, is as sobering as it is awesome, and conjures up mental images from which, even today, thousands of years later, the mind recoils numbed and appalled.

Of the many terrible earthquakes that have occurred at intervals within living memory – among which those of San Francisco, Quetta, Agadir and several in Turkey instantly spring to mind – probably none was more severe than that which, just before noon on 1st September 1923, struck the twin Japanese cities of Tokyo and Yokohama. In the present context this was an unusually instructive event because it also involved a retreat of the sea, a gigantic tidal wave, a landslide, a tremendous rocky avalanche and a terrible fire. The full extent of the destruction meted out by these agencies did not become apparent until the completion some while later of official Japanese enquiries, which disclosed truly horrific details.

The following statistics suffice to convey the scale of that disaster. In Tokyo destruction was incredibly rapid everywhere. Four-storey concrete buildings disintegrated 'in the flash of an eye', tiles cascading with precipitous speed from roofs. Fires broke out all over the place – 252 in all, of which only 40 were contained or extinguished – and 71% of the city, or some 366,262 houses, was incinerated. Neighbouring Yokohama was eventually completely gutted by fire within twelve hours. No fewer than 38,015 human victims of the holocaust were finally counted, many of them having died of heat suffocation.

Around Sagami Bay, the final figures of casualties from fire, earthquake and tidal wave was 99,333 killed, 43,476 missing and 103,733 injured. Of buildings, 128,266 had totally collapsed, 126,233 had half-collapsed or suffered irreparable damage, 447,128 had burned down and 868 had been demolished or swept away by the tidal wave. The overall total of destroyed buildings was 576,262[53].

The avalanche, beginning on the 3,000ft (923m) high peak of Mt Hiziridake, just over 4 miles (6.4km) inland, consisted of a wall of dirt and rocks which roared across the country obliterating everything in its headlong rush towards the sea, at a speed subsequently calculated to have been approximately a mile-a-minute (95kph). The speed and volume was attested by the debris it deposited along the valley slopes forming its route, at heights exceeding several hundred feet as it rounded curves in its course[54].

From just this one terrifying event, 718 aftershocks occurred in September, 96 in October, 86 in November, 139 in December, and 167 in January 1924[55]. How much worse and globally more numerous must have been the aftershocks following the departure of Phaeton?

Probably the most notorious earthquake recorded since modern archives began was that which devastated Lisbon on November 1st 1755. It was so powerful that it was also clearly felt in Morocco and Algeria 1,000 miles (1,600km) or so to the south. Between eight and ten thousand people, together with their cattle, camels, horses and other animals, were swallowed up by abysses which closed over them again, the ground presenting the same surface appearance as it had before the dreadful event[56].

Often more destructive than earthquakes are the subsidiary catastrophes accompanying them. Those must have been common at the time of and immediately following the Phaeton disaster.

In the celebrated earthquake of 1811 at New Madrid in Missouri, for example, entire islands disappeared in the Mississippi River and local flooding caused great loss of life[57].

Certainly, the burial of some 25,000 people by the Huascaran avalanche, caused by seismic activity in the Yungay and Ranrahirca region of Peru on May 31st 1970[58] falls into this category. This avalanche poured down the valley at no less than 200mph (320kph)! Its motion resembled a great wave, and, in the words of one nearby observer: "The crest of the wave had a curl like a huge breaker coming in from the ocean. I estimated the wave to be at least 80m (160ft) high"[59]. At some places it buried the valley with debris to a depth of 260ft (80m), and transported huge boulders, some as large as 19.5 cubic yards (15 cubic metres), long distances before dumping them at all sorts of locations.

A comparable landslide of 1,300 million cubic yards (1,000 cubic metres) occurred at Mayunmarca, also in Peru, in 1974. In only 4 minutes it descended a vertical distance of 4,800ft (1,500m) at a speed of 75–87mph (120–140kph) and was completely irresistible[60].

The volume of material moved by landslides is sometimes awesomely great. At Frank, in Alberta, for example, one such slide involved approximately 39,650,000 cubic yards (30,500,000 cubic metres) of rock[61]. Last century, a land-slip at Gohna, in Himalayan India, involved the 4,000ft (1,230m) vertical descent of so much rock debris that it piled up in moments to a height of 800ft (246m) and completely blocked the local river. The force carried debris half way up – 2,000ft (615m) – the opposite side of the valley and hurled large boulders a mile or more away. So much dust rose into the air that the district remained darkened for several days[62].

Such instances graphically illustrate how giant rock-slides and avalanches occurring on a global scale during the Phaeton disaster could have obliterated and buried extensive areas of the pre-catastrophic landscape, and how much of this material – subsequently rearranged by the Deluge waters following closely upon its dislodgement – has been recorded as 'drift' filling up entire valleys.

Submarine earthquakes, such as must have undoubtedly occurred during Phaeton's visit, also often generate highly destructive subsidiary calamities. Tsunamis (tidal waves – a Japanese term) are among the worst and commonest of these, and can be up to 500 miles (800km) long. In the ocean itself, the waves may be only a few feet high, but on reaching coastal margins sometimes attain enormous heights. One recorded in 1737 at Cape Lopotka, Kamchatka, was as much as 210ft (65m) high. Still larger ones have been reported, and wave speeds of between 300 and 500mph (480–900kph) are known, with water pressures reaching 800lbs per square foot. The velocity of the falling crest of a wave combined with the speed of advance reaches 49 tonnes per square yard for a wave only 30ft (9m) high[63], so we can only imagine the pressure exerted by the largest modern waves or by those occurring during the Phaeton disaster.

Their capacity to devastate must have been tremendous when we consider that a tsunami caused by a submarine earthquake near the Tuscarora Deep south of Japan in June 1896 roared in from the sea as a 75–100ft (23–31m) high wave which engulfed whole villages and left no trace either of them or their inhabitants. In moments, 27,122 people were annihilated, thousands more injured, and 10,617 dwellings swept away[64].

Additional hazards accompanying earthquakes include emissions of natural gases, sulphurous odours and seepages of petroleum and bituminous substances[65]. Did we not read in Part Three of poisonous blasts and rivers and lakes of fire, as having been among the traumas which reportedly beset early humanity at the time of the Phaeton disaster? Gases and petroleum seepages would have afforded precisely these effects.

But earthquakes even of the magnitude just mentioned are hopelessly inadequate explanations for the collapse of ocean basins, the formation of rift valleys and fracture complexes of global extent. These are clearly the outcome of the more fundamental process of plate tectonics, which alone appears to be capable of dislocating the lithosphere. Infinitely larger and more dramatic than any produced by even the severest known earthquake, the results usually manifest themselves as enormous faults. They are the true lines of Earth fracture.

Arguably the most famous example is the San Andreas fault in California (fig 5.7), but others equally representative are known from every continent. All usually occur as scarp faces separating faulted blocks of land (tectonic plates), the scarps often rising, sometimes vertically, high above the surrounding countryside. A splendid instance is the nearly straight fault bordering Lake Mobutu Sese Seko (Albert) in Uganda, the scarp face towering to a height of almost 975ft (300m) and evincing every sign of being geologically very youthful (fig 5.8).

As previously noted, these rock faults accompanied the widespread orogeny of 'late Pleistocene' times. The San Andreas fault, for example, is associated with the latest uprise of the Sierra Nevada range, while another of still greater dimensions (the Indo-Gangetic trough), has long been associated with the elevation of the Himalayas[66]. This latter is actually a gigantic crack, now largely in-filled with alluvial deposits, stretching more or less uninterruptedly from Sumatra, round the Arrakan coast, across northern India and through the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean[67].

It is parallelled further north by another crack marking the centre line of a succession of mountains running from south Asia, through Asia Minor and the Balkans to the Alps[68]. It is now filled with serpentine, a rare deep-seated rock, which must have welled up from immense depths. Both cracks are connected with the latest uprise of the Alps and with the formation of the Mediterranean basin occasioned by the collapse of the old Tyrrhenian continent.

Interestingly, Burrard, a former surveyor-general of India, concluded that the uprise of the Himalayas and the associated crustal fractures resulted from a deceleration of Earth's rotation, and that:

> It looks as if our Earth had in the distant past received a tremendous blow from outside...[69]

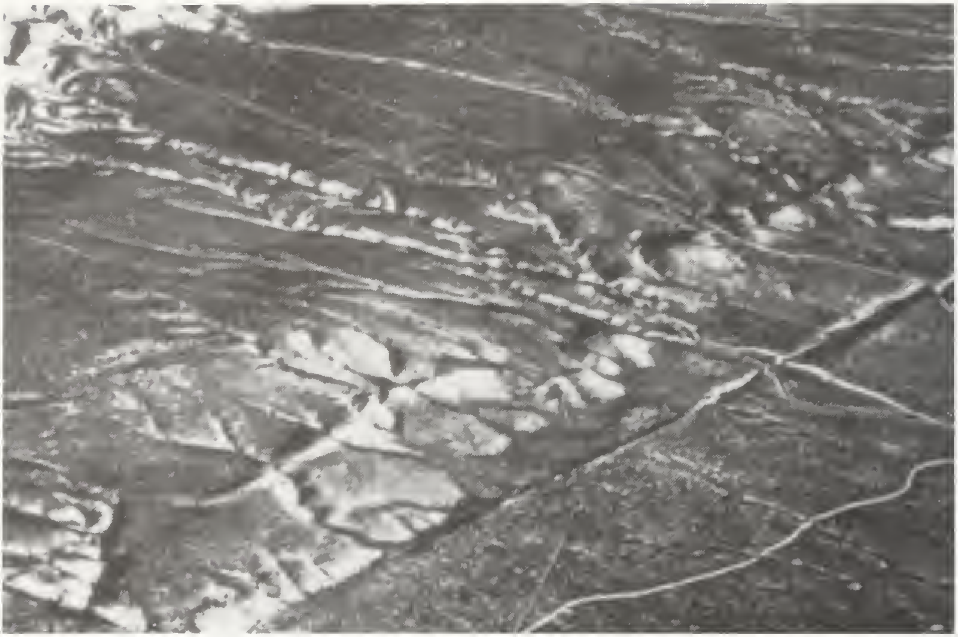

Fig 5.7. The San Andreas crustal fault in California. Photo: W A Garnett, California.

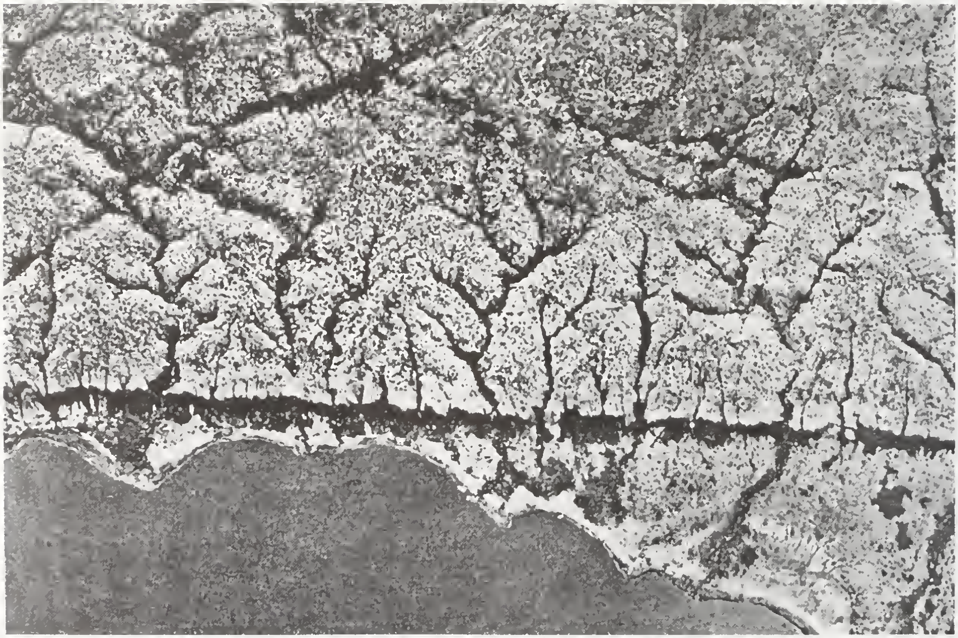

Fig 5.8. The fault bordering on Lake Mobutu Sese Seko, Uganda. By permission of David & Charles, Newton Abbot.

Obviously Burrard envisaged a celestial force, although he failed to specify its identity. In our submission, Burrard's 'blow' was administered by Phaeton, although we do not consider that actual physical contact occurred between that object and Earth. The electromagnetic, thermal and gravitational interplay between the two bodies sufficed at the time to fracture the terrestrial crust in the manner now discernible.

Using varied material, Mantura[70] and others have recently questioned the validity of the currently-fashionable theory of continental drift. Others, like Oppenheim, have concluded that, as presently advocated, the concept is grossly oversimplified and that the key to its understanding lies in the pattern of global crustal fracture zones. As Oppenheim said:

> This pattern... would suggest that expansion of the Earth's crust has taken place[71].

Vast amounts of thermal energy could achieve such expansion. As the great majority of these fractures are demonstrably young features and an exceptionally powerful geomagnetic reversal (over 100 times stronger than terrestrial mechanisms could produce) occurred approximately 11,500 years BP, when the Phaeton disaster took place, so much thermal energy was seemingly generated that expansion of the underlying magma resulted in Earth's crust literally cracking apart like the shell of an overheated egg.

If true, this may even have distorted the geoidal shape. Very significantly, Taira[72] has suggested that such a geoidal distortion accompanied severe vulcanism in eastern Asia coincidentally with the onset of cold (glacial) conditions at the beginning of Holocene times (ie, immediately after the Phaeton event). In all probability the difference between 'during' and 'immediately after' is illusory.

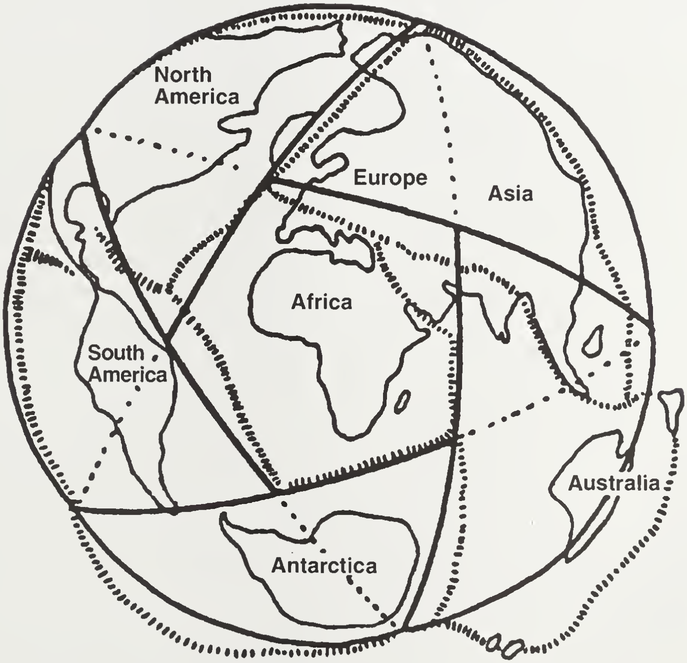

Fig 5.9. Major tectonic plates of the Earth (broken lines) compared with a projection of a regular icosahedron (solid lines) on an azimuthal equidistant projection (after Spilhaus).

Mantura, moreover, has argued that the curious shapes of the major tectonic plates – produced by crustal fracturing – show the theory of continental drift to be false, while Spilhaus has demonstrated that the shapes of the plates and the triple points formed where the plates naturally meet coincide very closely with the vertices of an icosahedron (fig 5.9). He added:

> Triple points are important, such as the cracks in Pangaea [the original tectonic plate which split into present continental plates], which typify what happens in a homogeneous material that is uniformly stressed.[73] (Our italics)

Recent explorations in Arizona have highlighted puzzling seismic data from levels deep in the continental crust. These concern the homogeneity of miles-thick sheets of crystalline rock, which have been forcibly pushed hundreds of miles over younger sedimentary deposits. Similar homogeneous sheets, up to 61 miles (10km) thick, have also been noted in the southern Appalachians, where they have been moved bodily westward by as much as 140 miles (225km), while in Utah another almost identical example has apparently been pulled down a vast inclined fault[74]. In every case, the sheets appear to have slid while molten over the strata now underlying them – yet, in doing so, they remained intact, a seemingly impossible but nevertheless real effect.

A uniformly exerted stress would be one method by which this remarkable result could be achieved. Certainly the thermal energy unleashed by these events must have been appalling. These details, coupled with Spilhaus' observation on what happens to uniformly stressed homogeneous rocks, provide sobering insights into both the linear and vertical extent of the crustal disturbances characterising Phaeton's visit. The lateral displacement of enormous pieces of Earth's crust has been noted in Part One, where we saw that, like other major mountain ranges, the Rockies were pushed many miles over adjacent strata.

In Nigeria, sets of uniformly straight parallel crustal fractures, each hundreds of miles long and aligned almost due north-south, have resulted from the application of a massive compressive stress. Investigators of these huge cracks actually suggested that their near-meridional orientation was due to a change in the speed of Earth's rotation, and that this was probably induced by a near-miss or the oblique impact of a cosmic body![75]. Although that proposed event supposedly occurred millions of years ago, considerable field evidence exists that these Nigerian fissures may really be geologically very recent. If so, the unspecified cosmic body just postulated could very well have been Phaeton.

Gigantic east-west crustal derangements reach great visual prominence in the Central American-Caribbean region and in eastern Indonesia. In the former region, these displacements occurred during late Quaternary times when colossal portions of the lithosphere slid past one another or subducted[76]. Directly associated with the Clarion fracture zone in the eastern Pacific[77], with the San Andreas fault in California and its southern extension in the Gulf of California[78], with the deep-sea trench off Guatemala and with the trans-Mexican volcanic belt[79], these upheavals were also connected further south with a similar belt of major tectonic collapse features which, in Guatemala and San Salvador, include the stunning Coatapepeque caldera and the Ilopango depression[80].

Indonesia virtually duplicates the Central American region just considered. There also an east-west crustal dislocation of surprising modernity and stupendous proportions is present. It profoundly affected the biology of the region as represented by Wallace's Line[81].

The sudden slowing of Earth's rotation, therefore, inevitably caused severe crustal fracturing worldwide. The continued rotation of the semi-fluid molten magma below Earth's halted or decelerated crust resulted in vastly increased thermal energy and, not improbably, in temporary geoidal deformation. In such circumstances the greatest stresses would mostly be experienced in tropical latitudes where both surface and subterranean magma speeds are naturally higher than in polar regions. The direction of such stresses would tend to override that of planetary rotation.

Lithospheric fracturing and the subduction and over-thrusting of crustal plates of the magnitude being contemplated would inevitably compress and buckle some portions of the terrestrial surface (causing the uprise of mountains and plateaux) while simultaneously stretching others to the point where massive crustal fracturing and collapse would occur. The African Rift Valley, the floor of the Atlantic either side of the mid-Atlantic ridge, the Mediterranean basin, the dropped ocean floor off Kamchatka, and the Turfan depression in central Asia, all appear to be examples of such crustal collapse, and geologically very recent ones at that.

5

FIRE-STORM

The ferocious magnetic storms in Earth's atmosphere coincident with the widespread drought and botanical desiccation which typified the terrible confrontation between Earth and Phaeton, allied to the furious winds generated by the braking of Earth's rotation and an attendant axial shift, quickly produced Fire-storm conditions.

Moreover, crustal sliding and disruption over magma intensely heated electromagnetically by a massive polarity reversal, together with concurrent volcanic eruptions and magmatic outpourings on a tremendous scale, increased global thermal levels catastrophically. Tinder-dry grasslands and forests (often of resinous timber) perished in frightful holocausts. Water temperatures rose, and rivers, lakes and even seas eventually began to steam and boil. As conditions progressively deteriorated, metalliferous veins in surface strata, often acting as natural lightning conductors, began to melt or fuse, with the softer ores (eg, lead, tin and gold) liquefying quickest and finding their way into rock fissures and other cavities. The presence of iron ore and other metals in several bone-fissures was noted in Part Two. Evidence for all these and the following effects of great heat and rampant fire at the close of so-called 'Pleistocene' times abounds on almost every continent.

Near-endless torrents of hot volcanic ejecta rained down upon huge areas; immense clouds of inflammable gases escaping from seismic fissures and volcanic vents rolled over the terrain, bursting into flame or, as nuées ardentes, buoying up enormous boulders and other debris for long distances before depositing them at all sorts of locations; exploding gases and other volcanic substances created blast effects of appalling severity, and high pressure jets of grit-charged steam and heated water carved out, striated or drastically altered local topography.

In other regions, avalanches of boiling mud, spewing out of vents and chasms, compounded the unbridled chaos. These overwhelmed whole forests, filled up entire valleys, buried rivers and small lakes, scored rock surfaces and transported sizable boulders many miles from their original sources. In short, the terrible world conflagration of universal tradition had begun.

The traditional recollections of this holocaust are frequently most graphic, and often contain interesting supplementary information about it. They show that nothing remotely resembling this conflagration has been experienced by present-day humanity. Even the severest modern volcanic outpourings or forest fires fall very short of what clearly took place then.

Nevertheless, as the following examples clearly indicate, even these disturbances furnish valuable insights into what must have happened on an immeasurably greater scale during Phaeton's visit.

Today, approximately 500 terrestrial volcanoes are considered to be active or dormant[82] (potentially active). The number of extinct cones, however, greatly exceeds this – and when one contemplates that many presently extinct volcanoes were active a mere thousand years ago, the rate of extinction, even if only approximately constant over the last 11,500 years, indicates that volcanic activity around that date was severe. Indeed, the volcanic record confirms this, for literally thousands of volcanoes were active during and immediately following Phaeton's visit (see table 5A). Little imagination is needed to visualise the colossal volume of 'hot' volcanic material – lava, mud, ashes, dust, gases, steam, smoke, etc – ejected then. The following modern reports and observations clearly reveal that it cannot have been otherwise.

Observations of geologically recent vulcanism encountered in Mato Grosso, Brazil, by Savage-Landor in 1912 concerned volcanic lapilli (stone fragments), ashes and cinders which had buried whole valleys. Large portions of sizable hills had blown up or collapsed. Huge subterranean volcanic cauldrons and gigantic wall-like volcanic dykes were encountered. Blue, black and red baked rocks abounded. Craters of every size were seen. Great expanses of pulverised and carbonated rock were traversed and observations made of extensive beds of cinders and ashes up to 40ft (12m) deep. Numerous large fissures and cracks, very significantly aligned north-west to south-east, had riven surface strata throughout the region[83]. Near the Capim Branco basin, gigantic solidified 'waves' of once molten lava were found. They had formerly been flowing across the landscape as a vast fiery avalanche like, but infinitely greater than, known modern equivalents. One of the 'waves' had been arrested in mid-motion, its upper portion hanging like a magnified crest of a breaking sea wave[84].

Although the heat emitted by such vulcanism must have been indescribable, it still pales alongside that which must have accompanied the stupendous basaltic outpourings. The temperature of a fire fountain (like that in fig 5.10) repeatedly measured on December 5th 1959 in Hawaii was consistently above 2050°F (1120°C), and actually reached 2200°F (1200°C) on one occasion[85]. The largest fire fountains, incidentally, have been known to spurt upwards by as much as 1,000ft (308m)[86]. Fire fountains having similar temperatures must have been common in these gigantic volcanic eruptions of the past.

Like many of their modern analogues, these outpourings almost certainly occurred with devastating violence and rapidity. Lava ejected by Mauna Loa on Hawaii in 1855, for instance, moved at over 40mph (64kph), while, during the eruption of the Japanese volcano Bandai in 1888, one of its four peaks was blown off and almost three billion tonnes of material were hurled skywards within just a few minutes. Many of the 'late Pleistocene' volcanoes must have acted with similar speed and violence.

Even in modern eruptions, the volume of ejected matter is frequently immense. In December 1959, for example, the volcano Kilauea Iki on Hawaii at first spewed out lava at the enormous rate of 470,000 cubic yards (357,200m^2) per hour, later increasing this to 1,400,000 cu yds (1,064,000m^3) per hour[87]. A still higher hourly rate – 5,000,000 cu yds (3,800,000m^3), or approximately 2,500,000 tonnes – was attained by the volcano Mauna Loa in 1887[88].

Most popular and general scientific surveys of vulcanism refer to the tremendous volcanic explosions of Krakatau in August 1883 and Mt Pelée in May 1902, while in our own day accounts of the huge eruption of Mt St Helens in May 1980 have been published at all levels. These three events – of which the first two are classics – have furnished abundant data about important subsidiary phenomena respecting rock striations and huge displaced boulders. Fuller consideration of these is therefore especially instructive.

Krakatau is a small volcanic island in the Sunda Strait separating Java and Sumatra which, on August 26th 1883, erupted so loudly that it was audible 150 miles (240km) away.

The whole night long Krakatau belched thick black smoke which, rent by continuous lightning flashes, eventually soared to a height of 87,750ft (27,000m).

At approximately 10.00am the following day, however, there occurred the most violent natural disaster of modern times. Krakatau literally exploded with a thunderous roar which was heard in Ceylon (Sri Lanka), the Philippines and Japan, over 3,000 miles (4,000km) away. Masses of rock measuring 5,200ft (1,600m) were flung as far distant as 100 miles (160km), and its shock waves were registered by barographs all over the world. A tidal wave 32.5ft (10m) high rushed out from the island at the incredible speed of 350mph (560kph) in all directions, reaching a height of 120ft (36m). It swamped Javanese and Sumatran settlements, in a matter of minutes completely demolishing 295 towns and villages, and partially devastating 132 others. At least 5,000 ships and boats were wrecked, or carried, toy-like, far inland. Acting in unison, blast and tidal wave killed some 36,000 people and numberless animals and plants almost instantly, while many others were badly injured. The wave itself was distinctly felt at places as distant as Port Elizabeth in South Africa and, as an abnormal swell, in the English Channel[89].

Enormous quantities of ejected ash and dust were blown far and wide. Regions up to 275 miles (440km) away were plunged into total darkness: 130 miles (208km) away the darkness continued unnaturally for 24 hours, and 50 miles (80km) away for as long as 57 hours. In the immediate neighbourhood of Krakatau it persisted for three days and was so thick that nobody could see their hand before their face[90]. 'Collapsed Sky' conditions had been produced. Dust from the explosion actually fell on ships 1,600 miles (2,560km) away, and for years remained suspended in the upper atmosphere causing spectacular sunsets. Pumice (light bubbly volcanic rock) thickly covered the sea all round Krakatau, and ships visiting the area shortly afterwards reported how they had to plough their way through 10ft (3m) thick layers of it.

Fig 5.10. A fire-fountain.

Innumerable tree trunks and animal and human corpses were embedded in it – a dismal and sobering sight[91].

It has been estimated that the main Krakatau explosion released energy in the order of 7.2×10^{22} ergs (72 followed by 21 zeros), which is equivalent to that produced by an atom bomb of about 1.8 megatons[92].

Hardly less traumatic, and in some ways worse, was the appalling volcanic cataclysm involving Mt Pelée at the north tip of the island of Martinique, on Thursday 8th May 1902. Shortly before 8.00am that day, when 28,000 inhabitants of Saint Pierre nestling at the foot of Mt Pelée's southern slope were just starting another day, and the harbour of this coastal town was full of shipping, Mt Pelée erupted with incredible violence. Initially, only minor explosions shook the volcano, which threw mud and rocks about and rained heavy ash falls over the surrounding countryside[93]. Later repeated blasts of gas and superheated steam shot with frightful intensity through fissures in the volcano's flanks:

> ...carrying with them vast quantities of glowing ash and blocks. So voluminous were these ejecta that they fell at once on the adjacent slopes, then raced down the mountain sides at hurricane speeds. Some of these glowing avalanches were observed to move at rates of more than 100 miles an hour. One overwhelmed the town of Saint Pierre in an instant, killing all but one of its 28,000 inhabitants.[94] (Our italics).

The lone survivor was a prisoner in a local jail! Almost everyone aboard the vessels in the harbour was similarly annihilated in a flash[95], a mere 25 (out of a crew of 68) surviving on the steamer Roraima. Their collected depositions revealed that Mt Pelée had blown to pieces soon after 7.45am. One side of the volcano had been ripped out completely, and a solid wall of flame had hurtled out at horrifying speed with a noise compared to thousands of simultaneously discharging cannon. A veritable fire-hurricane, it careered down the mountain and across Saint Pierre and its harbour. Saint Pierre was destroyed in an instant, leaving it singularly like the incinerated cities of Nagasaki and Hiroshima in World War II (fig 5.11). On reaching the harbour, the fire-wave caused the sea to boil and seethe and send up vast clouds of steam, as coincidentally it burnt off masts and funnels of anchored ships. Indeed, Roraima's masts and smokestack looked as though they had been "cut by a knife"[96].

Other recorded effects included the ejection of huge blocks of andesitic lava – some 15ft (4.6m) long[97], and one 30x24x22ft (9x7x7m)[98] – flung as far as Sèche-Blanche plateau 3 miles (4.8km) distant. Elsewhere, a bluff near Mt Pelée exhibited surface striations caused by sand-blast action which were practically indistinguishable from so-called 'glacial' striae[99], while at Grande Rivière an extensive boulder-field formed by high speed mud-torrents was found. Alleged glacial boulder-fields are often very similar (figs 5.12, 5.13), while, as we have seen, mud-slides sometimes produce rock striations[100] as well as transporting large rocks appreciable distances[101].

Medical examination of the grotesque injuries on the dead were also instructive:

> In many instances the actual cause of death probably was the inhaling of the very hot gas. The bodies were intensely burned, as also were those of the survivors. Many were stripped of clothing by the force of the blast; but others remained clothed and the clothing was not ignited, even though the body beneath it was severely burned. Body tissue was distended, and in many instances skull sutures had been opened up. The injuries were such as would result from sudden heat intense enough to turn water in human tissue into steam, but not high enough or of long enough duration to raise fabrics to kindling temperature.[102].

Though grisly, these details instantly recall the state of some of the animal remains excavated from several of the aforementioned bone-caves, and the Zuni legend describing how, at the time of Phaeton's visit, searing blasts heated the blood of huddling animals to the point where it gushed out of their bodies. Coincidences?

Just one day earlier, La Soufrière on the island of St Vincent had also erupted. While not as devastating as the Martinique explosion, that of La Soufrière was nevertheless violent and cataclysmic. It included a tremendous volcanic blast which felled and debarked numberless trees, and a rain of ashes so immense that it filled a local gorge to a depth of 200ft (61.5m). Sand-blasted trees, resembling some found in 'drift' gravels elsewhere, were among its other victims[103].

When Mt Pelée erupted again between 1929 and 1932, geological teams rushed to Martinique to study how some of the scientifically unobserved 1902 effects had been achieved. Interesting discoveries resulted. Enormous lava boulders were found 3 miles (5km) from the main crater, not flung there by blast or transported by mud-torrents, but carried aerially by nuées ardentes – gas-charged vapour emitted explosively from the volcano. Perret described the process as follows:

> At the moment of explosion liquid masses of lava, instead of being hurled high into the air to form bombs, are converted more or less completely into ash by the rapid discharge of gas, and with the ash are carried along ejectamenta of all sizes: blocks, boulders... highly heated but not fused. Of such materials are the nuées ardentes composed, and no matter how heterogeneous in size they may be, all are derived from the same mass of lava... The vapour density about the separate particles is so great that blocks and boulders... are buoyed up and carried forward like corks.[104].

The force and velocity of these nuées ardentes were frequently so great that, not only did they carbonise trees, but underlying rock surfaces were scarified (incised or stripped) and striated very much in the manner of alleged glacial action. Such effects were noticed at several places, especially at the base of Morne Lénard near Mt Pelée. The close similarities between striations of volcanic and supposed glacial origin was noticed as long ago as 1909, when it was established that, given sufficient power and speed, grit-charged volcanic steam could quickly excavate U-shaped valleys in solid rock. One such valley was cut by this process during the 1902 eruption of Mt Pelée[105].

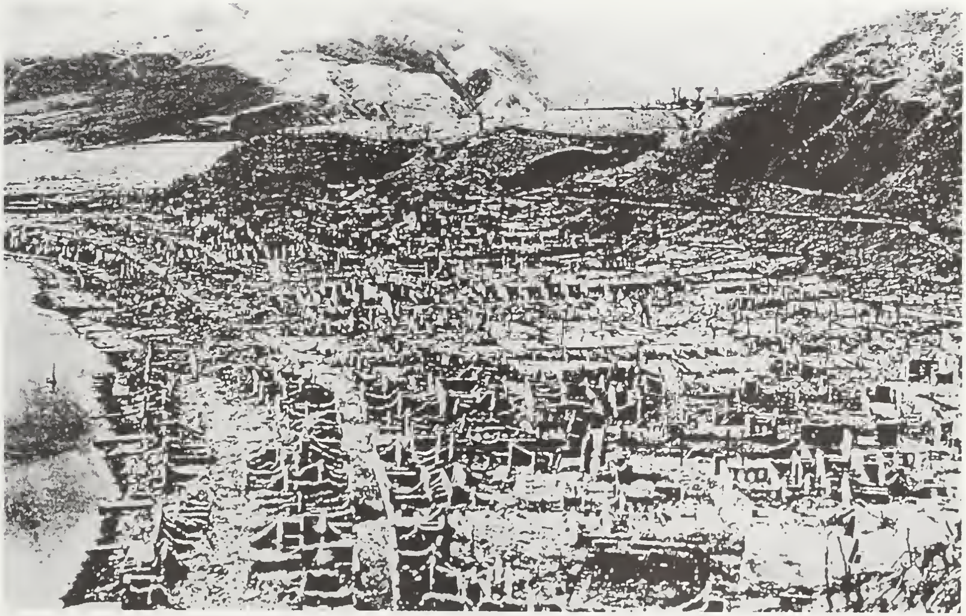

Fig 5.11. Saint Pierre, Martinique, shortly after the Mont Pelée fire-hurricane had devastated it on May 8th 1902. Photo: Brown Brothers, Sterling, Pennsylvania, by permission.

On December 4th 1951, Hibokhibok volcano in the Philippines duplicated Mt Pelée's 1902 performance on a somewhat smaller but still catastrophic scale. A mighty explosion released a gigantic avalanche of red-hot lava enveloped in "writhing clouds of stifling gas and hot dust" which:

> ...swept silently and lethally over the villages just north of Mambajao and, in a few moments, took the lives of 500 persons. Houses were burned and bodies of persons and animals were charred and mummified. The blast accompanying the avalanche knocked down trees and aligned them parallel to the direction of movement of the avalanche. Three miles from the summit of the mountain the force of the blast was sufficient to wrap the trunk of a coconut tree 5in in diameter in the form of a U around the trunk of a big mango tree.[106] (Our italics).

The extraordinary effects of directed volcanic blast have also been noticed in Russia, particularly in connection with the eruption of Mt Shiveluch[107].

The recent Mt St Helens eruption provided further evidence of the near-instant devastation possible by just one large volcanic outburst. Exhaustively published elsewhere[108], the details need not be repeated here, although reference should certainly be made to the vast number of trees felled by incredibly powerful fast-moving blast clouds, and to the huge pyroclastic ash and mud-torrents enveloping enormous log jams "...that resemble those deposited by water". The resultant deposits with their woody contents are reminiscent of the Alaskan 'muck' beds and the Siberian 'wood hills' which contain trees like those carbonised by Mt Pelée.

These modern examples of vulcanism demonstrate that many, if not all, of the agents capable of causing phenomena supposedly typical of the alleged 'Pleistocene' glaciations are to be found in them. Superheated high-pressure steam and sand blasts, nuées ardentes and mud-torrents causing rock striations; mud-slides forming extensive boulder-fields; nuées ardentes and mud-flows transporting giant rocks long distances; high-velocity grit-charged steam carving out whole valleys; and fire-waves incinerating and debarking numberless trees, as in Alaska and Arctic Siberia. This, of course, does not imply that vulcanism was exclusively responsible for all the alleged 'Pleistocene' glacial effects.

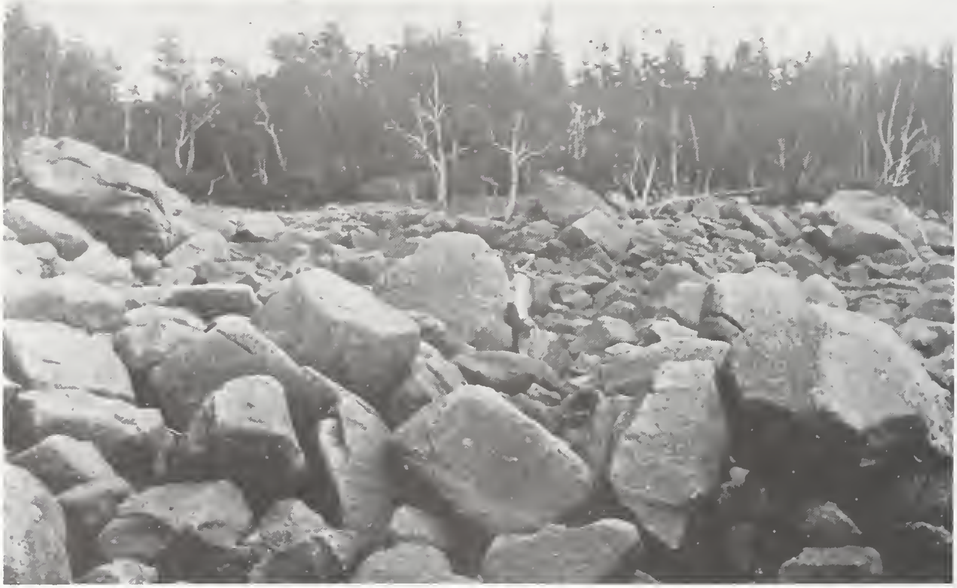

Fig 5.12. Alleged moraine at Bear-den, Maine. The size of the boulders is indicated by the human figure in the middle distance. This boulder field is essentially identical to those formed by flash-floods and mud-torrents. By permission of the Geological Society of America, Bulletin, vol 11, 1900, and R S L, Oxford.

Unquestionably various other agents also contributed to their generation. Nonetheless, considering the extent and severity of vulcanism at the end of so-called 'Pleistocene' times, and the apparent absence then of large scale ice action globally, it is more than probable that at least some alleged 'glacial' effects were due to volcanic agencies.

Numerous independent tribal recollections of a frightful world holocaust traditionally attributed to one or more cosmic agents were marshalled in Part Three. Very significantly, these memories are entirely consistent with the type of scenario which the volcanic and Earth fracture evidence just reviewed unmistakably suggests. Many accounts provide exceptionably graphic descriptions of a raging inferno. In the North American Wintun legend, for example, the hero, Olelbis, allegedly:

> ...looked down into the burning world. He could see nothing but waves of flame; rocks were burning, the ground was burning, everything was burning. Great rolls and piles of smoke were rising; fire flew up towards the sky in flames, in great sparks and brands... The great fire was blazing, roaring all over the earth, burning rocks, trees, people, burning everything...[109].

The Mbocobi tribe of South America recall that when the Sun once fell down from the sky it set the world alight in a "deluge of fire"[110]. The Norse Voluspa recounts how the cosmic assailant Surt: "...comes from the south with ...fire". In the stanza which describes earth sinking into the sea, it is said that "steam rages... fire shoots high to heaven itself..."[111].

Surt, who, with the Midgård Serpent and the Fenris-Wolf, figures prominently in the Ragnarök epic:

> ...remains (in the sky) to the last, to fling fire over the whole world, so that the race of men perishes with the gods, and all are finally engulfed in the overwhelming sea; the Sun becomes dark, Earth sinks in the sea, the shining stars slip out of the sky. Vapour and fire rage fiercely together, till the leaping flame licks heaven itself.[112].

Ovid, in his account of Phaeton's flight close to Earth, tells how Phaeton "...beholds the world set on fire on all sides..."[113] (our italics) and how, at that time, all the great rivers of the world either dried up or were turned to steam. The Washo Indians of California recollect a tremendous terrestrial convulsion which up-heaved whole mountain ranges in blazing fire, the flames rising to such heights that "...the stars of heaven melted and fell upon the Earth. Then the sierras rose up from the plain..."[114].

Closely similar events are mentioned in the Old German Apocalypse, the Muspilli, in its account of the reputed conflict between Elijah and Satan (Phaeton):

> ...the mountains begin to belch forth fire, no tree remains unscathed upon the land, the waters dry up, the sea disappears, the heavens begin to burn in a dull flame, the Moon falls, the Earth is on fire, no stone remains upon another.[115].

These are not simply memories of unusually severe vulcanism, although volcanic eruptions are featured, but accounts of infinitely worse conditions: occasions when yawning chasms in a fractured and dislocated lithosphere permitted stupendous volumes of molten magma to well up and overspread adjacent landscapes; when great portions of the Earth's crust buckled and folded amid fountains of fire and superheated steam as new mountain ranges were up-heaved and existing ones elevated still higher; and when other portions collapsed and fell away into fiery cauldrons of prodigious size. Accompanying such hellish events, fire, lava, cinders, ashes and gases shot skywards to immense heights in repeated explosions of unimaginable ferocity, transcending even those of Krakatau and Tambora. Many eruptions would have given the impression of reaching 'heaven itself'.

These recollections also plainly state that the entire world, not just some particular region, caught fire: "everything was burning", "fire on all sides", "roaring all over the earth", and so on. A universal conflagration, however, is precisely what would have occurred if the terrestrial crust was extensively fractured and buckled by an irresistible force; and only an external force could have achieved such disruption.

Still closer consideration of the thermal aspect of this disaster indicates the operation of yet another highly destructive agent – wind of super hurricane force. It was a major element in this appalling Fire-storm, and must now claim our attention.

6

HURRICANE

Inevitably, tremendous winds generated by the various factors discussed previously blew with mind-boggling force and velocity over much of the world. Even the worst modern typhoons, cyclones, hurricanes and tornadoes pale alongside the winds that must have been unleashed then. Their destructive power almost surpasses comprehension, and today they have no direct parallels. It is not, however, difficult to appreciate their effect upon the worldwide fires we have just been considering.

Here, we survey some of the yet extant data – physical and traditional – apparently relating to the former reality of these winds, and attempt to assess their significance during the Phaeton disaster.

We begin by recalling the remarkable accumulation of diverse avian species (birds) entombed in 'late Pleistocene' deposits in California, and the equally heterogeneous mass of plant and animal remains in the similarly-aged lignite beds at Geiseltal in Germany. These assemblages can only have been congregated at these places by furious winds or wildly surging water, or by both those agents acting in unison.

The destructive capacity of continuous winds has long been known, those laden with dust or grit being especially acute. Concerning the effects of sand-charged winds, Dana once remarked:

> The sands carried by winds when passing over rocks sometimes wear them smooth, or cover them with scratches and furrows, as observed by W P Blake on granite rocks at the Pass of San Bernardino, in California... Limestone was so much worn as to look as if the surface had been removed by solution. Similar effects have been observed by Winchell in the Grand Traverse region of Michigan...[116] (Our italics).

Almost all observers of 'drift' – that singular formation considered at length in Part One – have commented on its generally unstratified and chaotic appearance. Geikie spoke of it as having a "confused and tumultuous" appearance[117], adding that the intercalated beds in it:

> ...are twisted, bent, crumpled and confused often in the wildest manner. Layers of clay, sand and gravel... are puckered into folds and sharply curved into vertical positions. The intercalated beds are everywhere cut through by the overlying 'till', and... in the mass of the 'till' itself fossils sometimes, but very rarely, occur, and fragments of wood have from time to time been discov> ered. They almost invariably afford marks of having been subjected to the same action as the stones and bowlders by which they are surrounded.[118] (Our italics).

Only an agency operating indiscriminately and universally, or a combination of such agents acting coincidentally, could have produced results of this kind. Indeed, it was, as Dana once stated, a process which deposited the 'drift' "pell-mell"[119]. Its distribution is also peculiar, for, speaking of that portion of it known as 'boulder clay', another authority described how:

> The true bowlder-clay is spread out over the region... as a somewhat widely extended but uniform sheet, yet it may be said to fill up small valleys and depressions, and to be thin or absent on ridges or rising ground.[120]

This singular distribution is comparable to snow accumulations driven by high winds.

Many have admitted that the 'drift' was deposited under violent conditions which affected vast areas simultaneously[121]. Others, like Figuier[122], have recognised that the event was sudden and somehow connected with a change in the inclination of the Earth's axis[123] – by now an all too familiar theme. This violence of deposition, and its apparent similarity of operation over huge regions, not only explains the unstratified and tumultuous appearance of much of the 'drift', but is in direct contrast to the slow, if inexorable, action of ice to which its origin is usually ascribed. All-embracing agents capable of acting violently and suddenly are required to account for the observable phenomena. Only water and wind possess those capacities.

The 'boulder clay' was almost certainly viscous when first deposited. Prior to attaining that consistency, however, it had existed on the original land surface as sand and soil particles which, from the earliest stages of the catastrophe onwards, were frequently disturbed by lightning strikes and heavily augmented by prodigious falls of volcanic ash and dust produced by the ever-increasing vulcanism. Super-cyclonic winds subsequently whirled up all this material from the pre-catastrophic landscape, depositing it as a great dusty mantle over hill and dale alike. Shortly afterwards it was converted into a great muddy paste by the Deluge waters which redistributed it tumultuously where we now find it. As we shall soon see, the Deluge was not long in materialising and apparently commenced its activities well before the super-winds were eventually dissipated. It was the combination of water and wind which bodily moved the 'drift' across the convulsed landscape. That much of the 'drift' was deposited in this manner is indicated by the presence in it, in many places, of upright tree stumps with their roots still firmly embedded in the original soils underlying the 'drift'. These stumps protrude upwards into the basal layers of the 'drift'. Had ice deposited the 'drift', then these stumps would have been obliterated. They were not.

Thus, terrible winds, whistling round the world, swept up masses of loose surface material and fanned the conflagration already in progress as the result of plate tectonics and rampant vulcanism engendered by the rotational and axial changes. The results were horrendous.

It is scarcely surprising, therefore, that descriptions of these stupendous winds feature in the ancient recollections of almost every nation of consequence. It was a wind without parallel – and, because it occurred at the time of the cosmic assailant Phaeton, was accorded a cosmic origin. This notion of a 'cosmic' wind is reiterated again and again in the Persian Avesta[124], in the Hindu Vedas, in the Babylonian Talmud, and by many authors of antiquity. It was also known as the 'diluvium venti' – the deluge of wind[125] – and was expressly attributed by the ancient Mesopotamians to Marduk (Phaeton) which is said to have:

> ...created the evil wind, and the tempest, and the hurricane, and the fourfold wind, and the sevenfold wind, and the whirlwind, and the wind which has no equal.[126].

In the Gilgamesh epic the duration of the wind is given as : "...six days and a night... the hurricane, deluge and tempest continued sweeping the land"[127]. The wind is described as a whirlwind or cyclone of unimaginable ferocity. We are told that: "The whirlwind of Adad swept up to heaven"[128], and was so awesome that even "The gods were terrified at the cyclone"[129].

Rabbinical records provide essentially the same information. They assert that the wind endured unabated for seven days and that it was accompanied by a darkness so intense that people did not stir from their homes and refuges during that period[130].

The pre-Columbian Maya records describe how these frightful winds demolished all towns, swept away whole forests, moved great rocks, and blew away entire hills[131], the latter, no doubt, being sand-hills or earthy mounds. The winds were regarded as the wrath of the Mayan god Hurakan, whose name, later corrupted to 'hurricane', was ever afterwards associated with winds of exceptional force and prolonged violence.

The Mayan claim that this super-cyclone moved giant rocks is, somewhat surprisingly, consistent with fact. Fig 5.14 shows one such rock which was thrown up a cliff about 39ft (12m) high and carried inland a further 97ft (30m), before being turned upside down by a hurricane which recently visited the east coast of Barbados[132]. Many further similar modern instances are known. Certainly large rocks can be, and are, moved by exceptional winds. Those comprising the 'diluvium venti' were more than exceptional.

Maori traditions connect this dreadful aeolian derangement with a gigantic cataclysm which permanently submerged an ancestral Pacific homeland. These describe them as: "...the mighty winds, the fierce squalls, the clouds, dense, dark, fiery, wildly drifting, wildly bursting"[133], which swept away vast forests and lashed the ocean waters into mountain-high waves.

It scarcely needs emphasising that this 'diluvium venti' created a tremendous din. Many traditions expressly refer to the appalling racket accompanying the Conflagration and the Deluge. Much of it was caused by these winds. Interestingly, the native North Americans link the winds and the noise they made with a celestial monster (Phaeton) which passed across the heavens near Earth, with:

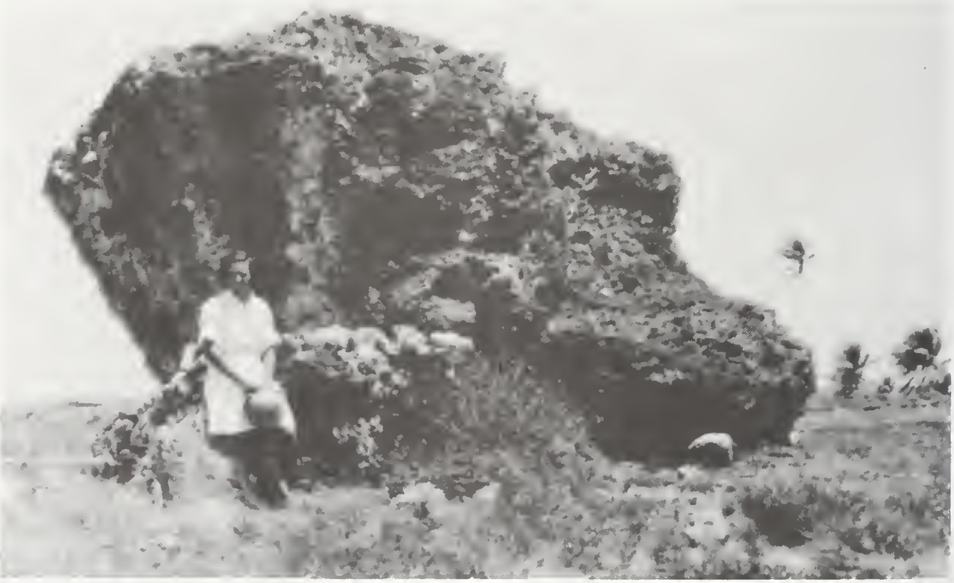

Fig 5.13. Large coral rock blown by a modern hurricane up a cliff and then inland, on eastern Barbados in the Windward Islands. Photo: C T Trechman, in Principles of Geology by A Holmes, 1964, by permission of Van Nostrand Reinhold (UK) and R S L, Oxford.

> ...a whistle in his mouth; as he moved forward he blew with all his might, and made a terrible noise... He came flowing and blowing; he looked like an enormous bat with wings spread.[134].

Marduk, which allegedly unleashed an 'evil wind' and 'fierce storm winds' to destroy Tiamat (see Part Four), evidently repeated the process when, in its guise as Phaeton, it confronted Earth at the time of the Noachian Deluge.

The absolute power of concentrated wind is often not sufficiently comprehended, especially in regions normally not experiencing it. It is, however, devastating. At Salt Creek, Iowa, for example, hurricane force winds on June 12th 1881 lifted cattle high into the air and flung them violently back onto the ground, killing them outright. Leaves on adjacent vegetation were withered as "by the heat of a fire". Simultaneously, stands of timber in Nevada were flattened and tree trunks hurled 500ft (153m) away, while a heavy goods train was blown off a nearby railroad track[135].

Regarding the unfortunate cattle of Salt Creek, one can appreciate how animals similarly exterminated during Phaeton's visit might be buried whole, their constituent bones broken or fractured internally but held in place by muscles, sinews and flesh externally; and how modern finds in 'drift' deposits of such bones with all the fragments still in relative position (but with the formerly surrounding flesh and soft tissues decayed away) perplex those still adhering to conventional 'Ice Age' concepts. In Part Two many such finds were noted, clearly indicating that whole animals had been interred coincidentally with the deposition of the 'drift'. Moreover, in view of the previously suggested aeolian involvement in the tumultuous deposition of the 'drift', it is not surprising that organic remains found in it were apparently subjected to the same action as the deposits enveloping them[136].

The Maori reference to 'fiery' winds seemingly alludes, at least in part, to airborne billows of ignited gases and a general fanning of the tremendous conflagration already raging then across much of the world. As we shall now see, it is a detail consistent with what must have happened at numerous localities.

Such huge fires – which at their height may have attained sub-continental extent – would themselves have created acute fire-storm conditions by sucking in air from surrounding regions on a retort basis. This is a well known aspect of particularly severe fires, and has been documented in connection with prairie fires, volcanic eruptions and giant fires in cities. A brief look at some of these provides telling glimpses of what occurred on Earth immediately before the onset of the Deluge.

Wind rushing in from all sides to fan 200ft (61.5m) high flames generated during a field fire at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, in 1783, were strong enough to lift large cut trees 50–60ft (15–18m) above the ground[137]. Other similar cases are known.

The bombing in World War II of Hamburg, Germany, on the night of July 27th 1943, led to an appalling fire-storm which raged on into the next day. Three years later exhaustive investigations pieced together the tragedy. Very dry weather conditions had preceded the bombing, and contributed greatly to the 'success' of the fire. The exceptional number of bombs dropped upon the city started so many fires simultaneously that a column of heated air, 11 miles (2.4km) in diameter and 21 miles (4km) high, formed above the centre of the fire[138]. Temperatures inside this fire area reached 800°C[139]. The water in the canals and port of Hamburg heated to the point where they were "hardly bearable"[140]. These details are strongly reminiscent of what occurred during Mt Pelée's 1902 destruction of Saint Pierre, when the fire-wave had melted glass (650–700°C) but not copper (1,058°C) and the harbour waters had boiled and steamed[141].

The Hamburg fires produced air turbulence fed by ground surface winds in-rushing from surrounding districts to replace those drawn up by the rising column of heated air. One and a half miles (2.4km) from the central fire area wind speeds varied from 11–33mph (18–53kph), whereas near the centre they reached typhoon strength, uprooted trees of all sizes and blew people off their feet. At first, the typhoon "...moved into the direction of the fires, later spreading in all directions"[142]. People perished not so much from exploding bombs or actual incineration but from the rapid loss or contamination of the atmosphere. Heat stroke, suffocation due to a lack of oxygen, carbon monoxide poisoning and inhalation of dust were among the causes established[143]. Unquestionably wind played the most critical role in this tragedy and, as the principal cause of atmospheric derangement and pollution, increased the final death toll far beyond that which could have been initially anticipated.

Almost precisely similar circumstances attended the even worse fire-storm that destroyed Chicago in 1871. Its horrors were carefully chronicled by Sheahan and Upton in their classic account of the event published within weeks of the calamity[144]. Although grim, their text sheds considerable light on the kind of fiery phenomena generated by Phaeton's visit. Tornado strength winds fanned the fire so fiercely that iron, granite, bricks and glass were melted and fused together in grotesque conglomerates, as if all had passed through a blast-furnace. Athens marble, which had been used to adorn certain city edifices, burned like common fuel[145]. The fire also doubled on its track at the Great Union Depot, and burned half a mile southward in the very teeth of the gale – a gale which blew a perfect tornado[146]. Another notable feature of this fire was its cleansing capacity:

> The most striking peculiarity of the fire was its intense heat. Nothing exposed to it escaped. Amid the hundreds of acres left bare there is not one to be found with a piece of wood of any description, and, unlike most fires, it left nothing half burned... The fire swept the streets of all the ordinary dust and rubbish, consuming it instantly.[147].

Sufficient data has been presented to show the devastating role of concentrated wind when combined with fire. On its own, fire is bad enough, and if winds are light or non-existent it can be contained. Accompanied by strong or gale force winds, however, fire becomes uncontrollable. It becomes rampant – wind exacerbates it. And when it attains the fury of a fire-storm, performs a remarkable cleansing role.

At this late date we can merely try to imagine what the great Conflagration of Phaeton's day must have been like. The mind almost refuses to accommodate all the interrelated relevant factors, while the sheer scale of it encourages the mind to recoil from a picture so terrifying as to be numbing. Frightful though they were, the Mt Pelée fire-wave, the Hamburg fire-storm, and the great Chicago fire were miniature events when compared with Phaeton's Conflagration. Whole continents were on fire with flames that we are told "reached to heaven". Certainly it was the worst holocaust ever experienced by humankind. And winds of staggering force and power were a part of it, just as they seem to have been during the Deluge which, following hard on the heels of the Conflagration, extinguished it.

7

BOMBARDMENT

It is surprising to discover on the gentle terrain of the Atlantic Coastal Plain, with no concealing cover or topography, one of the Earth's most immense, spectacular and intriguing topographical phenomena. Seen from the air the Carolina bays are an astounding, unforgettable revelation. But though hundreds of thousands lie clearly visible, scattered across the Atlantic Coastal Plain from Maryland into northern Florida, they are often all but unrecognisable to the uninitiated eyes of groundlings.[148].

So wrote Henry Savage jr in his recent study of these extraordinary ground features which, although most abundant near or along the Atlantic coast, also occur far inland[149]. They almost certainly occur, too, as submerged structures on the adjacent Atlantic continental shelf. The term 'Carolina Bays' is thus a misnomer: they are not bays and extend far beyond Carolina. First mentioned in 1847, when comparatively few were noted[150], the true distribution of these shallow crater-like depressions was not appreciated until the 1930s following the advent of aerial photography. Today about half a million 'bays', both complete and vestigial, have been recorded. Of these: "...140,000 are large-to-medium sized, having lengths of more than 500ft"[151]. Their shapes are also particularly intriguing, for:

> ...Although most bays approximate an elliptical shape, they vary greatly in ellipticity. Generally, the smaller the bay the more nearly round it becomes. Although there are numerous bays that are almost perfect ellipses, the variations from that geometrical perfection are many and diverse. Often bays are asymmetrical, their north-east sides being significantly more curved than their south-west sides... More frequent variations from elliptical perfection are the ovate bays. These egg-shaped bays likewise vary greatly among themselves, running the gamut from extremely elongated ones to some almost circular in shape. Among the ovate bays marked geographical correlations have been observed. As one moves south-westwardly from the South Carolina-North Carolina border bays tend to become increasingly ovate in shape. A similar tendency appears as one moves west across the coastal plain.[152]

Respecting their sizes and distribution:

> ...There are some immense bays such as Big Swamp Bay... in central South Carolina, nearly four miles long. In striking contrast some of its tiny neighbours are only three or four hundred feet long... Very large bays occur mostly in the area of bay concentration in south-east North Carolina and north-east South Carolina. They become markedly less frequent the farther they are from that region. So too does the rate of bay occurrence diminish, and when they do occur in the most distant areas they usually appear in groups widely separated from other groups.[153]

Although like several other authors Velikovsky boldly stated that: "...A remarkable feature of these depressions is their parallelism: the long axis of each of them extends from north-west to south-east..."[154]. This comment actually applies to comparatively few 'bays', since, overall, their alignment varies considerably and does so systematically on a geographical basis. For example:

> Bays in the area of the border between the Carolinas display a generally north> west/south-east orientation. However, as one moves up the coast there is a tendency for bays to become more and more easterly in orientation, until in Maryland they approach an east-west direction. Likewise, as one moves down the coastal plain the 'bays' long axes tend to rotate in a clockwise direction, until those found in south Georgia generally display an almost north-south orientation. A similar effect can be observed as one moves from east to west.[155].

The significance of this important fact, which clearly relates to the cause of the formation of the 'bays', will be discussed later. Various explanations for the formation of these curious structures have been proposed down the years. The earliest advocated a combination of artesian springs and wind action[156]. Another argued that the 'bays' possibly evolved from drowned valleys blocked by sandbars when the coastal plain hosting them emerged from the sea[157], while a third postulated that they possibly resulted from a process of natural solution of sandy sediments[158]. Studies of the 'bays' in the Carolinas suggested to Melton[159] and others[160] that they probably represented ancient meteor scars dating from 'late Pleistocene' ('Ice Age') times[161].

Other explanations involved supposed gyroscopic eddy effects[162], air shock waves generated by aerially-exploding meteors[163], giant prehistoric fish spawning-beds[164], the action of dust devils[165] and stranded icebergs[166].

Another hypothesis[167] suggested that the 'bays' were made by a comet which crashed into the eastern United States long ago. We now know, of course, that even large comets apparently lack sufficient mass to cause crustal damage like that represented by the 'Carolina bays'. More feasible, however, was the suggestion that the 'bays' were of meteoric origin[168], especially as magnetometer studies of them in North Carolina hinted that buried meteoritic debris existed in association with those structures. Previously it had been noted that unusually high concentrations of meteorites existed inland from the main 'bays' area (map 5C), and in 1952 this was stressed as good evidence of such an origin[169].

Yet whatever the cause of the formation of the 'bays', it must have been extensive, sudden and violent. Not long ago, the high probability of this came to light in a lengthy farm drainage trench dug near Camden, South Carolina, which, at an average depth of 14ft (4.3m), exposed masses of prostrate trees at its base. Many were of large size and all indicated the former occurrence of a sudden "massive blowdown"[170]. If the 'bays' are low-level aerial blast effects, then, granted that the ancient landscape was well forested, the occurrence of calamitously-felled timber in their immediate vicinity could not only be expected but would be consistent with such an explanation.

Interestingly, Henry Savage jr, the latest investigator of these 'bays', has also advocated a celestial cause for their origin, placing that event at the end of the 'mammoth' age ('late Pleistocene' times in conventional chronology), an age which, we have already seen, terminated abruptly and violently everywhere during Phaeton's visit. If the conclusions of Savage and others like him are correct, then the Carolina 'bays' might very well represent yet further physical reminders of the Phaeton disaster.

The likelihood that numerous similar 'bays' lie submerged on the continental shelf east of the Carolinas has encouraged investigations of what may be an immense impact crater on the floor of the Atlantic near Bermuda. A collision between Earth and a gigantic meteor has been suggested as the origin of this drowned feature, described by Kelly and Dachaille as follows:

> This great undersea crater has a rim that stretches for hundreds of miles in a great circle beginning at a point north and east of Puerto Rico and curving past the Bahamas, the Carolina coast, and north and east along the Atlantic coast until it loses itself in the deep ocean off the New England coast. There is a very sudden break, almost a cliff, where the continental shelf (crater rim) breaks off into the deep ocean. The Bahama Islands form the south wall of this crater. They rise only a few feet above sea level but they form an undersea cliff that is nearly 700 miles long. Between the Great Bahama Bank and the islands of Cuba and

P NJ
70°
40
I
O
M
D
WV
V
K
NC
35
T
SC
A
G 30
F
25
75°
90°
85°
80° miles
0
100
200
0
100 200 kilometres
Area of very abundant 'bays'
Area of abundant meteorites
Area of abundant 'bays'
Area of frequent 'bays'
Letter abbreviation
A Alabama
D Delaware
F Florida
G Georgia
I Indiana
K Kentucky
M Maryland
NC North Carolina
NJ New Jersey
O Ohio
P Pennsylvania
SC South Carolina
T Tennessee
V Virginia
WV West Virginia

Map 5C. Areas of abundant meteorites and Carolina 'bays' in the eastern United States. After Prouty, Johnson, Savage and other sources.

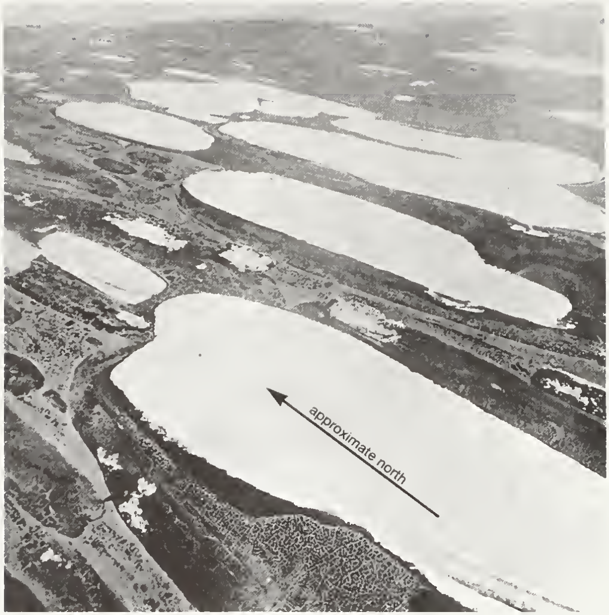

Fig 5.14. Aerial view of some of the oriented lakes near Point Barrow, Alaska. With permission of the Univ of Chicago and R S L, Oxford.

Haiti, there is a secondary channel that is nearly half as deep as the main crater basin. The islands of Cuba, Haiti and Puerto Rico are the mountains that form the remains of the outer crater rim, and the Brownson and Bartlett Deeps are the down-warped troughs that are common to many of the other great collision points that we shall mention later.

The floor of this great impact crater is also consistent with what might be expected. It slopes in every direction from the central peak (Bermuda) gradually growing deeper toward the rim, although it averages deeper on the south and south-west than it does on the north. It is somewhat ovoid in shape, being longer from north-east to south-west; the distance from Bermuda to Cape Hatteras being about 600 miles and from Bermuda to the Bahamas about 750 miles... The Bermuda central peak is surrounded on all sides by deep ocean, reaching a depth of 2,500 fathoms within a few miles from shore. From this point it gradually deepens outwardly in all directions for about 300 miles where it levels off and continues at about the same depth until it meets the sudden rise of the crater wall. This wall averages nearly 17,000ft and in places more than 18,000ft and this in a distance of no more than 15 or 20 miles. If one could remove the water and stand on the bottom of this crater one would look up at a mountain wall almost three times as high as the Grand Canyon is deep, and almost as steep. The deepest part of the crater lies at the end of the Bahama chain and athwart the Mona Passage between Haiti and Puerto Rico. This is the Brownson Deep which is 4,780 fathoms or 28,680ft. It is a comparatively narrow trench... and probably indicates a down-warping of the crust or an in-falling of molten magma at the time of the collision.[171].

As direct observations are inevitably limited, it is presently impossible to positively assert that the above structures do collectively represent an ancient impact crater. Nevertheless, the known physical evidence is decidedly thought-provoking, and it must be noteworthy that it is located eastward of the general area of the Carolina 'bays'. Furthermore, it would indeed be remarkable if entirely separate events, possibly spanning millions of years, contrived to place in such close geographical juxtaposition sets of major topographical features forming a seemingly natural west-to-east sequence – an area of prolific small meteorites progressing via abundant larger 'bays' to an immense crater-like structure – suggestive of one or more impacting cosmic bodies.

The Carolina 'bays', however, are not entirely unique. Similar concentrations of oriented shallow depressions ('lakes') exist on the Alaskan permafrost near Point Barrow – and, like their southern analogues, they are mostly aligned north-west to south-east. They also extend, or must have once extended, northwards across the floor of the Arctic Ocean.

Oval, elliptical, or greatly elongated in shape (no circular examples are known) they number many thousands and cover more than 25,000 sq miles (64,750km^2). In size, they range from 9 miles (14.4km) long and 3 miles (4.8km) wide to 1 mile (1.6km) or less long and 1 mile (0.8km) or less wide. Some are water-filled, but others are quite dry, the latter revealing that many depressions overlap upon one another and must have been created successively (see fig 5.15). Very interestingly, a 'late Pleistocene' or early Holocene date has been suggested for these features[172].

Early studies of these 'lakes' concluded that many, if not all of them, represented land surface 'cave-ins' resulting from the thawing of otherwise permanently frozen ground[173]. 'Caving', however, cannot produce extensive regional orientation or cause apparently newer 'lakes' to impinge on older (and presumably 'caved-in') 'lakes'. Only some aerial cause could produce such effects.

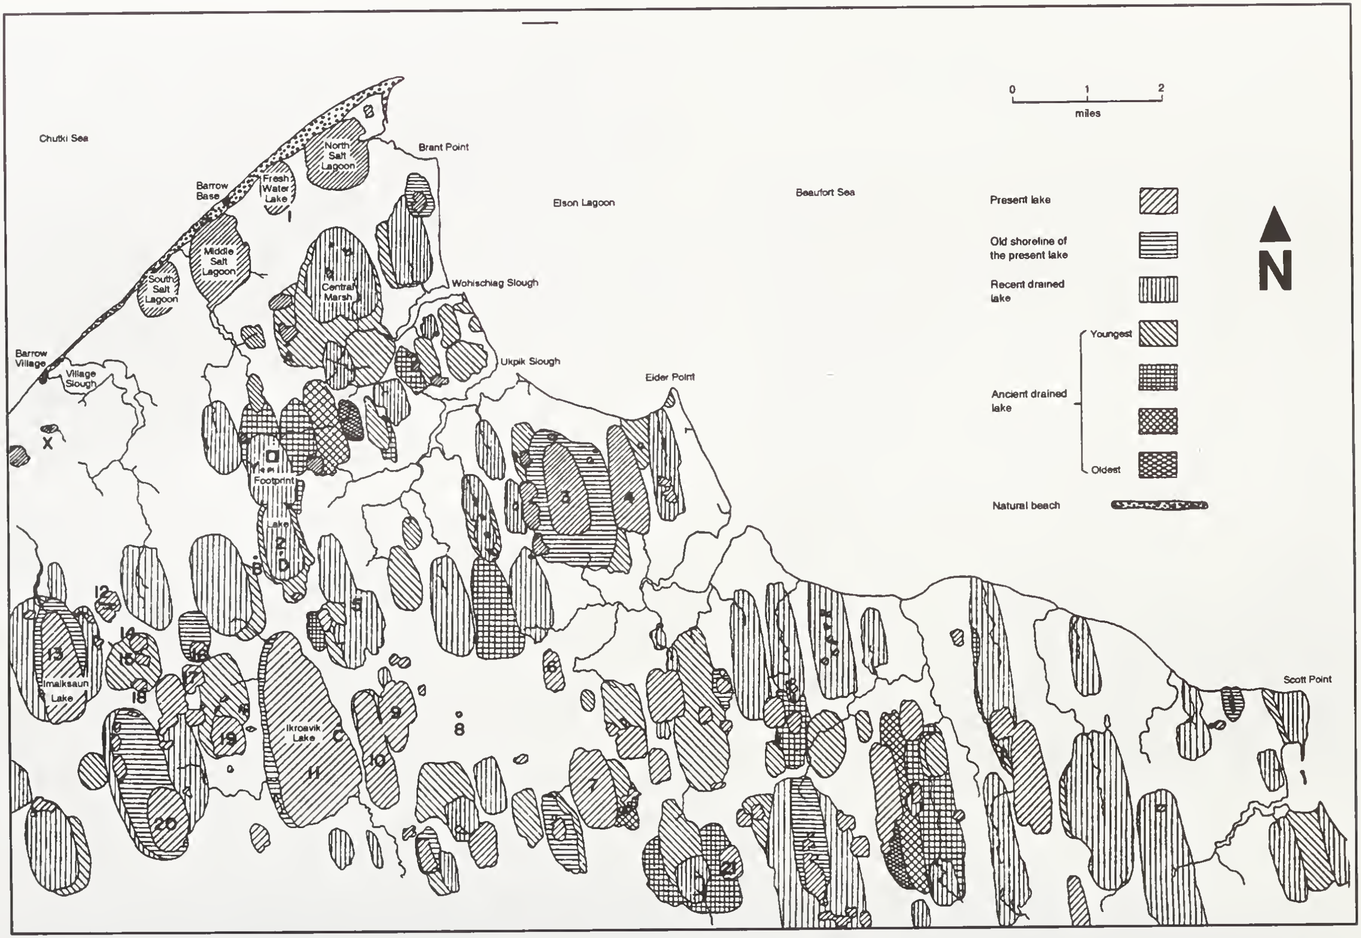
These 'lakes' bear close comparison not only with others in the Harrison Bay area of Alaska, where they are also aligned north-west to south-east[174], and on the Old Crow Plain (west of the Mackenzie Valley) in Yukon, Canada[175], but also with others believed to be of Quaternary age in the valleys of the Penzhina and Anadyr rivers in north-eastern Siberia[176]. These latter reportedly vary in diameter from several hundred feet to as much as 3 miles (5km), are generally oblong or elongated, and are remarkably shallow. Nor should we forget that, as previously remarked, shallow, swampy 'lakes' close to the north Siberian mammoth graveyards are stated to have been formed under exceptional circumstances.

Rather unexpectedly, a further group of over 200 shallow 'lakes', also generally aligned north-west to south-east, covers more than 45,000 sq miles (116,550km^2) of the Beni region of north-eastern Bolivia in South America. In size, they range from about 1,000ft square (307m^2) to 5.4 by 12.4 miles (8.6 x 20km). Again, some are water-filled, others are dry. Most exhibit rectilinear or oval shapes, although a few irregular shaped examples also exist. The oval 'lakes' are particularly noteworthy for having one rim more developed than the others, exactly as in many of the Carolina 'bays' and the Old Crow Plain 'lakes' (see table 5B), and, as with many of those structures, also lack stream inlets or outlets[177].

The arguments advanced to account for the Carolina 'bays', and the oriented 'lakes' of Canada, Alaska and Siberia, which call for ice, 'cave-ins', or the collapse of portions of ancient buried valleys, scarcely apply in tropical Bolivia, yet, the South American examples are seemingly explicable by a single event responsible for all these remarkable geographically scattered features.

Oval crater-like ground structures, closely resembling th Carolina 'bays' also exist in the Netherlands, where they are, however, far less obvious than their American counterparts through having been largely obscured by agricultural and constructional activities[178]. Significantly, many erratic boulders composed of rocks not now found closer than Finland and Scandinavia occur near these depressions, the long axes of which, moreover, are predominantly north-northwest to south-southeast.

At Tapanui, north of Invercargill at the south-eastern end of South Island, New Zealand, an extensive, largely triangular area is notable for yielding unusual quantities of small metallic fragments and stony objects known locally as 'China-stones'. The latter contain carbonised



0
1
2 miles
Chutki Sea
Brant Point
Barrow Base
Elson Lagoon
Beaufort Sea
North Salt Lagoon
Fresh Water Lake
Middle Salt Lagoon
South Salt Lagoon
Central Marsh
Wohischiag Slough
Ukpik Slough
Elder Point
Barrow Village
Village Slough
Footprint Lake
Imalksaun Lake
Ikroavik Lake
Scott Point
Present lake
Old shoreline of the present lake
Recent drained lake
Ancient drained lake Youngest Oldest Natural beach
N
X
B
C
D
1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21

Map 5D. Oriented lakes near Point Barrow on the north coast of Alaska.

Table 5B

Comparison of the Alaskan lakes, the Carolina 'bays' and the Beni Basin, Bolivia

(After Plafker G, Prouty W F, Johnson D)

	Northern Alaska	Old Crow Plain Yukon Territory	Carolina 'Bays'	Beni Basin
Area	More than 25,000 sq miles	About 3,000sq m	Between 25,000 and 40,000 sq m	Total area approx 45,000 sq m limited to Beni Basin
Number	Probably tens of thousands of lakes or lake basins	Several hundred oriented lakes	About 500, 000 'bays'	Roughly 2,000 oriented lakes and dry lakes
Axial orientation	North-west	North-west	North-west	Majority trend from N40ºE to N55ºE with average N48ºE. Subordinate trend from N50ºW to N30ºW with average N41ºW. Minor amount almost square
Size	Vary from 9m long and 3m wide to 1m long by ½m wide	From very small to 6½m long by 3½m wide	Vary from a few hundred ft in diameter to 3-7m long and 2+m wide	Several hundred ft in greatest diameter, to 12.4m long by 5.4m wide
Shape	Elliptical, cigar-shaped, ovoid rectangular, compound	Rectangular, elliptical, compound	Elliptical, ovoid	Square; rectangular; groups of adjacent rectangles; elliptical (many with one side more strongly curved than the other); irregular
Depth	From less than 10ft to 60-70ft below surrounding plain	Reportedly very shallow	From 1-2ft to 30-40ft below surrounding plain	Roughly 75ft maximum reported
Shorelines	Outline of many lakes smoothly curved	Appear smoothly curved on oblique air photo	Shorelines smoothly curved	Generally smooth outlines; in detail most are finely embayed or jagged
Relationship	Lakes parallel, intersect or overlap one another	Lakes parallel one another, rarely intersecting or overlapping	Bays parallel, intersect or overlap one another. Some bays lie within others	Lakes parallel one another; rarely intersect or overlap
Linear arrangement	Rows of lakes present in some localities	Rows of lakes present in some localities	Rows of lakes present in some localities. Parallelism along axes of ovoid. Longest axes running NW-SE	Rows of lakes present in several localities
Cross-section shape	1. Shallow with concave profile; 2. Deep central portion surrounded by a shallow shelf	Described as shallow	Shallow, concave, deepest toward SE end with a higher rim	Pan-shaped with abrupt, steep sides and flat bottoms
Age	Probably 'Pleistocene' to recent	No data	'Pleistocene'	Probably recent Note: m = miles.

fragments of 'late Pleistocene' plants and animals. Hand-held compasses also regularly behave wildly in this area.

In combination, these details raise the possibility that this is another area over which a large aerial explosion (like those suggested as the cause underlying the creation of the Carolina 'bays') occurred in 'late Pleistocene' times – a date agreeing remarkably well with the 11,500 years BP date advocated in this book for the Phaeton disaster. In this case, however, no shallow-rimmed craters were formed. Rather interestingly, however, Maori traditions refer to an immense aerial detonation occurring over South Island long ago, when a huge horned celestial object, "glowing like the Moon". split apart and crashed to Earth, causing widespread devastation.

In 1951, Kelly[179] suggested that the Carolina 'bays', the supposed Bermuda 'crater' and the oriented 'lakes' around Barrow Point all originated during 'late Pleistocene' times through Earth's collision with a giant meteor or series of meteors, which jolted the terrestrial pole from an older position centred on Apatak Island in Ungava Bay, Quebec, to its present location. While we do not necessarily agree with this theory, it is nevertheless a most interesting one.

All the aforementioned structures lie along a single curving course. If we add the Russian, Harrison Bay and Old Crow Plain Map 5E. Possible polar flight-paths of disintegrating aerial objects theoretically responsible for oriented lakes, Carolina 'bays' and an alleged crater on the floor of the Atlantic Ocean at the time of the Phaeton disaster. The recently discovered 'craters' at Duolon (A) and the Amirantes area of the Indian Ocean are not necessarily any part of the events depicted on this map. Their locations, however, suggest that some association may exist. Accordingly, their suggested pre-impact flight-paths are shown dotted. Partially based on Kelly and Dachaille.

sets of oriented 'lakes' to Kelly's map we find that they too generally straddle the same curving course. Dare we accept this coincidence? The overall impression received is that of some large disintegrating body nearing the Earth on a curved trajectory over the northern hemisphere, and of pieces of it breaking off en route and striking the ground or exploding a short distance above ground-level at those places where the above-noted 'bays', 'lakes' and supposed 'crater' now occur as reviewed by Silver and Schuttz.[361]

Using the reported alignments of the Bolivian and Dutch structures, it is also possible to interpret them as analogous effects, created by related pieces of the same disintegrating object, ending their careers over Bolivia and the Netherlands respectively (see map 5E). Certainly the long list of similarities between all these topographical features (table 5B) strongly suggests that they shared a common origin. Indeed, how many coincidences are tolerable before definite causal connection between these topographical features becomes irrefutable?

Exciting though such an interpretation may seem, does it really reflect reality or even the sequence of events which can be inferred as having probably comprised that phase of the Phaeton catastrophe? The testimony of tradition, representing the only surviving eye-witness record of that terrible event, supplies several interesting clues partly answering this question.

8

HELL ON EARTH

No matter which account we study, the principal assailant in the great cosmic drama under discussion is almost always stated to have been accompanied by several lesser but highly destructive 'attendants'. The Babylonian account provides the assailant Marduk with four 'assistants' early in his wanderings amongst the outer planets. Later, after the battle with Tiamat, it reportedly acquired Tiamat's satellite Kingu as well as dismembered pieces of Tiamat too. By the time Marduk (Phaeton) neared Earth it did so in company with quite an entourage of lesser objects.

Likewise, the Midgård Serpent of Norse tradition was attended by the Fenris-Wolf, Garm, Surt and Loke; while in the Bundahish, Tistrya is accompanied by the Pairikas or 'worm-stars' and the 'angels' Vohuman, Hôm and Bûrg[180]. The solar horses, which in Greek legend pull Phaeton's fiery chariot, is a poetic way of saying that fiery and effulgent objects accompanied and preceded it through the heavens. Biblical texts mention an 'evil host' accompanying Satan or the dragon during the 'war in Heaven', while the Vedic hymns of ancient India describe Indra (Phaeton) as travelling across the firmament with a band of destructive entities known as Maruts, who are repeatedly described as 'blazing', 'brilliant with fire', 'shining like snakes' (with long trailing tails), the 'terrible ones' and the 'shakers of Heaven and Earth'[181].

Such traditions clearly record that several fiery or luminous objects arrived simultaneously in the neighbourhood of Earth at the time of the Phaeton disaster, and that these were largely subordinate to Phaeton irrespective of the name by which Phaeton was locally remembered.

As the following excerpts suggest, it was widely believed that several if not all of these unwelcome visitors crashed down upon

Earth to be buried deep below its surface in a vast chasm – which later came to be regarded as Hell itself. Describing this event, the Book of Revelation informs us:

> And there was a war in Heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon, and the dragon fought with his angels. And prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in Heaven. And the dragon was cast out... he was cast into the Earth, and his angels were cast out with him.[182]

The same source provides further details about what can only have been a cosmic bombardment during the course of this 'war', and refers to various other effects considered previously. We are told that first there was "silence in Heaven about the pace of half an hour"[183]. This was succeeded by "thunderings and lightnings, and an earthquake"[184], after which the Earth was showered by "hail and fire mingled with blood"[185], which consumed trees and grass. Then a "great mountain burning with fire was cast into the sea: and the third part of the sea became blood", which, evidently poisoning the waters, occasioned widespread loss of marine life[186].

This event was followed by the falling of a "great star from Heaven, burning as (if) it were a lamp"[187]. This star was called Wormwood because it allegedly made "a third part of the waters" of the world bitter and undrinkable[188]. This heralded a general blotting out of the Sun, Moon and stars, after which another "star fell from Heaven unto Earth; and to him was given the key to the bottomless pit. And he opened the bottomless pit; and there arose a smoke out of the pit, as the smoke of a great furnace; and the Sun and the air were darkened by reason of the smoke of the pit"[189].

Finally there appeared "a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his head. And his tail drew the third part of the stars of Heaven, and did cast them to the Earth"[190]. This same red dragon was then "cast down" onto the Earth and a vast flood issued from its mouth[191], and it uttered "blasphemies" (awful sounds) from the mouths of its seven heads which continued to be emitted for "forty and two months"[192].

These extraordinary passages clearly state that, during a tremendous cosmic conflict, several of the participating bodies actually crashed to Earth. Although we are not told in which hemisphere these objects fell, they reportedly came down well apart – one in a chasm, one in the sea, another which rendered waters undrinkable, and one (a 'dragon'-like body) which inferentially fell on land. Very likely most of these objects vaporised or totally disintegrated before making physical contact with the terrestrial surface (excepting the supposed impact crater off the eastern coast of the United States), this occurring a short distance above ground level.

At the time, 'collapsed sky' conditions had already been established over many regions, the thick, particle-charged atmosphere contributing materially to the ultimate combustion of most of the falling bodies.

Widespread atmospheric derangements must also have occurred as prominent subsidiary effects in the vicinity of each blast area. Respecting these, it is surely significant that several ancient texts aver that, when these 'stars' and the 'dragon' fell to Earth, "Heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together, and every mountain and island moved out of their place" (our italics)[193], and that Heaven was "cloven"[194] or "rent in twain"[195]. The Norse epics significantly mention that the "sons of Muspelheim" (Phaeton's attendants) "ride" through this opening as they plummet earthwards[196].

The power and velocity of these blasts and shock waves must have been appalling, and the associated wind speeds phenomenal. No organism, large or small, within scores of miles of the blast areas could have survived. Needless to add, sudden local withdrawals of air sucked into these areas by the final vaporising explosions would have been lethal for all air-breathing inhabitants of the affected regions.

Especially interesting at this juncture is the multi-headed 'dragon'. Not improbably it represents the state of the last major remnants of Kingu which, at the time, were cascading earthwards as burning masses of jagged material superficially resembling a 'horned dragon'. Presumably, the burning mountain, the 'star' named Wormwood and the 'star' associated with the 'bottomless pit' were other large pieces of Kingu preceding the 'dragon'-like portion to Earth.

* See Note 18.

We should particularly note that Michael (really Phaeton) did not succumb in this drama, and that in Greek legend it was Phaeton's chariot and steeds which disintegrated and fell to Earth, just as, in Ute Indian tradition, it was a wayward sun god called Ta-vi and not the opposing solar hero Ta-wats (Phaeton) who was "shivered into a thousand fragments which fell to Earth".

Thus it was not Phaeton, but its 'attendants' which plummeted to earth, and it was Kingu which, venturing into the terrestrial Roche zone, disintegrated and plunged earthwards in mighty blazing fragments. The lurid spectacle of this falling debris doubtless rivalled Phaeton itself in brilliance, amid the extensive gloom of 'collapsed sky' conditions, evidently leading terrified eye-witnesses unable to view events in their entirety to assume that it was actually Phaeton which was crashing.

Biblical and other texts refer to these falling objects as 'angels'. The Epistle of Jude, for example, states:

> And the angels which kept not their first estate, but left their habitation [Heaven], He [God] hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgement of the great day.[197].

A very similar statement occurs in the Epistle of Peter, which tells us:

> For... God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgement.[198]

All religions and mythologies which speak of Hell or a Hell-like realm invariably regard it as the abode of Satan and demons and as a place characterised by fire – everlasting fire. In the apocryphal Book of Enoch Hell is described as a vast abyss at "...the end of Earth and Heaven; here is the prison of the stars which had transgressed God's will... Here shall be confined the angels..."[199]. The same source elsewhere tells us: "And God confined the angels... in the fiery valley in the west... [where were] melted mountains of metal...", during a frightful natural convulsion when "heaven fell upon Earth [collapsed sky] and the Earth was swallowed up by an immense abyss [crustal dislocation]; and hills crowded on hills, and mountains on mountains [plate tectonics]"[200]. These awful events occurred when "...the waters boiled... and the Ark floated upon the water"[201], an assertion confirmed by Peter in his second Epistle when he stated that God "spared not the old world, but saved Noah the eighth person... bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly"[202].

These are clear references to the contemporaneity of the Deluge (Noah's), a cosmic conflict (the 'war in heaven') and the fall of celestial objects (rebellious 'angels' from Heaven). In several accounts, the latter were somehow confused or connected with a race of antediluvian giants traditionally associated with the north or the west. Thus Merezhkovsky, who equated the giants with 'fallen angels' (Phaeton's attendants), concluded:

> In the Book of Enoch, the human giants of the pre-flood world, the 'Sons of God', the ben Elohim, the fallen angels, are men of the extreme west.[203].

Norse epics place their abode in the far north-west:

> Far in the north-west – to all nations in our hemisphere [northern] the abode of darkness – is Jotunheim, where the giants dwell...[204]

The direction from which the celestial objects came that were apparently responsible for creating the oriented 'lakes', 'bays' and 'craters' was north or north-west relative to the present North Pole. Moreover, except for the Dutch 'bays', all these features lie far west or north-west of Europe and Asia Minor where these traditions have been preserved.

A definite northern source for this bombardment is seemingly implied in those traditions which mention the Bifrost Bridge. The Norse Eddas state that this bridge, allegedly constructed by the gods during the wonderful primeval Golden Age, existed near Meru in the formerly equable North Polar latitudes. When the Midgård Serpent and its associates assaulted Earth, the Bifrost Bridge was reputedly set on fire, and it broke up under the onslaught of the 'sons of Muspelheim", who are said to have ridden through a 'cloven' heaven. A huge fiery chasm opened beneath the bridge, into which it collapsed. This was presumably the 'immense abyss' and 'fiery valley' which scriptural texts locate at the 'end of Earth and Heaven' (exactly where the Eddas place the Bifrost Bridge), and where the 'prison' of the 'stars which had transgressed' was situated.

The opening up of a large fiery chasm at or near the North Pole seems scarcely credible, until it is realised that the pole concerned was not the present one but that of the precatastrophic world, which was located a considerable distance from the site of its modern counterpart. Was the final resting place ('prison' or 'fiery valley') of at least some of these celestial objects ('fallen angels') therefore some site now north-west of the present North Pole – a site which, at the time, had split open as a gigantic crustal fracture exposing sub-adjacent molten magma, or which had collapsed en bloc through crustal dislocation and had begun to fill with erupting magma?

The previously-mentioned references to 'everlasting chains under darkness' and the widely-held concept of hell as the domain of raging fire may thus signify gravitational or electromagnetic capture (chaining) on the one hand, and the exposure, through lithospheric fracturing, to fire on the other. Subsequent cooling and solidifying of the magma below which the 'fallen angels' allegedly lay buried would thus explain the added phrase 'under darkness'.

No exceptionally large crustal fractures that could now be termed an abyss or chasm have been traced in latitudes northwards of Spitzbergen, although the great world crack discussed in Part One runs as far North as that archipelago, and can be followed across the floor of the Arctic Ocean to the Russian mainland immediately south-west of the New Siberian Islands[205]. Much of the north polar region, however, generally exhibits evidence of massive and geologically recent crustal shortening, suggesting of a former folding-in upon itself of the lithosphere there. One such example concerns the Barents Sea and the anomalous depths of the Eurasian Basin (Nansen Basin) and its margins which:

> ...represent a regional collapse of the Earth's surface due to material being removed from the lower mantle.[206] (Our italics).

It would, of course, be premature to insist that this north polar crustal shortening in any way supports the admittedly unverifiable claims of ancient literature, tradition and legend. We merely draw attention here to its existence, its location and its inferred cause, and to the fact that several apparently similar crustal collapse areas lie along or near the line of the previously-mentioned oriented 'lakes'.

A particularly large and geologically recent instance has been noted immediately east of the Kamchatka peninsula. This location lies close to the suggested trajectory of the object or objects advocated as having caused the oriented 'lakes' of Siberia and Alaska and over which, we submit, must have passed the group of objects which eventually came down over north-eastern Bolivia. If the flight-lines produced by aligning these groups of oriented 'lakes' and 'bays' are extended back towards a point of convergence, that point lies in the southern hemisphere. This detail becomes interesting when we recall that several Asiatic accounts of these celestial assailants specifically state that they initially arrived from the south. Again, can apparent concordance between such intrinsically dissimilar details be entirely coincidental?

The preceding reconstruction of what appears to have occurred immediately after the disintegration of Kingu imparts new significance to the hitherto curious belief among many peoples that the 'devil' or 'dragon' once flung huge stones great distances over the terrestrial landscape.

Numerous independent traditions about the Phaeton disaster refer to rocks, stones and dust being cast down upon the Earth by the main celestial antagonists at the time of that dire event. Sometimes these missiles are described as 'hail' and as falling 'mingled with fire' or accompanied by loud or frightening noises. Conventional icy hail does not fall with fire and, even in heavy falls, is not particularly noisy. Obviously a different kind of 'hail' is meant. The following examples reveal that the 'hail' was largely stony.

The pre-Columbian Toltecs assert that long ago "there fell a rain of gravel" accompanied by a "rain of fire", when "all which existed burned"[207]. A Peruvian recollection tells of a vast stone which "fell from Heaven to Earth and broke into sixteen hundred pieces"[208]. Algonquin legends refer to a tremendous primeval battle between the celestial brothers Manibozho and Chakekenapok. The former prevailed and broke Chakekenapok into many pieces which he "scattered over the land" when "the face of nature was desolated by a tornado", "...the gigantic bowlders and loose rocks found on the prairies are the missiles hurled by the mighty combatants"[209].

Early Mexican accounts of the same event mention that the sky "rained not water but fire and red-hot stones"[210], and that the stones "...levelled whole forests"[211]. In the Old World, an ancient tradition from the Atlas Mountains near Bou-Merzoug asserts that long ago "...a wicked people lived there, and for their sins stones were rained upon them from heaven"[212]. Buddhist texts on world cycles say similar things: "There arises a wind to destroy the world cycle... it rains a fine dust... boulders as large ...as mighty trees on the hilltops... [it] turns the ground upside down... [when] worlds clash with worlds"[213]. Even the early Chinese believed that planets closely approaching Earth (which, of course, they do not) occasion great showers of stones[214].

This near-universal belief that ages ago Earth and everything upon it was bombarded by a multitude of cosmic missiles, both large and small, fiery and stony, cannot be without foundation, particularly when those same beliefs specifically correlate that event with a mighty celestial conflict and tremendous physical changes on Earth. We have seen that several terrestrial regions host the remarkable youthful ground structures of 'bays' and 'lakes' which, in the light of all present evidence, are best explained as blast effects caused by large concentrations of aerially-detonating bodies. The fact that they lie in parallel rows and chains, often overlapping each other, strongly supports that interpretation. Furthermore, their general close proximity and their localisation (in groups) in particular areas indicate the involvement of veritable swarms of objects, with their detonations following one another in rapid succession.

Rains of fire can only signify falls of burning gases or hydrocarbons, or both. Several authorities, including T A Link[215], argued that petroleum residue traced in some meteorites possibly indicates that both meteorites and petroleum are remnants of a former, but now disintegrated planet-like body on which petroleum had been present, and that such a body existed between the present Martian and Jovian orbits. This is precisely where Tiamat and Kingu apparently once existed.

The great majority of these missiles can only have been fragments of the disintegrated Kingu, which, on exploding, must have hurled burning pieces of itself literally in all directions. Those nearest Earth inevitably hurtled through the atmosphere towards the crust, igniting and fragmenting as they did so. Those thrown away from Earth may have completely escaped Earth's gravitational field and gone great distances into interplanetary space before settling down into eccentric orbits. The origin of the meteor swarms and bands of comparatively small, apparently stony, maverick objects occupying interplanetary space between the Sun and Jupiter, of which numerous sightings have been made for centuries (see Appendix C) may also be explained by this disintegration.

9

IRON BOUND

Many traditional accounts of this awful calamity mention sticky or inflammable blood-like fluids falling from the sky as 'hot naphtha', 'bitumen' or 'rains of fire'. The possible hydrocarbon origins of some have already been touched upon, while we may also reasonably infer that the fluids described as blood-like consisted not of blood but of a red or brownish-red liquid. In one account from Finland it is compared to a 'red milk'[216]. This description suggests that it was thick and opaque. Like the sticky and inflammable substances, these red 'rains' were inimical to terrestrial life.

Traditions refer to these blood-like rains many times. Mt Haemus in Thrace, for example, was anciently so named because of the "stream of blood which gushed out on the mountain" when a 'thunderbolt' (a massive electrical discharge) struck Typhon (Phaeton) during its flight over the Balkans[217]. The Orphic hymns of classical Greece refer to remotely early times when, as Earth "groaned fearfully" amid terrible convulsions, a discoloured sea was "troubled with its purple waves"[218].

The Tatars of Central Asia remember a great world conflagration preceded by a 'rain of blood' which turned the "whole world red"[219], while in the afore-cited Babylonian epic the entire world is said to have been coloured red by the 'blood' of the vanquished Tiamat[220]. We also recall the 'hail mingled with blood' mentioned in the version of this cataclysm given in the Book of Revelation[221]. A similar statement in the Apocalypse of Thomas avers that "a great cloud of blood shall come down... a rain of blood upon all the Earth"[222]. Even the Maya of pre-Colombian Mexico remember a time of tremendous world upheaval when the waters of all the rivers turned to a bloody redness as the Sun's motion was disturbed[223].

These and various other similar traditions clearly state that this red liquid arrived and fell as a 'great cloud' or as a 'stream' and that it rained down globally ('all the world'). Immense quantities of it must have existed even to have fallen even as a light short-lived shower over an area as extensive as the Earth's surface. But what was its origin and its true nature? We may never be able to answer these questions for certain, although some educated guesses can be attempted, which are seemingly consistent with the available details.

Ancient Mesopotamian texts repeatedly allude to the original 'watery' nature of Tiamat – special names such as Tehom-Raba ('watery monster') being used to stress that characteristic[224]. Interestingly, Tehom-Raba means 'great Tiamat' in the Hebrew language. From such fragments we may conclude that Tiamat was essentially a watery planet and that very large quantities of water were probably dispersed into space during Tiamat's destruction.

Assuming that Tiamat possessed some sort of central core composed of dense, perhaps mainly metalliferous, material, this too might have been fragmented and partially vaporised into dust-sized particles by Marduk's final destructive 'arrow'. This 'arrow' (a gigantic bolt of intense electrical energy?), ancient texts assert, "tore her belly... cut through her insides, tore into her womb" (penetrated to Tiamat's core). If valid as an interpretation, then this disintegration of Tiamat's core produced billions of particles which were scattered into space as a vast cloud close to where Tiamat had previously existed. Indeed the ancient texts virtually record this very process:

> ...(Marduk) severed the channels of her blood
> And caused the North Wind to bear it

To places that have been unknown.

In other words, Tiamat's 'blood' was scattered to regions where it had never previously been – that is, the area of space just indicated.

In space, any metalliferous particles of Tiamat's former core would have rapidly oxidised red or brown, while mixing and freezing solid with Tiamat's similarly dispersed fluids. Upon freezing, ice rinds must have enveloped the constituent particles. These, with the frozen liquids (ice), probably developed a highly reflective albedo.

It is curious, therefore, that a 'sea of crystal' allegedly preceded the red 'dragon' in space prior to the fall of, firstly, the 'burning mountain' which turned the world's waters blood red, secondly the 'star' named Wormwood which turned the world's waters bitter, and thirdly the 'dragon', itself red[225].

If remnants of Tiamat's original hydrosphere, atmosphere and core indeed mixed and froze together, this 'sea of crystal' presumably consisted of those remains of Tiamat which, the ancient records allege, were 'captured' and taken in tow by Marduk (Phaeton) as it proceeded sunwards. Such frozen masses, possessing highly reflective albedos, could easily have resembled a celestial 'sea of crystal'. And when the constituent materials eventually fell to Earth, as numerous accounts insist that they did, what better description of them could be given than 'hail mingled with blood'[226] (ice mixed with liquid ferruginous matter and metalliferous particles)?

An alternative interpretation of these 'blood' rains could be, despite the traditional insistence that they were a legacy of Tiamat, as easily attributed to the break-up of Kingu in Earth's Roche zone. The larger pieces of Tiamat's former satellite – the 'burning mountain', the 'star', Wormwood, etc – constituted portions of its core or crust, while the red 'milk', 'rains of blood' etc represented liquefied and oxidised smaller fragments.

The likeliest explanation, however, is that the rains with their red pigment had indeed mostly originated with Tiamat, and that the larger objects were falling remnants of the shattered Kingu. By the very nature of things, all arrived in the vicinity of Earth at the same time, and either fell more or less simultaneously or in quick succession. Confused, panic-stricken observers understandably assumed that all this falling material shared a common origin.

The bitter taste of the waters polluted by the 'star' Wormwood and the blood colour imparted to the sea by the 'burning mountain' were obviously chemical reactions between essentially incompatible substances. It is probably reasonable to suppose that the bitterness and the bloody colour of these waters derived from ferric matter, such as often tends to stain sediments and stones with deep red or brown tints. Remarkable concentrations of ferrous minerals and traces of ferruginous staining exist in various terrestrial surface deposits evidently laid down at the time of the Phaeton disaster. A closer look at some of them is most informative.

Several geologically young deposits, both on land and under the sea, exhibit markedly red or red-brown tints. Similar tints characterise many cave earths and fissure fillings. Almost the entire floor of Kesslerloch cave in Switzerland, for example, in which numerous animal bones were embedded, was coloured red with iron oxide[227]. We have already noted some fissures in Carniola in-filled by nearly pure iron ore. So-called 'Pleistocene' bone breccias are also often strongly ferruginised and silicified as, for example, that in Tea Tree Cave, Queensland[228]. Similar iron-stained bones have been found in many fissures, such as on the Isle of Portland, England.

Bones of 'late Pleistocene' animals encountered in 'drift' deposits are frequently iron-stained. Mammal remains from high-terrace gravels at Acton and Turnham Green, west London, for example, exhibited abundant traces of a manganous deposit and were described at the time of their discovery as being "loaded with manganous oxide"[229]. Blue-grey iron sands overlay the celebrated rhinoceros carcass found in Vilyui valley, Siberia, and even some of the so-called Miocene plants found in north-west Greenland occurred in a 'sparry iron ore'[230].

Iron or manganese staining of 'drift' deposits and associated organic remains, conventionally attributed to ice action or the environment this believedly created, are usually ascribed to periglacial conditions. Thus, black manganese staining in gravels at Radley, Oxfordshire, England, is accounted for by this process, which is said to have been of brief duration[231]. But if, as argued in Part One, glacial conditions did not exist when these gravels were deposited – and, very significantly, molluscs in these same gravels indicate 'warm' ('interglacial') conditions – other circumstances must have caused the staining.

A rusty colour is also characteristic of much of the 'Pleistocene' loess formation. In northern China, for example, loess occurs extensively as a reddish-hued surface deposit in which "...iron-manganese Pisolites are often disseminated in its basal layer" (our italics)[232]. Studies of these loessic loams reveal that their red colour "...can neither be a quality inherited from the original matter of which the loams are composed, nor a condition brought about by slow chemical processes long after their formation"[233]. In other words, the reddish tints were imparted to the loams during their deposition, and one may reasonably suppose that the above-mentioned iron-manganese Pisolites were also. Loessic loams in other parts of the world show similar metalliferous associations. Thus, in Nebraska, where loam abounds, as much as 20.26% of it consists of aluminium and 7.80% of iron[234]. Although numerous other examples could be cited, it must suffice here to state that mineral grains composing loessic deposits consist "...mostly of silica and associated heavy minerals (and) are fresh and angular..."[235] (our italics).

The fresh and angular appearance of these grains signifies geological modernity, while the very presence of heavy minerals in a surface deposit is most interesting. The occurrence of so much aluminium is likewise interesting in view of the recently-monitored exceptional concentration of aluminium-26 in the outer vicinity of the solar system, referred to in Part Four.

Deltaic deposits at the mouth of the Fraser River, British Columbia, brought down from inland regions characterised by extensive 'drift' beds and alleged glacial sculpturing, represent another example of recent surface deposits charged with "abnormal concentrations" of heavy metals, including cobalt, lead, zinc, copper, manganese and iron[236]. That 'drift'-age deposits elsewhere consistently contain significant quantities of these metals reveals how many modern surface deposits (deltaic and otherwise) have acquired their metalliferous contents. Natural erosion, leaching and other processes transfer ores from older to younger deposits, often investing bones and other remains with a metalliferous (and sometimes ochreous) patina (covering). Thus, a small carved figurine retrieved late last century from coarse sand over 280ft (86m) below ground level at Nampa, Idaho, was found to be covered with reddish iron oxide[237], which must have formed around it soon after its burial.

It is clear, therefore, that appreciable quantities of metals which exist locally in the 'drift' were deposited coevally with it and the animal and plant remains it contains. Considerable amounts of gold, for example, have occurred in 'drift' gravels in California, Alaska and Siberia, where mammoth and other animal remains abound, and as small isolated nuggets at various places in North Carolina, South Carolina and Virginia[238], just to name a few localities. Significantly, these finds closely abut the main area of the Carolina 'bays'!

If, as previously suggested, the formation of the Carolina 'bays', the deposition of 'drift' and the annihilation of the mammoths and their contemporaries was due to cosmic agencies epitomised by Phaeton and its entourage, it is undoubtedly noteworthy that iron was anciently regarded as the 'bones of Typhon' by the Egyptians, or as the 'droppings of the serpent' (Phaeton) by the early Jews. Indeed, Phaeton, irrespective of the name by which it was remembered, was widely associated with a great variety of metals in antiquity. The Chinese believed gold to be the dragon's breath, and glass or crystal its congealed breath[239]. Phaeton's companions, Leviathan and Behemoth were both thought to have produced gold and precious stones[240]. Even the early Peruvians accorded a celestial origin to gold and silver, the former being regarded as 'tears wept by the Sun' and the latter as 'tears of the Moon'[241]. These notions subsequently became corrupted into dragons guarding gold and other treasures.

But fanciful and distorted though these ancient memories may now be, they unquestionably date back to the time when a severely heated Earth ran with streams of molten and magnetised metals, derived, perhaps, as much from its cosmic assailants as from existing terrestrial lodes and veins of ore. Later, after solidifying once more, men came to believe that all had been produced by terrible celestial monsters. Magnetised iron, incidentally, was the first iron known to have been worked by man.

10

THE RAINS OF DEATH

As long ago as 1872, the Challenger oceanographic expedition, which sailed over 68,000 nautical miles in circumnavigating the globe, recorded the presence on the world's ocean floors of myriads of small, black, nickel-rich magnetic spherules having diameters in the order of 10–50 microns (u). They appeared to be especially abundant in the deepest basins. The existence of these tiny objects was repeatedly confirmed in the late 1940s by the Swedish marine exploration vessel Albatross, the observations made then rekindling interest in the spherules. Indeed, after considering all relevant factors, both E J Opik[242] and Kurt Fredericksson[243] independently concluded that the spherules were very probably of meteoric origin.

Also covering much of the floors of the deep ocean basins is a distinctive deposit which, though usually tinted a rusty brown, is known as the red clay. It occupies "...about 102 million km^2" and represents a prodigious tonnage since "...at an average depth of about 200 metres, there would be some 10^{16} tons of red clay on the ocean floors"[244]. Naturally radioactive, this clay derives its colour from ferric hydroxide and a small amount of manganese oxide[245], and consists of very fine-grained sediments mixed with coarse silt and sand fractions originating in the oceans, as well as hydrogenous minerals, volcanogenic debris and ferromanganese concretions[246].

Sea-bed clays and muds from the Arctic are coloured brown due to the presence in them of enormous quantities of oxidised ferric iron particles, while those from the seafloor near the New Siberian Islands, in the White Sea and the Barents Sea contain a notably high percentage of manganese oxide[247]. Examining clay samples from the bottom of the Pacific Ocean, Pettersson discovered that they contained layers of volcanic ash and large amounts of nickel and radium – two elements almost completely absent from sea water. He observed that "nickel is a very rare element in most terrestrial rocks and continental sediments and is almost absent from ocean waters"[248]. Pettersson attributed the origin of the iron and nickel in these clays to "...very heavy showers of meteorites in the remote past"[249]. He also added:

> Assuming the average nickel content of meteoric dust to be two per cent, an approximate value for the rate of accretion of cosmic dust to the whole Earth can be worked out from these data. The result is very high – about 10,000 tons per day, or over a thousand times higher than the > value computed from counting the shooting stars (meteors) and estimating their mass.[250]

In many areas, however, the red clays possessing this unexpectedly high nickel content rest directly upon geologically very recent lavas and basalts, indicating that they (and their nickel content) must be younger still. At some places these clays form only thin veneers or are altogether absent. Thus, considering all these details in unison, not only must the supposed meteor shower have been recent rather than ancient, but its occurrence must have been sudden, its volume enormous and – in view of the wide distribution of the clay – its operation global.

This last factor is contrary to the normal behaviour of the average meteor shower, even of an exceptionally large one. Meteor showers inevitably enter the terrestrial atmosphere from one quadrant only at any given time. However, owing to the rotation of the Earth, most, if not all, parts of the world's surface could theoretically receive meteoric material over a twenty-four hour period. To account for the enormously high tonnage here, we must imagine either a veritable meteor blizzard continuously pounding the Earth for weeks on end, or the Earth passing through (or being passed by) a vast cloud of metalliferous debris which enveloped more or less every part of the planet's surface almost simultaneously. On remembering that, at this phase of the disaster, Earth had either been braked to a halt, or its rotation was markedly slowed, such near-instantaneous global falls of huge quantities of ferruginous dust becomes easier to understand.

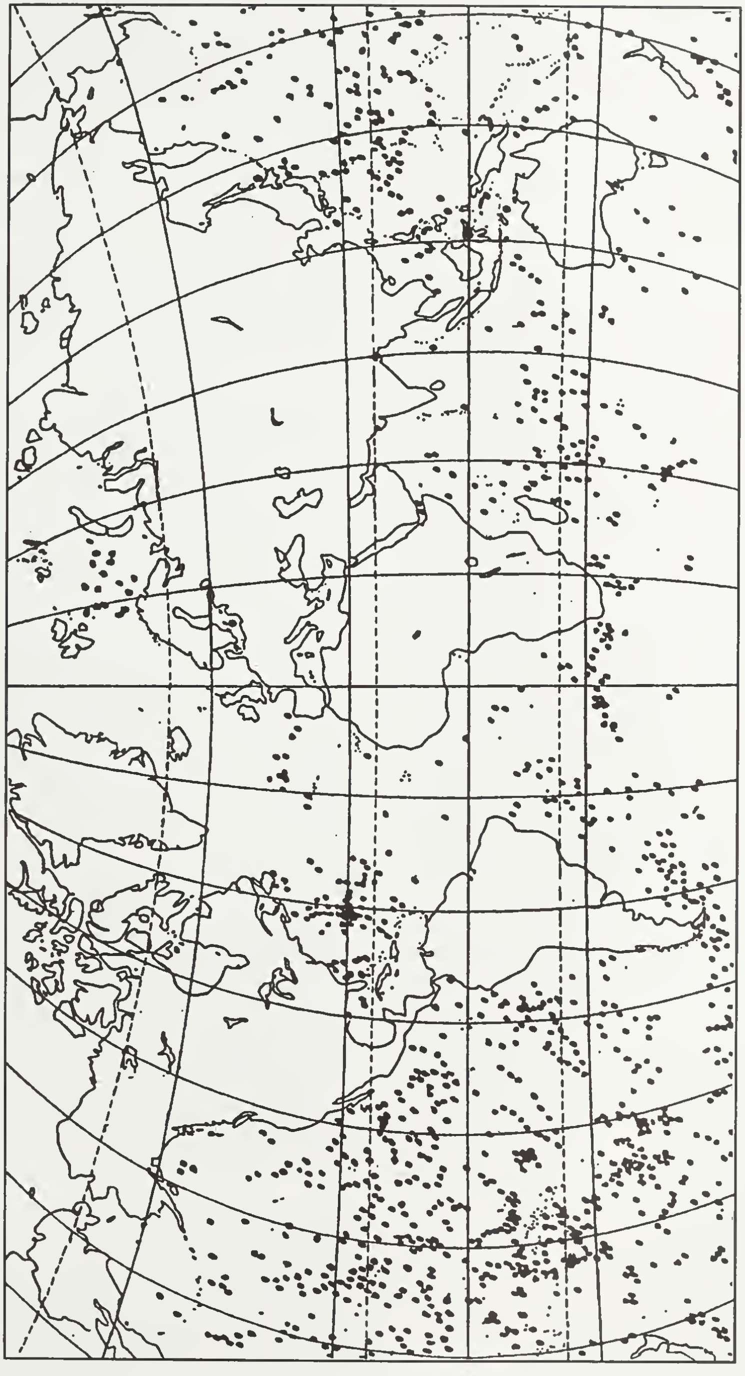
New significance thus attaches to the Finnish tradition that, when the Sun and Moon once disappeared and 'red milk' was sprinkled over the world, 'hailstones of iron' fell prodigiously – likewise to those recollections of fine dust falling endlessly from the skies while the Deluge waters swept across the Earth. In turn, these indicate that we are not dealing here with a meteor shower but with a gigantic cloud of cosmic debris, the origin of which we have already suggested.

Finally, we must consider more fully the ferromanganese concretions found in the red clay. Usually referred to as manganese nodules, these irregularly-shaped objects range in size from that of a garden pea to lumps up to 3ft (0.9m) in long diameter, and exist in countless numbers on the sea-bed worldwide[251]. Like the associated red clays, the nodules are naturally radioactive[252], and at some localities are astonishingly abundant, forming veritable 'fields' and 'pavements'. Some 'fields' consist of nodules packed so densely that they totally cover almost 100% of the sea-floor[253]. The wider distribution of the nodules is patchy, however. We are told, for example, that in the eastern central Pacific Ocean:

> ...records were taken with bottom-near television cameras, for hundreds of kilometres. For 5% of the records the sea-floor was covered to more than 50% by nodules, that is up to 25kg of ore per square metre. Conversely, 5% of the records showed the sea-floor free of nodules. Elsewhere, the cover varied, sometimes considerably, even over distances of only 50m. The reasons for the patchiness are not clear...[254]

The areas richest in nodules occur in the north-equatorial Pacific region[255]. Globally, however, it has been estimated that the nodules represent between 100 and 200 billion tonnes of material[256]. Map 5F shows the main areas from which they have been reported[257], the concentrations in the Pacific and the western Atlantic, east of the Carolina 'bays, being immediately noticeable.

Manganese nodules are rich in cobalt, nickel, copper and other heavy elements[258], a factor suggesting to several authorities the idea that the nodules, which are thought to grow through natural chemical accretion of these and other elements in sea water, are very old. A very slow growth – one estimate suggests "a few millimetres per million years, at most"[259] – has been postulated because these metal are rare in sea water, and long ages must have passed for the nod-



Map 5F. Ocean floor areas from which ferromanganese nodules have been reported. Each dot represents a separate locality, not an individual nodule. Many areas have yet to be searched for nodules – the expectation being that the final number of nodule-yielding localities will be appreciably higher than shown here.

Compiled from Berger, Horn, and other sources. Van der Grinten's projection. Scale: 1:220,000,000 at the Equator.

ules to have attained their present size by such processes. The fact that the overwhelming majority of these nodules occur on the surface or uppermost layers of the red clay has suggested to some that they have formed principally in areas of low sedimentation rates, since "...because of their slow growth they would soon be covered up in regions of high sediment supply"[260].

No plausible explanation has yet been advanced to account for the formation of nodules in such areas. We have already seen, however, that the twin notions of a great age and slow deposition rate for the red clays are apparently erroneous – especially where the clays overlie geologically young lavas and basalts – and the inference must be that the associated nodules are at least as youthful if not more so. In any case, major geophysical changes to ocean floors approximately 11,500 years ago (see Part One) clearly nullify the concept of sea-bed deposits slowly accumulating under generally stable conditions over very long periods of time, or of a similar slow growth for the nodules. The abundance and distribution of the nodules is remarkable, yet if the sea water below which they lie is almost devoid of the materials from which they allegedly form, and if the associated seafloors and bottom sediments are indeed geologically youthful[261], then the nodules must have formed under other circumstances.

When all these factors are taken into consideration, they suggest that the nodules have been dumped en masse rather than accumulating slowly. This implies a cosmic source which, if correct, signifies that they arrived suddenly and in vast numbers. We recall that several traditional memories of that frightful event agree that some celestial object disintegrated into innumerable fragments while in the vicinity of Earth, showering it with its remnants. Are these nodules further evidence of that calamity and (considering their heavy mineral content) of shattered core material from Tiamat, or Kingu, or both?

Earth's apparently 'recent' acquisition of iron-impregnated matter (subsequently accumulated as loess and red clay) and of enormous quantities of metalliferous nodules certainly calls for exceptional circumstances. Among other effects, these acquisitions would have rendered water supplies bitter and unpalatable. World tradition remembers just such a 'recent' event – the Phaeton disaster.

As noted previously, world tradition also links the bitterness of Earth's waters with a widespread loss of marine life. Can it be coincidence, therefore, that together with other life-forms, pteropods suffered mass mortality in the eastern Atlantic during the alleged Weichselian (Würmian) phase of the so-called Ice Age? Today, the remains of these marine organisms are embedded in sea-floor sediments stretching from Portugal to Senegal, a distance of 1,560 miles (2,500km). These sediments, which have apparently been washed by red tides several times, are estimated to have been deposited sometime between 14,000 and 11,000 years BP[262] – exactly that division of time when the Phaeton disaster apparently occurred. This pteropod destruction has been attributed directly to a sudden increase in sedimentation resulting from "rapid hydrographic and climatic changes"[263], both highly prominent features of the Phaeton event!

It would seem, therefore, that both ferruginous dust and metalliferous nodules were simply further aspects of the tremendous celestial bombardment responsible for the aforementioned oriented 'bays' and 'lakes'. In short, they were indeed 'rains of death'.

11

THE WATER MOUNTAIN

Unquestionably the most widely remembered expression of the Phaeton disaster was the Deluge. It allegedly drowned all living things and is stated to have extinguished a terrible world fire. The Deluge was thus rather a late development during this dreadful catastrophe. Moreover, the numerous traditional accounts referred to in Part Three clearly reveal that the Deluge was an almost inevitable outcome of the tremendous events immediately preceding it.

These same accounts also describe several highly unusual aspects of the Deluge which are at variance with the popular (and oversimplified) concepts of how the Deluge supposedly behaved. Broadly speaking, the Deluge is an umbrella heading embracing three distinct phases: first, a temporary but singular heaping-up of terrestrial water in a specific region, secondly, an equally remarkable torrent of cosmic origin, and thirdly, the release across the greater part of the world of the united terrestrial and cosmic waters as an irresistible flood.

A recurrent theme in the Deluge traditions generally concerns the extraordinary heights attained by these flood waters. In Genesis we find that:

> ...the waters prevailed exceedingly on the Earth, and all the high hills that were under the whole heaven were covered. Fifteen cubits upward did the waters prevail, and the mountains were covered.[264]

A cubit is generally regarded as having corresponded to 17.58 inches (44.6cm), so 15 cubits would signify that the flood waters rose about 23ft (7m). If above today's highest mountains, then to more than five miles (8km)! We have seen, however, that antediluvian peaks were probably much lower than those of present times, so the seemingly exaggerated height reportedly reached by the flood-waters may not be so extravagant after all. Notwithstanding such possibilities, we are still told that "...the waters stood above the mountains" (our italics), as tremendous winds caused them to "...mount up to the heavens"[265], and "He [God] gathereth the waters of the sea together as a heap"[266].

Maori traditions also speak of terrific winds lashing the Deluge waters into mountain-high billows[267], just as ancient Chinese records mention that the waters, "...in their vast extent over-topped the great heights, threatening the heavens with their floods"[268]. An independent Midrashic account goes so far as to assert that: "The waters were piled up to a height of sixteen hundred miles, and they could be seen by all the nations of the Earth"[269] – a near-unbelievable claim. There are essentially similar, if less exorbitant, accounts of this watery distortion, such as the following Lappish tradition describing the destruction of a wicked antediluvian world by the angry deity Jubmel, who allegedly promised: "I shall reverse the world. I shall bid the rivers flow upward; I shall cause the sea to gather together itself up into a huge towering wall which I shall hurl upon your wicked Earth-children, and thus destroy them and all life"[270].

Other accounts tell of waters piled up to heights so great that they 'overtopped' mountains and appeared to threaten the 'heavens' themselves; waters gathered into a 'huge towering wall' and so on. The prevailing picture is everywhere consistent and quite unlike that usually conveyed by artists and some scholars of slowly-rising flood waters. The dominating vision, then, is of a colossal heap or wall of water gathered together at a particular locality (or hemisphere) and held there by some immense gravitational force. A hint is given of this effect in Psalms, where we read that this watery heap "...stood fast"[271]. In other words, it was immobile. Such a phenomenon is explicable only if a second gravitational field was acting in opposition to terrestrial gravity, a field which caused 'rivers to flow upward', which 'heaped up' the ocean waters and which then held them stationary, for a definite interval. The opposing gravitational field was presumably Phaeton's.*

This point assumes particular significance when we discover the Babylonian Talmud asserting that: "Seven days before the Deluge, the Holy One changed the primeval order..."[272], an observation anciently remembered by numerous nations and implying a change in the Earth's previous axial stability and rotational speed, with water flowing uphill rather than downhill.

Especially significant is the conclusion reached as far back as 1936 by Hess and MacClintock, who, in considering the effects of a hypothetical astral influence which suddenly decreased Earth's rotational speed and caused a rapid change in the shape of the hydrosphere, inferred that sea levels would be greatly depressed in low (equatorial) latitudes and drastically raised in high (polar) latitudes[273]. This is precisely what the aforementioned traditions appear to imply. The heaping up of Earth's waters evidently occurred at or around the original poles, or, just possibly, principally at one pole only – the northern one.

At this juncture we should recall those traditions which refer to the Deluge waters as having flowed strongly northwards. It may be surmised that these were waters being gravitationally attracted to the polar latitudes. The incredible abnormal weight of accumulated water at one pole may have been as much the cause of an axial tilt as the near-proximity of a powerful external influence like Phaeton. Most probably, both factors working in concert effected that major terrestrial change. One agrees, therefore, with Patten when, as one of the few writers who has perceived the true nature of the Deluge, he remarked:

> If one concludes that this great event in Earth history, the Flood, was indeed a cosmic catastrophe, rather than merely a prolonged meteorological event, then one must conclude that its cause was gravitational rather than heat, which is the ultimate cause in floods caused by excessive rainfall [heat causing the evaporation and the organising of wind systems]. If the Flood was cosmic, it is not only a gravitational catastrophe – it is a gravitational-magnetic catastrophe...[274]

Inevitably, the inhabitants of high latitudes experienced the most massive rising of the Deluge waters as they became piled up into a gargantuan 'water mountain' submerging all land. Salvation in 'arks' and other floating refuges was the sole means of escape for those communities, while those in low latitudes, from which much water had been withdrawn polewards, this was not the case.

---

* See Note 19.

12

THE TORRENT FROM HEAVEN

A variety of traditional sources also refer to what was seemingly yet another aspect of the Deluge, namely that very considerable quantities of water from celestial sources contributed to its final mass.

In the Apocalypse of Thomas, for example, we read of blocks of 'hail' (ice) individually weighing about a hundredweight (50kg) showering Earth immediately before the Deluge. Again the Zend-Avesta mentions that, when Tistrya assaulted Earth, it sent tremendous rain in which the drops were the size of saucers, or of a man's head, and were sometimes boiling hot. Raindrops of phenomenal size are said to have fallen when the thunder-god of the Sac and Fox Indians of North America destroyed the primeval world long ago: they were allegedly the size of wigwams[275].

In these and many similar recollection which could be cited, we seem to be dealing with falls of what may be aptly termed 'whole water – water which descended in drops so large that their origin and formation cannot have been due to even the most chronic dust-polluted atmosphere. Obviously originating elsewhere, their great size suggests that these huge 'raindrops' were almost certainly great lumps of melted ice – pieces of the 'sea of crystal' (interpreted as an ice-field) which preceded Phaeton through space. Thus the largest pieces, melting slowest, appeared as huge 'drops' of 'whole water' when they reached the ground, and they naturally excited lasting astonishment. That their exceptional size was noticed amid the chronically deranged conditions suggests that these 'raindrops' fell, not so much in the high latitudes where the 'water-mountain' would obscure the falls, but in the low latitudes largely bereft of water, and where numerous confused individuals still dwelt.

The truly staggering duration of this rain deserves further comment. Best known, of course, is the 40 days mentioned in Genesis[276], a duration also given by the Tepanecas of pre-Columbian Mexico. The aforementioned tradition of the Sac and Fox tribes describes the rain as unlike any that has ever fallen before or since. It was unparalleled. It was compared to "seven water torrents"[277], described as "an overflowing rain, and great hailstones"[278], and reported as having "...descended out of the clouds [collapsed sky] as if poured out of jars... prodigiously, in drops like bull's heads, and men's heads, in handfuls and armfuls, both great and small"[279].

Therefore this rain fell torrentially and uninterruptedly as a kind of celestial cascade or waterfall. It rapidly swamped everything upon which it fell. Clearly it was no ordinary rain, a factor appreciated by many early writers who differentiated normal (seasonal or occasional) rains, which the called 'small rains', from exceptional (cataclysmic) rains, which they called 'great rains'[280]. Interestingly, these old accounts never mention 'great rains' except in association with catastrophic events, and then almost always as 'divine' retribution.

In the Norse Eddas, during Odin's battle with the Fenris-Wolf, the upper heaven is alleged to have been shattered, its wreckage plummeting to Earth as hail and huge blocks of ice. This shattering of the firmament or celestial vault reappears in numerous ancient traditions. The Maori, for instance, recall how their hero Tawhaki, in a fit of rage, once stamped on the 'floor of heaven'. The resultant crack permitted the celestial waters to pour down and flood Earth. In Chinese tradition, a marauding dragon is substituted fro Tawhaki; while in the Bundahish, 'demons' which "dashed against the celestial sphere" are given as the culprits[281]. Everywhere, therefore, these extraordinary rains are consistently accorded a cosmic origin and are associated with a tremendous celestial commotion – the Phaeton disaster.

Among the Jewish myths collected by Josippa ben-Gorion are some which specifically refer to an amalgamation of positively differentiated terrestrial (female) and celestial (male) waters. One even provides details of the date when this allegedly occurred: "On the seventeenth day of the month of Cheshvan the male waters fell from the heavens while the female waters welled forth from the depths. They united and waxed strong and overwhelmed the Earth and all that was upon it"[282]. Cheshvan was the second month of the old Jewish year. A variant account mentions that the event happened in the month of Ijar, which is the eighth month in the ordinary Jewish calendar. We shall later find these details to be most significant, merely adding here that the version in Genesis also states that the event occurred on the seventeenth day of the second month[283].*

13

DELUGE

The disintegration of Kingu signalled a marked lessening, or even breakdown, of the opposing gravitational fields which apparently held the 'heaped up' terrestrial waters immobile in high latitudes. This diminution evidently occurred quite slowly at first, for several Amerindian legends, of which two are given below, relate how the advance of the released waters was watched for hours, even days, beforehand. It presumably reflected the steadily lessening influence of the opposing gravitational field proportional to the rate of dispersal of Kingu's debris and Phaeton's departure towards the Sun.

The Choctaw of Oklahoma recall that after the primeval Earth had been plunged into darkness "for a long time" (another reference to 'collapsed sky' conditions) a bright light appeared in the north, which occasioned great joy. The light, however, proved to be a wall of water composed of mountain-high waters advancing toward the observers.

A similar narrative preserved amongst the Navajo of Arizona describes how one morning long ago there appeared in the east, and subsequently in the south, north and west, a phenomenon which from a distance resembled a high, steep wall of rock. It was, however, water steadily advancing toward them. A variant Navajo legend contains further interesting details. Long ago, the Navajo ancestors were surprised one day to see animals of every type running from east to west. Four days later they saw a bright light in the east, and those sent to investigate it returned with the news that it was a vast flood of water proceeding in their direction. Next morning this flood had drawn quite close, and filling the entire horizon except the west, advanced like a chain of high mountains[284].

The significant point here is the consistent description of the flood waters as being prodigiously high and advancing as a watery wall. Once the 'heaped-up' terrestrial waters were released from the counter-gravitational grip holding them, they began to flow equatorwards, slowly at first, but ever more speedily as a stupendous watery avalanche of awesome power. Even the Koran[285] states that the Deluge bearing Noah's ark was simply a vast wave – and this rapidly united with the very considerable quantity of water which had been received in lower latitudes from cosmic sources. Upon uniting, these waters formed the Deluge proper.

---

* See Note 20.

A closer look at some of the effects of various major floods and marine storms of modern times provides glimpses of the probable capacity, power and behaviour of the Deluge. Moreover, measurements of water velocities amply demonstrate the terrifying force of large bodies in violent motion. Engineers concerned with coastal sea-defences have long known of the power of stormy seas, when man-made structures become puny things. Consider the following examples.

Tremendous gales in December 1872 destroyed the seaward end of a large breakwater at Wick, in northern Scotland. It was built of large concrete blocks securely bound together and to the underlying bedrock by huge iron rods, and weighed over 800 tonnes.

> During the height of this winter gale the resident engineer watched the onslaught of the waves... Before his incredulous eyes, the whole mass of the pier was 'slewed around' until it was finally broken away from its attachments, lifted and deposited inside the pier. After the storm... divers... found that not only the concrete monolith but the whole of the lower mass attached to it by iron bolts had been carried away. The waves had torn loose, lifted and bodily moved a mass weighing not less than 1,350 tons. Five years later... the new pier, weighing about 2,600 tons, was then carried away.[286]

Previously-mentioned tsunamis can reach formidable heights. One in July 1958 at Lituya Bay, southern Alaska, reached the immense height of 1,700ft (523m), and in scale and effect probably approached the equivalent characteristics of the Deluge water-avalanche. A subsequent report stated:

> Examining the sides of the bay, geologist Don Miller (and) seismologist Don Tocher... found that the wave had swept along the side of the bay at about the 100ft level, knocking down virtually all of the trees and stripping them of their bark. The greatest surprise was what happened on a mountain spur across a narrow inlet from the largest of the rock falls. Here a swash swept up onto the ridge to a height of 1,700ft, making a clean sweep of the forest so that only one tree was left standing amidst the ruins. The trees at the upper end were washed into the living forest, showing that it was a wave rather than a landslide that caused this damage. Miller, flying along the bay a few hours after the quake, saw great masses of water still running down the sides of the mountain.[287]

It is important to note that even the largest tsunamis that do occasionally invade the land are incapable of travelling very far inland and sustaining their destructive power. The Deluge waters clearly behaved otherwise. They consisted of colossal aqueous masses which arrived suddenly at particular localities, which exerted continuous pressures upon everything they overflowed, and which, even though of comparatively brief duration, also poured unabated over the land for hours and days without respite. Only something like a displaced ocean relocating itself could produce such effects. Thus, missing these crucial facts, every previous attempt to explain away the Deluge calamity simply as an unusually severe river flood or as a series of exceptional tsunamis has failed to convince.

Discoveries made about water pressures and rates of flow today indicate how the Deluge waters must have acted in many regions all those millennia ago. It has been determined that winter gales, such as regularly batter the Scottish coast, produce water pressures as great as 6,000lbs per square foot (25,834kg/m^2)[288]. Pressures, however, largely depend on the depths of water concerned, and the speed at which it happens to move or the wind drives it. Hurricanes, for example, can drive waves ashore at speeds of 30–45mph (50–70kph), while the velocity of the falling crest of a wave only 30ft (9m) high produces a pressure of 49 tonnes per square yard[289]. The pressures exerted by the Deluge waters must have been immeasurably greater.

Studies of the rate of flow of ocean waters of different depths have produced the following results:

Depth of Sea		Height of wave		Velocity of water current feet	metres	feet	metres	mph	kph
200	61.5	100	30.7	22	35.2
300	92.3	100	30.7	19.5	31.2
400	123	100	30.7	17	27.2
600	185	150	46	20.5	32.8
800	246	200	61.5	28	44.8

Experiments have established that the force exerted on a surface increases as the square of the velocity, and varies as the sixth power of the velocity of the current involved. For instance, a current able to move a cube of given weight would, if its velocity were doubled, be capable of moving a cube 64 times heavier than the first-mentioned cube, and, if trebled, it could move a cube 729 times as heavy, and so on. Relating such velocities to the transportation of 'erratic' boulders by water, one investigator concluded that: "There is no doubt that blocks of 5 tons or upwards might be moved by a current of 10mph"[290].

Moreover, while currents flowing at a mere 2–3mph (3–5kph) cannot move even a modest-sized pebble, those with a velocity of about 10mph (16kph) can move blocks weighing several tonnes, currents moving at 15mph (24kph) can move 56 tonnes or so in weight, at 20mph (32kph) they can move blocks around 320 tonnes, and others flowing at 50mph (80kph) or higher could move boulders weighing many thousands of tonnes[291].

There is no reason why many of the 'erratic' boulders could not have been transported to their present locations by the Deluge waters, now that we perceive these as having been oceans undergoing relocation. Putnam[362] shows a boulder field assembled entirely by flash-flood waters in California. In all essentials it resembles others known to have been accumulated by mud-torrents, and yet others conventionally accorded glacial origins.

But could water have actually uplifted 'erratics' sometimes weighing many thousands of tonnes from low to high levels – as noted in Part One? Some near Settle in North Yorkshire, England, for instance, are 200ft (61m) higher than the nearest parent rocks[292], while others elsewhere sometimes lie higher still. In view of the above statistics, and of the stupendous pressures that ocean-sized masses of water on the move could exert, there appears no good reason why the Deluge waters could not have uplifted even the largest 'erratics'. In Part One we saw that ice could not have moved them.

During the summer of 1810, Long Lake and Mud Lake in Vermont were catastrophically emptied of their waters. Eye-witness descriptions of what occurred furnish valuable clues as to the kind of things that must have happened in many regions on a still greater scale at the time of the Deluge, and interested readers would do well to consult the fascinating report by S Edwards-Dwight[293]. Among the effects produced in a matter of minutes was the excavating of a huge gully 1 mile (0.4km) wide, and 50–90ft (15–28m) deep. Enormous immovable rocks jutting out of the valley sides altered the course of the torrent without lessening its force. Sand heaps up to 20ft (6m) deep and extending as much as an acre accumulated on the sides of these obstacles, and torn-up trees were embedded in them. Marks of the torrent's violence were later seen all the way down the valley to Lake Memphremagog, 21 miles (34m) distant. At Eno's Mill, 17 miles downstream, a boulder estimated to weigh 100 tonnes had been moved many yards from its original location upstream.

A horse caught by the torrent near Keene Corner was found a great distance down the valley "literally torn to pieces". Eye-witnesses reported that the torrent bore before it all the trees in its path, so that it looked as though a forest was on the move. Some of these were buried in sand and rubbish far down the valley, while others covered a 20–acre field being piled up to a height of 25ft (7m). All eye-witnesses agreed that the noise was louder than the "loudest thunder".

Similar devastation by pent-up waters occurred in 1818 in Switzerland, when avalanches of impacted snow dammed a narrow pass containing the River Drance. A large lake was formed some 700ft (215m) wide and 200ft (61m) deep. Engineers had succeeded in draining off about half of the lake's water when the central section of the dam suddenly collapsed.

> ...the residue of the lake was emptied in half an hour. In the course of its descent the water encountered several narrow gorges, and at each of these they rose to a great height... sweeping along rocks, forests, houses, bridges... Some fragments of granitic rocks of enormous magnitude... were torn out of a more ancient alluvium and borne down for a quarter of a mile. One fragment moved was sixty paces in circumference. The velocity of the water... was thirty-five feet per second.[294]

Severe floods in Scotland during 1829 actually cut new ravines in local hillsides and transported huge sandstone boulders some 200 yards (185m) – one being dumped 6ft (1.8m) above the level of its original site[295]. The huge muddy floods resulting from the eruption of Mt St Helens in May 1980 caused similar effects:

> An avalanche of volcanic debris ploughed into Spirit Lake, forcing millions of gallons of water through the lake's outlet. The velocity of the lahar [surge] was estimated at 29–55kph... Seven of the eight existing bridges were destroyed. The muddy flow poured through two logging camps 20km downstream, flipping over heavy equipment... devouring a locomotive... Thick mud, logs, boulders and anything else in the path of the lahar were swept up, carried to 70km downstream and dumped into the Cowlitz River... About 39 million cubic metres of material reduced the 180m wide shipping channel of the Columbia River from its normal depth of 12m to a depth of 4,3m for a distance of 6km.[296]

At some places walls of mud and volcanic debris 195ft (60m) high were left behind, modern equivalents of the comparable 'Pleistocene' deposits discussed in Part One. All these examples repeatedly emphasise the erosional and excavatory powers of violently agitated waters and the sheer volume of torn-up and relocated debris they are capable of moving. In every case vast water pressures were involved.

The pressure behind the initial watery face of the Deluge must have been titanic. Until the final phase of their dispersion, when they had reached lower latitudes, these waters were irresistible. Such torrents easily demolished colossal pieces of the Earth's lithosphere and transported them great distances, irrespective of local geography. It plastered up 'drift' against hillsides facing north or north-west (surfaces opposing its direction of flow) and, as seen in Part One, rammed 'erratic' boulders into solid strata. Animal debris in numerous bone-caves and rock fissures were frequently forced unnaturally by the flooding into even the tiniest crevices and most tortuous passages, sometimes penetrating the Earth's crust to great depths at all kinds of angles. Only under immense water pressures could such effects have been produced – ice pressure could not accomplish them.

It is reasonable to infer that the external gravitational field responsible for 'heaping up' the Deluge waters in high latitudes acted similarly on Earth's internal magma tides. If so, this must almost certainly have caused crustal bulging (the lithospheric expansion suggested by Oppenheim) in the northern hemisphere, together with a northwards flow of the magma normally south of the equator. Geoidal deformation almost certainly resulted, such as Taira[297] and others have urged.

For almost one hundred years, numerous geologists and physicists have investigated this deformation as having been actual rather than theoretical. In 1889, Rudzki recognised major geoidal deformation as having occurred during the 'Ice Age'[298], while in 1939, Sauramo placed the event in late Quaternary times[299], the very period we are considering.

It has been widely recognised that this deformation was caused by the shifting of surface loads[300] and pressures[301], and with how far the flexibility of the lithosphere[302] contrived to cope with the creep-strength of Earth's mantle[303], and with the distribution of viscous matter deep within the Earth's interior[304]. The 'heaping up' of a large part of the terrestrial waters at one geographical point was a remarkable instance of the shifting of surface loads and pressures.

The rapidity of this 'heaping up' meant that the shifting of the loads and pressures, and the subsequent deformation, was equally rapid. The magnitude of the crustal dislocations caused by this deformation are thus more readily understood. However, with the dissipation of the external gravitational influences, both the magma tide and the 'water mountain' were released. This led to the magma establishing a new equatorial 'bulge' and the consequential readjustments of the crust to meet this new geoidal shape.

14

SCOUR

Bearing the above in mind, it is easy to understand how, in Cambridgeshire, England, ocean-sized masses of water wrenched out huge lumps of Cretaceous strata, 430yds (397m) long and 60yds (55m) wide, and redeposited them incongruously many miles distant upon Jurassic strata[305]; or how the weight and pressure of such watery masses so compressed and crushed rocks immediately underlying 'boulder clay' around Holderness, Humberside, that they now look as though a steam-roller had once passed over them[306].*

The piling up of the Deluge waters to great heights in narrow spaces on encountering mountainous obstacles, as in the Alps for example, explains the deposition of huge rocks and great accumulations of gravel high on the flanks of infant peaks. These same waters banked up equally large accumulations of 'drift' against the lower slopes of the Himalayas, Andes, Altai mountains and other prominent ranges. Although this deposition was assumed to be the result of ice action, it is entirely consistent with water action on a stupendous scale, and supports the view of several authorities who argued for a marine origin for a large proportion of the 'drift'.

The passage of the Deluge waters across the landscape – from a north-south or north-west-southeast direction as the evidence previously presented consistently shows – was obviously a transient affair, but it was not entirely uniform. Traditions mention areas which escaped its ravages, and science has recognised such isolated refuges as well – albeit refuges from glaciation[307].

Numerous collapsed portions of the Earth's crust soon became basins for the new (present) seas and oceans, and the Deluge waters must have streamed off the newly-elevated land areas (the present continents) into these depressions.

The Deluge was also a powerful scouring agent. Thus, vertical polished rock faces on the northern side of Red Rock Pass, Alberta, were caused by water-borne pebbles carried tumultuously against them by exceptional water currents coming from the north. That the "...polished surfaces show southward flow into the Bonneville Depression"[308] merely lends credence to the ancient Chinese claim that the Deluge waters generally streamed south-east to drown great areas of land which had subsided in that hemisphere because "The whole Earth had tilted and sunk"[309].

Thus the scouring, scoring and polishing of rocks was, in many cases, caused by high-velocity water-borne debris of great depth and long continuous pressure, rather than by the conventionally-accepted glacial action.

---

* See Note 21.

The scouring effects of water upon land surface strata is often seriously underestimated. Many modern examples exist of cloudbursts achieving dire effects, such as the previously-mentioned 'moraine' found in Alabama last century, and the boulder debris which swamped Lynmouth, England in 1952. Dr Arkell described a similar event which occurred near Weymouth, Dorset, in 1955, when 11–12 inches (30cm) of rain fell on the adjacent hills in only 9 hours[310]. The cascading waters deepened, widened and cut new stream beds, scoured away entire hillsides and gouged out a crevasse almost 6ft (1.8m) deep in the solid chalk. Boulders, rubble, heaps of soil and uprooted vegetation were strewn everywhere.

If comparatively modest cloudbursts can produce such scour effects, the prodigious rains and the enormous aqueous movements associated with the Phaeton disaster must have denuded the landscape infinitely more acutely. Soil and softer surface deposits would have been removed from whole regions, to bury hillsides and entire valleys elsewhere.

Arkell regarded such downpours as:

> ...comparatively rare events that really mould the landscape... Lyell's principle of uniformitarianism... becomes credible only when it is realised that the 'exceptional' cloudburst is really part of the normal weather pattern, and, from the point of view of denudation, the important part.

In this context we suggest that the Phaeton disaster was also a 'rare' and 'exceptional' event, differing only from modern examples in its sheer scale and intensity. Accordingly, the violence of its action was correspondingly greater.

15

THE 'WOOD HILLS' OF THE NORTH

Enormous accumulations of sub-fossil and carbonised wood occur along the Arctic shores of Siberia, along the coastlines of the Bering Strait, and on various islands both north and south of that channel. Staggering amounts exist on many of the New Siberian Islands and, as we have seen, in the Alaskan 'muck' beds. The vast quantities of vegetable matter represent whole forests which have been obliterated and buried catastrophically. The constituent trees, which include sycamore, poplar, alder and sequoia, today flourish much further south, and represent a typical Miocene/Pliocene forest assemblage, evidently forming part of that flora which persisted more or less unchanged into 'Pleistocene' times, before being overwhelmed.

Before its submergence, it appears that Fennoscandia apparently bore luxuriant forests, for sub-fossil 'driftwood' now accumulates on the shores of several of its remaining fragments. On Koluguev Island, for example, pieces of this wood are regularly swept up from some now-submerged offshore source[311], while on Spitzbergen similar 'driftwood' occurs with whale remains several miles inland at least 30ft (9m) above present sea level[312]. Similar elevated inland locations for essentially identical 'driftwood' occur on many of the north Canadian islands, where the wood often lies embedded in steep cliff faces. At latitude 75°N on Banksland (Melville Island), for example, pine cones and acorns have been met with 300ft (92m) above the present sea level[313], and 'driftwood' occurs elsewhere on the island[314]. Fossil wood also occurs at a height of 1,800ft (550m) on Ellesmere Island, wood which surprisingly is of Siberian origin. It cannot be 'driftwood', because the north coast of the island is permanently ice-bound[315], nor can it have been transported glacially from Siberia, which has never possessed an ice-sheet of any significance, and sends no glaciers across the Arctic wastes to end at Ellesmere Island.

All across the northern Parry Islands (Melville, Cornwallis, Bathurst and Devon Islands) of the Queen Elizabeth group innumerable pieces of 'driftwood' and marine shells of 'Pleistocene' age frequently lie at heights well above the line of a supposed 'Pleistocene' submergence of those territories[316].* Many of the shells occur at quite extraordinary elevations, those on Somerset Island being 1,000ft (300m) above sea level. Others on the Fosheim Peninsula – where they occupy "several acres" – a thousand feet higher, and still others on the Grinnell Peninsula of Devon Island 2,300ft (700m) above sea level[317]. To account for their present occurrence, it has been suggested that the shells were pushed up to these elevations by a 'late Pleistocene' ice-sheet (the Laurentian)[318]. Except for Banks and Victoria Islands, this ice-field is widely alleged to have mantled the entire Canadian archipelago. As shown earlier, this is an erroneous concept.

As so often occurs when examining the wreck of the 'Pleistocene' world, the history of the Siberian tundra vegetation proves to be surprisingly complex, for the record there shows repeated changes between a cold, dry (steppe) ecology and a warm moisture-loving one. Further complications arise from the fact that a vast belt of trees, including lime, oak, elm and alder stretched at one time from the Ural Mountains in the west, through the Altai Mountains far into eastern Siberia[319]. The Ural and Altai ranges were among those which rose to their present elevations at the end of 'Pleistocene' times. The evidence implies that during the 'Pleistocene' period, a temperate non-continental climate existed across practically the whole of what is today southern Siberia, having no counterpart in that region today.

While trees today no longer grow further north than latitude 71°N in northern and north-eastern Siberia, their remains are consistently encountered for hundreds of miles northward towards the Pole. The story they tell is very impressive. Some of the most striking vestiges of these vanished forests were seen by Sannikov and Hedenström in 1806 during their discovery of the New Siberian Islands. They found there abundant remnants of enormous ancient forests. Many of the trees were still standing where they had grown, but others lay prostrate upon the perpetually-frozen ground[320]. Hedenström visited Kotelnyy Island, which lies at latitude 75°N, where he observed "remarkable wood hills" along its southern coast. Some of these 'hills' were as much as 180ft (55m) high and consisted almost wholly of the bituminous trunks of trees. On the summits of the 'hills' the trunks stood vertically with the tops snapped off.

Elaborating, another celebrated Arctic explorer, F R von Wrangell, said of these botanical graveyards, in which the bones of mammoths also abounded: "On ascending these hills, fossilised charcoal is met with everywhere... covered with a petrification which is so hard it can scarcely be scraped off with a knife"[321]. Lt Anjou visited these same islands on a later expedition and found the 'wood hills' extending for over 3 miles (5.2km) along the coast. He described the tree trunks as lying in clumps of fifty or more, often horizontally, and noted that the wood was friable, black in colour with a slight gloss, and how – like charcoal – it did not burn when lighted but merely glowed, giving off a resinous odour[322] At various neighbouring localities, other tree trunks, converted into a bituminous substance, lay in great horizontal piles alternating with sandstone layers containing tree stumps rooted in situ. Again, fossilised charcoal covered by ash, itself a petrification, was noticed everywhere[323].

In 1829, G A Erman went to Great Lyakhov Island, and was so impressed by the scene confronting him that the obvious cause of what had taken place was immediately apparent:

---

* See Note 22.

> On the summit of these hills (250–300ft high) [the trees] lie flung upon one another in the wildest disorder, forced upright in spite of gravitation, and with their tops broken off or crushed, as if they had been thrown with great violence from the south on a bank, and there heaped up... So it is clear that at the time when the elephants and the trunks of trees were heaped together, one flood extended from the centre of the continent... (and) may have poured from the highest mountains through the rocky valleys.[324]

The tremendous extent of these ancient forests can be judged from the occurrence on Maloi Island, in the Lyakhov group 100 miles (160km) to the south, of tree stumps in situ exactly like those on the New Siberian Islands, accompanied in some cases by leaves and cones. In Whitely's opinion they prove that "...when the mammoths and rhinoceroses lived in northern Siberia, these desolate islands were covered with great forests and bore a luxuriant vegetation"[325].

We venture to add that, when these 'Pleistocene' mammals roamed Siberia, the Lyakhov Island and New Siberian Island were not islands at all, but portions of the continuous land that stretched northwards from the present Asiatic mainland perhaps as far as the North Pole itself.

Further glimpses of the former flora of these northern islands were unearthed by Baron von Toll, who visited these regions several times between 1895 and 1902. One of his expeditions was to Great Lyakhov Island, where he discovered a totally frozen specimen of Alnus fruticosa – a member of the alder family – 90ft (28m) in length and complete with roots, leaves and fruits. Nearby were the remains of willow trees lying alongside the bones of mammoths[326].

These same forests extended over great expanses of what is presently the north Siberian mainland, for their remnants are found on the shores of inland lakes such as Lake Chastach. This lake lies on the tundra close to the River Kolyma, and "...every autumn throws up quantities of bituminous fragments of wood... the shore [being] covered to a depth of 2ft (0.7m)"[327]. Among the debris occur pieces of a solid substance like amber, considered to be the hardened resin of larch trees, but which, when burnt, failed to emit the odour of burning amber. Tree roots as fresh as if they had only just been severed from living trees, interspersed in black earth and ice-clay composing a cliff some 30–35ft (9–11m) high were found by Hedenström near Malaya-Kuropalasik-Vaga. The nearest living woods, however, were over 100 Russian versts (112km) distant[328]. Wrangell made similar discoveries in soil only a short depth below the surface near Kolymsk on the Chukchee Peninsula, and in cliff facing the Polar Sea. He described the permanently frozen ground there as containing "...a great measure of ice which never thaws, mixed with a little black earth and clay, amongst which are a few long thin roots of trees"[329].

Again, when Hedenström journeyed from the Indigirka River valley to Ulsiank, he observed:

> On the tundra, equally remote from the present line of forest, among the steep sandy banks of the rivers and lakes, are found large birch trees, complete with bark, branches and roots. At first glance they appear to have been well preserved by the earth, but on digging them up they are found to be in a thorough state of decay... the inhabitants of the neighbourhood use them as fuel, and designate these subterranean trees as Adamovshtshina, or of Adam's time. The first living birch tree is not found nearer than three degrees to the south, and then only in the form of a shrub.[330]

Herr von Ruprecht, who also travelled across Siberia, observed on the Chernoi Nos Peninsula, at the mouth of the Indiga River, where now only stunted birch bushes grow, upright rotten birch trees as tall as the average human being[331]. Nordenskiöld also noted under the tundra of the Yenisei valley large trees with their roots still fast in the frozen soil, although trees of the same type thrive today only much further south. Masses of 'driftwood' and mammoth bones occurred with these stumps[332].

Another interesting discovery was that of the shells of Helix schrencki which still retained well-preserved colours, near the mouth of the Awamka River in latitudes 68° and 69°N, and the finding by Prof Schmidt of the same mollusc with plant fragments in frozen freshwater beds below Dudinsk, latitude 77°N, well beyond the present northern limits of the trees. Speaking of his journey, Prof Schmidt informs us that: "On top of the tundra is often found Noah's wood and peat moss with Planorbis limnaea, and a large species of Helix which I have never found here alive"[333].

Apart from mentioning that the remains of vast sub-fossil forests of oaks and other trees occur near Novgorod and Tver in Russia, where living specimens cannot now grow[334], we should note that Erman ably summarised the distribution of the Siberian record as follows:

> It cannot escape notice that, as we go nearer the coast, the deposits of wood below the earth and also the deposits of bones which accompany the wood, increase in extent and frequency. Here, beneath the soil of Yakutsk the trunks of birch trees lie scattered, only singly, but on the other hand they form such great and well-stored strata under the tundras, between the Yana and the Indigirka, that the Yakadirs never think of using any other fuel than fossil wood. They obtain it on the shores of lakes, which are continually throwing up trunks of trees from the bottom... Thus, in New Siberia, on the declivities facing the south lie hills 200–300ft high, formed of driftwood; the ancient origin of which, as well as the fossil wood in the tundras, anterior to the earth in its present state, strikes at once even the most uneducated hunters. They call both sorts of wood adamovchina or adamitic things.[335]

Thus we find extensive areas within the Arctic Circle containing two kinds of fossil fuel – one which drifted to the places where it is now accumulated, and the second which plainly grew where it is now found. The distinction between these two types of timber dates from very early times in Siberia, where the former was called Adamshina (Adam's wood) and the latter Noahshina (Noah's wood)[336]. That this timber should be traditionally associated with the Noachian Deluge is of more than passing interest, particularly in view of the geologically recent occurrence of that disaster in a geographical region hosting the frozen carcasses of hairy mammoths and woolly rhinoceroses.

The consistently tumultuous manner of deposition of all this ancient timber, and the immense geographical extent of its remains, everywhere bespeaks of the sudden and violent demise of these huge forests. Likewise, the exceptional piling up at some localities, and the deep burial at others, of numberless trees could only have been accomplished on such a scale by tremendous water action wholly indiscriminate in its activities, like that produced by the release of those comprising the abovementioned 'Water Mountain'.

But if the eventual draining away of the Deluge waters seemed to herald the end of Earth's ordeals, one more was yet to come – refrigeration on a grand scale.

16

REFRIGERATION

For almost 150 years it has been acknowledged that, geologically recently, Earth has undergone a cold period epitomised by glacial conditions in both the northern and southern polar latitudes. However, no satisfactory theory has yet been proposed which actually explains what caused the 'Ice Age' in the first place. There appear to be no terrestrial conditions, as we know them, capable of producing the heat necessary to evaporate vast quantities of water to form continental-sized ice-sheets.

As it was recognised that warm air and elevated land areas were necessary to produce ice and rime (frost), the recent inception of the Gulf Stream in the North Atlantic was invoked as one of the prime causes of refrigeration[337]. Some have even argued that the Deluge itself induced glacial conditions[338]. It would appear that the key to solving the so-called 'Ice Age' problem lies in the Arctic, where the evidence has been frozen in a macabre fashion. The deeply frozen trunks of trees still bearing leaves and berries, the refrigerated carcasses of mammoths, woolly rhinoceroses, musk-ox and other 'late Pleistocene' animals are preserved today in the same chaotic order in which they died and were deposited. They represent a unique picture of a former world coming to a sudden halt and remaining at that point until today.

As we have already mentioned, the demise of mammoths and other animals was not caused by the onset of glacial conditions, as many authorities would have us believe, for the evidence shows that they were, in most cases, already dead before they were abruptly frozen. Therefore, instead of a slow gradual freeze and build-up of glacial conditions over a prolonged period, as is generally proposed, refrigeration was remarkably sudden and unrelenting. This was another of Phaeton's legacies.

The factors which led to this sudden glaciation have already been mentioned in other parts of the book. However, in order to trace a coherent sequence in the events before us, they are briefly itemised below:

- The tilting of the Earth from its previous axis immediately turned the 'Golden Age' polar sub-temperate zones away from the Sun's heat;
- The waters of the world became 'heaped up' in polar regions;
- The induced tectonic changes caused massive volcanic discharges leading to 'collapsed sky' conditions. In high latitudes these conditions effectively blocked out sunlight and solar warmth at ground level in all regions for a very long time. This atmospheric pollution and the heat generated by crustal dislocations greatly increased precipitation[339] which fell as snow and sleet. In high latitudes, temperatures were thus severely reduced and held there for years due to a virtual perpetual night;
- After the release of the waters and the establishment of new oceanic and meteorological regimes, circulating warm currents (such as the Gulf Stream) created fog banks along polar and sub-polar coastlines. Enhancing the already-thick cloud cover blanketing those regions, this led to the formation of ice and rime. Furthermore, practically all land surfaces in these regions had been drenched, even waterlogged, by the Deluge, and this undoubtedly ensured the perpetuation there of a general refrigeration. In lower > latitudes, this waterlogged ground led eventually to the formation of numerous peat beds. Thus, the Deluge and the Gulf Stream indirectly contributed to the glaciation.

Bodies of former Deluge water trapped in valleys and depressions in high latitudes would have quickly frozen solid. Ice-cliffs and buried ice lenticles, as well as the strings and ribbons of ice accompanying biological debris in the Alaskan and Siberian 'drift' are surviving remnants of trapped Deluge water.

Glacialists supporting the conventional notion of alternating glacial and interglacial episodes have recognised the abruptness of both the beginning[340] and end[341] of the last glacial period in their scheme of events. Many authorities now hold that this was swift and rapid, two terms repeatedly used to convey the speed of first the ice build-up and, later, its dissipation. Lamb and Woodroffe, for example, have argued that after the inception of the last glacial period there was a "...swift establishment of ice over northern and north-western Europe, and over some extensive hinterland in North America... within 100–500 years"[342]. Others have suggested still shorter times[343].

The inception of Greenland's present ice-sheet, considered at some length earlier, has lately been attributed to massive 'post-glacial vulcanism[344]. We have repeatedly seen that Phaeton's visit abruptly generated severe vulcanicity around 11,500 years ago – a date strikingly close to that (11,000 years BP) now widely held to mark the end of alleged 'Ice Age' and the beginning of Holocene (Recent) times, when prodigious quantities of volcanic ash were deposited within the aforementioned Alaskan 'muck' beds enveloping countless diluvially-entombed remnants of late 'Pleistocene' animals.

The scale, extent and abruptness of this vulcanicity worldwide, and the attendant atmospheric pollution, was so great that the inevitable lowering thereby of temperatures globally, especially in high latitudes, was automatically rapid. Direct connections between widespread severe late 'Pleistocene' vulcanism and profound climatic changes (glaciation included) have been repeatedly stressed on previous pages and have formed the subject of successive studies by, among many others, Lamb[345], Hammer[346], Aubert de la Rüe[347], Nixon[348] and Pollack[349], and tie in closely with the swift environmental changes which, as noted previously, were prominent features of the Younger Dryas episode.

The great lenticles and ribbons of ice which locally penetrate the Alaskan 'muck' beds, just as they do in equivalent deposits containing similar organic remains in Siberia, were clearly frozen more or less at, or very shortly after, the actual accumulation of the beds. In other words, the freezing of these beds, the deposition of the volcanic ash layers within them, the slaughter of the innumerable animals they now yield, and the aqueous (diluvial) mixing of this assorted debris into chaotic 'muck' deposits was extraordinarily rapid. The singular evidence of the suddenly and permanently refrigerated animal carcasses found in both the Siberian and Alaskan deposits (see Appendix A) not only overwhelmingly confirms this but suggests that in at least those regions refrigeration was virtually instantaneous and occurred during the final stage of the Deluge phase of the giant calamity we are outlining here.

Most significantly, several writers have urged that the radical climatic changes of the so-called glacial and interglacial episodes are explained only by major vulcanism arising from discontinuous motions of disturbed crustal plates[350]. This is precisely what occurred at the time of the Phaeton disaster and in the period immediately afterwards. The disaster apparently set in motion a chain-reaction, with one set of effects leading inevitably to the next, and of which the latest and less severe are still being experienced today.

In our opinion, the growth of the present polar ice-caps did not lead to the development of the vast ice-sheets advocated by Geikie and Penck, but rather to a multiplicity of glaciers (many of very large size) on all the recently elevated plateaux and mountain ranges. These even formed on high land in tropical regions. Thus, glaciers descended Mt Kilimanjaro in Tanzania to 3,000ft (900m) lower than their remnants do today[351]. Others even then existed on the equator[352]. Worldwide, they represented what is now termed the Little Ice Age[353].

Between 11,500 and 7,500 years BP, these glaciers produced a massive rearrangement of many superficial 'drift' deposits, relocated detached boulders, left thousands of moraines and influenced climates locally. But not all moraines were or are necessarily of glacial origin[354]. Glaciers proceeded at different speeds depending on local conditions, sometimes retreating and re-advancing several times over the same routes. In doing so, they locally modified existing mountain valleys, fiords and hillsides, and carved out mountainside depressions such as cirques. Only very occasionally did they unite to form ice-sheets of limited extent. These actions did not cause the polishing, fluting, gouging or striation of rock strata which, though commonly attributed to supposed ice action during the 'Ice Age', were made during the Phaeton confrontation before glaciation commenced. Thus, while the ice-sheets so beloved of orthodox glacialists never really existed, the glaciers most certainly did. The glaciers of today are the last vestiges of a frigid era that ought more properly to be styled the 'Glacier Age' rather than the 'Ice Age'.

Obviously these glaciers did not all form at the same rate, for their growth depended on variations of snowfall, the latitude of their occurrence and the gradient of the hill or mountainside down which they descended. Scientists have calculated some reliable dates for the initiation and maximum expansion of several famous glacier (including the Mer de Glace on Mont Blanc and the Rhone Glacier), and these not only correlate with the 11,500 years BP date we have advocated for the Phaeton disaster, but show that the entire 'Glacier Age' occurred within the Holocene period. Incidentally, the date given for the great tectonic changes which occurred on Spitzbergen and neighbouring islands and for their glaciation is also Holocene[355].

It would appear that the conditions producing the growth of the glaciers were geologically of short duration and lasted until early historical times – say 6,000–7,000 years ago in Eurasia and as late as 3,000 years ago in North America. Thus, the terrible Fimbul winter of Norse tradition is quite credible, and is in keeping with the belief of the Aymara Indians of Andean Peru that, after the Deluge, the mightiest of the gods punished the wicked by throwing a coat of snow and ice over the whole country[356].

Even the Polynesians, now living in idyllic surroundings, have memories about early times when their gods and ancestors lived in severe wintry conditions. S P Smith noted that: "The Tongans have also a tradition of the ice-covered ocean, which they call Taifatu, which means the thick fat-like or congealed ocean, and which some of their ancestors had been in ages ago"[357]. And Brown observed that: "Most of the Polynesian gods and demigods of the underworld have indications in their careers of having come from a land of bitter winter"[358].

It is surely significant, therefore, that in the Babylonian Talmud a celestial body known as Kimah is described as the source of 'great cold'; and that an ancient Jewish legend states that a change in, or of, Kimah was responsible for the Deluge[359]. Kimah was regarded either as a planet or the constellation of the Pleiades, which, as the undermentioned details suggest, was a most interesting concept.

The ancient association of a period of intense cold on Earth with some celestial influence is also found in the Old Testament, which links the icy phase with the Pleiades and with Mazzaroth (alias Phaeton/Marduk), for we read:

> Out of whose womb came forth the ice?
> And the hoary frost of heaven,
> who hath gendered it?

Table 5C

Phaeton's record compared: geological/biological, astrophysical and traditional.

Geological/Biological (factual) (all dated 'late Pleistocene')	Astrophysical (theoretical)	Traditional (memories)
Deposition of 'drift' and silt		Deposition of mud and gravel
	Change in atmosphere, Nitric acid formed and chemical reactions due to release of energy	Changed atmosphere - described as poisoned
Changed bio-ecological regimes		Changed biological regime
Changed polar axis	Change in polar axis of rotation Slowed rotational speed	Change in polar axis
Variable axial rotation - length of day fluctuates	Change in length of day, year and seasons	Changes in length of day and seasons
		Changes in position of polar constellations
Changed topography with: land elevation/subsidence, mountain elevation/subsidence, disappearance and creation of seas, desert formation		Land subsidence mountain elevation/subsidence disappearance of seas
	Noise from sonic booms and earthquakes	Deafening noise
Changed water levels		Drought
Conflagration in some areas	Rise in temperatures above boiling point of water	Tremendous fire and heat boiling seas, lakes and rivers
Destruction of flora and fauna		Destruction of animal life, withering of vegetation
Dust in the atmosphere	Atmospheric pollution: low cloud-cover in high latitudes	Rains of fire and dust - a collapsed sky
Flooding	Giant tides raised and pulled polewards - when released caused global flooding	Northward trend of water followed by world deluge
Geoidal deformation	Geoidal deformation
Global crustal fracturing with: crustal shortening, expansion, inversion, overthusting, tilting, lateral displacements, coastal warping	Global earthquakes. Puncturing of crust produces violent explosions. Impacts cause low-presure areas leading to hurricane force winds	Earth cracks into great chasms Hurricane force winds
Magnetic reversal with: anomalous magnetic losses, anomalous magnetic trends	Magnetic reversal
Massive lava/magma flows	Lava flows	Rivers of fire
Marine displacements		Tritonis, Han Hai
Period of intense cooling	Drop in temperatures globally due to vulcanism	Sun blotted out
Sudden onset of glacial conditions in northern hemisphere	Earth plunged into darkness for 5 years or longer depending on duration of vulcanism	Sudden arrival of glacial conditions and perpetual night
Uni-directional 'meteoric' fall in northern hemisphere		Falls of metal and stones
Uni-directional movement of huge 'erratics'		Movement of huge rocks
Uni-directional striation flow across northern hemisphere
Worldwide vulcanism	Severe vulcanism	Widespread conflagration

> The waters are hid as with a stone
> and the face of the deep is frozen.
> Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, > or loose the bands of Orion?
> Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth in his season?[360]

Here, perhaps, is an indication of the celestial direction from which Phaeton arrived – from that of the Pleiades and Orion.

So in antiquity at least, the notion of great terrestrial cold was directly associated with significant celestial events and with a period of great darkness, and to have quickly followed a worldwide Deluge. These traditions, therefore, are not only consistent with one another, but also reflect the correct sequence of physical processes and effects traceable by scientific investigation. Furthermore, they also largely coincide with the theoretical propositions of astrophysicists respecting the probable effects sustained by Earth in the event of a close cosmic fly-by. Table 5C gives a comparison of these effects. Surely such harmony between essentially disparate material cannot be fortuitous.

REFERENCES

1. Bellamy, H S. 1945. In the Beginning God (London), 212pp; see p157.
2. Posewitz, T. 1892. Borneo: Its Geology and Mineral Resources, tr by F H Hatch, (London) xxxii + 495pp; see p260, footnotes 1 and 3, p261, footnote 1.
3. Stephens, J. 1919–1920. "The Freshwater Sponges of Ireland", Proc Roy Irish Acad, vol xxxv, pp205–254.
4. Babcock, W H. 1922. "Legendary Islands of the Atlantic", Amer Geogr Soc Res, ser no 8, (Greenwich, USA), 196pp; see p128.
5. Hobbs, W H. 1959. "Zeno and the geography of Greenland", Imago Mundi, vol vi, pp15–19.
6. Babcock, W H. 1922. Op cit, pp96, 141.
7. Hobbs, W H. 1959. Loc cit.
8. Hapgood, C H. 1966. Maps of the Ancient Sea Kings: Evidence of Advanced Civilisations in the Ice Age (Philadelphia), 316pp; see pp156–7.
9. Hapgood, C H. 1966. Op cit.
10. Hapgood, C H. 1979. Op cit, 2nd edn (London); see pp124–133, 251–2.
11. Embleton C, & C M King. 1975. Glacial Geomorphology (London), 2nd edn, vi + 573pp; see p16.
12. Baird, P D. 1964. The Polar World (London), xvi + 328pp; see p246.
13. Embleton C, & C A M King. 1975. Op cit, p49.
14. Denton G H, & T J Hughes. 1981. The Last Great Ice Sheets (New York), 464pp; see p50.
15. Denton G H, & T J Hughes. 1981. Op cit, pp48–49.
16. Inglefield, Capt. 1867. "On the Change of the Obliquity of the Ecliptic: its influence on the climate of the Polar regions and on the level of the sea", Phil Mag, ser 4, vol 33, pp426–445.
17. Holtzcherer, J J, G de Q Robin. 1954. "Depth of the Polar Ice Caps", Geogr J, vol cxx, part 2, June, pp193–202.
18. Johnson S J, H B Clausen et al. 1992. Loc cit, p533. White, J W C. 1993. "Don't touch that dial", Nature, vol 364, issue 6434 (July 15th), p186.
19. Putnam, W C. 1964. Geology (New York), xiii + 480pp; see p125.
20. Forrest, H E. The Atlantean Continent (London), 2nd edn, 352pp; see p55.
21. Pickles, T. 1953. The World (London), xvi + 431pp; see p315.
22. Scharff, R F. 1899. The History of the European Fauna (London), vii + 364pp; see p156, fig 12.
23. Maunder, A S D. 1912. "The Zoroastrian Star Champions", Observatory, vol xxxv, (Nov), pp393–6; see pp395–6.
24. Suess, E. 1904. The Face of the Earth, 2 vols, (London); see vol 1, pp17–18.
25. Kennett, J P, & N D Watkins. 1970. "Geomagnetic Polarity Change, volcanic maxima and faunal extinctions in the South Pacific", Nature, vol227, pp930–934.
26. Gray, L (ed). 1918. J Machal in The Mythology of All Races, 13 vols, (Boston); see vol iii, p229.
27. Ginzberg, L. 1925. Legends of the Jews, 7 vols, (Philadelphia); see vol ii, p259.
28. Williamson, R W. 1933. Religious and Cosmic Beliefs of Central Polynesia, 2 vols, (Cambridge); see vol i, p41.
29. Bancroft, H H. 1875–6. Native Races of the Pacific States of North America, 5 vols, (London); see vol iii, p86.
30. Aston, W G (tr). 1956. The Nihongi: Chronicles from Japan from Earliest Times to AD 697 (London), xx + 443pp; see p110.
31. Teit, J A. 1917. "Kaska Tales", J Am Folklore, vol xxx, p440.
32. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Moons, Myths and Man (London), 351pp; see p80.
33. Frobenius, L. 1898. Die Weltanschauung der Naturvölker (Weimar), xv + 427pp; see pp355–7.
34. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p277.

35. Aston, W G (tr). Op cit, p46.
36. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p286.
37. Hallock, W. 1901. "Peculiar Effects due to Lightning Discharge on Lake Champlain in August 1900", J Geol, vol 9, pp671–2.
38. Barnett, V H. 1908. "An Example of Disruption of Rock by Lightning", J Geol, vol 16, pp568–571.
39. Griggs, G B, & J A Gilchrist. 1983. Geological Hazards, Resources and Environmental Planning (Belmont, Calif), 2nd edn, xvii + 502pp; see p82.
40. Williams, H, & A R McBirney. 1979. Volcanology (San Francisco), 396pp; see p362.
    Stothers, R B. 1984. "The Great Tambora Eruption in 1815 and its Aftermath", Science, vol 242, pp1191–1198.
41. Williams, H, & A R McBirney. 1979. Op cit.
    Harrington, C R (ed). 1992. The Year without a Summer. World climate in 1816, (Ottawa), 576pp.
42. Lamb, H H. 1970. "Volcanic Dust in the Atmosphere: with a chronology and assessment of its meteorological significance", Phil Trans Roy Soc Lond, vol 266, pp425–533.
43. Bray, J R. 1977. "Pleistocene Volcanism and Glacial Initiation", Science, vol 197, pp251–254.
44. Kennett, J P, & R C Thunnell. 1975. "Global Increase in Quaternary Explosive Volcanism", Science, vol 187, pp497–503.
45. Pollack, J B et al. 1976. "Volcanic Eruptions and Climatic Change: a theoretical assessment", J Geophys Res, vol 81, pp1071–1083.
46. Lamb, H H. 1970. Op cit.
47. Clube, V, & W M Napier. 1982. "The Role of Episodic Bombardment in Geophysics", Earth & Planetary Sci Letts, no 57, pp251–262.
48. Anonymous. 1964. "What's Happened to the Earth's Helium?", New Scientist, vol 24, pp631–2.
49. Ovenden, M W. 1972. "Bode's Law and the Missing Planet", Nature, vol 239, pp508–9.
    Van Flandern, T C. 1978. "A Former Asteroidal Planet and the Origin of Comets", Icarus, vol 36, pp51–74; see p51.
50. Gold, T. 1955. "Instability of the Earth's Axis of Rotation", Nature, vol 175, pp526–9.
51. Warlow, P. 1978. "Geomagnetic Reversals", J Phys A, vol 11, pp2107–2130.
52. Sagan, C. 1977. "An Analysis of Worlds in Collision", pp41–104 in Scientists Confront Velikovsky, D Goldsmith (ed), (Ithaca & London), 184pp.
53. Leet, L D. 1948. The Causes of Catastrophe (New York), 232pp; see pp1–6.
54. Leet, L D. 1948. Op cit, pp53–54.
55. Leet, L D. 1948. Op cit, p7.
56. Leet, L D. 1948. Op cit, p46.
57. Fuller, M L. 1912. "The New Madrid Earthquake", Bull US Geol Surv, no 494, p52.
58. Vitaliano, D R. 1973. Legends of the Earth: their Geologic Origins (Indiana Univ Press), xiii + 305pp; see p100.
59. Whittow, J. 1980. Disasters (London), 398pp; see pp139–141.
60. Whittow, J. 1980. Op cit, p150.
61. Brunsden, D et al. 1977. The Unquiet Landscape (London), 168pp; see p37.
62. Strachey, R. 1894. "The Landslip at Gohna, in British Garwhal", Geogr J, vol iv, no 2, pp162–170; see pp162 & 166.
63. Anonymous. 1961. Encyclopaedia Britannica; see vol 23, pp443–444.
64. Leet, L D. 1948. Op cit, pp169–170.
65. Vitaliano, D R. 1973. Op cit, p90.
66. Burrard, S G. 1912. "The Earth as a Planet: the Geology of India", Observatory, vol xxxv, May, pp189–193.
67. See, T J J. 1913. "Further Considerations on the Origin of the Himalayan Mountains and the Plateau of Tibet", Proc Amer Philos Soc, vol lii, pp495–515; see p496.
68. Cloos, H, & C Dietz. 1954. Conversations with the Earth (London), xiii + 427pp; see p258.
69. Burrard, S G. 1912. Op cit, p191.
70. Mantura, A J. 1972. "Geophysical Illusions of Continental Drift", Bull Amer Ass Petrol Geol, vol 56, pp1552–1556.
71. Oppenheim, V. 1967. "Critique of Hypothesis of Continental Drift", Bull Amer Ass Petrol Geol, vol 51, pp1354–1360; see p1360.
72. Taira, K. 1981. "Holocene Tectonism in Eastern Asia and Geoidal Changes", Palaeogeogr Palaeoclimat Palaeoecol, vol 36, pp75–85; see p75.
73. Spilhaus, A. 1975. "Geo-Art: Tectonics and Platonic Solids", Trans Amer Geophys Un, vol 56, pp52–57; see fig 8.
74. Kerr, R A. 1984. "Continental Heading Drilling Deeper", Science, vol 224, p1418.
    Kerr, R A. 1984. "Probing the Deep Continental Crust", Science, vol 225, p492.
75. Norman, J, & M Chukwu-Ike. 1977. "The World is a Bit Cracked", New Scientist, vol 73, pp320–322.
76. Nixon, G T. 1982. "The Relationships between Quaternary volcanism in Central Mexico and the Seismicity and Structure of Subducted Ocean Lithosphere", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 93, pp514–523; see p514.
77. Mooser, F, & M Maldonado-Koerdell. 1961. "Tectonica penecontemporanea a lo largo de la costa mexicana deal Océano Pacífico", Geofisica Internat, vol 1, pp3–20.
78. Gastil, G R, & W Jensky. 1973. "Evidence for strike-dip Displacement beneath the trans-Mexican Volcanic Belt", Stanford Univ Publ Geol Sci, vol 13, pp171–180.
79. Nixon, G T. 1982. Op cit, p517.
80. Meyer-Abich, H. 1956. "Los volcanos activos de Guatemala y El Salvador", An Serv Geol Nacl El Salvador, vol 3, pp1–102.
81. Whitmore, T C (ed), 1981. Wallace's Line or Plate Tectonics (Oxford), xii + 91pp.
82. Kennedy, W Q. 1947. "Catalogue of the Active Volcanoes of the World", Bull Vulcanologique, Suppl de Serie II, tome vii.
83. Savage-Landor, H. 1913. Across Unknown South America, 2 vols, (London); see vol 1, pp77, 176–7, 182, 186, 269–271, 363.

84. Savage-Landor, H. 1913. Op cit, vol 1, pp336–7; see plate opp p332.
85. Leet, L D, & F J Leet. 1961. The World of Geology (New York), vi + 262pp; see p172.
86. Putnam, W C. 1964. Geology (New York), xiii + 480pp; see p79.
87. Leet, L D, & F J Leet. 1961. Op cit, p172.
88. Stearns, H T, & W O Clark. 1930. "Geology and Water Resources of the Kan District, Hawaii", US Geol Surv Water Supply Paper 616.
89. Gallant, R. 1964. The Bombarded Earth (London), 256pp; see p64.
    Vitaliano, D R. 1973. Op cit, pp185–187.
90. Bullard, F M. 1962. Volcanoes in History, in Theory, in Eruption (Austin TX), 441pp; see p85.
91. Furneaux, R. 1964. Krakatoa (New Jersey), 224pp; see p154.
92. Gallant, R. 1964. Op cit, p65.
93. Leet, L D. 1948. Op cit, p8.
94. Leet, L D, & F J Leet. 1961. Op cit, p186.
95. Leet, L D. 1948. Op cit, p8.
96. Leet, L D. 1948. Op cit, pp9–10.
97. Hovey, E D. 1902. "Observations on the eruptions of 1902 of La Soufrière, St Vincent, and Mt Pelée, Martinique", Amer J Sci, ser 4, vol xiv (clxiv), pp319–358.
98. Hovey, E O. 1902. Op cit, pp334–5.
99. Hovey, E O. 1902. Op cit, p357.
100. Embleton C, & C A M King. 1975. Op cit, p184.
101. Blackwelder, E. 1928. "Mudflow as a Geologic Agent in semi-arid Mountains", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol xxxix, pp465–483, pp471ff.
102. Whittow, J. 1980. Op cit, p145.
103. Whittow, J. 1980. Ibid.
104. Perret, F A. 1935. "The Eruption of Mt Pelée, 1929–1932", Publ Carnegie Inst, Washington, no 458, pp45, 87.
105. Hovey, E O. 1909. "Striations and U-shaped valleys produced by other than glacial action", Bull Geol Soc Am, vol xx, pp409–416; see fig 2 in plate 38.
106. MacDonald, G A. 1972. Volcanoes (New Jersey), xi + 510pp; see p4.
107. Gorshkov, G S, & Y M Dubik. 1969. "Directed Blast on the Volcano Shiveluch", in Vulkany i Izerzheniya (Moscow), Akad Nauk USSR Sibirskoye Otdeleniye, Inst Vulkanologii, Izdatel'stvo "Nauka", pp3–37.
108. Griggs, G B, & J A Gilchrist. 1983. Geologic Hazards, Resources and Environmental Planning (Belmont CA), 2nd edn, xvii + 502pp; see p82.
109. Gray, L H (ed). 1916. Op cit; see vol x, pp223–224.
110. Tylor, E B. 1874. Primitive Culture, 2 vols, (Boston); see vol ii, p288.
111. Gray, L H (ed). 1916. Op cit; see vol ii, p339.
112. Ellis-Davidson, H R. 1964. Gods and Myths of Northern Europe (London), 225pp.
113. Miller, F J (tr). 1916. Ovid P. Metamorphoses (London & New York).
114. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p114.
115. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p77.
116. Dana, J D. 1880. Manual of Geology (New York), 3rd edn, xvi + 911pp; see p275.
117. Geikie, J. 1877. The Great Ice Age (London), 2nd edn, xxvii + 624pp; see p21.
118. Geikie, J. 1877. Op cit, pp149–150.
119. Dana, J D. 1880. Op cit, p220.
120. Anonymous. 1878. American Encyclopedia; see vol vi, p112.
121. Anonymous. 1878. Op cit, pp111, 114.
122. Figuier, L. 1891. The World Before the Deluge, (Bristow's translation), (London), viii + 518pp; see p435.
123. Figuier, L. 1891. Op cit, p463.
124. Carnoy, A J. 1917. In Gray, L (ed). Op cit, vol vi.
125. Eisler, R. 1910. Weltmantel und Himmelszelt, (München); see vol ii, p453.
126. King, L W. 1902. The Seven Tablets of Creation (London), 2 vols.
127. Gadd, C J. 1929. The Babylonian Story of the Deluge and the Epic of Gilgamesh (Brit Mus, London) 57pp; see p36.
128. Gadd, C J. 1929. Op cit, p35.
129. Gadd, C J. 1929. Op cit, p36.
130. Ginzberg, L. 1925. Op cit, vol ii, p360.
131. Gómara, F L de. 1553. Conquista de Mexico 2 vols, (Madrid); see vol ii, pp261ff.
132. Holmes, A. 1964. Principles of Physical Geology (London), 2nd edn, xv + 1288pp; see p471.
133. Tylor, E B. 1874. Op cit, p322ff.
134. Alexander, H B. 1916. In Gray, L H (ed). Op cit, p223.
135. Anonymous. 1881. "Precipitation", Mon Weather Rev, (June), p18.
136. Geikie, J. 1877. Op cit, p150.
137. Redfield, W G. 1839. "Some account of violent columnar whirlwinds which appear to have resulted from the action of large circular fires", Am J Sci, vol xxxvi, pp50–59.
138. Bond, H (ed). 1946. Fire and Air War (Nat Fire Protection Assn, Boston), xii + 262pp; see p85.
139. Bond, H (ed). 1946. Op cit, p116.
140. Bond, H (ed). 1946. Op cit, p118.
141. Bullard, F M. 1976. Volcanoes of the Earth (Austin), revd edn, 579pp; see p152.
142. Bond, H (ed). 1946. Op cit, p117.
143. Bond, H (ed). 1946. Op cit, p114.
144. Sheahan, J W, & G P Upton. 1871. The History of the Great Conflagration (Chicago), 458pp.
145. Sheahan, J W, & G P Upton. 1871. Op cit, p87.
146. Sheahan, J W, & G P Upton. 1871. Op cit, pp85–86.
147. Sheahan, J W, & G P Upton. 1871. Op cit, p119.
148. Savage, H jr. 1982. The Mysterious Carolina Bays (Univ Sth Carolina), xv + 121pp; see p2.
149. Goodwin, B K, & G H Johnson. 1970. "Geology of the Upland Gravels near Midlothian, Virginia", Atlantic Coastal Plain Geol Assoc Guidebook, pt 2, 11th Ann Fld Conf, Norfolk VA.
150. Savage, H jr. 1982. Op cit, p14.
151. Savage, H jr. 1982. Op cit, p23.

152. Savage, H jr. 1982. Op cit, p7.
153. Savage, H jr. 1982. Op cit, pp4, 7.
154. Velikovsky, I. 1956. Earth in Upheaval (London), xiv + 263pp; see p87.
155. Savage, H jr. 1982. Op cit, p7.
156. Tuomey, M. 1847. Report on the Geology of South Carolina (Columbia, S Carolina), iv + 293pp.
157. Glenn, L E. 1895. "Some notes on Darlington (SC) 'Bays'", Science, vol 2, pp472–5.
158. Smith, L L. 1931. "Solution Depressions in Sandy Sediments of the Coastal Plain of South Carolina", J Geol, vol 39, pp641–652.
159. Melton, F A, & W Schriever. 1933. "The Carolina 'Bays' – are they Meteor Scars?", J Geol, vol 41, pp52–66; see p56.
160. Nininger, HH. 1934. "When the Sky Rains Stone and Iron", Literary Digest, vol 117, pp16–29.
     Wylie, C C. 1933. "On the Formation of Meteorite Craters", Pop Astron.., vol 41, pp211–214.
161. Melton, F A. 1934. "The Origin of the Carolina 'Bays'", Discovery (June), pp151–4.
162. Cooke, C W. 1940. "Elliptical Bays of South Carolina and the Shape of Eddies", J Geol, vol 48, pp205–211.
163. Kelly, A O, & F Dachaille. 1953. Target Earth: the Role of Large Meteors in Earth Science (Carlsbad, CA), 263pp.
164. Grant, C. 1945. "A Biological Explanation of the Carolina Bays", Sci Mon, vol 61, pp443–450.
165. Shand, S J. 1946. "Dust Devils? Paralelism between the South African Salt Pans and the Carolina Bays", Scient Mon, vol 62, p117.
166. McGarthy, G R. 1937. "The Carolina Bays", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 48, pp1211–1226.
167. Corlett, E H. 1947. "The Carolina Bays", Scient Mon, vol 46, p187.
168. McCampbell, J C. 1944. "Meteorites and the Carolina Bays", Pop Astron, vol 53, pp388–392.
169. Prouty, W F. 1952. "Carolina Bays and their Origin", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 63, p167–224.
170. Savage, H jr. 1982. Op cit, p96.
171. Kelly, A O, & F Dachaille. 1953. Op cit.
172. Carson, C E, & K M Hussey. 1962. "The Oriented Lakes of Arctic Canada", J Geol, vol 70, pp417–439.
173. Black, R F, & W L Barksdale. 1949. "Oriented Lakes of Northern Alaska", J Geol, vol 57, pp105–118.
174. Black, R F, & W L Barksdale. 1949. Op cit.
175. Plafker, G. 1964. "Oriented Lakes and Lineaments in Northern Bolivia", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 75, pp503–522.
176. Obruchev, S V. 1941. "Obshcheie merzlotovedeneie" ("General Frozen Ground Science", textbook), unpublished extract in English of chap ix of I V Poire's textbook, Akad Nauk SSSR, Feb 1947.
177. Plafker, G. 1964. Op cit.
178. Hoffleit, D. 1952. "Bays in Holland", Sky and Telescope, vol 12, p8.
179. Kelly, A O. 1951. "The Origin of the Carolina Bays and Oriented Lakes of Alaska", Pop Astron, vol 59, pp199–205.
180. Maunder, A S D. 1912. "The Zoroastrian Star Champions", Observatory (Dec), pp438–443; see p438.
181. Muller, F M (tr). 1891. Vedic Hymns, 2 vols, (Oxford); see mandala 1, hymns 171, 172.
182. Book of Revelation, chap 12, v7–9.
183. Book of Revelation, chap 8, v1.
184. Book of Revelation, chap 8, v5.
185. Book of Revelation, chap 8, v7.
186. Book of Revelation, chap 8, v8–9.
187. Book of Revelation, chap 8, v10.
188. Book of Revelation, chap 8, v11.
189. Book of Revelation, chap 9, v1–2.
190. Book of Revelation, chap 12, v3–4.
191. Book of Revelation, chap 12, v15.
192. Book of Revelation, chap 13, v5.
193. Book of Revelation, chap 6, v14.
194. Bellows, H A (tr). 1923. The Poetic Edda: Voluspa (London), n p.
195. Donnelly, I. 1895. Ragnarok: the Age of Fire and Gravel (New York), vi + 452pp; see p144.
196. Donnelly, I. 1895. Op cit, p144.
197. Epistle of Jude, chap 1, v6.
198. Second Epistle of Peter, chap 2, v4.
199. Book of Enoch, chap 18, v14–15, chap 19, v1–2..
200. Book of Enoch, chap 88, v3–5.
201. Book of Enoch, chap 89, v2–6.
202. Second Epistle of Peter, chap 2, v5.
203. Merezhkovsky, D S. 1933. The Secret of the West, tr by J Cournos, (London), 449pp; see p74.
204. Kellett, E E. 1927. The Story of Myths (London), 275pp; see p124.
205. Emery, K O. 1949. "Topography and Sediments of the Arctic Ocean", J Geol, vol 57, pp512–521; see map opp p514.
206. Herman, Y (ed). 1974. Marine Geology and Oceanography of the Arctic Sea (New York), 376pp; see p100.
207. Short, J T. 1880. The North Americans of Antiquity (New York), 2nd edn, xviii + 544pp; see p499.
208. Brinton, D G. 1882. Myths of the New World (Philadelphia), viii + 331pp; see p170.
209. Brinton, D G. 1882. Op cit, p181.
210. Alexander, H B. 1920. Latin American Mythology (Boston), xvi + 424pp; see p72.
211. Brinton, D G. 1882. Op cit, p197.
212. Tylor, E B. 1870. Researches into the Early History of Mankind (London), vi + 386pp; see p222.
213. Warren, H C. 1896. Buddhism in Translations (Harvard Univ Press), xx + 520pp; see 'World Cycles' in the section on "Visuddhi-Magga", p328.
214. Arago, F. 1865. Astronomie Populaire, 4 vols, (Paris); see vol iv, p204.
215. Link, T A. 1957. "Whence came the Hydrocarbons?" Bull Amer Ass Petrol Geol, vol 41, pp1387–1402.
216. Holmburg, V. 1927. Finno-Ugric, Siberian Mythology (Boston); see p370.
217. Frazer, J C (tr). 1921. Apollodorus' The Library, 2 vols, (London & New York).

218. Buckley, A (tr). 1861. "To Minerva", in 'Orphic Hymns', in Homer's Odyssey (New York), xxx + 432pp.
219. Holmburg, V. 1927. Op cit.
220. King, L W. 1902. The Seven Tablets of Creation, 2 vols, (London).
221. Book of Revelation, chap 8, v7.
222. Apocalypse of Thomas, found in Summa Theologica, tr from the original Latin; 1st American edn, 3 vols (New York), 1947–48.
223. Bourbourg, Brassaeur de. 1957–59. Histoire des Nations civilisées du Mexique, 2 vols, (Paris); see vol 1, p30.
224. Langdon, S. 1923. Enuma Elish: The Babylonian Epic of Creation (Oxford), n p.
225. Book of Revelation, chap 4, v6.
226. Book of Revelation, chap 8, v7.
227. Merck, C. 1876. Excavations at the Kesslerloch near Thayngen, Switzerland, a cave of the Reindeer Period, tr by J E Lee, (London), viii + 68pp; see p7.
228. Molnar, R E. 1980. "The Fossils of Tea Tree Cave", Tower Karst, no 3, pp9–15.
229. Busk, G. 1872. "On the Animal Remains found by Col Lane Fox in the High- and Low-Terrace Gravels of Acton and Turnham Green", Q Jl Geol Soc Lond, vol 28, pp465–471, pp465–6.
230. Heer, O. 1866. "On the Miocene Flora of North Greenland", Rep Brit Assoc Advmt Sci (Nottingham), pp53–55; see p53.
231. Corser, C E. 1978. "The Sand and Gravel Resources of the country around Abingdon", Inst Geol Sci Lond Min, assessment rep 38, iv + 105pp; see p14.
232. Lee, J S. 1939. The Geology of China (London), xv + 528pp; see p421.
233. Lee, J S. 1939. Op cit, pp202, 368, 371.
234. Watkins, W I. 1945. "Observations on the Properties of Loess in Engineering Structures", Amer J Sci, vol 243, pp294–303; see p297.
235. Bates, R L, & J A Jackson. 1980. Glossary of Geology (Amer Geol Inst, Virginia), vii-x, 749pp; see p367.
236. Grieve, D A, & W K Fletcher. 1976. "Heavy Metals in Deltaic Sediments of the Fraser River, British Columbia", Canad Jl Earth Sci, vol 13, pp1683–1693, p1693.
237. Wright, G F. 1889. "The Idaho Find", Amer Antiq Orient Jl, vol xi, pp379–381.
238. Heyl, P R. 1913. "Platinum in North Carolina", Proc Amer Phil Soc, vol lii, pp2–30, pp21, 22, 27.
239. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p87.
240. Book of Job, chap 40, v21, 38.
241. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p84.
242. Opik, E J. 1955. "Cosmic Source of deep-sea Deposits", Nature, vol 176, pp926–7.
243. Frederickson, K. 1956. "Cosmic Spherules in deep-sea Sediments", Nature, vol 177, pp32–33.
244. Fairbridge, R W. 1966. Encyclopedia of Oceanography (New York, v-xiii, 1021pp; see p523.
245. Kuenen, P H. 1950. Marine Geology (New York), x + 568pp, pp359–360.
246. Seibold, E, & W H Berger. 1982. The Sea Floor (New York), vii + 288pp, pp359–360.
247. Emery, K O. 1949. "Topography and Sediments of the Arctic Ocean", J Geol, vol 57, pp512–521; see pp516–518.
248. Pettersson, H. 1953. Westward Ho with the Albatross (New York), 218pp; see pp149–150.
249. Pettersson, H. 1950. "Exploring the Ocean Floor", Scient Amer (August), pp42–44.
250. Pettersson, H. 1953. Op cit, p150.
251. Seibold, E, & W H Berger. 1982. Op cit, p241.
252. Kuenen, P H. 1950. Op cit, p375.
253. Kennett, J P. 1982. Marine Geology (New Jersey), xv + 813pp; see p500.
254. Seibold, E, & W H Berger. 1982. Ibid.
255. Burk, C A, & C L Drake (eds). 1974. The Geology of Continental Margins (New York), xiii + 1009pp, see article by W H Berger.
256. Seibold, E, & W H Berger. 1982. Op cit, p239.
257. Horn, D R. 1972. Ferromanganese Deposits on the Ocean Floor (New York), Washington Nat Science Foundation, n p.
258. Seibold, E, & W H Berger. 1982. Ibid.
259. Seibold, E, & W H Berger. 1982. Op cit, p241.
260. Seibold, E, & W H Berger. 1982. Op cit, p241.
261. Ewing, M, J I Ewing & M Talwani. 1964. "Sediment Distribution in the Oceans: the Mid-Atlantic Ridge", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 75, pp17–34; see p17.
262. Diester-Haass, L, & S van der Spoel. 1978. "Late Pleistocene Pteropod-rich sediment layer in the N E Atlantic and Protoconch variation of 'Clio Pyramidata', Linne 1767", Palaeogeogr Palaeoclimat Palaeoecol, vol 24, no 2, pp85–109; see p85.
263. Diester-Haass, L, & S van der Spoel. 1978. Op cit, p107.
264. Book of Genesis, chap 7, v18–19.
265. Psalms, chap 104, v6.
266. Psalms, chap 33, v7.
267. Tylor, E B. 1929. Primitive Culture, 2 vols, (Boston), edn; see vol i, pp322ff.
268. Legge, J (tr). 1876. "Annals of the Bamboo Books", vol 3, part 1 of The Chinese Classics (Hong Kong).
269. Ginzburg, L. 1925. Legends of the Jews, 7 vols, (Philadelphia); see vol iii, p22.
270. Cambrey, L de. 1926. Lapland Legends (New Haven & Oxford), x + 212pp.
271. Psalms, chap 3, v9.
272. Talmud, Tractate Sanhedrin, 108b.
273. Hess, H H, & P MacClintock. 1936. "Submerged valleys on Continental Slopes and Changes of Sea Level", Science, vol 83, n s, pp332–4.
274. Patten, D W. 1966. The Biblical Flood and the Ice Epoch (Seattle), xvi + 336pp; see p56.
275. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, pp124–5.
276. Book of Genesis, chap 7, v4.
277. Book of Enoch, chap 89, v1.
278. Book of Ezekiel, chap 13, v2, chap 38, v22.
279. West, E W (tr). 1880. "The Bundahish", chap 7, in part 1, in The Pahlavi Texts, 5 vols, (Oxford).

280. Book of Job, chap 37, v9.
281. Bellamy, H S. 1945. Op cit, pp58–59.
282. Gorion, M J ben. 1919. Sagen Juden, 5 vols, (Frankfurt).
283. Book of Genesis, chap 7, v11.
284. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit; see p277.
285. Koran, chap 11.
286. Carson, R L. 1951. The Sea Around Us (London), 230pp; see p124.
287. Shephard, F P. 1959. The Earth beneath the Sea (London), xii + 275pp; see pp45–6.
288. Carson, R L. 1951. Op cit.
289. Leet, L D. 1948. Op cit, pp179–184.
290. Hopkins, W. 1848. "On the Elevation and Denudation of the Lakes of Cumberland and Westmorland", Q Jl Geol Soc Lond, vol 4, pp70–98.
291. Hopkins, W. 1848. Op cit, p93.
292. Phillips, J. 1854. "On the Dispersion of Erratic Rocks at Higher levels than their Parent Rock in Yorkshire", Rep Brit Assoc Advmt Sci, (Hull, 1853), p54.
293. Edwards-Dwight, S. 1926. "Description of the Eruption of Long Lake and Mud Lake in Vermont, and of the desolation effected by the rush of the waters through Barton River, and the lower country towards Lake Memphremagog, in the summer of 1810", Amer J Sci, vol xi, pp39–54.
294. Lyell, C. 1852. Principles of Geology 2 vols, (London), 6th edn; see vol 1, p363.
295. Anonymous. 1857. Voices from the Rocks (London), viii + 147pp; see pp130–131.
296. Griggs, G B, & J A Gilchrist. 1983. Op cit.
297. Taira, K. 1981. "Holocene Tectonism in Eastern Asia and Geoidal Changes", Palaeogeogr Palaeoclimat Palaeoecol, vol 36, pp75–85.
298. Rudzki, M P. 1889. "Deformation der Erde und der Last des Inlandeises", Bull Internat de l'Acad des Sci de Cracovie, vol 168, p48.
299. Sauramo, M. 1939. "The Mode of the Land Upheaval in Fennoscandia during late Quaternary time", C R de la Soc Geol de Finlande, vol 13.
300. Longman, I M. 1962. "A Green's Function for determining the Deformation of the Earth under Surface Mass Loads; 1. Theory", J Geophys Res, vol 67, pp845–850.

     Longman, I M. 1963. "A Green's Function for determining the Deformation of the Earth under Surface Mass Loads; 2. Computations and Numerical Results", J Geophys Res, vol 68, pp485–496.
301. Slichter, L B, & M Caputo. 1960. "Deformation of an Earth Model produced by Surface Pressures", J Geophys Res, vol 65, pp4151–4156.
302. Walcott, R I. 1972. "Flexural rigidity, thickness and viscosity of the Lithosphere", J Geophys Res, vol 75, pp3941–3954.
303. Walcott, R I. 1972b. "Inferences of Upper Mantle Rheology from Quaternary Deformation", Symposium of Recent Crustal Movements (August 1971), Moscow.

     Weertman, J. 1970. "The Creep Strength of the Earth's Mantle", Rev Geophys and Space Phys, vol 8, pp145–168.
304. Takenchi, J, & Y Hasegawa. 1965. "Viscosity Distribution within the Earth", Geophys J Roy Astron Soc, vol 9, pp503–8.
305. Avebury, Lord. 1902. The Scenery of England and the Causes to which it is due (London), ix + 534pp; see p65.
306. Reid, C. 1885. "The Geology of the Country around Holderness", Mem Geol Surv Engl & Wales, (London), 177pp.
307. Heusser, C J. 1972. "Palynology and Phytogeographical Significance of a Late Pleistocene Refugium near Kalaloch, Washing-ton", Quat Res, vol 2, pp189–201.
308. Hunt, C W. 1977. "Catastrophic Termination of the last Wisconsin Ice Advance", Bull Canad Petrol Geol, vol 25, pp456–467.
309. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p262.
310. Arkell, W J. "Geological Results of the Cloudburst in the Weymouth District, 18th July 1955", Proc Dor Nat Hist & Arch Soc, vol 77 (1955), pp90–96.
311. Fielden, H W. 1896. "Notes on the Glacial Geology of Arctic Europe and its Islands – Part One: Koluguev Island", Geol Mag, n s, dec iv, vol iii, p40.
312. Lamont, J. 1859. "Notes on Spitzbergen", The Geologist, vol 2, p293.
313. Hooker, J D. 1881. "Presidential Address", Proc Roy Geogr Soc Lond, vol 3, pp601–604.
314. Markham, C R. 1906. "On the next Great Arctic Discovery, the Beaufort Sea", Geogr J, vol xxvii, no 1, pp1–4.
315. Nansen, F. 1907. "On North Polar Problems", Geogr J, vol xxx, no 6, pp585–601.
316. Bird, J B. 1966. The Physiography of Arctic Canada (Johns Hopkins Univ Press), xix + 336pp; see p135.
317. Greely, A W. 1866. "Arctic Expedition with reference to Grinnell Land", Proc R Geogr Soc, vol x, no 8, pp156–176, p162.
318. Bird, J B. 1966. Op cit.
319. Frenzel, B. 1968. "The Pleistocene Vegetation of Northern Eurasia", Science, vol 161, no 3842, pp637–648.
320. Whitely, D G. 1910. "The Ivory Islands of the Arctic Ocean", J Trans Vict Inst Lond, vol xlii, pp35–57, p43.
321. Wrangell, F P von. 1844. Narrative of an Expedition to Siberia and the Polar Sea, 1820–23 (London), 2nd edn, xix + 525pp, tr by E Sabine; see p471.
322. Wrangell, F P von. 1844. Op cit, p383.
323. Wrangell, F P von. 1844. Op cit, p173fn.
324. Erman, G A. 1848. Travels in Siberia 2 vols, (London); see vol ii, pp379–380.
325. Whitely, D G. 1910. "The Ivory Islands in the Arctic Ocean" J Trans Vict Inst Lond, vol xlii, pp35–57; see p43.
326. Anonymous. 1895. "Baron von Toll's Expedition to Arctic Siberia", Geogrl J, vol v, p373–376.
327. Wrangell, F P von. 1844. Op cit, p491.

328. Wrangell, F P von. 1844. Op cit, p cxxiv.
329. Wrangell, F P von. 1844. Ibid.
330. Wrangell, F P von. 1844. Ibid..
331. Brandt, A F. 1867. "Kurze Bemerkungen über Aufrechtstehende Mammut-Leichen", Bull Soc Nat Moscow, vol xl, no iii, pp241–256.
332. Nordenskiöld, N A E. 1881. Voyage of the Vega around Asia and Europe, 2 vols, tr by A Leslie, (London); see vol 1, pp380–1.
333. Schmidt, M Fra. 1869. "Vorlaufige Mittheilung über die wissenschaftliche Resultate der Expedition zur Aufsuchung eines angekündigten Mammuth-kadavers", Bull Acad St Petersburg, vol 13, pp97–130, p112.
334. Ure, A. 1829. A New System of Geology (London), lv + 621pp; see p455, citing Prof Kounizin in Isis.
335. Erman, G A. 1848. Op cit; see vol ii, p379.
336. Howorth, H H. 1887. The Mammoth and the Flood (London), xxxii + 464pp; see pp63–64.
337. Bell, R. 1889. "On Glacial Phenomena in Canada", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 1, pp287–310; see p309.
338. Ure, A. 1829. Op cit, p483.
339. Lamb, H H. 1970. Loc cit.
340. Johnson, R G, & J T Andrews. 1979. "Rapid Ice-sheet growth and Initiation of the Last Glaciation", Quat Res, vol 12, pp119–134.
Lamb, H H, & A Woodroffe. 1970. "Atmospheric Circulation during the last Ice Age", Quat Res, vol 1, pp29–58.
341. Upham, W. 1895. "The Glacial Lake Agassiz", US Geol Surv Monograph xxv, p240.
342. Lamb, H H, & A Woodroffe. 1970. Op cit, p33.
343. Vasari, Y, H Hyvarinen, S Hicks (eds). 1972. Climatic Changes in Arctic Areas during the last Ten Thousand Years (Univ of Oulu, Finland).
344. Hammer, G H, H B Claussen & W Dansgaard. 1980. "Greenland Ice-Sheet Evidence of post-glacial Volcanism and its Climatic Impact", Nature, vol 288, pp230–235.
345. Lamb, H H. 1968. "Volcanic Dust, Melting of Ice-caps, and Sea-levels", Palaeogeogr Palaeoclimat Palaeoecol, vol 4, pp219–222.
346. Hammer, G H. 1977. "Past Volcanism revealed by Greenland Ice-Sheet Impurities", Nature, vol 270, issue 5637, pp482–486.
347. Aubert de la Rüe, E. 1958. "Observation sur le volcanisme tertiare et quaternaire de quesques isles de la Polynesia Française", Bull Volcanol, ser 2, vol 19, pp159–178.
348. Nixon, G T. 1982. Loc cit, p514.
349. Pollack, J B, O B Toon, C Sagan, A Summers, B Baldwin & A W van Camp. 1976. "Volcanic Explosions and Climatic Change: a theoretical assessment", Journ Geophys Res, vol 81, no 6, pp1071–1083.
350. Flohn, H. 1979. "On the Time Scales and Causes of abrupt Palaeoclimatic Events", Quat Res, vol 12, pp135–149, p135.
351. King, L C. 1963. South African Scenery: a Textbook of Geomorphology (Edinburgh), 3rd edn, xxx + 308pp; see p298.
352. Veeh, H H, & J Chappel. 1970. "Astronomical Theory of a Climatic Change: support from New Guinea", Science, vol 167, pp862–5.
353. Groves, J M. 1988. The Little Ice Age (London & New York), xxii + 498pp.
354. Anonymous. 1896. "Cloud-burst tracks and water gaps in Alabama", Science, vol 3, pp276–277.
355. Sokolov, V N. 1977. Stratigraphy of Spitzbergen (Boston Spa, UK), iv + 298pp; see pp260–293.
356. Bellamy, H S. 1943. Built Before the Flood (London), 144pp; see pp70–71.
357. Smith, S P. 1910. Hawaiki: the original home of the Maori (Wellington, NZ), 3rd edn, 301pp; see p177.
358. Brown, J M. 1927. Peoples and Problems of the Pacific, 2 vols, (London); see pp113, 153.
359. Bellamy, H S. 1945. Op cit, pp191.
360. Book of Job, chap 38, v29–32.
361. Silver, L., and P H Schultz (eds.). 1982. "Geological Implications of large Asteroids and Comets on the Earth", Spec. Papers Geol. Soc. Amer., vol 190, xix + 529pp.; see especially ppxvii-xviii.
362. Putnam, W C. 1964. Op cit, p268, fig11-7.

PART SIX

PHAETON'S LEGACY

1

AFTERMATH

In the days immediately following Phaeton's departure sunwards, the effects of the tremendous physical trauma which Phaeton had wrought on Earth were formidable and acute for practically every living organism that had somehow survived the catastrophe. The world's topography had been largely rearranged. Prior to the disaster, the general trend of the major landmasses appears to have been east-west; after it they were aligned in a predominately north-south direction – as is still plainly discernible today.

New mountain ranges and lofty plateaux had been upheaved, and deep gorges and huge fissures had come into being. Unimaginably large eruptions of magma, lava and other volcanic ejecta, including steam and gases, had attended these derangements. Former seas and lakes had been drained or drastically reduced – the displaced waters (the biblical Deluge) roaring as immense irresistible watery avalanches over the newly emerging landscape, as they sought new basins. Only the very largest obstacles withstood these churning torrents.

Where the waters had met heated rock surfaces and erupting lava or magma, violent explosions occurred, wrenching huge boulders and lesser debris from parent strata and hurling them great distances in all directions, as prodigious clouds of steam rose to drench and scald adjacent districts. In many regions, once the Deluge waters had drained away, countless boulders of every composition, size and shape dotted the landscape.

Astounding quantities of gravel, sand, clay, mud and silt had accumulated on hillsides – even on hilltops – and had spread over valley floors and across plains. Such old rivers as still existed now flowed along highly modified courses or in entirely new directions. Wholly new drainage systems, occasioned by the youthful topography, were the norm. In some places lakes and lagoons left by receding Deluge waters were extensive but shallow, and certain traditions describe how creatures of many kinds – and the ancestors of particular human tribes – crept or swam in them in their quest to find dry land[1].

Organic debris had been deposited in all sorts of localities. Intense water pressures had rammed these remains into fissures, crevices and the innermost recesses of tortuous caverns – totally without regard to the size or class of the organisms concerned. Gargantuan rafts of mangled vegetation lay here and there in thick banks as far as the eye could see, while, protruding through or lying upon the surface, everywhere, lay the corpses of animals of all kinds. These occurred singly, in small groups or as great assemblages congregated locally by arresting obstacles or trapped within newly-formed lagoons, dammed valleys, lakes or bogs.

Accordingly, the stench of death and decay must have pervaded many districts, especially in lower, warmer latitudes, where unpolluted water must have been rare and the risk of pestilence high for an appreciable time. The offensive odours eddying out from bone-caves (crammed with countless cadavers or dismembered parts thereof), and from the decaying banks of vegetation, must have been truly frightful in the weeks immediately following Phaeton's departure.

Precipitation (rainfall) would probably have been intense, particularly in high latitudes, due to the tremendous atmospheric pollution caused by the massive volcanic activity in virtually all hemispheres. This pollution would have enhanced the 'collapsed sky' conditions already established during Phaeton's visit, so that a gloomy shroud continued to envelop much of the Earth. This gloom, and the resultant progressively cold conditions in high latitudes due to a blotting out of sunlight and solar warmth at ground level, together with the rapid growth of glaciers and ice-fields, were vivid features of these dire early post-catastrophic days.

Certainly they are enshrined in ancient traditions and memories the world over: and these, very significantly, almost invariably place them shortly after the retreat of the Deluge waters and the passing of the main catastrophe.

2

THE SURVIVORS

While traditional descriptions of the Phaeton disaster reflect an almost identical pattern of events world-wide, great diversity exists in the ways specific groups of people are said to have survived that ordeal. Instantly recalled are arks, rafts, great canoes, uprooted trees and other floating objects. Yet, although these devices could at best accommodate only limited numbers of individuals – and some, like the tomtom drum of the Annamese hero[2] and the ball of rubber or pitch in the Pima Indian legend[3], could serve but one person. Those who entrusted themselves to floating objects feature in traditions as true Deluge-heroes.

Among these were people who deliberately constructed vessels (arks) before the onset of the Deluge – usually on the advice of others alleged to have superior or 'divine' advance knowledge of the impending disaster. Several widely scattered traditions refer to arks being built on mountains far inland[4]. And there were others who, perhaps ignoring clear signs and portents, or who were simply caught unawares, literally commandeered the first sizable floating object available to them when the disaster broke.

Another group of survivor legends gives mountain tops as sanctuaries or places where arks, 'swimming houses' or the like came to rest with the ebbing off of the Deluge waters. With the terrifying arrival of the Deluge waters, safety was probably instinctively sought on the nearest high ground. As we have already mentioned, there are accounts of mad, panicky scrambles up mountain sides by those hoping to avoid drowning[5].

It is noteworthy that several of the mountain-top survivors had, like those urged elsewhere to build arks and great vessels, received 'divine' advice to seek safety on particular peaks before the onset of the Deluge. In the well-known Greek story of Philemon and Baucis, for example, the righteous Phrygian couple were taken by the gods Zeus and Hermes to the top of a lofty mountain to escape the fate reserved for their fellow men, who perished shortly afterwards in a Deluge[6]. A similar account concerns two human pairs who became the ancestors of the Sing-Pohs of Assam. They had previously been urged by one of their deities to ascend Mt Singrabhum so that they might survive the Deluge[7]. The neighbouring Lakhers relate how their forefathers found asylum on Mt Leiparang during the same event. The name Leiparang, incidentally, signifies 'Old Earth' because the mountain, allegedly, was never submerged by the Deluge[8].

Sometimes 'divine intervention' was seen as occurring only after the climb to a mountain summit had been accomplished, the hard-pressed refugees (animals included) being offered sanctuary in floating vessels, as in a Lithuanian tradition[9]. This association of human and animal refugees crowding a Flood-girt mountaintop is similar to the Peruvian Deluge legend involving the Andean peak of Ancasmarca[10]. Similar beliefs were preserved also among Formosans and Polynesians[11].

Before leaving these fragments of prehistory, we should emphasise that the mountain-top survivors were seldom likely to see clearly the surrounding turmoil. Almost all the accounts describe a combination of driving rain, furious winds and a thick gloom which for a long period obscured the Sun, Moon and stars. The South American Caingang Indians described the darkness as 'pitchy' and as punctuated by howls, piercing screeches and other unearthly sounds[12]. These were presumably the peculiar sounds of hurricane force winds and possibly also of the passage through the atmosphere of still-falling cosmic debris.

Parallelling these flood traditions is another category recording how people and animals survived the disaster in caves. Many examples could be cited and in Part Three we mentioned the reactions of the refugees to the chaos and din that raged outside their sanctuaries. Elsewhere, we have mentioned bone-caves yielding the remains of sizable groups of human beings, as though those particular asylums had been ill-selected and their sheltering occupants overwhelmed by gases or tumultuous water action.

It is probably significant that most accounts indicate that caverns were sought more as protection from super-hurricane winds, conflagration[13] and cosmic bombardment[14], than from the subsequent Deluge. Given all the circumstances under discussion, it is obvious that deep caverns would have been ideal refuges from missiles and fire, but extremely dangerous shelters against rampaging water.

Some refugees became buried in caverns, as earth and rocks were piled up at the entrances by 'drift' borne by the Deluge waters. In Part Two we noted several instances of completely blocked-up bone-caves. Some groups, like the cruel race of the Tahoe legend, were entombed permanently[15], but others, like the Lenni-Lenape Indians of Delaware, tell how their forefathers were once buried in the Earth, but survived the ordeal by successfully digging their way out[16].

Probably the most complete memory of this kind is preserved amongst the Navajo Indians. It describes how:

> ...at one time all the nations – Navajos, Pueblos, Coyoteros and white people – lived together underground, in the heart of a mountain, near the river San Juan. Their food was meat, which they had in abundance, for all kinds of game were closed up with them in their cave; but their light was dim, and only endured for a few hours each day...[17]

Later they successfully dug their way to the surface, only to find themselves on the outside of a mountain surrounded by water. Shortly afterwards, the waters had ebbed away, leaving a sea of mud, and the legend continues:

> Then the men and the animals began to come up from their cave, and their coming up required several days. First came the Navajos... then came the Pueblos and other Indians... [and] lastly came the white people, who started off at once for the rising sun, and were lost sight of for many winters... When these nations lived underground they all spoke one tongue; but, with the light of day and the level of earth, came many languages. The earth was at this time very small, and the light was quite as scanty as it had been down below, for there was as yet no heaven, no sun, nor moon, nor stars.[18]

This remarkable narrative, which contains several elements repeated in various other independent cave-survivor legends, forms a graphic account of the burial of a remnant of early humanity with many animals in a cave on a mountain. What buried them is not actually specified, although it had blocked up the cavern's entrance with material that could be dug. The people evidently subsisted on the animals for a considerable time, during which not only did the cave remain mostly dark and gloomy, but so did the outside world. The absence of heavenly luminaries almost certainly relates to the 'collapsed sky' conditions prevalent then.

On eventually receding, the water left everything covered with wet mud, and this, after slowly drying out, apparently enabled various survivor groups to set off in particular directions. The reference to 'white people' who apparently wished to sever their association with the Indians, is especially interesting. It could be concluded from this action that they regarded themselves as belonging to a different race. It is surely pertinent that almost all traditions which refer to culture-heroes (virtually every one of whom was active immediately after the Deluge) describe them as white, tall, bearded and invariably superior to the aboriginal peoples among whom they appeared – often suddenly – to impart laws, crafts and useful information.

One such culture-hero, Caboy by name, allegedly brought the ancestors of the Brazilian Karaya Indians out of a 'subterranean world' following the Great Flood[19]. Elsewhere, another culture-hero, using a golden spade-like implement, dug Amerindian Deluge survivors out of a blocked-up cavern[20]. The hill tribes known as the Pankhoos and Bungogees, who inhabit the Chittagong area of Bangladesh, preserve a similar tradition. They recall how, after the recession of the Deluge waters "...their ancestors came out of a cave in the earth, under the guidance of a chief named Tlandrokpah[21].

The early post-diluvian activities of this superior culture-bearing white race are chronicled in numerous traditions distributed globally, but are regrettably too complex and important to discuss adequately here. They will, however, be fully considered in a later volume devoted to unravelling this now almost-forgotten era of organised endeavour.

Clearly, members of several different races sometimes took refuge in the same caverns or on the same mountain peaks, being as often as not complete strangers to one another. Such mixed gatherings were not expected, for, faced with an all-encompassing common danger, the sole aim of every individual must surely have been survival. Previous social considerations such as race, rank, gender or age, became meaningless instantly. It is, therefore, significant that echoes of precisely this scenario appear in the Book of St.John the Divine:

> And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains.[22]

By its very nature the Phaeton disaster affected all men indiscriminately. Small cross-sections of pre-catastrophic society found themselves sharing common refuges and, those groups which somehow managed to survive, entered the post-diluvian world together, equally destitute, and bereft of basic necessities[23].

3

AN UNCERTAIN FUTURE

Many garbled and incomplete recollections have come down to us of the dismal period characterising earliest Holocene times. They describe not only the ever-worsening climate but humanity's general poverty and wretchedness. These deleterious after-effects of the catastrophe were catalogued by the Babylonians in the Atra-Hasis, their account of the Great Flood and its aftermath. In it, we read:

> The womb of the earth did not bear... vegetation did not sprout... people were not seen... the black fields became white... the > broad plain was choked with salt... [and:] For one year they ate couch grass... for the second they suffered itch... the third year came – their features [were altered] by hunger.[24]

The reference to salt-choked plains is echoed on the other side of the world, when the Kwakiult Indians of British Columbia recall how:

> ...when the flood had subsided there was no fresh water to be found. They were nigh on dying from thirst, and chewed plants to obtain moisture. But then a great rain came, very heavy and very long, which filled the valleys with fresh water lakes and rivers, which have remained there ever since.[25]

The undrinkable character of the pre-rain waters are also alluded to in the Bundahish. This states that the "poison and venom of the noxious creatures" which had perished in the Deluge "were all mixed up in the water, and the waters became quite salt."[26] Elsewhere, the waters are said to have been made 'bitter'[27].

The Norse Eddas refer explicitly to terrible cold – the Fimbul Winter: "The mighty, the great, the iron winter..."[28] and the Elder Edda adding:

> The sunshine blackens
> In the summers thereafter.
> And the weather grows bad.

According to the Younger Edda:

> ...as soon as the streams that are called Elivogs [the rivers flowing under the ice] had come so far... [they] ...turned into ice. And when this ice stopped and flowed no more, then gathered over it the drizzling rain... and froze into rime, and one layer of ice was laid upon another clear into Ginungagap... All that part of Ginungagap that turns north was filled with thick and heavy ice and rime, and everywhere were drizzling rain and gusts...[29]

Darkness and great cold were remembered everywhere as having reduced a great majority of human survivors to pitiable physical and mental states. A prayer addressed by the Mexican Aztecs to their god Tezcatlipoca evidently refers to this epoch and runs as follows:

> Know, O Lord... the men have no garments, nor the women, to cover themselves with, but only certain rags rent in every part, that allow the air and the cold to pass everywhere... With great toil and weariness they scrape together enough for each day, going by mountain and wilderness seeking their food; so faint and enfeebled are they that their bowels cleave to their ribs, and all their body re-echoes with hollowness, and they walk as people afrighted, the face and body in likeness of death... they draw a rag over them at night, and so sleep; there they throw down their bodies, and the bodies of the children thou hast given them. For the misery that they grow up in, for the filth of their food, for the lack of covering, their faces are yellow, and all their bodies of the colour of the earth. They tremble with cold, and for leanness they stagger in walking. They go weeping and sighing, and full of sadness... though they stay by a fire, they find little heat.[30] (Our italics).

Many were obliged to eat whatever they could find. Food must have been mostly recently-annihilated plants and animals, and many survivors must have died then as much from food poisoning as from cold and hunger. Fresh food was undoubtedly scarce or non-existent in many regions, and several districts must have remained uninhabited, and uninhabitable, for decades.

Different effects were experienced in warmer latitudes, but even there the prevailing damp allegedly turned such food as then existed mouldy[31].

In the Ten Stems, an ancient Chinese work, which divides world history into ten periods or stages, we read: "At Wu – the sixth stem – the Darkness and the Light unite with injurious effects – all things become solid (freeze into ice), and the Darkness destroys the growth of all things. At Kung – the seventh stem – the Darkness nips all things."[32] Another ancient Chinese record, the Twelve Branches, similarly reports: "K'wun-tun stands for the period of chaos, the cold midnight darkness. It is said that with it all things began to germinate in the hidden recesses of the underworld."[33] In the Ten Stems we learn, similarly, that: "At Jin – the ninth stem – the Light begins to nourish all things in the recesses below."[34] These would seem to be references to the germination of seeds and plant roots swept by the Deluge waters into caves and fissures.

After the Phaeton upheaval people's diet differed appreciably from that which had prevailed previously. In Genesis there is more than a hint that antediluvian Man was vegetarian:

> And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be your meat.[35]

The same source then informs us that, following the Deluge, God said to Noah and his family:

> And the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowl of the air, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the sea; into your hand are they delivered. Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you.[36]

In other words, post-diluvial people became omnivorous by being obliged to eat meat. Ancient Chinese annals mention the same thing: "At first even the rulers dwelt in caves and desert places, eating raw flesh and drinking blood"[37]. Not improbably, this memory refers to the consumption of animal carcasses, when rapidly-falling temperatures in high latitudes might have permitted meat to remain edible for an appreciable time. The description of the flesh as raw certainly suggests this. We should not forget that frozen Siberian mammoth meat is known to have been devoured in historical times by wolves and human beings (see Appendix A).

That dead meat was indeed eaten is indicated elsewhere in Genesis, which mentions how God instructed Noah: "But the flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat"[38]. This was an injunction that living animals were not to be eaten: survivors of animal populations decimated by the catastrophe were to be left to multiply and replenish stocks.

That meat eating became a necessity for many Deluge survivors is clearly implied in the following account of how searches for plant foods proved unsuccessful:

> They sought for food everywhere. For nine days they roamed about, but found none such as they used to eat in Paradise. 'We used to have angels' food then', they complained.[39]

Occasionally, people seem to have supplemented a meat diet with other food. Charred ostrich eggshells, radiocarbon-dated at 10,720 ±132 years BP, found in a rock-shelter in Tanzania[40], suggest that eggs and perhaps birds were eaten in those difficult days.

Meat eating usually meant the removal of the animal's hide or pelt. Several traditions describe how some superior race (the Sarku?) made garments from these skins for the less expert survivors of Adamic humanity. Genesis greatly simplified these relationships, where the superior race is represented by God and the needy survivors by Adam and Eve[41].

This suggests that the making or wearing of garments had been rare among ordinary antediluvian humanity, accustomed to equable 'Golden Age' climates, and that they lacked the knowledge to manufacture clothing. Nevertheless, one early cave drawing of a clothed individual evidently dating from the period under discussion shows that unexpectedly sophisticated garments were made then and could only have resulted through long familiarity with clothes-making generally. Yet the production of such attire required not only particular skills but also tools – and tools were probably in short supply during those wretched times.

Nevertheless, some implements did exist even in those desperate years, and were presumably made by pre-catastrophic peoples familiar with their manufacture and use before the onset of the Phaeton disaster. Very well-made curved bone sewing needles having small eyes, attributed to the Solutréan culture, existed in France as far back as c20,000 years BP. These indicate that fitted garments, probably of skin or leather, were made at a surprisingly early stage.

Solutréan arrowheads and knives are also beautifully made, and it is hard to imagine that they were produced by barbarian peoples groping for survival. On the contrary, they evince every sign of having been produced by well developed, long established techniques.

The references in traditions and ancient sagas everywhere to the dreadful physical conditions and general poverty during early post-catastrophic times have no real meaning, of course, unless the situations described actually once existed. Very significantly, however, those situations are precisely those which can be expected to have followed global disruption on the scale of the Phaeton disaster. The future of humankind at this time was unquestionably very uncertain.

4

THE STONE AGE ARRIVES

Early post-diluvian social degradation was almost certainly occasioned as much by lack of adequate tools as by adverse physical and climatic conditions. Indeed, such degradation was exacerbated not only by an absence of tools but, in some communities, by an actual ignorance of tools.

Knowledge of tools amongst early post-diluvians depended upon whether individuals had formerly belonged to the apparently small ruling class or to the seemingly large semi-ignorant masses: semi-ignorant because, although many had doubtless seen the great antediluvian buildings, large boats (arks included), irrigation systems, pottery, metallic utensils and weaponry specifically mentioned in innumerable traditions, they had not themselves designed, built or used those inventions, and few possessed the skills to do so. But what firm evidence is there that such diverse artificial creations existed before the Phaeton disaster? After all, we are referring to a period 11,500 years or more ago, and which orthodox history views in a very different light. Strangely enough, there is quite a large corpus of evidence, both circumstantial and factual, indicating that civilised communities existed on Earth before that shocking calamity.

Many of the previously-cited traditions refer unmistakably to various antediluvian structures (for example, houses, temples, towers, canals), land vehicles (carts, chariots), aquatic vessels (rafts, canoes and arks) and implements (ploughs, bows, arrows, spades). Elaborating on this theme, Bellamy has pointed out that:

> Many myths tell of tools having been saved more or less accidentally (quite apart from the elaborate ark myths, some of which even describe the salvage of a lot of quite unnecessary odds and ends). In various North American Indian myths fire-drills are mentioned, in others stone implements, pots, bows, jewellry are reported to have been saved. Some myths say that the people who had escaped on rafts, and had saved certain personal belongings, believed that the waters would > never subside unless they sacrificed something from their store. Such saved tools were frequently stolen from their owners, probably because of their efficiency, though the myths usually stress the 'magical' properties of the 'other-worldly' implements.[42]

Scholars have either ignored or dismissed these essentially circumstantial references as fanciful or allegorical devices. Latterly, however, the same material has been adopted by writers who, possessing scant knowledge and lively imaginations, have concocted outrageous hypotheses purporting to identify culture-heroes as prehistoric astronauts and the various artefacts as the products of their supposed technology. Viewed individually, none of these intriguing references is either important or verifiable. Assessed collectively, however, they form a recurrent theme in the symphony of traditional world history, and as such increase in significance. Nevertheless, they will forever remain scientifically worthless without supportive material evidence, and it is only when we consider physical artefacts that they acquire any value.

Among the physical evidences for exceedingly early civilisation are the innumerable stone walls retaining agricultural terraces on the slopes of the Peruvian and Bolivian Andes. These occur at several places well above the present line of perpetual snow, where cultivation is no longer possible. Unless much warmer climates occurred here relatively recently they can only have attained their present elevation when the mountains were upheaved. As noted previously, the latest uprise of the Andes occurred at the close of the so-called 'Pleistocene' times, about 11,500 years ago.

Cyclopean stone ruins now 13,000ft (4,000m) above sea level at Tiahuanacu, SSE of Lake Titicaca, and apparently similar lithic structures on islands in the lake, seem to be equally ancient[43]. Their enormous size and extent testify eloquently to markedly different environmental conditions and population densities throughout that region in the distant past. Commenting specifically on the Tiahuanacu ruins, but in terms equally applicable to all these ancient stone structures, Sir Clements Markham once observed:

> The city covered a large area, built by highly skilled masons, and with the use of enormous stones. One stone is 36ft long by 7ft, weighing 170 tons; another 26ft by 16ft by 16ft. Apart from the monoliths of ancient Egypt, there is nothing to equal this in any other part of the world. The movement and placing of such monoliths point to a dense population, to an organised government and consequently to a large area under cultivation, with arrangements for the conveyancing of supplies from various directions. There must have been an organisation combining skill and intelligence with power and administrative ability.[44]

The undoubtedly genuine discovery, noted earlier, of a carved figurine at a great depth under 'Pleistocene' lava near Nampa, Idaho, represents the handiwork of some very early cultured race. So, also, do the well-made granite dishes in undisturbed auriferous (gold-bearing) gravels containing the remains of typical 'late Pleistocene' plants and animals (including the celebrated Calaveras skull), far below the surface in California. As argued previously, all these artefacts are very ancient indeed. So are the following.

Vessels of vesicular basalt were obtained in 1880 from gravels also yielding bones of the extinct giant ground-sloth Mylodon, near the Klamath River, California.[45] Many comparable finds from the same Californian gravels were listed by Dr James Southall in 1882 and are collectively of much interest. These include a mortar found 150ft (46m) below the surface in gravel capped by volcanic deposits at San Andreas; a triangular polished stone hatchet 75ft (23m) below ground level 300ft (90m) inside a mine tunnel penetrating Table Mountain; many stone dishes, pestles, mortars and other carved lithic utensils found along with bones of elephants and mastodons at a place called 'Murphy's' in Tuolumne County; and numerous grooved discs, mortars, and other stone objects at various depths in gravels subjacent to volcanic deposits in the same district[46]. The curious grooved discs were investigated in a special study by Dr Eberhart in 1961[47]. The unknown makers of these artefacts also used a circular vessel having three legs and a spout made of lava, 'hard as iron'.

By 1888, as many as 300 stone mortars had been found in undisturbed gravels capped by basalt at Cherokee in Butte County, California. Interestingly, these gravels were deposited by an ancient river pre-dating the present, quite differently oriented, river system there, and have even been observed on the very summits of neighbouring mountains 6,000ft (1,850m) high. Geologists have assigned them to either 'Upper Pleistocene' or 'glacial' times[48]. Still more stone objects, including bowl-shaped mortars, graceful sandstone pestles, serpentine cups and steatite tobacco pipes, have been retrieved from considerable depths in these gravels near Santa Barbara, California[49], while essentially similar stone bowls, often very well made, have been dredged from so-called 'late Pleistocene' deposits off the Californian coast[50]. It is very significant that these gravels and volcanic beds occupy the valleys indenting the flanks of the Sierra Nevada and Sacramento Valley[51], which exhibit many geological features (eg, striated and polished rock surfaces) conventionally ascribed to former glacial action but which we contend were products of other agencies acting tumultuously at the time of the Phaeton disaster.

Particularly telling evidence of very early cultured endeavour came to light in 1940, when Dr Asbjourn Ousdal – a dental practitioner and amateur fossil collector – unexpectedly discovered an inscribed bowl in a block of solid sandstone near the summit of a hill in the Santa Barbara range. Part of the rim of this bowl, illustrated here for the first time (fig 6.1), bears strange, elaborate and carefully executed script-like signs or decorative devices. In considering the great antiquity of this relic, we should recall: a) the previously-mentioned stone utensils in the Santa Barbara gravels; b) Dr Bower's report on the bones of cetacean and other marine mammals in Pliocene deposits (later identified as 'Pleistocene') met with "...especially along the sides and crests of the Santa Paula mountains..." and the hills just north of Buenaventura[52], near the Santa Barbara range; and c) that the sandstone enveloping this bowl had been upheaved with the hill of which it was a part.

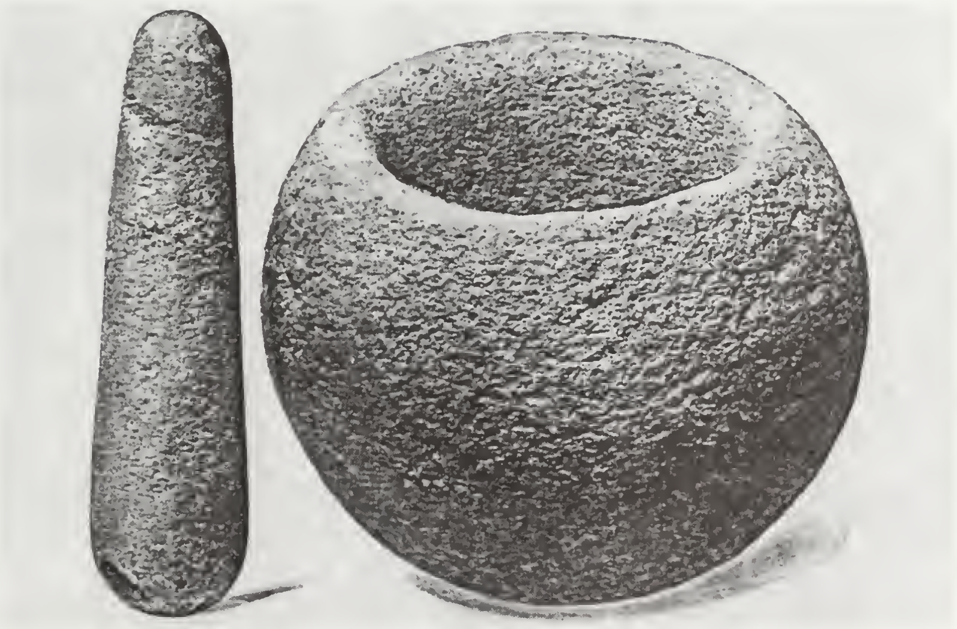

Fig 6.1. Mortar and pestle found in gravels in California. Courtesy of Geological Society of America.

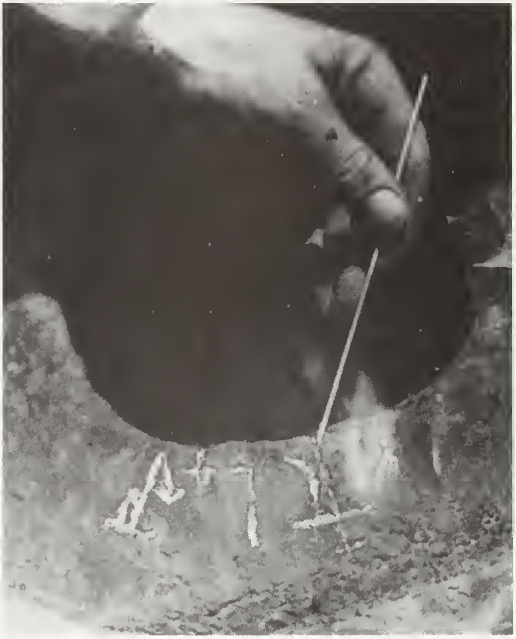

Fig 6.2. Prehistoric inscribed bowl, Santa Barbara Range, California.

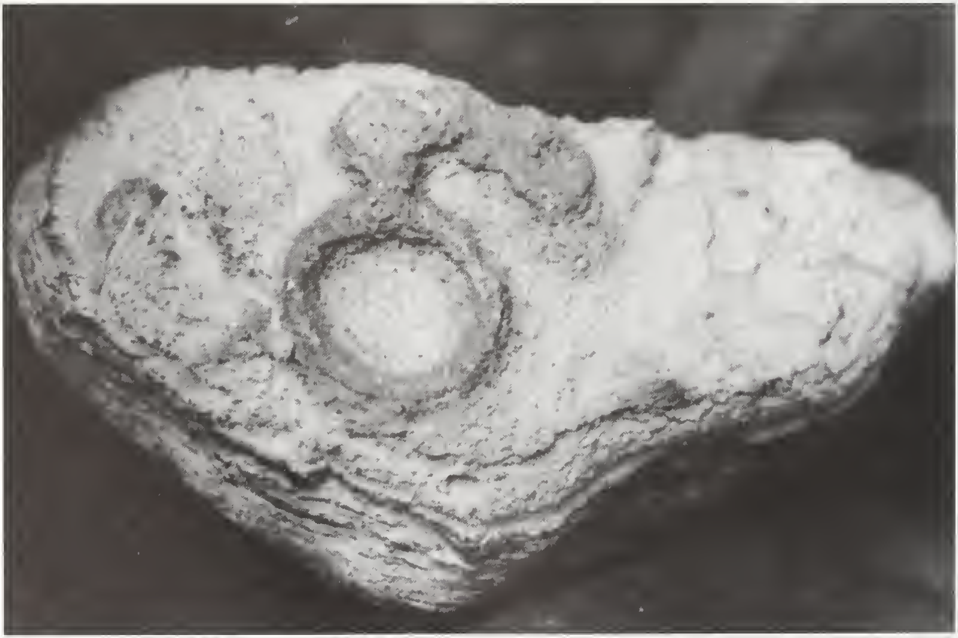

Fig 6.3. Prehistoric iron chain.

Equally noteworthy is the portion of an iron chain accidentally discovered in solid sandstone exposed in the side of a deep ravine, at the junction of Clark and Nye counties with the California stateline, by the late Frederick G Hehr of Los Angeles during 1952. Hehr, an artesian well specialist, collected the curiosity and supplied the photograph of it, published here for the first time (fig 6.3). The sandstone lay 37ft (11m) below the rim of the ravine wall – a rather modest depth compared to the 184ft (56m) at which undoubted fragments of a paved road or causeway which were found by Hehr, protruding from a canyon wall 13 miles (21km) SSE of Lake Owens, westward of the notorious Death Valley, California[53].

No less interesting is the copper coin-like object (fig 6.4) discovered at Lawn Ridge, Illinois, last century, described by Prof Alexander Winchell in 1881[54]. So, too, the copper knife found close to a much-decayed Mastodon leg-bone, 5–6ft (1.6m) below ground level in undisturbed 'drift' gravel near Stirling, Illinois[55].

Before leaving North American evidence, of which much more could be cited, we should mention the beautifully-fashioned plummet-like object of sienite discovered 30ft (9.2m) below ground level during the sinking of a well at Woodbridge in the San Joaquim Valley, California. Embedded in undisturbed Pleistocene gravel, the object was so expertly ground and polished that Prof Foster considered it to be "...an exhibition of the lapidiary's skill superior to anything yet furnished by the Stone Age of either continent"[56]. The implement had been drilled by a process which, instead of producing a uniform gauge, resulted in a rimmed aperture, the rimming having been started from each end. Such technological accomplishments bear eloquent testimony for the existence of a civilized race at this early time.

But if the foregoing fails to impress as certain evidence of wide-ranging technical ability before Phaeton's visit, how does one view the ruins of a well-made village at Jarmo, 30 miles (48km) east of Kirkuk in north-eastern Iraq, where charcoal samples have been dated at 11,200 ±200 years and 11,240 ±300 years BP respectively?[57] The village itself is apparently at least as old as, if not older than those dates. The capacity to build such a village so soon after the inferred date of the Phaeton disaster was only possible if knowledge of organised construction and the requisite skills to effect it already existed amongst the builders. These must have been catastrophe survivors, or their immediate offspring, possessing a tradition of building techniques.

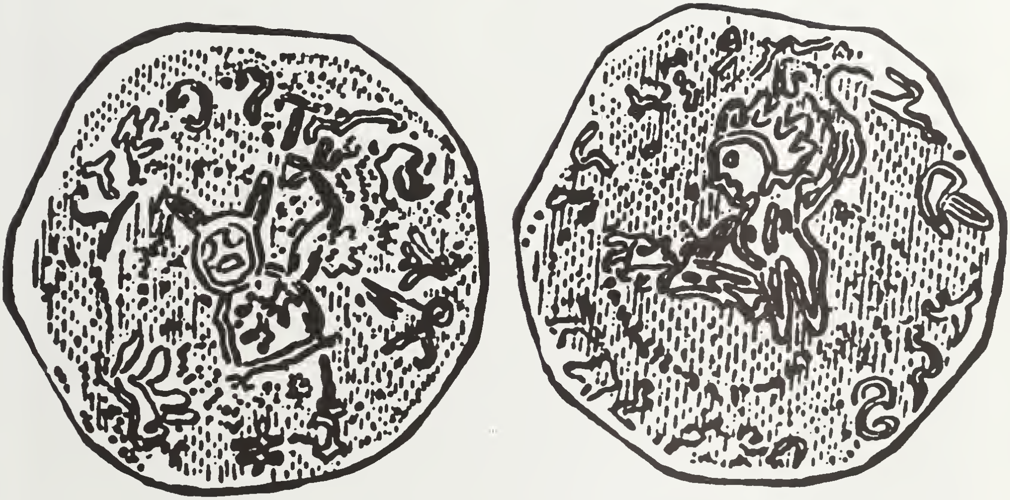

Fig 6.4. Copper coin, found buried 114ft underground in Illinois.

Larger relics, such as the buried remains of large well-formed boats or ships, probably coeval with at least some of the aforementioned artefacts, have occasionally been encountered at various depths in 'drift' deposits. As these ships, which have been discovered in Peru[58], Switzerland[59], Russia[60], and South Africa[61], occur either in solid stone or at remarkable depths underground, and are unquestionably of great antiquity, reasonable grounds exist for regarding them as vessels which were probably overwhelmed and buried during the Phaeton disaster. Statements like those of the Mandan Indians, who aver that shortly after the Deluge their forefathers were visited by a mysterious bearded white culture-hero who arrived in a huge wooden ship made with 'metal tools'[62], appear as valuable if fragmentary confirmation of prehistoric technological abilities.

Not improbably, therefore, a great cross-section of antediluvian artefacts and useful objects lay strewn about the post-diluvian landscape some 11,500 years ago, often partly buried or obscured by sediments, fallen rock or erupted lava, and no doubt frequently cracked, broken or otherwise damaged. Many, in fact, must have been irretrievably damaged and were unusable. More elaborate objects – even if broken – may still have yielded useful components (eg, cogs, nails, etc) or simply useful flat surfaces or sharp edges which could be salvaged and adapted by those who knew how to do so.

Ignorant and semi-ignorant individuals would have remained unaware of the potential value of such debris, although occasionally they may have preserved such items as 'sacred' or 'magical' relics of a lost and much greater past. In this way quite mundane objects may have come to be worn outlandishly as amulets and charms. On the other hand, more knowledgeable individuals would have been near-ecstatic at finding, say, an intact bowl, a knife, a cut plank of wood or even an isolated brick.

In the very earliest post-diluvian days, many human corpses would have been found with at least some of their clothing still on them. High latitude survivors, facing rapidly cooling climatic conditions, would doubtless have had no compunction in stripping wearable garments from the dead. Living animals with hides and pelts were rare and, without cutting instruments, difficult to skin and harder still to flense properly, even if successfully parted from their original owners. Where they occurred, sharp edged stones must have been among the very first objects used to cut and pound raw flesh, cut off skins and furs, sever small branches from the multitude of smashed trees and other botanical rubbish littering the countryside or washed-up as great mats and rafts along beaches or choking creeks and backwaters.

Flatter stones must have served as the first hammers and mauls, being utilised to crack open animal bones and drive in stout branches around which the earliest artificial windbreaks must have been constructed. Certainly the salvaging of all transportable timber must have been an early activity of post-diluvian Man, for these plants simultaneously afforded fuel (and therefore warmth), building materials for both permanent and portable refuges, enclosures, mating, fibres and weapons, to name just a few uses.

Through necessity, stones – in many places the most common objects on the surface of the ground – began to be used for all kinds of purposes, and a whole new culture developed with the use and adaption of stones as the underlying motive. Hesitantly at first, and certainly crudely, stones began to be employed as tools, utensils and weapons, with refinements gradually added to the earliest stumbling adaptions. The 'Stone Age' had arrived.

5

A NEW BEGINNING

Catapulted into the unfamiliar, often hostile, Younger Dryas world generated by Phaeton's visit which contrasted so markedly with the previous 'Golden Age', the surviving remnants of humankind faced what, in effect, was a new beginning. The prehistoric (Pliocene/Pleistocene) world had gone and a new, historic (Holocene) world had just dawned.

Initially, the enforced degradation and vastly depleted population of the survivors would combine to retard people's progress for decades, even centuries. Relocation to more favourable localities became an early priority, especially for survivors who at first found themselves in high latitudes. Accordingly, great treks to more benevolent regions were undertaken, the participants learning en route how effectively to utilise the smallest item to their common advantage. The seeds of nomadic lifestyles were born then. People had to adapt or perish.

Organised re-peopling and husbandry assumed special urgency then, as did the remarkable civilising activities of the aforementioned mysterious white culture-heroes of global tradition. Certainly grassy steppes were among the first of the re-vegetated regions occupied by the early survivors. There, pastoral communities developed and bred horses, cattle, sheep and goats, which were in time moved systematically from one suitable locality to the next as pastures were eaten down and left to regenerate. A wandering nomadic existence became the norm for many survivor groups, and, as Prof Scott-Elliot long ago pointed out:

> ...the point... of most importance to us here is the effect of this sort of life in producing not only breeds of cattle, sheep and goats capable of looking after themselves without much assistance, but also a kind of person of a totally new character. There must have been, as soon as this sort of life became possible, an extraordinary increase in population. Both people and animals would multiply with extreme rapidity in a practically unlimited ranch such as were the steppes in this early period. The life was healthy enough, though dirty and restless... The mere fact of living in company involves... invaluable discipline...[63]

In warmer latitudes, where collapsed sky conditions and persistent bitingly cold winds were either less acute, infrequent or non-existent, re-vegetation of the new landscape would have proceeded with surprising rapidity, especially in regions extensively covered by freshly deposited muds heavily charged with organic remains and nutritious mineral and volcanic debris. Seeds, cones, pollen and spores buried in such deposits must have germinated comparatively quickly in such regions with highly beneficial results. Modern studies of botanical regeneration in flood-afflicted regions, so intimately governed during Younger Dryas times by often severe climatic fluctuations both north and south of the equator[64], themselves induced by an unstable, wobbling Earth, strongly support the high probability of such developments[65].

Such herbivores as had survived would have naturally gravitated towards botanically revitalised areas, and the same would also have been true of many types of birds and insects. Reptilian and amphibian survivors, on the other hand, could have re-established themselves and multiplied only in warm latitudes.

Developments like these in equatorial areas would have been strong inducements to human survivors aware of them to reach and settle such regions to partake of, and perhaps harvest, the varied life already beginning to proliferate there. This reaction apparently also extended to the settling and exploitation of equatorial, subtropical and warm-temperate marine and lacustrine coastlines and their offshore waters. Numberless early Holocene 'kitchen' middens, containing the remnants of vast numbers of fish-bones and edible molluscs are known from many parts of the world, attesting to the attraction such localities and lifeforms had for hard-pressed humanity. In South Africa, for instance, early Holocene communities evidently subsisted on shellfish over a very long span of time[66], the duration of which can be gauged from the significant changes observable in the isotopic record embodied in the mineralogy of shells obtained from different levels within specific middens accumulated then[67]. Essentially identical records have now been traced for the same period almost worldwide.

As we have previously noted, environmental changes like this were rather characteristic of Younger Dryas times. But of all the changes which took place then, two in particular were especially critical, and unquestionably influenced a great deal of early Holocene human activity. Apart from the aforementioned high winds and thick cloud cover in high latitudes (collapsed sky conditions), ice-caps began to form around earth's relocated poles, as much as a result of Earth's new axial tilt as of the persistent cloud cover itself. An ice-cap began to form and expand across what today is Antarctica, with concomitant climatic effects across much of the southern hemisphere.

In warmer latitudes, innumerable glaciers developed in the majority of upland regions everywhere – even in the tropics[68] – and continued until the onset between seven and eight thousand years ago of warmer conditions. These caused their general recession and, in many cases, disappearance. In turn, the melt-waters resulting from this widespread diminution of glaciers served to raise world sea levels, with subsequent further effect upon climatic regimes. The release of so much additional water then also contributed to the natural rearrangement of much of the original 'drift' deposits, reducing these in many places to the valley and river-terrace sands and gravels of present times.

All these developments were further legacies of Phaeton's visit, just as are the present day climatic vicissitudes – transient but calamitous local flooding, sudden landslides and the multitude of isolated seismic and volcanic disturbances. As Wigley[69] and Lamb[70] have so ably pointed out, these and other environmental factors have had a pronounced influence of the development of Holocene people, their thoughts and industries, so that, in a sense, we are still combating and experiencing the last-gasp effects of the Phaeton disaster itself, insofar as those affect our home planet, Earth.

That the Phaeton disaster proper marked the single most momentous point in intelligent humanity's history so far – the Deluge of global tradition representing our most abiding memory of it – can surely no longer be doubted. Earlier scholars who, using the Deluge as a critical datum, scheduled ancient events as either ante- or *post-*diluvian were, despite some of their quaint and often spurious arguments, essentially correct. To be more accurate, however, we should perhaps henceforth classify humanity's past history as either pre- or *post-*Phaetonic.

This is a possibly startling yet eminently defensible proposition, in which the celebrated Ice Age largely vanishes, and the associated Pleistocene period shrinks to become an event which, though appallingly violent worldwide, was actually of surprisingly brief duration. Evidence – much of it of recent discovery – repeatedly demonstrating these propositions is not only numerous – itself a most impressive point – but truly interdisciplinary and of a genuinely global scope. Certainly the collective message transmitted by this evidence cannot be justifiably ignored or side-stepped any longer.

Yet, despite all the foregoing, the story of the Phaeton disaster remains unfinished. For obvious reasons the present outline of that event's terrible character and effects is inevitably incomplete and uneven, for much additional evidence supporting its former reality undoutedly awaits discovery.

There can be no question that future research and discoveries will markedly enhance some of the many aspects still traceable of this remarkable event or will, with equal incisiveness, modify or even negate others advanced on earlier pages. Nevertheless, the story's main fabric will not fall; the prolific evidence adduced in support of it is too wide-ranging and incontrovertible to permit that.

In the light of recorded knowledge, therefore, our presentation of the time when Earth Nearly Died actually consists of little more than a preliminary study of an infinitely greater puzzle, en route merely stressing vital links, important hints, apparently endless ramifications, and suggesting various line of further enquiry. The field affected is unquestionably immense, and countless future researches will be undertaken before the full extent of this awesome event will be revealed in all its towering majesty.

REFERENCES

1. Rafinesque, C S. 1836. The American Nations, 2 vols, (Philadelphia).
2. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Moons, Myths and Man (London), 351pp; see p146.
3. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p257.
4. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, pp145–6.
5. Bellamy, H S. 1945. In the Beginning God (London), 212pp; see pp160–165.
6. Graves, R. 1960. The Greek Myths 2 vols, (London), revised edn; see vol 1, p154, citing Ovid's Metamorphoses, viii, 670–724.
7. Bellamy, H S. 1945. Op cit, p163.
8. Bellamy, H S. 1945. Op cit, p197.
9. Bellamy, H S. 1945. Op cit, p164.
10. Nadaillac, M de. 1885. Pre-Historic America (London), xii + 566pp; see p530.
11. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p271.
12. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p138.
13. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, pp121–2.
14. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, pp164–5.
15. Bancroft, H H. 1875–6. Native Races of North America, 5 vols, (London); see vol iii, p81.
16. Bancroft, H H. 1875–6. Ibid.
17. Bancroft, H H. 1875–6. Ibid.
18. Bancroft, H H. 1875–6. Ibid.
19. Koch-Grünberg, T. 1907. Südamerikanische Felszeichungen (Berlin), 3 + 92pp.
20. Brinton, D G. 1882. Myths of the New World (Philadelphia), viii + 331pp; see p165.
21. Lewin, T H. 1869. The Hill Tribes of Chittagong (Calcutta), 151pp; see p95.
22. St John the Divine, The Revelation of. Chap 6, v15.
23. Bancroft, H H. 1875–6. Op cit, p204.
    Goetz, D, & S G Morley (eds). 1950. The Popul Vuh, tr by A Recinos, (Univ Oklahoma Press), xix + 267pp; see pp182–3.
    Short, J T. 1880. North Americans of Antiquity (New York), 2nd edn, vii-xviii + 544pp; see p214.
24. Lambert, W G, & A R Millard. 1969. Atra-Hasis: The Babylonian Story of the Flood (Oxford), xii + 198pp; see p79.
25. Bellamy, H S. 1945. Op cit, p133.
26. West, E W (transl), 1880, "Pahlavi Texts: The Bundahish" in The Sacred Books of the East (Oxford), Chapt vii, sec 13.
27. Book of Revelation. Chap viii v11.
28. Anderson, R B. 1888. Norse Mythology (Chicago), 473pp; see p444.
29. Anderson, R B. 1888. Op cit, p447.
30. Bancroft, H H. 1875–6. Ibid.
31. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p131.
32. Crawford, T P. 1881. The Compendium of Wong-shi-Shing, 1526–1590, The Chinese Recorder (Shanghai); see vol xii, pp4–5.
33. Crawford, T P. 1881. Op cit, p8.
34. Crawford, T P. 1881. Op cit, p5.
35. Book of Genesis. Chap 1, v29.
36. Book of Genesis. Chap ix, v2–3.
37. Crawford, T P. 1881. Op cit, p3.
38. Book of Genesis. Chap ix, v4.
39. Charles, R H (ed). 1913. "The Book of Adam and Eve" in The Apocrypha and Pseudepigraphia of the Old Testament in English, 2 vols, (Oxford); see vol 1, chap 4.
40. Radiocarbon. vol 6, 1964, p28.
41. Book of Genesis. Chapt iii, v21.
42. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Op cit, p253.
43. Posnansky, A. 1912. Guia General illustrada para la investigacion de los Monumentos Prehistoricos de Tiahuanacu e Islas del Sol y la Luna (La Paz), 104 + 2pp.
44. Markham, C. 1910. The Incas of Peru (London), xvi + 443pp.
45. Hay, O P. 1927. "The Pleistocene of the Western Region of North America and its Vertebrate Animals", Carnegie Inst, Washington, publ no:322b, p3.

46. Southall, J. 1882. "Pliocene Man in America", J Trans Vict Inst Lond, vol 15, pp195–6.
47. Eberhart, H. 1961. "The Cogged Stones of Southern California", Amer Antiq, vol 26, pp361–370.
48. Skertchly, S B J. 1888. "On the occurrence of stone mortars in the ancient (Pliocene?) river gravels of Butte County, California", J Anthrop Instit, vol 17, pp332–337.
49. Holmes, W H. 1919. Handbook of Aboriginal American Antiquities: Part 1. Introductory and Lithic Industries (Washington), xvii + 380pp; see p115.
50. Carter, G F. 1980. Earlier than You Think (Texas Univ Press), 348pp; see pp146–7.
51. Southall, J. 1882. Op cit, p197.
52. Hay, O P. 1927. Op cit, p193.
53. Hehr, F G. 1955. Personal communication.
54. Winchell, A. 1881. Sparks from a Geologist's Hammer (Chicago), 400pp; see p170.
55. Foster, J W. 1870. "On the Antiquity of Man in North America", Trans Chicago Acad Sci, vol 1, pt ii, p244.
56. Foster, J W. 1870. Ibid.
57. Radiocarbon, vol 2, 1960; see p182.
58. Cieza de Leon, P. 1553. La Cronica del Perú: Part One (Seville), xxxii + 367pp.
59. Fregosa, B. 1509. De dictis factisq; memorabilibus collectanea (Medoliani), np.
60. Strahlenberg, P J. 1738. A historico-geographical description of the northern part of North and Eastern Europe and Asia (London), 462pp; see p405.
61. Anonymous. 1818. "General Literature and Miscellaneous Communications: no 17 Ship discovered in the Earth in Africa", Q Jl Lit Sci Arts Lond, vol v, p150.
62. Weid-Neuweid, M A P. 1839–1841. Reise in das innere Nord-America in den Jahren 1832 bis 1834, 2 vols, (Coblenz); see vol 2.
63. Scott-Elliot, G F. 1925. Prehistoric Man and His Story, (London), xvi + 398pp; see p205.
64. Salinger, M J. 1981. "Palaeoclimates North and South", Nature, vol 291, pp106–107.
65. Sigafoos, R S. 1964. "Botanical Evidence of Floods and Flood-Plain Deposition", US Geol Surv Prof Paper 485-A, pp1–35.
    Hupp, C R. 1988. "Plant ecological aspects of Flood Geomorphology and Palaeoflood History", pp335–356 in Flood Geomorphology, ed by V R Baker et al, (New York).
66. Parkington, J E. 1986. "Landscape and subsistence changes since the Last Glacial Maximum along the Western Cape Coast", pp201–226 in "The End of the Palaeolithic in the Old World", ed by L G Strauss, Brit Archaeol Rep, GB.
67. Cohen, A L, & J E Parkington et al. 1992. "A Holocene Marine Climate Record in Mollusc Shells from the Southwest African Coast", Quat Res, vol 38, pp379–385.
68. Hume, W F, & J I Craig. 1911. "The Glacial Period and Climate Changes in North-East Asia", Rep Brit Assoc Advt Sci, Portsmouth), pp382–3.
    Bowler, J M, & G S Hope et al. 1976. "Late Quaternary Climates of Australia and New Guinea", Quat Res, vol 6, no 3, pp359–394, see p359.
    Also see: Hope, G S, J A Patterson, U Radock & I Allison. 1976. The Equatorial Glaciers of New Guinea, (Rotterdam), 330pp.
69. Wigley, T M I, M A Ingram & G Farmer (eds). 1981. Climate and History, Studies in Past Climates and their Impact on Man (Cambridge), 530pp.
70. Lamb, H H. 1982. Climate, History and the Modern World (London).

Appendix A
REFRIGERATED MAMMOTHS

Before the Phaeton disaster, much of the present Arctic region was covered with forest-steppe vegetation – forests interspersed with grasslands – maintained by moist, mild climatic conditions typified by an annual average temperature at least 10°C, much higher than today. Prodigious herds of herbivores roamed the area and depended heavily on this vegetation.

When the catastrophe occurred, animals and plants alike were destroyed as the climate was changed drastically. The location of the poles altered and the Arctic region, cut off from the heat of the Sun, was plunged into a prolonged night of devastating cold. Temperatures there dropped almost immediately below –40°C, and perhaps eventually to –71°C, which is that of the present 'Cold Pole' in Siberia. Chronic volcanic pollution of the atmosphere worldwide not only accompanied this axial shift but also greatly accelerated this tremendous (and permanent) drop in temperature. Large scale watery displacements also occurred in these latitudes more or less simultaneously.

The intense refrigeration was unquestionably sudden, very sudden. All observers have commented upon this inescapable fact. It froze the ground solid, turned lake and ground water into great lenses of ice, and froze dead and dying animals and plants throughout the region into grim memorials which have survived, unchanged, in that condition, down to our own day. Among these have been the frozen carcasses of mammoths, woolly rhinoceroses and their large contemporaries.

It is the physical state of the flesh of these frozen cadavers which provides evidence of the astonishing suddenness and completeness of this refrigeration. Digby, in his book about Siberian mammoths, quotes Herz as describing mammoth flesh as "...fibrous and marbled with fat", and as looking "...as fresh as well-frozen beef"[1]. Excellent soup has been made from the meat of some frozen mammoth carcass, and the meat itself, apparently, was cooked and eaten[2].

This deep refrigeration, therefore, did not seemingly destroy the flesh of these animals, even though Merryman and others have contended that sudden, intense freezing would probably destroy the constituent cells. Merryman cites Lovelock as opining that –5°C is "...the lowest temperature to which mammalian cells may be slowly frozen and still survive"[3]. Others, however, have disputed such statements[4], and it is clear that the evidence of these frozen Siberian carcasses does too.

It is important to note that these mammoth carcasses represent healthy well-nourished individuals. They do not belong to very old, degenerate or starving animals as some have maintained. Indeed, a deep-frozen six month old baby mammoth carcass found in 1977 was so perfectly preserved that analyses could be made of its blood and protein, and its tissues were used for genetic studies. Interestingly, the date suggested for its demise was about 12,000 years BP[5]. This is within the 14,000–9,000 years BP period assigned on the basis of other C^{14} datings for the general extinction of mammoths in the Arctic[6], and relatively very close to the date of the Phaeton disaster advocated in this book.

According to professional opinion, to freeze a warm-blooded mammal the size of a mammoth requires a temperature of below –30°C to –40°C. This temperature is needed in order that there is no injury to the cellular tissue, and that the physio-chemical and enzymic reactions are halted – there is no question of the freeze being either slow or gradual[7].

Merryman has pointed out that, once the temperature has fallen to a low level, it must remain at that level if a frozen product is to escape serious damage. This is because, if these low levels are not maintained, a recrystallisation process may take place within the ice initially freezing the product. In such a process numerous small ice crystals combine into larger ones, and, in the case of frozen flesh, their growth would disrupt cells and membranes, allowing the escape of natural juices, nutriment and flavour[8]. Fluctuating freeze-levels would thus damage the flesh and lead eventually to decay and dissolution.

From this brief analysis of the mechanics of freezing, we can conclude that the preservation of mammoth meat for over 11,000 years in virtually unimpaired condition calls for an initial freeze followed by a great lowering of temperature which has been maintained uninterrupted throughout the intervening millennia. The sequence of events comprising the Phaeton disaster – insofar as it directly affected Earth – described in part five requires precisely the set of effects epitomised by these Siberian carcasses.

It has often been argued that the mammoth, with its thick hairy coat and layer of adipose tissue (established from several of the best preserved frozen cadavers) was admirably equipped to withstand the harsh conditions of Ice Age times. This theory was tested when a microscopic examination of retrieved mammoth skin was compared with another of the skin of the living Indian elephant. The comparison showed that both skins were identical and that neither contained the vital sebaceous glands for secreting the oil necessary to keep an animal sufficiently warm under icy conditions. Without a natural supply of oil, the hairy coat of the mammoth, and also that of its contemporary the woolly rhinoceros, would have been useless in such conditions. On the other hand, a sheep, and in particular the musk-ox, with its oily coat, is much better equipped than the mammoth or the woolly rhinoceros to withstand severe cold[9].

Fat, or adipose tissue, does not necessarily imply a defence mechanism against cold either. It constitutes a useful food store against winter scarcity or during months of aridity. As the seeds found in the mouths and stomachs of various frozen mammoths indicate a summer demise[10], the presence of fat on these individuals would, in fact, be completely normal. The bison, a companion of the mammoth at many and various localities, is an ecologically-specialised animal having a double hump. This feature, like the mammoth's adipose tissue, represents a food store enabling the animal to survive periods of aridity in the grasslands it inhabits[11]. Very probably, the woolly rhinoceros was similarly equipped, because it was not specifically adapted to Arctic tundra vegetation, but, like the bison, preferred rolling grasslands, as demonstrated by the remains which have been found across the plains of Spain[12].

REFERENCES

1. Digby, B. 1926. The Mammoth and Mammoth-Hunting Grounds in Northwestern Siberia (New York), 224pp.
2. Nalivkin, D V. 1973. The Geology of the USSR (Edinburgh), xxviii + 855pp; see p776.
3. Merryman, H T. 1956. "The Mechanics of Freeing in Living Cells and Tissues", Science, vol 124, no 3221, pp518–9.
4. Levitt, J. 1957. "The Mechanics of Freezing", Science, vol 125, no 3240, p194.
5. Anonymous, 1978–9. "Baby Mammoth Discovered in Siberia", The Polar Record, vol 19 (120); see 'Notes', p287.
6. Martin, P S, & H E Wright. 1967. Pleistocene Extinctions (Yale Univ Press), viii + 453pp; p392.
7. Bird's Eye Ltd. 1975. Food Freezing. Also correspondence.
8. Merryman, H T. 1956. Op cit, p518.
9. Neuville, H. 1919. "On the Extinction of the Mammoth", Rep Smithsonian Inst for 1919, pp331–333.
10. Sukachev, V N. 1914. Scientific Findings of an Expedition outfitted by the Imperial Academy of Sciences for the purpose of Excavating the Mammoth found by the Beresovka River in 1901, vol iii, (Petrograd).
11. Geist, V. 1970–71. "The Relation of Social Evolution and Dispersal in Ungulates during the Pleistocene, with emphasis on the Old World Deer and the genus Bison", Quat Res, vol 1, pp283–315.
12. Kurtén, B. 1968. The Pleistocene Mammals of Europe (London), viii + 317pp.

Appendix B

DATING OF FINDS FROM THE CATASTROPHE PERIOD

This concerns dated evidence for major worldwide environmental and faunal changes approximately 11,500 years ago.

Organic material has been dated almost exclusively by the Carbon-14 dating method, whereas most of the tectonic, meteorological and hydrological dates have been determined by other methods (including Argon-Potassium dating), or by a combination of two or more methods.

Among other dating methods now in use are those involving uranium-radium, thorium, chlorine, beryllium, rubidium-strontium, thermoluminescence, fission-track and tephrochronological (volcanic ash)[1]. All have limitations, however, as the Argon-Potassium method, outlined below, readily illustrates.

Potassium-bearing minerals have often been deposited with accumulated sediments. Potassium (K) is a very active alkaline element including in its composition a radioactive isotope which decays at a known rate into two other elements – Argon and Calcium. During this process, an electron from the Potassium 'shell' is captured by a nucleus, and 12% of the Potassium is converted into Argon-40, and 88% into Calcium.

Calculating the ratio of Potassium to Argon and calcium is quite accurate and easily applicable for periods extending back several millions of years before present. Unfortunately the half-life is not accurately known and the distribution of Argon has been found to be inhomogeneous in rocks and minerals. The difficulty is compounded by the fact that no basis presently exists for estimating the isotopic composition of the original Argon, and by the uncertainty surrounding what is taken to be 'original' Argon being, perhaps, actually a recent loss of Potassium[2].

REFERENCES

1. Nilsson, T. 1983. The Pleistocene: Geology and Life in the Quaternary Ice Age (Dordrecht, Boston, London), 651pp.
2. Faul, H. 1966. Ages of Rocks, Planets and Stars (New York), ix + 109pp; see pp32–46.

DATES AND PLACES OF FINDS PERTAINING TO THE PHAETON DISASTER

All dates cited are in years before present (BP). amsl signifies 'above mean sea level' and bpgl signifies 'below present ground level'.

Material	Location	Date
OLD WORLD
ORGANIC – BOTANICAL
Charcoal	Bushman's Rock, Africa	12,090
Charcoal	Uganda	11,350 ±340
Wood in peaty mud	Sjelland, Denmark	11,090 ±240
Wood	Sjelland, Denmark	11,310 ±500
Charcoal in fossil soil	Folkestone, England	11,944 ±210
Plant debris 4m bpgl under alluvium	Warwickshire, England	10,560 ±142
Charcoal in red soil with volcanic ash	Gala Lakes, Ethiopia	11,510 ±110
Charcoal in mud-flow	Andernack, Germany	11,150 ±200
Birch, willow	Kiel, Germany	11,270 ±130
Charcoal in mud-flow	Mayen, Germany	10,800 ±300
Charred wood	Inghiottitoio, Italy	11,150 ±650
Charcoal under tufa	Hokkaido, Japan	11,520 ±400
Carbonised tree	Komoro, Japan	11,300 ±400
Wood in lava flow	Kosakamachi, Japan	12,000 ±250
Wood in clay	Tokyo, Japan	11,300 ±360
Charcoal	Cyrene, Libya	12,580 ±172
Wood	Rudnja, Lithuania	11,970 ±180
Charcoal	Bodel, Netherlands	11,070 ±90
Wood	Blomvag, Norway	12,200 ±350
Driftwood	Bluno Is, Norway	12,100 ±350
Wood in sandy gravel	Cizysko, Poland	11,390 ±210
Charcoal residue	Kasama, Zimbabwe	10,820 ±430
Fossil tree from mammoth horizon	Taimyr Pen, Siberia	11,700 ±300
Wood in sand on top of 'till'	Dattnau, Switzerland	12,206 ±73
Wood fragments under basal 'till'	Petit-Saconnex, Switz	11,560 ±280
	Average date	11,517
ORGANIC – PEAT DEPOSITS
Basal peat showing start of bog	Spisska Kotlina, Austria	11,010 ±160
Peat	Anvers, Belgium	10,920 ±540
Peat	Anvers, Belgium	11,950 ±430
Peat	Campine, Belgium	11,640 ±250
Moss peat	Cornwall, Britain	11,071 ±180
Moss peat	Durham, England	11,011 ±230
Moss peat	Lincolnshire, England	11,205 ±120
Peat	Lithuania	11,200 ±340
Moss peat	Usselo, Netherlands	11,300 ±140
Moss peat	Usselo, Netherlands	11,620 ±140
Pollen-rich peat	Troms, Norway	10,720 ±240
Peat in clay	Stirling, Scotland	11,024 ±199
	Average date	11,222
SEDIMENTS
Lake mud	Denmark	10,970 ±300
Black mud	Wexford, Eire	11,060 ±250
Lake mud	Darlington, England	10,851 ±630
Organic marsh soil	Kent, England	11,960 ±160
Clay-mud in end moraine	Rappiner on Rugen Germany	12,100 ±600
Sediments below 'till'	Usedon, Germany	11,244 ±640
Organic carbon in clay	Tokyo, Japan	11,840 ±290
Basal gyttja	Bear Is, Norway	11,135 ±130
Gyttja in bog	Blindfunon, Norway	12,100 ±100
Grey gyttja	Brondmyra, Norway	11,300 ±300
Gyttja in kettle-hole	Troms, Norway	11,680 ±170
Organic sediments	Shetland Is, Scotland	10,055 ±300
Gyttja	Shetland Is, Scotland	12,090 ±900
Basal gyttja	Sweden	11,730 ±150
Gyttja with chalk and clay	Switzerland	10,950 ±200
Gyttja with clay	Dalpe, Switzerland	10,900 ±250
Gyttja in lake deposit	L Origlio, Switzerland	12,00 ±200
	Average date	11,409
NEW WORLD, OCEANIA & AUSTRALASIA
ORGANIC – BOTANICAL
Wood in ice-wedge	Baldwin Pen, Alaska	11,340 ±400
Wood 3.5m bpgl	Barrow, Alaska	10,800 ±300
Wood and shells 0.8m bpgl	NSW, Australia	11.140 ±160
Conifer 2m bpgl	British Columbia, Canada	11,590 ±280
Wood in lake silt	L Iroquois, Canada	11,570 ±260
Wood & peat between 2 till layers	Port Hood I, Canada	10,710 ±240
Wood 12m bpgl	Oldman River, Canada	11,000 ±250
Wood in mastodon horizon	Ontario, Canada	11,400 ±450
Plant remains in mastodon site	Ontario, Canada	12,000 ±200
Charcoal	Saskatchewan, Canada	10,800 ±300
Wood 19m bpgl	Vancouver I, Canada	12,000 ±450

Material	Location	Date
Organic residue in marl 2m bpgl	Yukon, Canada	12,120 ±140
Wood in peat	Aghawagon, New Guinea	11,330 ±150
Wood 2.5m bpgl with gravel, basalt and loess in clay	Dunedin, New Zealand	11,500 ±170
Wood	Wellington, New Zealand	11,500 ±160
Organic layers	Tristan da Cunha	10,770 ±156
Various trees, charcoal	Arizona, USA	11,290 ±500
Charcoal with mammoth remains	California, USA	11,800 ±800
Plants with Folsom artefacts and carbonised plants	Clovis, New Mexico, USA	10,490 ±900 11,170 ±360
Wood below mastodon remains	Indiana, USA	12,000 ±450
Spruce in 'glacial' deposit	Iowa, USA	11,120 ±400
Spruce 8m bpgl	Iowa, USA	11,600 ±200
Charcoal in mammoth site	Michigan, USA	11,290 ±500
Wood 1m under 'glacial' clay	Minnesota, USA	11,710 ±325
Spruce tree	New York, USA	11,410 ±400
Wood 4m bpgl	South Dakota, USA	12,000 ±400
Spruce tree	Wisconsin, USA	10,877 ±470
Picea wood	Wisconsin, USA	12,000 ±300
	Average date	11,390

ORGANIC – PEAT DEPOSITS

Material	Location	Date
Peat	Anchorage, Alaska	11,600 ±300
Peat with twigs 2m bpgl	Copper River, Alaska	11,390 ±300
Peat below Holocene marine sediments	Alaska	11,570 ±130
Peat in marine terrace	Munday Creek, Alaska	10,820 ±420
Peat	Ontario, Canada	11,950 ±350
Peat in kettle-hole	Vancouver Is, Canada	11,780 ±450
Peat, pollen 10m bpgl	Hauraki, New Zealand	11,900 ±750
Peat	Colombia, S America	11,350 ±140
Peat	Cape Fear, USA	10,430 ±590
Peat in estuarine deposits	Chesapeake Bay, USA	11,500 ±1200
Peat	36°-42°N, E Coast, USA	11,000
Peat in estuarine deposits	Georges Bank, USA	11,000 ±1200
Peat 1m bpgl	Wisconsin, USA	12,000 ±500
	Average date	11,406

SEDIMENTS

Material	Location	Date
Sediments	Baffin I, NWT, Canada	11,910 ±140
Muck in mastodon horizon	Ontario, Canada	12,000 ±500
Carbonaceous matter	Guatemala, C America	11,560 ±360
Organic carbon 2m bpgl	Eugene I, Mexican Gulf	11,950 ±650
Organic soil under 'till'	Aghawagon, New Guinea	11,810 ±250

Material	Location	Date
Loess	Slavonia	11,700 ±500
Organic carbon with foraminifera	California, USA	12,460 ±700
Muddy clays	California, USA	12,360 ±2600
Organic carbon 1.8m bpgl	California, USA	12,500 ±600
Organic carbon	California, USA	12,300 ±450
Organic carbon	California, USA	11,400 ±600
Sterile clay overlying 'till'	Massachusetts, USA	12,310 ±320
Organic matter in clay	New Mexico, USA	11,445 ±230
Clay gyttja	Ohio, USA	10,558 ±365
Organic matter	Wyoming, USA	11,330 ±320
	Average date	11,839

OLD WORLD

ZOOLOGICAL – Vertebrates

Material	Location	Date
Fossil fish	Kenya, E Africa	12,300 12,000 ±220
Reindeer bone	Picken's Hole, England	12,400 ±1500
Antler	Montastruc, France	12,070 ±180
Antlers	Meiendorf, Germany	11,750 ±200
Whale	Trondheim, Norway	11,290 ±190
Mammoth sinews and skin	Taimyr Peninsular, Siberia	11,450 ±250
Bone	Cueva Bora cave, Spain	11,470 ±500
White whale	Agnesberg, Sweden	12,270 ±220
Whale	Essunga, Sweden	11,495 ±100
Seal	Grums, Sweden	10,150 ±180
Seal	Hastefjorden, Sweden	10,875 ±160
Seal	Lagmansered, Sweden	11,840 ±180
Greenland whale	Orust I, Sweden	12,500 ±240
	Average date	11,670

ZOOLOGICAL – invertebrate

Material	Location	Date
Shells in marine sediments	Disko Bay, Greenland	1,000 ±900
Shells 45m amsl	Glommen, Greenland	10,720 ±150
Shells in sand amsl	Ekrukorn, Iceland	11,620 ±240
Shells in silt under gravels	Kaldarbrn, Iceland	11,230 ±160
Foraminifera	Washtana, India	11,130 ±150
Shells in 'glacio-marine' clay	Belsvik, Norway	11,250 ±180
Shells in 'till'	Bergen, Norway	11,500 ±300
Shells in 'glacio-marine' clay & silt	Björkvik, Norway	10,020 ±130
Shells in marine bed, end moraine	Rensa, Norway	11,900 ±250
Shells	Sandstrand, Norway	11,400 ±250
Shells	Sandstrand, Norway	12,100 ±160
Shells in laminated clay	Troms, Norway	11,500 ±400
Shells in clay under gravels	Troms, Norway	11,500 ±400
Shell fragments	Norwegian Channel	11,950 ±290
Shells	Ardyne Point, Scotland	12,150–11,680
Shells	Argyll, Scotland	11,530 ±210
Shells in marine sediments	Cardross, Scotland	11,787 ±122
Shells above 'boulder clay' but under 3cm of clay	Dumbarton, Scotland	11,805 ±205

Material	Location	Date
Shells in end moraine	Loch Lomond, Scotland	11,700 ±170
Shells in marine clay	Mentieth, Scotland	11,800 ±170
Shells in marine clay	Paisley, Scotland	12,615 ±230
	Average date	11,533
INORGANIC – GEOLOGICAL
Limestone	Bergen, Norway	11,700 ±230
Carbonates	Hormuz, Iran	12,350 ±145
Carbonates	Tunisia	12,470 ±540
	Average date	12,173
NEW WORLD, OCEANIA & AUSTRALASIA ZOOLOGICAL – Vertebrates
Bison horn	Alaska	12,460 ±320
Diprotodon molar	Orroroo, Australia	11,100 ±130
Paramilodon bone	Rio Grande, Brazil	12,770 ±220
Mammoth tusk	British Columbia, Canada	11,600 ±1000
Musk ox	Banks I, NWT, Canada	10,600 ±320
Mastodon	Ontario, Canada	12,000 ±500
Giant sloth	Brunswick, USA	11,310 ±90
Dwarf mammoth	California, USA	11,800 ±800
Mammoth tusk	Colorado, USA	11,200 ±500
Musk ox	Michigan, USA	11,100 ±400
Ground sloth dung	Nevada, USA	11,690 ±250
Mastodon	New York, USA	11,410 ±400
Mylodon skull	Oregon, USA	11,310 ±800
Bison bone	Wyoming, USA	11,830 ±410
	Average date	11,564
ZOOLOGICAL – Invertebrates
Shells in end moraine	Baffin I, NWT, Canada	10,760
Shells	Banks I, NWT, Canada	10,920 ±100
Shells in marine sediments		11,200 ±100
Shells	B Columbia, Canada	12,230 ±200
Oyster – warm-water species	Georges Bank, Canada	10,600 ±130
Shells	Green Bay, Canada	11,950 ±170
Shells in marine sediments	Melville I, NWT, Canada	11,310 ±150
Shells	Pr Edward I, Canada	12,410 ±170
Shells in marine sediments	Pr Patrick I, Canada	11,600 ±370
Foraminifera in moraine	Quebec, Canada	11,500 ±630
Shells	Victoria I, Canada	11,310 ±150
Reef coral	New Guinea	10,360 ±110
Foraminifera 0.5m bpgl	California, USA	11,180 ±550
Foraminifera 3.5m bpgl	California, USA	11,280 ±875
Foraminifera 1m below sea bed	California, USA	11,840 ±800
Foraminifera 0.25m bpgl (older than horizon)	California, USA	12,250 ±1200
Oyster shells	36–42°N, East coast, USA	c11,000

Material	Location	Date
Foraminiferal faunal change	Atlantic coast bed, USA	c12,000
Shells	Maine, USA	11,800 ±240
Shells	Maine, USA	13,020 ±240
Shells	Missouri River, USA	12,250 ±400
Shells	Nebraska, USA	10,850 ±300
	Average date	11,541
INORGANIC – GEOLOGICAL
Tufa	California, USA	12,000 ±400
Dolomite	Utah, USA	11,300 ±250
Tufa	Nevada, USA	11,150 ±250
Coralline tufa	Nevada, USA	11,950 ±250
Banded caliche	Arroyo, NM, USA	11,900 ±300
Platy caliche	Texas, USA	11,730 ±300
	Average date	11,671

General average date for the above worldwide: 11,577 years BP (Before Present)

Material	Location	Date
GEOPHYSICAL – miscellaneous
Elevation	Bight of Benin, Africa	12,250–10,750
Elevation	Ivory Coast, Africa	11,900
Dramatic rise in water levels	Lakes in Mauritania, Chad, Afar, Hoggar, Ethiopia	11,000
Core with four ash layers	L Tanganyika, Africa	11,690 ±300
Water depth more important	N Atlantic Ocean basin	c12,000
Marine transgression	Denmark	11,950 ±190
Temperature change	Taiwan	c10,000
Maximum monsoons	Rajasthan, India	c10,800
Land elevation	Ulster, SW Scotland	11,500
Shorelines tilt	Sweden	10,700
Land rose en bloc	Sweden	11,750
Warm climate starts suddenly	Yenisei, Siberia	c10,000
	Average date	11,125
GEOPHYSICAL – miscellaneous Tectonic, Meteorological, Hydrological etc
Deglaciation	Unmak I, Alaska	12,000–11,000
Dramatic rise in lake-water levels	S E Australia	11,000
Rain forests expand	Queensland, Australia	12,000–11,000
Change in sediment source	East-central Bering Sea	c13,000
Laurentid ice retreats by 500km	SE Canada	11,000–8,500
Glaciers shrink	Chile	11,000
Subsidence	Gulf of Mexico	10,200
End moraine	Westland, New Zealand	11,450
Ice overlies tephra deposits	Cascade Range, USA	12,250–11,250
Glaciers disappear	Rocky Mts, CO, USA	11,000
Subsidence	East cont'l shelf, USA	11,090
	Average date	11,600

Appendix C
REMNANTS OF THE CELESTIAL BATTLE?

The explosive destruction of any non-gaseous planet or planetary satellite within the solar system would inevitably produce an outwards dispersal of the disintegrated fragments radially from the epicentre of the explosion – from the core of the destroyed object. Such an explosion would be of appalling violence and power, even for a small satellite, and would hurl all large fragments of the dismantled world vast distances in every direction into interplanetary space. Some fragments would hurtle away as single objects, others as groups, and yet others as great swarms of variously shaped and sized debris, before settling down into orbits around the Sun. These orbits would almost certainly be eccentric and lie at all kinds of planes relative to the solar and terrestrial equators, and some might even extend out to the confines of the solar system itself. In many cases, they would undoubtedly resemble those described in Part Four of the Earth-crossing Apollo asteroids. Orbital eccentricity is a powerful indication of the geologically very recent origin of these objects.

In time many fragments would pass close to Earth or between Earth and its planetary neighbours, the largest pieces being, in favourable circumstances, observable from Earth. The celebrated 'law of averages' would ensure that.

Following such a disaster, lesser fragments and dust particles would settle down comparatively quickly into a loose shell of immense size but of slight density around the general location of the explosion, and this too would obey gravitational laws and eventually orbit the Sun – in the process gradually becoming progressively elongated. Such a fate would also befall any unvaporised portions of the atmosphere and hydrosphere which the destroyed world may originally have possessed, although in the case of surviving liquids and gases, these would, in the low temperatures of space, rapidly freeze into various types of ice.

If, as we contend, such a catastrophe occurred in the solar system as recently as 11,500 years or so ago, then the existence within it of myriads of such varied fragments should not only be theoretically possible but actually expected. As shown below, this is precisely what astronomers have apparently been reporting for at least 300 years – although except for a large object sporadically sighted near Venus during the 17th and 18th centuries, few have been observed for any appreciable length of time, and fewer still on more than one occasion. The problem of what these objects signify has never been satisfactorily resolved in astronomical literature.

From the many now long-forgotten accounts of these transient, anomalous objects we present a small selection of those which antedated the advent of ballooning and the appearance of man-made satellites, rockets, space vehicles and disintegrated parts thereof – hence all references derive from before 1900. Meteors are excluded from these notes since their true origins are still under review, but falls of ice, sometimes of remarkable bulk are included, despite being in recent years commonly explained away as ice detached from high-flying aircraft. Such ice reportedly fell to Earth quite regularly in years predating the modern discovery of aviation.

Our brief survey proceeds systematically from the Sun outwards as far as Mars.

Objects crossing the solar disc

Three observations were made of dark, unknown bodies passing across the face of the Sun on different occasions between February 1762 and May 1764[1]. In 1777, Charles Messier, the French astronomer, saw myriads of black spherical objects cross the solar disc[2]. Similar objects were seen by Lofft in 1818, and by Stark in 1820[3]; and again in 1826 and 1828[4]. They were seen no less than six times in 1834, twice in 1836, and once in 1837, when Pastorff watched two objects moving on different courses across the Sun's face[5]. Other objects were seen in 1847, 1849[6], 1850[7], 1853[8], 1860[9], 1864[10], 1865[11], 1875 and 1876. Hosts of irregularly-shaped black objects were seen to cross the Sun in 1883 as if in alignment – similar to the North American meteor train of 1913[12].

Some of these objects were either very large or were comparatively close to the terrestrial observers, for one, apparently one-fifth of the diameter of the Sun, was sighted with the naked eye between 1st and 5th May 1764 by Hoffman, who saw it slowly traverse the solar disc from north to south, an almost unheard-of direction of motion: but not for an object following a highly eccentric orbit. An almost equally large (or near) object was sighted by Lichtenberg in November 1762. It took approximately three hours to cross the Sun's face. Objects as large as these would, if they penetrated the solar system, undoubtedly cause planetary disturbances. These did not, so the conclusion must be that the objects were really quite close to Earth when observed. Indeed, at 800 miles (1280km) distance, such objects would need to be only about one mile (1.6km) in diameter to appear that large or take that amount of time to transit the solar disc. Obviously the further away the objects were from Earth the larger they must actually have been. What, however, was their origin and why did they follow such unusual orbits?

Objects near Mercury

In 1799, the astronomers Harding and Schroedter independently reported seeing a luminous body of unknown identity crossing the face of Mercury, and on May 22nd 1854 three unknown objects of varying sizes were sighted in space apparently close to Mercury, and have not been seen since[13]. Points of light were observed crossing the unilluminated parts of Mercury[14] and Venus[15] on several occasions in 1892[16].

Objects near Venus

Early modern astronomers considered that Venus possessed a large satellite which they named Neith. As early as 1645 a moon-sized object was sighted near Venus, and was reportedly seen four times during the first half of the eighteenth century, and again in 1867. Denning in 1871 and Hind in 1873 both saw a rather similar object, while in April 1876, at Berlin, Weber watched a black body pass across the illuminated part of the Venusian globe. Seven more sightings of 'Neith' were made in 1886, although whatever it was has not been observed since.

Objects near to or crossing the lunar disc

There have been numerous sightings of dark bodies traversing the face of the Moon[17]. In the 19th century, a dark triangular-shaped object was observed for three minutes, which obliterated almost a quarter of the Moon's face[18]. In 1917, Dr Harris saw a large object silhouetted against the Moon which he estimated to be about 250 miles (400km) long and 50 miles (80km) wide[19]. Other maverick travellers through solar space appear to reflect the Sun's light, the albedo being due to their composition – probably of ice or frozen gas. Bright lights have been seen against the Moon over the last 200 years. They were seen in 1783[20] and 1787[21] and again in 1821[22]. Prof Harrison saw a bright point of light "...resembling a reflection from a moving mirror" in 1877[23], while a similar object was seen in 1881. Even in more modern times such observations have occurred, such as in 1910[24] and 1917. These instances are but a small fraction of the recorded reports of similar sightings of objects close to the Moon.

Objects on or close to Mars

In 1864 and 1865, small shining reddish lights were noticed on the Martian disc[25], while a light-reflecting body was seen in space above the unilluminated portion of Mars in 1894[26]. It was not Phobos or Deimos. In the twentieth century, a "...fountain of flashing light" was seen on the face of Mars by Prof Pickering for 70 minutes in 1900, while on more than one occasion several brilliant moving spots of light crossed the Martian disc in 1911.

Objects in the vicinity of Earth

Unexplained phenomena have been noticed closer to our own planet. Henry Waldner saw a large number of small shining bodies pass at great altitude from East to West in 1863. This group of objects had been seen previously crossing the sky above Naples in 1845. The objects were of diverse shape, and it was concluded they were made of ice[27]. In 1849, Sir Robert Inglis watched thousands of brilliant white objects cross a cloudless sky for 25 minutes[28]. A similar phenomenon was watched by Rev W Read for no less than six hours in 1851[29]; a repeat performance occurred in 1860, which was described as having "...shone with a remarkably brilliant light"[30].

The brilliance of these unknown objects suggests that they were either burning meteors, or were pieces of ice illuminated by sunlight as they passed close to the Earth's upper atmosphere. In 1882, Prof Schwedoff argued that ice of celestial origin existed and accounted for the bombardment of the Earth by curious hailstones and huge chunks of ice which occur from time to time[31].

Impact

Sooner or later the law of averages will ensure that collisions will take place between these maverick objects and the planets or their satellites. One, involving the Moon, apparently occurred on June 25th., 1178 A.D., according to Gervase of Canterbury. On that day 5 men of Kent allegedly watched fast-moving clouds and flames issue from a point within the unlit area between the horns of the new Moon, the illuminated part turning dusky and remaining so for several days[32].

Astronomers Clube and Napier[33] ascribe this duskiness to clouds of lunar surface dust being temporarily cast skywards by the impact's severity and shock waves. The suspension of such dust, even for a few hours, necessitates an atmosphere, something many texts deny the Moon possesses[34], although that was not the view of several earlier observers[35]. More recently, however, Moore has categorically stated that a lunar atmosphere does exist, albeit very attenuatedly[36].

Obscurations

Occasionally observations have been made of temporary disappearnces or diminutions, by generally invisible phenomena, of the normal luminosity of familiar celestial objects. Just a few examples must suffice here.

On the clear nights of January 16th., and 24th., and of February 17th., 1898, a diffuse 'cloud-like' object, far beyond Earth's upper atmosphere, discoloured and dimmed many stars in the constellation of Perseus[37; 38]. Ancient Babylonian cuneiform texts list earlier (undated) analogous effects. These included Cancer becoming "dark" and Venus as having once acquired a "dark crown"[39]. We may take these statements to mean that, on different occasions, the constellation of Cancer was temporarily obscured and Venus partially so.

Early Chinese annals contain essentially similar records. Although a summer's night in 687 B.C. was evidently clear, the 'fixed stars failed to appear", but "in the middle of the night stars fell like rain"[40]. Here, celestial opacity and an apparent meteor shower (stars falling like rain) were, inferentially, separate phases of a single event.

While all the foregoing obscurations were temporary affairs, others are known where the disappearances have been of far longer, even permanent, duration. Examples include the second magnitude stars listed by Johann Bayer in 1603[41] as β and γ in the stern and yard of the constellation Argo (The Ship). These were no longer visible by April 1668[42]. Other stars recorded in Tycho Brahe's famous stellar catalogue of 1602 as visible in Ursa Minor (the Lesser Bear) and Andromeda had either vanished or markedly dimmed by 1664 when Giovanni Cassini searched for them. By 1671 another had disappeared in Pisces (The Fishes) and 8 years later, when Edmund Halley published his star catalogue, still others had dimmed[44].

That these were not fading novae or supernovae seems clear for, throughout the same general period, other formerly unknown stars of considerable brilliance became (and have ever since remained) visible in the constellations of Cassiopeia, Eridanus, and Andromeda, as well as near the celestial North Pole. One or more far distant clouds of otherwise invisible matter variously obscured, dimmed, or 'revealed' so-called 'fixed stars' as they drifted across regions between those luminaries and Earthbound observers[45].

Even though it is known that vast and often dense clouds of dust and gas occupy numerous cosmic regions[46], not improbably most if not all of the above phenomena results from the presence and movements of the circumsolar dust-ring recently discovered interacting with Earth's orbital path, discussed more fully below.

Lunar Oddities

Even such a large and cyclically bright body as the Moon apparently sometimes vanishes, or, on other occasions, has been associated with celestial phenomena accorded scant (if any) attention in standard astronomical manuals. The phenomena, however, are particularly germane to the subject before us. Disappearances are reviewed first.

During the total lunar eclipse of May 18th, 1761, the Moon vanished completely for upwards of half an hour. Even during a total eclipse, sufficient light normally remains for successful telescopic observation of the principle lunar surface features; but not on May 18th., 1761. Otherwise undetectable matter between Earth and Moon had blotted out the latter.

As noticed from places as far apart as London, Ipswich, and Dresden, the Moon failed to appear in seemingly clear skies on June 10th and 11th, 1816[47; 48]. Millennia earlier, Babylonians had witnessed the same thing three times in a single month[49].

Although some, perpetuating a commonly invoked explanation, have identified the causal obscuring agent during such events[50] as dense volcanic dust ejected during eruptions into Earth's atmosphere, other interpretations, as indicated below, are now available to us.

Like the unaccountably hazy illumination of the eastern part of the Moon's dark limb at 10.00pm on March 24th, 1882[51], and the glow which – too bright for Earth-shine – covered the Moon's unlit portion two years later[52], a 1,500 miles long shadow (not cast by the Earth), seen during daytime inspection of the lunar disc by Australian observers Hirst and Russell in 1878, was hardly caused by sunlight reflected from, or a shadow cast by, meteor swarms moving between or near Earth and the Moon[53]. Such swarms are singularly non-reflective.

A professional report from Santiago, Chile, details a total eclipse of the Sun on November 30th, 1893. Briefly, 12 or 15 minutes before the eclipse began, the space separating the Moon's limb and the brilliant solar limb was instantaneously covered by moving nebulous matter of a dark rosy hue. As this progressively covered the Sun's face, it darkened as though "compressed". Eventually, neither the solar or lunar limbs could be properly distinguished through it. Almost as soon as this obscuring matter passed out of sight, a smaller unknown dark object for an instant covered the Moon to cause a splendid annular eclipse[54].

This account indicates that a solid dark body, preceded by a transparent mass passed between the Earth and Moon on the date in question. Yet, under normal conditions neither was visible from Earth.

Numerous reports exist of unfocusable nebulosities, either on or high above the lunar landscape. Variously described as pale or milky white, misty or diffuse, these nebulosities often move, drift, alter shape, or disappear. Occasionally dark bodies, that cast no shadows upon the Moon's surface, have been reported temporarily obscuring lunar topographical features. Such 'shadowless' objects must be located far outside the satellite's atmosphere, in space nearer, though still distant from, Earth.

A comparable nebulous object, briefly noted on the Sun's disc during May 26th, 1828, but not sighted since[55], must have been positioned that day in space somewhere between Earth and the Sun. It almost certainly falls into the same category as the aforecited Martian and lunar nebulosities.

Anomalous Meteorological Phenomena

From time to time Earth experiences singular falls of ice, stones (not meteoritic), mud and strange snows. On balance these do not readily conform to the known workings of terrestrial meteorology and show every sign of having non-terrestrial origins. Their very nature and common celestial origin suggests that they form part of the lesser residue of one or more disintegrated former worlds. Again, only a small number of the total recorded instances can be given here.

Falls of ice

In May 1802, a mass of ice 3ft long, as many wide, and over 2ft thick fell in Hungary. Pieces of ice, a foot in circumference, fell in Derbyshire, England, in May 1811, and in 1828 a lump about a cubic yard in size fell at Candeishe in India. A block of ice weighing 11lbs fell at Cette, France, in 1844; while a huge mass, some 20ft in circumference, fell at Ord in Scotland during 1849. Another, of comparable dimensions, fell in August of the same year at Bulvullich, also in Scotland. Pumpkin-sized pieces of ice fell on Gunfalore in India in 1851; and in March 1860, during a snowstorm, giant lumps of ice fell so thickly on hillsides in Upper Wasdale, England, that from a distance they resembled flocks of sheep. An 80lb block of ice fell during August 1882 near Salina, Kansas, while five years later 'snowflakes' 15in across and 8in thick fell prodigiously in Montana. In November 1901, innumerable pieces of ice each weighing a minimum of 1lb fell in Victoria, Australia. Very significantly, many reports (which collectively embrace practically the entire world) specifically note that, upon inspection, pieces of fallen ice give the appearance of being fragments of recently-disintegrated larger sheets or blocks.

Recent analysis of NASA images of large icy bodies entering and melting through friction in Earth's upper atmosphere, not only contribute to our planet's water supply, but indicate – through weighing as much as 20 tonnes each – the source of the fallen ice blocks from space mentioned by Prof. Schwedoff.

Showers of Stones

So many little stones fell during a violent storm at Wolverhampton, England, in June 1860, that they were cleared away with shovels[56]. Great numbers of small black stones fell at Birmingham during a storm in August 1858, and a large quantity of water-worn pebbles, unlike any known from the district, fell in Palestine, Texas in July 1888[57]. Similarly, numerous smooth pebbles fell at Kandahar in Afghanistan in 1834, while in May 1884 two falls of flinty stones occurred at Bismarck, North Dakota, each separated by an interval of 15 hours[58]. Interestingly, some of the many stones which rained down upon Dhurmsalla, India, in 1860 were coated with ice – Dhurmsalla is located in one of the warmest parts of India. It must be obvious that all these falls, and many others omitted here, were of non-meteoritic stones. Nor will it escape notice that, like the falls of ice, they occur globally.

Rains of Mud and Dust

During November 1902 staggering quantities of dust and mud fell over Australia, and fell there again in 1903 – 50 tons of it per square mile. It also fell in stupendous quantities simultaneously over much of Europe and western Russia, and was reported as having also fallen then over the Canary Islands, and by ships half-way between Britain and Barbados in the Caribbean. No less than 10 million tonnes of it is said to have fallen on southern England alone[59]. At the time it was fatuously alleged to be dust and sand whirled up from the Sahara Desert, an explanation still commonly advanced to account for modern falls of similar red dust and mud. Did Earth pass in 1902 and 1903 through part of the great cloud or shell of particles which, as previously argued, formed after the explosive disintegration of one or more once-solid bodies over 11,500 years ago?

And what, we may also ask, was the origin of the thick shower of marble-sized balls of soft, pulpy matter, which crumbled when dry, which fell at Queenstown, South Africa, in 1883?[60]. It was hardly a volcanic product, although some might reason that the following probably was, when on June 7th 1846 a 'slag'-like matter fell at Darmstadt, Germany.

Correlation

More or less coincidentally with the first printing of this book, astronomers announced the discovery just outside Earth's present orbit of a circumsolar ring of 'asteroidal' dust in 'resonant lock' with our planet[61]. The plane of the ring's orbit differs from that of Earth's, whereby the two intersect erratically and partially at that.

In reality the ring consists not only of genuine dust particles, ranging from submicron (mud) sized grains to larger (sand or grit) sized material, but also of a vast assortment of stones and boulders. The volume and range of this material is distributed unevenly and discontinuously along the ring's orbital path, and includes both clouds and trains of assorted meteoritic matter.

To a large degree the ring seems to be a likely source of much of the 10,000 tons of extraterrestrial dust thought to fall to Earth annually, and, probably, of a high percentage of the countless meteorites (not meteors) which also arrive every year. It is also known that inter-planetary dust grains, when congregated into dense clouds, have a tendency to develop ice-mantles[62], the whole cloud becoming opaque and of low reflectivity. Indeed, such clouds are only illuminated by received star (sun) light[63].

Here then, we contend, is an identifiable source of most if not all of the anomalous celestial phenomena just surveyed, why it is monitorable only irregularly, why observations of it extend both outwards towards Mars and inwards towards Venus and the Sun, and why certain "falls" or other manifestations of it are sporadic and occasionally repeated in quick or comparatively quick sequences. Intermittent 'clipping' or 'grazing' of the two relevant orbits would go far towards explaining the unusual patterns traced in previous paragraphs. Furthermore, the so-called 'invisibility' of much of the aforementioned obscuring matter, due to its presumed non-reflectivity, and the diffuse or luminous character of various other bodies detailed earlier (presumably ice-coated and therefore capable of reflecting sunlight, or even Earth-shine) now becomes explicable.

This dust ring plainly represents the dispersed residue of a body which has distintegrated. Its position indicates that the disintegration occurred in the general vicinity of the Earth-Moon system. As postulated in Part Five a major feature of the Phaeton visitation was the cataclysmic destruction, close to Earth, of a satellitic body remembered anciently as Kingu, large fragments of which apparently fell to Earth as 'burning mountains', the Wormwood Star, and rains of 'iron' hailstones. Since, however, the disintegration was explosive, dispersal of the affected material was radial, whereby a high percentage of the resultant debris was flung away from Earth. The dust ring now represents the orbital path onto which a great deal of this material has now settled, albeit somewhat discontinuously and in variable amounts at different places along its route. Was this antiquity's 'Hammered Bracelet' (see p.224 suprá).

Thus, many if not all of the curious observations just detailed concern further remnants of the terrible calamity endured by Earth approximately 11,500 years ago – remnants still in free but decidedly wayward orbits. That they, and the dust ring, actually exist so close to the Earth-Moon system is also positive confirmation of the general validity of the scenario presented in this study. Had they not existed the presentation would have been flawed.

REFERENCES

1. Wolf, Prof. 1859. "Miscellaneous Intelligence", Mon Notes Roy Astron Soc, vol 20, pp100–1.
2. Berard, M. 1836. Edin New Phil Jl, vol xxi; see p35, footnote.
3. Wolf, Prof. 1859. Loc cit.
4. Verrier, V J J le. 1876. "Astronomie", Comptes Rendu, vol 83, pp621–4.
5. Herrick, E C. 1860. "New Planets", Ann Sci Dig, pp409–411.
   Verrier, V J J le. 1859. "Astronomy", Amer J Sci, vol 28, ser 2, pp445–7.
6. Verrier, V J J le. 1876. Loc cit.
7. Hind, J R. 1878. "On the supposed discovery of a trans-Neptunian Planet at the US Naval Observatory in 1850", Smithson Misc Coll, vol 20, p20.
8. Radau, R. 1862. "Astronomie", Cosmos, vol 20, pp64–5.
9. Russell, F A R. 1876. "An intra-Mercurial Planet", Nature, vol 14, p505.
10. Anonymous, 1864. "Lescarbault's Planet?", Astron Reg, vol 2, p161.
11. Coumbray, M. 1865. L'Année Scient; see p16.
12. Trouvelet, M. 1885. "Report", L'Année Scient; v p8.
    Briguière, H. 1886. "Passage d'un essaim de corpuscles devant le soleil", L'Astron, p70.
13. Greg, R P. 1855. "Extracts of letters from R P Greg Esq to Prof Powell, dated Sep. 4th & 9th, 1854" Rep Brit Assoc Adv Sci, (Glasgow) p94.
14. Jenkins, B G. 1877. "The luminous Spot on Mercury in Transit", Mon Notes Roy Astron Soc, vol 38, pp337–340.
15. Roberts, C. 1892. "Venus", Engl Mech, vol 55, p239.
16. Barnard, E E. 1906. "An unexplained observation", Astron Nach, no:4106, p25.

17. Hopman, F. 1898 "On Dark Meteors" J Brit Astron Assoc, vol viii, p127–131.
18. Copeland, R. 1876–77. "On two flats on the Moon's limb", Mon Notes Roy Astron Soc Lond, vol 37, pp432–3.
19. Harris, F P. 1912. Pop Astron, vol 20, p398.
20. Herschel, W. 1792. "Miscellaneous Observations", Phil Trans Roy Soc Lond, vol 82, pp23–7.
21. Wilkins, W. 1794. "An account of an appearance of light like a star in the dark part of the Moon", Phil Trans Roy Soc, vol 84, pp429–431.
22. Fallows, F. 1821. "Communication of a curious appearance lately observed upon the Moon", Proc Roy Soc Lond, vol 2, p167.
23. Harrison, H H. 1884. Sidereal Messenger, vol 3, p150.
24. Goodacre, W. 1910. "The Eclipse of the Moon, 1910, Nov 16th", J Brit Astron Assoc, vol 21, pp99–101.
25. Lamey, C. 1877. "Correspondence", Comptes Rendu, vol 85, pp538–9.
26. Douglas, A E. 1895. "A cloud-like Spot on the Terminator of Mars", Astrophys J, vol i, pp127–130.
27. Waldner, H. 1872. "On Luminous Matter in the Atmosphere", Nature, vol 5, pp304–5.
28. Inglis, R. 1849. "Letter to Sir Robert H. Inglis, Bt, FRS, to Col Sabine, RA, Aug. 8, 1849", Rep Brit Assoc Adv Sci, (Birmingham) p17–18.
29. Read, W. 1851. "Miscellaneous. Letter from the Rev W Read, Vicarage, South Mimms", Mon Notes Roy Astron Soc, vol 11, p48.
30. Anonymous. 1880. "A Remarkable Phenomenon" Nature, vol 22, p64.
31. Schwedoff, T. 1882. "On the Origin of Hail", Rep Brit Assoc Adv Sci, p458.
32. Hoyle, F. 1990. Review of Clube and Napier (1990), Nature, vol 348, no6299, pp353–354; see p354.
33. Clube, V., and W Napier, 1990. The Cosmic Winter (Oxford), 307pp.
34. Jeans, J. 1945. The Stars in Their Courses (Cambridge), xii + 188pp.; see pp28, 30. (and very many other standard astronomical texts).
35. Neison, E. 1873. "Note on the possible existence of a Lunar Atmosphere", Mon Notes Roy Astron Soc, vol xxxiii, pp464–465.
    Neison, E. 1873a "On the Limit of a possible Lunar Atmosphere", Mon Notes Roy Astron Soc, vol iii, pp140–141.
36. Moore, P A. 1953. A Guide to the Moon (London), 222pp.
37. Espin, T H F. 1898. "A Remarkable Object in Perseus", Mon Notes Roy Astron Soc, vol 58, pp334–335.
38. Espin, T H F. 1898a. 'Reports', Journ Brit Astron Assoc, vol 8, p216.
39. Campbell Thompson, R. 1990. The Reports of the Magicians and Astrologers of Nineveh and Babylon in the British Museum, 2 vols. (London); see vol 1. reports 163 and 209 respectively.
40. Biot, R. 1846. "Catalogue Général des Étoiles Filantes et des Autres Météores observés en Chine après le VII^{e} siècle avant J.C." (Paris).
41. Bayer, J. 1603. Uranometria (Augsburg).
    Maddison, R E W. 1980. A Dictionary of Astronomy, ed. by V. Illingworth (London), 208pp; see p20.
42. Hevelius, J. 1671. "An Extract from a Letter, written to the Publisher by the excellent Johannes Hevelius, concerning his further observations of the New Star near the Beak of the Swan; to be compared with what was formerly published of the same account in Numb.65 and Numb.66", Phil Trans Roy Soc Lond, vol 6, no73 (July), pp2197-2002; see p2201.
43. Hevelius, J. 1671. Op cit, p2202.
44. Wolf, A. 1935. A History of Science, Technology, and Philosophy in the 16th. and 17th. Centuries, new edn ed by D McKie (London), xxviii + 692pp; see p187.
45. Hevelius, J. 1671. Op cit, p2201.
46. Lang, K R. 1992. Astrophysical Data: Planets and Stars, (New York), x + 937pp; see pp365, 368, 374.
    Evans, A. 1993. The Dusty Universe, (London), xii + 236pp; see p117.
47. Lofft, C. 1916. Month Mag, vol 42, p2.
48. Lee, S. 1919. Astr Jahrb, (Berlin), p263.
49. Campbell Thompson, R. 1990. Op cit, report 249.
50. Harrington, C R. (ed.). 1992. The Year Without a Summer: World Climate in 1816 (Ottawa), 576pp.
    Stothers, R B. 1984. "The Great Tambora Eruption of 1815 and its Aftermath", Science, vol 242, pp1191-1198.
    Phythian-Adams, W J. 1934. The Call of Israel (London), ix + 227pp.; see p165 – re: a year-long gloom in 1783.
    Pliny-the-Elder. Natural History, 10 vols; translated by H. Rackham (London, 1938); see vol 2, p30 – re: a year of continuous gloom during the Antonine War.
51. Richards, W J B. 1882. "Dark Limb of the Moon", Astron Reg, vol xxi, p18.
52. Haywood, 1884. 'Report', Siderial Messenger, vol iii, p252.
53. Proctor, R A. 1870. "Light Science for Leisure Hours" (London), viii + 316pp.
54. Gilliss, J M 1854. "The Total Eclipse of the Sun of November 30th, 1853", Astron J, vol 111, no19, pp145-146.
55. Ranyard, A C. 1873. "On a Remarkable Nebulous Spot upon the Sun's Disc by Pastorff, 1828, May 26th.", Mon Notes Roy Astron Soc, vol xxxiv, p26.
56. Anonymous. 1860. La Science pour Tous, vol 5, p264.
57. Perry, W H. 1888. "Local Storms", Mon Weather Rev, July, p173.
58. Anonymous. 1884. "Miscellaneous Phenomena", Mon Weather Rev, May, p134.
59. Anonymous. 1903. "The Great Dustfall of February 13th 1903", Symon's Meteorological Mag, vol xxxviii, March, pp21–24.
60. Clark, W. 1884. "Remarkable Sunsets": Letters, Nature, vol xxix, Jan, p252.
61. Dermott, S F., et al 1994. "A Circumsolar Ring of Asteroidal Dust in Resonant Lock with Earth", Nature, vol 369, pp719–723.
62. Evans, A. 1993. Op cit, p105.
63. Evans, A. 1993. Op cit, p117.

Appendix D
PHAETON'S SOURCE?

Recent studies of the Vela supernova, theorised as Phaeton's likely source on pages 209-210 suprá, demonstrate that its remnants – a radio and X-ray shell over 60 parsecs in diameter – comprise a tiny neutron star or pulsar (PRS 0833-45)[1] closely associated with the filamentary 'nebula' Stromlo 16[2], and that its radially expanded ejecta now occupy an impressive 4 to 5 degree of astronomical space[3].

A pulsar is a naturally pulsating radio star. A parsec is an astronomical unit of distance equivalent to slightly more than 3¼ light years[4]. Light travels at a prodigious 18,284 miles per second, or 11 million miles per minute, and therefore about 6 million million miles per year[5]. This last figure represents the distance involved in a single 'light'-year or parsec. Although to us such speeds and distances are virtually unimaginable, the are nevertheless authenticated facts.

Similarly, more distant filamentous 'nebulae', such as the Loop (NGC 6960) and Veil (NGC 6992-6995) examples in the constellation Cygnus, and the famous Crab 'nebula' (M.1) in Taurus[6], which exploded in A.D. 1054, constitute the scattered residue of other supernovae. Lethal masses of atomic hydrogen characterise one of the Cygnus shells[7], while the wisps and knot-like concentrations of disrupted astral matter in the Crab 'nebula' possess huge magnetic fields and emit intense electromagnetic radiation[8]. They are also known to be moving by as much as ⅒th of the speed of light[9]. Indeed, supernovae fragments can be expelled at speeds at least in the order of 10^4km.S^{-1}[10]

Analysis of all relevant data indicates that the average total mass ejected during supernovae detonations is equivalent to 1.4 solar masses[11], and, as they hurtle through interstellar space[12], retain their compact shapes over a 10^4 years period[13], provided they avoid resistant or perturbing phenomena. Relative to these factors, there is certainly no reason to suppose that the Vela paroxysm and resultant fragments differed significantly from this supernova norm.

Thus, even if travelling at only ⅒th the speed of light, supernovae ejecta velocities are still staggeringly great and ensure the traversal of vast tracts of interstellar space in comparatively short periods of time. Such enormous speeds would also tend dramatically to jeopardise the natural rotational and orbital speeds of lesser bodies encountered en route, not to mention their physical structures.

As far as is known, no comet, bolide, or asteroid possesses magnetic fields, emits electromagnetic radiation, or travels at the vertiginous speeds of supernovae ejecta. Yet, all surviving descriptions of Phaeton and its reported behaviour indicate that these corresponded closely to those of a highly dangerous, but thankfully small, supernova fragment initially catapulted supersonically towards, and eventually into, the Solar System from the far distant region now occupied by the Vela pulsar.

REFERENCES

1. Strom, R, H M Johnston, F Verbunt, and B Aschenbach. 1995. "A radio-emitting X-Ray "bullet" ejected by the Vela supernova", Nature, vol 373, no 6515, pp590–592; see p590.
2. Large, M T, A E Vaughan, and R Y Mills. 1968. "A Pulsar Supernova Association?", Nature, vol 220, no 5165, pp340–341; see p341.
3. Aschenbach, B, R Eggar, and J Trumper. 1995. "Discovery of Explosion Fragments outside the Vela supernova remnant shock-wave boundary", Nature, vol 373, no 6515, pp587–589.
4. Lang, K R. 1992. Astrophysical Data: Planets and Stars (New York), x + 937pp; see p9.
5. Jeans, J. 1946. The Universe Around Us, 4th edn. (Cambridge), x + 297pp.; see p20.
6. Lang, K R, and O Gingerich (eds) 1979. A Source Book in Astronomy and Astrophysics, 1900–1975 (Cambridge, Mass.), xx + 922pp; see pp492, 571, figs72.1 and 83.2.
7. Landecker, T L, R S Roger, and L A Higgs. 1980. "Atomic Hydrogen in a field of Cygnus X containing the supernova remnant G78.2+2.1", Astronomy and Astrophysics Supplement no:39, pp133–151.
8. Kafatos, M C, and R C B Henry (eds) 1985. "The Crab Nebula and Related Supernova Remnants" (New York).
9. Lang, K R, and O Gingerich (eds) 1979. Op cit, p494.
10. Strom, R, et al. 1995. Loc cit, p592.
11. Lang, K R, and O Gingerich (eds) 1979. Op cit, p385.
12. McKee, C R 1988. pp205–222 in "Supernovae Remnants and their Interstellar Medium", ed R S Roger and T L Landecker. IAU Colloq, 101 (Cambridge)
13. Strom, R, et al 1995. Ibid.

Appendix E
The Seven Suns

Seven spherical dots, globes, or 'stars' repeatedly feature on ancient Mesopotamian artefacts (eg Fig 4.11d on p216 suprá), as well as other relics from as far distant as Canaan[1], Hittite Syria[2], Cyprus[3], Persia[4], and pre-Columbian Peru[5]. They were obviously of great significance to the peoples who portrayed them. Always believed to have possessed 'astral' connotations, they appear in Near Eastern art as early as 'archaic' times[6].

Although invariably seven, their mode of presentation varies widely. Thus they appear as straight lines......., as triangles ⁖, as clusters .:::, ⁞:·, :::˙, ·:⁚:, or ·⁘·, as rosettes ⁙, unified along a stem ⁞, or as irregular scatter-patterns .··..:. Of these, the cluster and rosette arrangements are met with the most often.

They frequently occur peripheral to, or as integral elements in, depictions of mythological scenes – most commonly of great battles between heroic 'dieties' (Marduk/Phaeton), and a serpentine or winged 'dragon-monster' (Tiamat)[7]. This was evidently a very popular subject among the ancients. At least one instance is known showing the dots in cluster form adjacent to apparent widespread celestial derangement[8].

When shown as rosettes, they appear as six small globes equidistant round a larger central dot ('sun')[9]. Although several such examples feature in 'peaceful' scenes[10], others occur in association with a horned serpent or 'dragon'[11].

Frequently depicted as seven-headed[12], and as flaming or fiery[13], this serpent was anciently equated with the many-headed Hydra of classical mythology[14]. As a traditional emblem, it long predated even those accounts and was, earlier still, regularly identified with the 'dragons' of Tiamat[15]. Some accounts even identify Tiamat as the 'dragon', adding that it, too, was many-headed[16].

Interestingly, Revelation (12.3ff) records the Hebrew Leviathan, described elsewhere as a "crooked serpent" (Psalms, 74.14), as a seven-headed sea-monster[17]. Canaanite lore calls the same entity Yamm[18] or Mot[19], while Sumerian records refer to it as Kur. The latter add that it was eventually shattered into innumerable pieces[20].

Van Buren, admitting that the identification of the 7-dot emblem was "very difficult", noted that some thought it represented the Pleiades, the seven deified sage sons of Enmesarra, or the divine symbol of Sibitti[21]. Hayes Ward, while suggesting that the latter probably equated with the Igigi, also wondered if the emblem might represent Nergal, the ancient Mesopotamian 'god' of the Pleiades[22].

It is undoubtedly significant that the dates of certain religious festivals in India, Egypt, Australia, and Peru were determined from the annual Autumnal rising of the Pleiades star-group[23]. Interestingly, a still little-understood pre-Columbian script from Peru, featuring this same seven dot emblem, shows it alongside 11 dots (shades of Fig. 4. 11d) separated into adjoining groups of 5 and 6 dots by a serpentine figure, which may reasonably be interpreted as the abovementioned Hydra-like 'dragon'[24].

In that connection it is surely relevant that several ancient cylinder-seals depicting the Marduk (Phaeton)/Tiamat fight also show adjacent artistic devices featuring 11 elements. Examples include 11 small globes from Nineveh[25], 11 'petals' round a disc or sphere crowning a 'Tree-of-Life' symbol from Kish[26], one from Cyprus showing an 11-rayed 'Sun'[27], and another from Assyria depicting a 'deity' holding a circle composed of 11 small touching globes[28].

We hardly need to remind ourselves that the Deluge catastrophe, associated with the cosmic arrival of seven 'suns' or 'burning mountains', was widely remembered as a September (Autumnal) event in the northern hemisphere (see pp.161 and 173 suprá).

Did the Pleiades star-group, then, act among early peoples as a celestial marker for the time of the loss of a pre-Phaetonic 'Golden Age', or as that denoting when the dawn of a new one (the Holocene) began? Do not these curious sets of 7 and 11 dots confirm the broad validity of the Mesopotamian connection traced in Part Four, and are they not further un-expected but welcome aspects of the dramatic scenario unfolding before us?

REFERENCES

1. Gordon, C H 1941. The Living Past (New York), 232pp; see pp124f; seal 14.
2. Hayes Ward, W 1910. The Seal Cylinders of Western Asia, Carnegie Inst. (Washington), Publ no:100. xxxi + 428pp; see p282, fig 856; p287, fig 873; p288, fig 879.
3. Delaporte, L. 1909. Catalogue du musee Guimet: Cylindres Orientaux (Paris), xii + 140pp; see pl x, fig 141.
4. Hayes Ward, W. 1910. Op cit, p333, fig 1092.
5. Elworthy, F T. 1895. The Evil Eye: An account of this ancient and widespread superstition (London), xii + 471pp; see pp282, fig 126 (after C Wiener: 1880).
6. Van Buren, E D. 1939–1941. "The Seven Dots in Mesopotamian Art and Their Meaning", Archiv für Orientforschung, vol 13, pp277–289; see p277.
7. Ménant, J 1886. "Oriental Cylinders of the Williams Collection", Amer Journ Archaeol, vol 2, pp247–260; see pl vi, fig 9.
   Hayes Ward, W. 1910. Op cit, p199, fig 569; pp211-212, 241, 245, 384, etc.
8. Delaporte, L. 1909. Ibid.
9. Delaporte, L. 1909. Op cit, pl viii, fig 122.
   Hayes Ward, W. 1910. Op cit, p305, fig 956a; p316, fig 998.
10. Frankfort, H. 1955. Stratified Cylinder Seals from the Diyala Region (Chicago), xii + 78pp. + 96pls; see pl 20, fig 214; pl79, fig 851.
    Cesnola, L P di 882. Salaminia (London), xlviii + 329pp; see pl xii opp p120, no: 3; p129, fig 119.
    Moortgat, A. 1940 Vorderasiatische Rollseigel (Berlin), viii + 155pp + 91pls; see pl 82, figs 689–695.
11. Hayes Ward, W. 1910. Op cit, p267, fig 796.
12. Kramer, S N. (ed) 1961. Mythologies of the Ancient World (New York), 480pp; see p201.
    Black, J, and A Green. 1992. Gods, Demons, and Symbols of Ancient Mesopotamia (London), 192pp; see p165.
13. Frankfort, H. 1939. Cylinder Seals: a documentary essay on the Art and Religion of the Ancient Near East (London), xlvii + 328pp; see p72, fig 27; pl xxiii, fig j.
    Frankfort, H. 1955. Op cit, pl 45, fig 478.
    Pritchard, J B. (ed). 1955. The Ancient Near East in Pictures relating to the Old Testament", 2nd edn, with supplement (Princeton), xvi + 395pp; see p218, figs 691.
    Moortgat, A 1932. Die Bildende Kunst des Alten Orients und die Bergvölker (Berlin), 116pp + xcvi pls; see pl lxxxviii, fig 5; pl lxxxii.
14. Brown, R Jr 1899. Researches into the Origins of the Primitive Constellations of the Greeks, Phoenicians, and Babylonians, 2 vols. (London); see vol 1, p104.
15. Langdon, S H. 1923. The Enuma Elish: The Babylonian Epic of Creation (Oxford), 227pp; see p17. fig 1.
16. Bellamy, H S. 1936. Moons, Myths, and Man, (London), 351pp; see p214.
17. Gordon, C H. 1941. Op cit, p125.
18. Kramer, S N. (ed). 1961. Op cit, pp193–194.
19. Kramer, S N. (ed). 1961. Op cit, p200.
20. Kramer, S N. (ed). 1956. From the Tablets of Sumer. (Indian Hills, Colorado), xxvi + 293pp; see pp195–199.
21. Van Buren, E D. 1939–1941. Ibid.
    Black, J, and A Green. 1992. Op cit, p162.
22. Hayes Ward, W. 1910. Op cit, pp333, fig 1092; p365, fig 1255; p369, fig 1272; pp410–411.
    Black, J, and A Green. 1992. Op cit, p55.
23. Chant, C A 1928. Our Wonderful Universe (London), 191pp; see p160.
24. Elworthy, F T. 1895. Op cit, top right set of ideograms.
25. Ménant, J. 1886. Op cit, pl v, fig 8.
26. Langdon, S H. 1931. "Semitic Mythology", in H B Alexander (ed). The Mythology of All Races, 13 vols. (Boston); see vol v, p281, fig84.
    Hayes Ward, W 1910. Op cit, p202, fig 585.
27. Cesnola, L P di 1877. Cyprus: its ancient Cities, Tombs, and Temples (London), xx + 448pp; see pl xxxiii, no: 29.
28. Hayes Ward, W. 1910. Op cit, p201, fig 577.

Appendix F
NOTES

The following notes, designed to augment specific themes, are given here separately to avoid undue interruption of the main narrative. The relevant text page shown in bold.

1. John Harris (1876. Celestial Sphere and the Doctrine of the Earth's Perpendicular Axis (Montreal), 42pp.) also discussed this celestial change, which apparently affected the original location of the 4 cardinal points. Persian records state that in remotely early times these were marked in the heavens by 4 'zodiacal' stars – those, representing the two equinoxes, being the Eye of the Bull (Taurus) and the Heart of the Scorpion (Scorpio) and those the solstices the Head of the Lion (Leo) and the Southern Fish (Pisces) (Bailly, J S 1787. Traite de l'Astronomie Indienne et Orientale (Paris), clxxx + 427pp; v p13). These stars no longer coincide with today's cardinal points.
   Also relevant are the remarks of Dupuis, Maurice and other early writers that, as the zodiacal constellation of Libra shows indications of formerly being a Spring equinoctial sign and Aries an Autumnal one, the precession of the equinoxes has, since the invention of the zodiac either moved progressively, or by some sudden jolt, forwards by 7 zodiacal signs.
   See pp191 and 197 suprá for other important zodiacal or allied changes. (p. 15)

2. Other factors were also involved. For example, long and deep fiords (reviewed again on p35 suprá), are often regarded as glacial (ice-sculpted) features. Much time believedly elapsed while slow-acting ice allegedly excavated them. The duration of the Pleistoceue epoch was accordingly extended to accommodate such a process. (p. 25)

3. Pacific territories submerged geologically recently include those once unifying Australia and New Guinea, and the latter with Melanesia and Micronesia as far North as the Caroline Islands (Van Andel, T H, G R Heath, T C Moore, and D R F McGeary. 1961. "Late Quaternary History, Climate and Oceanography of the Timor Sea, Northwestern Australia", Amer J Sci, vol 265, pp737–758; Krausse, D S 1965. "Submarine Geology North of New Guinea", Bull Geol Soc Amer, vol 76, pp27–42; Bloom, A. 1969. "Holocene submergence in Micronesia as the standard for Eustatic sea-level changes", Quaternaria (Paris), vol xii (1970). (p. 90)
4. Natural effects inferable from a supposed near or actual collision between Earth and a large cosmic object include atmospheric ignition, when fire would fill the "whole space between sky and Earth" (Zahule, K J 1990. "Atmospheric Chemistry by large Impacts", Spec Papers Geol Soc Amer, vol 247, pp271–288; see p282).
   This effect, discussed as early as 1931 (Walk, L. 1931. "Das Flut-geschwisterpaar als Ur- und Stammelternpaar der Menschheit". Mitt. Österr. Ges. Anthrop. Ethnol. Prähist, vol 78–79, pp60–115), is best expressed as wildfire. Ovid's account was thus no exaggeration. (p. 152)

5. As given below, Aldi's earlier translation of the same passage contains differences, as seen later (see p295 suprá), of some significance.
   "A comet of a most terrible aspect, wreathed in spiral volumes, and resembling a knot, or cluster of fire, in the most early periods of the world, appeared in Egypt and Aethiopia, which . . . the king then reigning in Egypt denominated Typhon: and because Plutarch affirms that the ocean was called Typhon, an argument has been deduced from thence, that this comet was the occasion of the deluge." (Pliny: Nat. Hist., Lib. 2, cap. 25, p14 – Aldi ed, 1559)
   Compare the 'spiral wreathing' of this account with the "swirling as a whirlwind" of the Babylonian epic (see p.222 suprá). The concept of Phaeton being a twisting or spiralling object obviously far antedated Roman times. (p. 152)
   Up to the time of Seneca comets had, on the authority of Aristotle and other classical philosophers, been regarded simply as "sublunary vapours floating in the aether". Seneca, the first to study comets as true cosmic objects, did not consider Typhon as a star or a normal celestial body but as something different. Like Pliny, he described it as a great knot of fire. (Halley, E. "Synopsis" at end of "Elements of Physical and Geometrical Astronomy" in Halley's Oxford lectures edited by J. Kersey (Oxford), 1717).

6. Earth presently rotates West to East. Modern studies of Phaeton's apparent flightpath suggest it ran, contrarily, southeast to northwest (Tollmann, A and E Tollmann. 1993. Und die Sintflut gab es doch (München), 560pp; v 210) – interestingly the predominant direction of the aforementioned glacial striae (see p9 suprá). (p. 154)

7. That dry land recently occupied extensive areas now below Pacific waters (see Note 3) tends to counterbalance such doubts. (p. 156)

8. Some North American accounts state that this protracted 'night' fell so swiftly that the Flood, arising soon afterwards, poured across the land amid intense gloom (Boehmer, J. 1932. "Tellürische Trümmerstucke im Fluthericht der Genesis", Zeit. fur Alttestamental. Wiss., vol 50, pp117–124). (p. 159)

9. Inevitably the semi-permanent darkness, largely created by chronic atmospheric pollution itself induced by widespread volcanism (but also see data on the 'dust ring' given in Appendix C), led to radically reduced temperatures and the onset of cold conditions. As several traditions record, the magnetic storms naturally generated by this pollution quickly engendered excessive and persistent rainfall. Some accounts describe this as hot or boiling (Lücken, H. 1956 Die Traditionen des Menschengeschichte order die Uroffenbarung Gottes unter den Heiden (Münster), 483pp; v. p185), a phenomenon more recently explained by the aerodynamicist S K Croft ("First-Order Estmates of Shock Heating and Vaporisation in Oceanic Impacts", Spec Papers Geol Soc Amer, vol 190 (1982), pp143–152; v p150). (p. 160)

10. The low temperatures at numerous places ensured early conversion of rains into snow and ice. Effects varied locally. German accounts record the resultant snowfalls lasting for three whole years (Derolez, R L M 1976. Götter und Mythen der Germanen (Weisbaden), 334pp; v p286), while in Iran the bleak conditions permitted no more than two months of 'summer' for several decades (Rhode, J G 1819. Ueber den Aufung unserer Geschichte und die leizie Revolution der Erde als wahrscheinliche Wirkung eines Kometen (Breslau), 78pp; v p21). (p. 161)

11. Several Deluge traditions independently confirm this conclusion. In the northern hemisphere, for example, both the Babylonian historian Berosus (Stentzel, A. 1894. Weltschöpfung Sintfluth und Goll (Braunschweig), 183pp; v pp137f) and the Canadian Chippeywayan Indians (Andree, R. 1891. Die Flutsagen, ethnographisch betrachtet (Braunschweig), 152pp; v p82) date the Deluge as a September event. Appropriately, the Yamana Indians of Tierra del Fuego in the southern hemisphere remember it as a Springtime occurrence (Tollmann, A., and E. Tollmann. 1993. Op cit, p211). As noted on p161 suprá, Autumn in one hemisphere, is Spring in the other. (p. 173)

12. A literal turning over of the Earth, while difficult to conceive mechanically, might well explain those early beliefs, repeatedly discussed since classical times through George Costard (A Further Account of the Rise and Progress of Astronomy among the Ancients (London: 1748), 163pp; v p8) to Immanuel Velikovsky (Worlds in Collision (London: 1950), 384pp; see pp83, 112–130), which insisted that the stars have changed their courses 4 times and the Sun has twice set in the East since the creation of Man. (p. 191)

13. The oldest Chaldean solar zodiacs, which date from 5,000 or more years ago, show only 11 signs, the space now occupied by Libra (The Scales) being taken up by Scorpio's claws (Costard, G. 1748. Op cit p 10). The ancients preserved the traditional connections between these constellations when they referred to them as Chelae Scorpionis (Maurice, T. 1820. History of Hindustan, 2nd ed, 2 vols, (London); see vol 1, pp291, 298).
The dynastic Egyptians regarded the Scorpion (Scorpio) as the mortal enemy of their god Osiris, who was avenged by his son Horus (Graves, R. 1960. The Greek Myths, rev edn, 2 vols, (London); see vol 1, p153: Mackenzie, D A c 1918. Myths of Crete and pre-Hellenic Europe, (London), liv + 361pp; see pxxx), and knew it as Typhon (see p152 suprá). Similarly, classical Greek lore makes the Scorpion the adversary of the heroic hunter Orion, the archer-god Apollo fulfilling Horus's avenging role. Constellationally, the first stars of Scorpio rise annually as the last of Orion set, in direct allusion to this astronomical mythology.
Intimations also exist that the earlier Sumerians and Babylonians knew Orion as Gilgamesh-the-hunter (Graves, R. 1960. Ibid: Sandars, N K 1972. The Epic of Gilgamesh, rev edn, (London), 128pp; see p21), and that both were at least partly identical with antiquity's foremost hero Hercules (Herakles) (Graves, R. 1960. Op cit, vol 1, p153, vol 2, p142).
In Ovid's "Metamorphoses" (Lib 1, p438) Apollo vanquishes the monstrous Python (Typhon) at the time of Deucalion's Flood (see pp152–153 suprá) with special arrows, thereby partially paralleling the equivalent account in the Norse Eddas. As seen in Appendix E, Typhon (Phaeton) was often equated with the multi-headed Hydra, traditionally slain by Hercules. Germane, then, are the many ancient Mesopotamian cylinder seals depicting such a creature battling one or more arrow-shooting figures, the chief of whom is frequently identified as Marduk (Hayes Ward, W. 1910. Seal Cylinders of Western Asia, Carnegie Inst., Publ. 100, xxxi + 428pp.; see figs 187b, 563–580, 584–585). As well as being another link in the 'Mesopotamian Connection', it is also surely significant that the zodiacal sign next to Scorpio is Sagittarius-the Archer!
Libra was thus not an original zodiacal sign, but added only after Phaeton's visit, when the new (post-diluvian) celestial order was determined. (p. 197)

14. Recent observations of the speed of a post-explosion X-ray jet from the Vela supernova indicate that it is as high as 540km.S^{-1} (Markwardt, C B, and H Ögelman. 1995. "An X-Ray jet from the Vela pulsar", Nature, vol 375, no: 6526, pp40–41) and that the original explosion possibly occurred a little earlier than first calculated (Lyne, A G, R S Pritchard, F Graham-Smith, and F Camilo. 1996, "Very Low Breaking Index for the Vela pulsar", Nature, vol 381, no: 6582, pp497–498). Either way such data is consistent with the scenario advanced here. (p. 210)

15. That it was given a tail described as stretching "far along the zodiac" (Rhode, J G 1819. Op cit, p19) localises Tristrya's course as watched from Earth. Significantly, when traversing the zodiacal sign of Capricorn, it was, under one of its Mesopotamian titles, Zalbatānu, described as the "star that abounds in death" (Langdon, S. 1935. Babylonian Menologies and their Semitic Calendars, Schweich Lectures, Brit Acad Lond, vi + 169pp; see p8). Although now greatly fragmented, memories of this calamitous object are strikingly consistent. (p. 211)

16. Several accounts from India mention the approach of many "terrible suns" (Hochenberger, A. 1930. Die Indische Flutsage und das Matsayapurana, (Leipzig), 217pp; v 21); the Hebrew 'Henoch' refers to seven invading 'stars', each resembling a "burning mountain" (Roloff, J 1984. Die Ofenbarung Johannes: Zürcher Bibelkommentare, N. T., 18 Theol Ver, Zurich, 218pp; v 99); and Peruvian traditions occur that speak of six 'suns' which, assaulting Earth, caused the Deluge (Lenormant, F. 1889. Les Origines de l'Histoire, 5 vols (Paris); see vol 5, pp16–17). (also see p12 suprá). (p. 212)

17. This was doubtless a result of the raging 'wildfire' engendered by the 'atmospheric ignition' mentioned in Note 4. Such effects should also be considered in conjunction with those of the 'Firestorm' detailed on pp269–276 suprá. (p. 262)

18. Babylonian records refer to the rains of mud and 'grains' (sand) which fell during the evening before the arrival of the Wormwood Star and the 'burning mountain' (Schott, A 1984. "Das Gilgamesch Epos", ed by W von Soden. Reclam Universal Bibliothek 7235/2, 127pp; see p96). (p. 290)

19. Strangely enough, this remarkable scenario is actually recorded on early Sumerian clay tablets: there, Marduk/Phaeton is called Kur – "a monstrous dragon which held Tehom's (Earth's) waters in check" (Kramer, S H 1056. From the Tablets of Sumer (Indian Hills, Colorado), xxvi + 293pp; see p195).
    What early people, even a race as comparatively advanced as the Sumerians, could have imagined an event as aberrant as this had it not really taken place? (p. 302)

20. The Meskito Indians of Nicaragua preserve similar memories of the Flood which, they aver, was brought by a tremendous hurricane as a giant wave, so high that it submerged and swept away all things (Scrope Viner, H. W. 1928. "Primitive Beliefs of Nicaraguan Indians", Folklore, vol 39, pp166–171; v pp166–7). (p. 304)

21. It would be reasonable to suppose that the transportation and deposition of the enormous erratic boulders of unknown origin decorating northern Greenland and Grant Land (Ellesmere Island) in Arctic Canada, was effected by precisely similar agencies (Markham, C R 1906. "On the Next Great Arctic Discovery, the Beaufort Sea", Geogr J, vol 27, pp1–14). (p. 308)

22. The marine character of these now 'high-altitude' remains was reinforced in 1911 by Bessel's discovery of a subfossilised Narwhal whale's skeleton at a height of 1,250 feet (380 metres) above present sea-level on Bylot Island to the North of Baffin Island (Bird, J B 1966. The Physiography of Arctic Canada (John Hopkins Univ. Press), xix + 336pp; see pp122–123). (p.310)

Appendix G LIST OF BIBLIOGRAPHIC CONTRACTIONS

Actes 4th Congr Int Quat	Acts of the 4th Int'l Congress on the Quaternary.
Akad Nauk USSR Sibirskoye Otdeleniye, Inst Vulkanologii, Izdatef	Akademiya Nauk USSR Sibirskoye Otdeleniye, Instituta Vulkanologii, imeni Izdatef.
Akad Savet FNRJ Bull Sci	Scientific Bul of the Savet Acad, Yugoslavia.
Amer Anthrop	Amer Anthropologist.
Amer Antiq	Amer Antiquity.
Amer Antiq Orient Journ	Amer Antiquarian and Oriental Journal.
Amer Assoc Petrol Geol	Amer Assoc of Petroleum Geologists.
Amer Geogr Soc Res	Amer Geogr Soc Resume.
Amer Geol	Amer Geologist.
Amer J Sci	Amer J of Sci.
Amer J Sci Art	Amer J of Sci and Arts.
Amer Mus Nat Hist	Amer Mus Natural History, New York.
An Serv Geol Nacl El Salvador	Anales del Service Geológico Nacionales, El Salvador.
Ann Carnegie Mus	Ann of the Carnegie Mus, Pittsburgh.
Ann Géogr Paris	Ann de Géographie, Paris.
Ann Mus Zool St Petersburg	Ann of the Mus of Zoology, St Petersburg.
Ann Paléont	Ann de Paléontologie, Paris.
Ann Rep Dept Mines, NSW	Ann Rep of the Dept of Mines, New South Wales.
Ann Rep Smithson Inst	Ann Rep of the Smithsonian Inst, Philadelphia.
Ann Sci	Ann of Sci.
Ann Sci Dig	Ann Sci Digest.
Ann Sci Indust	Ann de Sci et l'Industrie.
Annln Phys	Anna de Physik, Leipzig.
Annls Soc Linn Lyon	Ann de la Soc Linnéenne de Lyon.
Annls Sci Nat Paris	Ann des Sci Naturelles, Paris.
Annls Scient Univ Besancon	Ann Scientifiques de l'Université de Besancon.
Archaeol Inst Amer.	Archaeological Inst of Amer.
Arch Mus Nat Hist Lyon	Archives du Muséum d'Histoire Naturelle de Lyon.
Arch Naturgesch	Archiv für Naturgeschichte, Berlin.
Arch Wiss Kunde Russ	Archiv für Wissenschaftliche Kunde von Russland, Berlin.
Astr Astrophys	Astronomy and Astrophysics.
Astron J	Astronomical J.
Astron Nach	Astronomical Nachrichten.
Astron Reg	Astronomical Register.
Astrophys Journ	Astrophysical J.
Atlantic Coast Plain Geol Assoc Guidebook	Atlantic Coast Plain Geological Association Guidebook.
Atti Mus Civ Stor Nat Trieste	Atti del Museo Civico do Storia Naturale di Trieste.
Aust J Earth Sci	Aust J of Earth Sci.
Aust J Phys	Aust J of Physics.
Beitr Kennt Russ Reichs	Beiträge zur Kenntniss de Russischen Reiches und die Angränzenden Lander Asiens, St Petersburg
Ber Offenbach Ver f Naturkunde	Bericht über die Tätigkeit des Offenbach Vereins für Naturkunde.
Ber Sächsischen Akad d Wis Phil Hist Klasse	Bericht der Sächsischen Akademischen der Wissenschaftliche der Philosophie und Historischen Klasse.
Bot Rev Lond	Botanical Rev, London.
Brit Journ Hist Sci	Brit J for the History of Sci.
Bull Amer Assoc Petrol Geol	Bull of the Amer Assoc of Petroleum Geologists, Chicago.
Bull Astron Inst Czch	Bull of the Astron Inst of Czechoslovakia.
Bull Canadian Petroleum Geol	Bull of Canadian Petroleum Geology, Calgary.
Bull Comm Geol Finland	Bull of the Geol Commission of Finland.
Bull Geol Soc Amer	Bull of the Geol Soc of America.
Bull Geol Soc China	Bull of the Geol Soc of China.
Bull Geol Soc Fr	Bull of the Geol Soc of France.
Bull Im Acad Sci St Petersburg	Bull of the Imperial Acad of Sci, St Petersburg.
Bull Inst Oceanogr	Bull of the Inst of Oceanography, Monaco.
Bull Internat de l'Acad des Sci de Cracovie	Bull Int'l de l'Acad des Sciences et des Lettres de Cracovie, Poland.
Bull l'Acad St Petersburg	Bull de l'Acad de St Petersburg.
Bull Mus Anthrop Prehist Monaco	Bull du Mus Anthropologie Prehistorique de Monaco.
Bull Mus Comp Zool	Bull of the Mus of Comparative Zoology, Cambridge, MA.
Bull NY St Mus	Bull of the New York State Mus.
Bull Scient Cons Acad RSF Youg	Bull Scientifique, Conseil des Acad de la RSF de Yougoslavie, Zagreb.
Bull Soc Climat Algér	Bull de la Soc de Climatologie Algérienne.
Bull Soc Hist Nat Afr N	Bull de la Soc d'Histoire Naturelle de l'Afrique du Nord, Algiers.
Bull Soc Hist Nat Toulouse	Bull de la Soc d'Histoire Naturelle de Toulouse.
Bull Soc Nat Moscou	Bull de la Soc des Naturalistes de Moscou.
Bull Soc Zool Fr	Bull de la Soc Zoologique de France, Paris.
Bull US Geol Surv	Bull of the US Geol Surv, Washington.
Bull US Natl Mus	Bull of the United States National Mus, Washington DC.
Bull Vulcanologique	Bull Vulcanologique, Bruxelles.
Canad Jl Earth Sci	Canadian J of Earth Sciences, Ottawa.
Contemp Rev.	Contemporary Rev.
Congr Geol Internat	Inter'l Geol Congress.
Contrib Palaeont Carnegie Inst	Contributions to Palaeontology, Carnegie Inst.
C R Acad Sci Paris	Compte Rendue de l'Acad des Sci, Paris.
C R de la Soc Geol de Finlande	Compte Rendu de la Soc Geol de Finlande.
C R Int Con Zool Monaco	Compte Rendue de la Conferance Int'l de Zoologie, Monaco.
C R Soc Sci Lett Pologne	Compte Rendu de la Soc des Sci et des Lettres de Pologne.
Earth & Planetary Sci Letts	Earth and Planetary Science Letters, Amsterdam.
Edinb New Phil J	Edinburgh New Philosophical J.
Engl Mech	English Mechanic.
Erlanger Forsch	Erlanger Forschungen, Erlangen, Reihe B, Nuturwissenschaften.
Essex Nat	Essex Naturalist.
Folia Quatern	Folia Quaternaria.
Geofisica Internat	Geofisica Internationaler.
Geogr J	Geog J.
Geogr Rev	Geog Rev.
Geol Mag	Geol Mag.
Geol Mijnbouw	Geol Mijnbouw.
Geol Soc Amer Spec Paper	Geol Soc of Amer, Special Paper.
Geophys J	Geophysical J, London.
Geophys J Roy Astr Soc	Geophysical J of the Royal Astronomical Soc, London.
Geophys Res Letts	Geophysical Research Letters.
Gesamtinhaltsverz Wiss Zn Univ Hochsch DDR	Gesamtinhaltsverzeichnis der Wissenschaftlichen Zeitschriften de Universitäten und Hochschulen der Deutschen Demokratischen Republik.
Hist Sci	History of Sci.
Illinois Geol Surv Circ	Illinois Geol Sur Circular.
Indian Sci Cong	Indian Scientific Congress.
Inst Geol Soc Lond, Min	Minutes of the Inst of the Geol Soc of London.
Int Congr Prehist Archaeol	Inter'l Congress of Anthropology and Prehistoric Archaeology.
Irish Astron	Irish Astronomy.
J Amer Folk	J of Amer Folklore.
J Amer Orient Soc	J of the Amer Oriental Soc.
J Anthrop Inst	J of the Anthropological Inst, London.
J Atmosph Sci	J of Atmospheric Sci.
J Brit Astron Assoc	J of the Brit Astronomical Assoc.
J Geophys Res.	Journal of Geophysical Research.
J Hist Astr	J of the History of Astronomy.

J Mammal	J of Mammology, Baltimore.
J Palaeont	J of Palaeontology.
J Phys	J of Physics.
J Proc Roy Soc NSW	J and Proc of the Royal Soc of New South Wales.
Jb K-K Geol Reichsanst Wien	Jahrbuch der Kaiserlich-Königlichen Geol Reichsanstalt, Wien.
Journ Egypt Archaeology	J of Egyptian Archaeology.
Journ Geol	J of Geology.
Journ Geol Soc Lond	J of the Geol Soc of London.
Journ Roy Geogr Soc Lond	J of the Royal Geog Soc of London.
Journ Trans Vict Inst Lond	J and Trans of Victoria Inst of London.
K Dansk Vidensk Selsk Skr	Kongelige Danske Videnskabernes Selskabs Skrifter, Copenhagen.
L'Année Scient	L'Années Scientifiques.
L'Astron	L'Astronomie.
Matér Hist Prim Homme	Matériaux pour l'Histoire Positive et Philosophique (Primitive et Naturelle) de l'Homme, Paris.
Mem Acad Sci Lett Montpellier	Mem dl l'Acad des Sci et Belles-Lettres de Montpellier.
Mem Asia Soc Bengal	Mem of the Asiatic Soc of Bengal.
Mem Geol Surv Amer	Mem of the Geol Surv of America.
Mem Geol Surv Engl & Wales	Memof the Geol Surv of England & Wales.
Mem Geol Surv India	Mem of the Geol Surv of India.
Mem Mus Civ Stor Nat Verona	Mem del Museo Civico de Storia Naturale di Verona.
Mem Soc Géol Fr	Mem de la Soc Géol de France.
Mem Soc Hist Nat Paris	Mem de la Soc d'Histoire Naturelle de Paris.
Mem Univ California	Mem of the Univ of Cal, Berkeley.
Mitt Naturw ver Steiern	Mitteilungen der Naturwissenschaftlichen Vereins für Steiermark, Graz.
Mon Nots Roy Astron Soc	Monthly Notices of the Royal Astronomical Soc.
Monogr Ser	Monograph Series.
Mon Weather Rev	Monthly Weather Rev.
Nachbl dt Malakozool Ges	Nachrichtsblatt der Deutschen Malakozoologischen Gesellschaft, Frankfurt.
NASA Sp Publ	NASA Space Publications.
Nat Geogr Mag	National Geog Mag.
Ned Akad Wet Versl	Nederlandsch Akademisch Wetenschappelijke Verslagen.
NW Nat	North Western Naturalist, Arbroath, Scotland.
NY Lyceum Nat Hist	New York Lyceum of Natural History.
Ohio J Sci	Ohio J of Sci.
Öst Staats Wien	Österreichische Staatanstalt, Wien.
Overseas Geol Surv Min Resour Divn	Overseas Geol Sur and Mineral Resources Division.
Palaeogeogr Palaeoclimat Palaeoecol	Palaeogreography, Palaeoclimatology, Palaeoecology.
Phil Mag	Philosophical Mag.
Phil Trans Roy Soc Lond	Philosophical Trans of the Royal Soc of London.
Pop Astron	Popular Astronomy.
Pop Sci Mon	Popular Sci Monthly.
Pop Sci Rev	Popular Sci Rev.
Proc Acad Nat Sci Philad	Proc of the Acad of Natural Sci, Philadelphia.
Proc Acad Sci Lett Montpellier	Proc de l'Acad'e des Sci et Belles-Lettres de Montpellier.
Proc Amer Philos Soc	Proc of the Amer Philosophical Soc.
Proc Berlin Acad	Proc of the Berlin Acad.
Proc Boston Sci Nat Hist	Proc of the Boston Soc of Natural Hist.
Proc Brit Acad	Proc of the British Academy.
Proc Dorset Nat Hist Archaeol Soc	Proc of the Dorset Natural History and Archaeological Soc.
Proc Geol Assoc	Proc of the Geologists' Assoc, London.
Proc Geol Soc Lond	Proc of the Geol Soc of London.
Proc Imp Acad Japan	Proc of Imperial Acad of Japan, Tokyo.
Proc Internat Symp Tsunamis & Ts Res	Proc of the Inter'l Symposium on Tsunamis & Tsunami Research.
Proc Roy Geogr Soc Lond	Proc of the Royal Geog Soc of London.
Proc Roy Irish Acad	Proc of the Royal Irish Acad, Dublin.
Proc US Natl Acad Sci	Proc of the US National Acad of Sci.
Proc Yorks Geol Soc	Proc of the Yorkshire Geol Soc.
Proc Zool Soc Lond	Proc of the Zoological Soc of London.
Prof Papers Geol Surv India	Professional Papers of the Geol Survey of India.
Publ Carnegie Inst	Publications of the Carnegie Inst, Pittsburgh.
Q Jl Geol Soc Lond	Q J of the Geol Soc of London.
Q Jl Lit Sci Arts Lond	Q J of Literature, Science and Arts, London.
Q Rev	Quaternary Rev.
Quat Res	Quaternary Research.
Quat Sci Rev	Quaternary Scie Rev.
Rep Brit Assoc Adv Sci	Rep of the Brit Assoc for the Advancement of Sci.
Rep Bur Amer Ethnol	Rep of the Bureau of Amer Ethnology, Washington DC.
Rep Inst Polar Stud	Rep of the Inst of Polar Studies.
Rep Smithsonian Inst	Rep of the Smithsonian Inst, Washington DC.
Rev de l'Histoire des Religions	Rev de l'Histoire des Religions, Paris.
Rev Palaeobot Palynol	Rev of Palaeobotany and Palynology.
Rev Sci Nat Montpellier	Rev des Sci Naturelle, Montpellier.
Sber Heidelb Akad Wiss Math	Sber die Heidelberg Akad für Wissenschaftlichen und Mathematik.
Sber Preuss Akad Wiss	Sber die Preussischen Akad der Wissenschaften.
Scient Amer	Scientific Amer.
Sci Dig	Sci Digest.
Sci News	Sci News.
Scient Mon	Scientific Monthly, London.
Sida	Sida Contributions to Botany, Dallas.
Slov Akad Znan Umetn Razr Priorod Vede Razr Jugosl	Slovenska Akad Znanosti in Umetnosti, Razprave Prirodslovnega Vede, Razprave, Jugoslavia.
Smithson Contb Knowl	Smithsonian Contributions to Knowledge, Washington DC.
Smithson Misc Coll	Smithsonian Miscellaneous Collections, Washington DC.
S Afr J Sci	South African J of Sci, Cape Town.
Sov Geogr	Soviet Geography.
Stanford Univ Publ Geol Sci	Stanford Univ Publications, Geol Sci.
Tidsskr Pop Fremst Naturv	Tidsskrift for Populaere Fremstillinger af Naturvidenskoben, Copenhagen.
Trans Amer Geophys Union	Trans of the Amer Geophysical Union, Washington DC.
Trans Chicago Acad Sci	Trans of the Chicago Acad of Sci.
Trans Edinb Geol Soc	Trans of the Edinburgh Geol Soc.
Trans Linn Soc Lond	Trans of the Linnaean Soc of London.
Trans Manch Geol Soc	Trans of the Manchester Geol Soc.
Trans New Zeal Inst	Trans of the New Zealand Inst.
Trans Norfolk Norwich Nat Hist Soc	Trans of the Norfolk and Norwich Natural History Soc.
Trans Roy Soc Edinb	Trans of the Royal Soc of Edinburgh.
Trans Roy Soc New Zeal	Trans of the Royal Soc of New Zealand.
Trans Roy Soc Tasmania	Trans of the Royal Soc of Tasmania.
Trans Wiscon Acad Sci Arts Lett	Trans of the Wisconsin Acad of Sci, Arts and Letters.
Trans Zool Soc Lond	Trans of the Zoological Soc of London.
Uchen Zap Leningr Gos Ped Inst A I Gercen	Uchenye Zapiski Leningradskogo Gosudarstvennogo Pedologiskiy Inst, A I Gercen.
Univ Okla Soc Sci Bull	Univ of Oklahoma Soc's Science Bull.
US Geol Surv Prof Paper	United States Geol Surv Professional Paper.
US Geol Surv Water Supply Paper	United States Geol Surv Water Supply Paper.
US Geol Survey Mon	United States Geol Surv Monograph.
Verh Geol Reichsanst	Verhandlungen der Geol Reichsanstalt.
Z dt Geol Ges	Zeitschrift der Deutschen Geol Gesellschaft.
Zeit Ges Erdk Berlin	Zeitschrift der Gesellschaft für Erdkunde zu Berlin.
Zool Zh	Zoologischeskii Zhurnal, Moscow.

Abbreviations

Acad = Academy
Amer = American
Ann = Annals
Assoc = Association
Astron = Antronomical
Aust = Australian
Brit = British
Bull = Bulletin
Geog = Geographical Geol = Geological
Inst = Institute
Int'l - International
J = Journal
Mag = Magazine
Mem = Memoirs
Mus = Museum
Proc = Proceedings
Rep = Report
Rev = Review
Sci = Science
Soc = Society
Surv = Survey
Trans = Transactions
Univ = University

INDEX

acorns 63, 310
Acton (London) 295
Adam and Eve 3, 332
Adams, Dr Leith 107
adiantum reniforme 87, 90
Aegean continent 101
Aenocyon 118
aepyornis 103
Aerolithes 201
Africa 33, 35, 96, 101, 242
African Rift Valley (see Great Rift Valley)
African tribes 256
Africanus, Julius 4
Africo-Brazilian continent 87, 89, 102
Agadir 263
Agassiz's glacial (ice age) hypothesis 119
Agassiz, Louis 23, 66
Age of Darkness 256
Ages 3
Agricultural terraces 334
ague-trefoil 84
Ahaggar (Hoggar) 28
Ahriman 212
Airy, Sir George 191
Akawais 159
Akkadian text 214, 219
Alabama 309
Alaska 16, 39, 57, 60, 94, 127, 170, 171, 255, 283, 292, 296, 305, 309
Alberta 91, 264, 308
alder 309, 310–1
Aleutian island 58, 70s
Alexandria 244
algae 59
Algeria 86, 99, 109
Algonquin legends 293
Allerod (interglacial) 43
Alpine flora 85
Alpine region 84
Alps 25, 42, 85, 183, 187, 265, 308
Altai mountains 26, 114, 308, 310
aluminium 296
aluminium-26 209, 210, 296
Amazon 91
Amerindian legends 304
Amor asteroid group 206 amphibians 100
amphicoma 99
Anatolia 101
Anaxagoras 14, 15
Anaximander 12
Anaximenes 12, 14, 15 ancient people and traditions 101, 303
Andaman Islanders 3, 191
Andes 30, 183, 308, 334
Andrews, Prof 46
anergetes 97
Anjou, Lt 310
Annam 328
annelids 96
Anshar 222
Antarctica 39, 53, 55, 174
antediluvian geography 242 antelope 125
Antillean landmass 96
ants 97
Anu 217, 222
Apatak Island 288
Aphrodite 229
Apocalypse of Thomas 294, 303
Apollo asteroid family 206
Apollodorus 13, 152
Apollonius Rhodius 155, 212
Apollonius the Egyptian 7, 15
Appalachia 32, 86, 98, 192
Appalachians 268
Appleton 171
apteryx 103
Arabia 13
Aral Sea 104
archidiskodon meridionalis 109
Arctic 60, 84, 92, 170, 172, 187, 297, 309, 310, 312
Arctic Circle 312
Arctic Ocean 292
Arctic plants 84, 87
Ardmarnoch, Scotland 213–4
Arendt-Rigaux comet 206
Ares (Mars) 225, 229
arianta arbustorum 97
Aristarchus of Samos 12, 196, 215
Arizona 268, 304
Arkell, Dr 309
arks 291, 328
armadillos 57
artefacts 334
Asama volcano 258
ash 271, 277, 298
Asia 26, 56, 114, 157, 267
Asia Minor 99, 291
asphalt, asphalt lakes and tar-seeps 59, 130, 203 Assam 242
astarte borealis 98
asteroid belt 205
asteroids 175, 198, 206, 208, 210
astronomers 19
astronomy 215
Atanekerdluk 248
Atlantic Ocean 43, 87, 96, 98, 156, 242, 244, 269, 299
Atlantis, Atlantean continent 14, 86, 156, 173, 225, 227, 242
Atlas mountains 28, 225, 227, 242, 293
atmosphere 38, 178, 256, 262, 269 atmospheric changes 178, 190 atmospheric cooling 38 atmospheric temperatures 258
Atra-Hasis 330
Augustine 4
Australasia 27, 56, 89, 100
Australia 90, 99, 102, 103, 115
Austria 114
avalanches 263–4
Avatdleq 248
Avesta 277
Avienus 211
axial changes 15, 189
axial rotation, spin 254
axial shifts 63, 182, 191, 204, 208, 252 axial tilt 38, 68, 153, 176, 191, 302, 340 axial wobbles 183, 186, 253 axis of inertia 190
axis of rotation 189, 191
Aymara Indians 315
Azhidhaka 212
Azores 31, 32, 87, 95, 97
Aztecs 13, 159, 227, 331

Babcock 156, 244
Babylonian epic 153, 225, 262, 289, 315
Babylonian Talmud 277
Babylon, Babylonians 4, 6, 197, 217, 226, 294, 330
Bacon, Roger 5
bacillus 99
Bahamas 282
Balkans 99, 101, 265, 294
Ball, John 85, 102
Bandai 270
Bangladesh 330
Banksia 90
Banksland 310
Barbados 278
Barents Sea 42, 292, 297
Barnes, Thomas G 184
Barnett, V H 257
Bavaria 84
Bayle, Pierre 5 bays 291
bays, Carolina (see Carolina Bays) bears 57, 84
Beaumont 18, 185
Bede, the Venerable 4 beetles 97, 99

begonias 89
Behemoth 296
Bellamy, H S 186, 208, 332
Bengal 12
ben-Gorion, Josippa 304
Beresovka, Siberia 125, 126, 172
Bering Straits 34, 309
Beringia 35, 187, 192
Bermuda 96, 282, 289
Bernhardi, Prof A 23
Berosus 4, 219
Biblical sources 212
Biela's comet 200
Bifrost Bridge 154, 292
birch 311 birds 90, 100; 276
bisons 58
Blanchard, E 99
Blanc, Mt 247, 315
Blanford, H F 34
blanus cinerus 100
blasts 290
Bloomington 92
Blount, Charles 5 boats 338
Bode's Law 207–8
Bode, Johann 207
Boettger, Prof 102
boettgeria 102
Bohemia 201
boiling water 186
Bolivia 30, 91, 133, 174, 255, 287, 289, 292
bombardments 255, 292 bone breccias 295
bones 86, 172
bone-caves 111, 113, 272, 307, 327, 329 boopsis sinensis 114
Boreas 13
Borneo 12, 43, 102, 242
Borros 218
bos 109
bos urus 104s
Bosnia and Herzegovina 113 boulder clay 91, 272, 308
boulder-fields 272
Bourbourg, Brasseur de 159
Bower, Dr 335
box trees 86
Brahma 211
Brandt, Prof A F 125
Braun 94
Brazil 11, 87, 116, 119, 157, 186, 256–7, 270
breadfruit 61
Brewster 33
breccias 295
Britain, British Isles 41–2, 86, 98
British Columbia 172, 242, 331
Brome, Captain Frederick 109
Bronsen's comet 200
Brooks Range 170
broom 87, 90
brown coal (see lignite)
Brownson Deep 284
brush-kangaroo 102
Bryum 91
Bryson 170
bubalus 109, 114
Bucher, Dr Walter 31
Buckland, William 119
Buddhist texts 293
Buddhists 12
Buffon, G L de 6, 7
buliminus fasciolatus 99
Bundahish 289, 303
Bungogees 330
Bununs 242
buried forests 93
Burma 27, 157
Burnet 4 butterflies 96, 99

Caboy 330
Caingang Indians 329
Calaveras skull 132, 334
Calendars 3
California 30, 59, 130, 133, 183, 186, 203, 212, 265, 268, 276, 296, 306, 334–5
Calluna 86
Camp Century 247
Canada 62, 91, 159, 183, 285
Canary Butterfly 96
Canary Islands 31, 95–6
Cape Breton 91
Cape Farewell 244
Capim Branco basin 270
Capybara 116
carbon dioxide 241
carbon dioxide content in atmosphere 38 carbon-14 dating (see radiocarbon dating) carcasses 332
Carcharodon 107
carduelis elegans 100
carex extensa 86
Caribbean 96
Carniola 295
Carolina 282
Carolina bays 245, 281–3, 296, 298
Carpathians 84–5
Carter, Dr George 171
Caruana, A A 107 carvings 214
Cashinaua Indians 256
Caspian Sea 104
Cassowary (Casuarius) 103 catastrophe traditions 150, 162–4 catastrophes 19
catastrophists, catastrophist 7, 17, 18, 21, 38, 66, 87, 159, 184
Caucasus 26, 57, 85
Cave faunas 121
caves 111, 173, 241, 329
cave-breccias 100
cedars 93, 123
celestial ice 207
celestial rotation 15
ceneri impastati 105
Central America 90, 268
Ceres 198
Chaldeans 197, 215
chamaeleon vulgaris 100
Chamberlin, R T 183
Champlain, Lake 257
Chandler Wobble 190, 194
Channel islands 101
Chara 91
charcoal 310, 338
Charon 205, 210
Charpentier, Johann von 23
Chastach, Lake 311
Chernoi Nos Peninsula 311
Cheshvan 304
Chicago 280
Chile 44, 98
Chimakum 186
China 16, 26, 43, 102, 114, 296
China-stones 285
Chinese texts & traditions 153, 211, 226–7, 293, 296, 301, 303, 308, 331–2
Chiron 207–8, 222
chlamydotherium 116
chlorophyll 59
Choctaw Indians 304
chondrites 201
Choukoutien, China 114 chrysippus 4 cirques 56, 315
civilisation 334
civilised communities 332
Clarion fracture zone 268
clausilia 102
Clavus, Claudius 244
Clement 153
clethra arborea 87 climate 257
climatic changes, variations 56, 183, 186, 189 cloud cover 256
cloudbursts 309
Clube, S V and Napier, W M 199, 209
Coatapepeque caldera 268
coelodonta tichorhinus 109, 125 coins 337 cold 159
Cold Pole 61
coleoptera 97
collagen 172
collapse of ocean basins 265 collapsed sky conditions 254, 256, 259, 271, 290–1, 304, 313, 327, 339
Columbia Plateau 179, 270
Columbia River 307
comets 5, 152, 175, 184, 199, 201, 206–8, 252
conch 99
conflagration 150, 187, 269, 294, 329
Congo 133
conifers 84, 86, 90
Constellation Cancer 173
constellations 15, 217 continental drift 37, 191, 267 continental shelves 37
copepod 104
Copernicus, Nicolaus 215
cordilleras 26, 28
core, Earth's (see Earth's core) Corsica 96
cosmic bombardment 329 cosmic space 220
Cox, A and Doell, R R 183

crabs 99 craters 284, 291
crayfish 99
creation 4, 6
Cretaceous Age, strata 18, 308
Crete 101
cricket 98
Croatia 113
Crocuta 119
Croll, Dr J 24
crustaceans 99 crustal bulging 307
crustal collapse 292 crustal damage, strains 183, 213 crustal dislocation, movement 28, 255, 259, 268, 291–2, 313 crustal fracturing 262, 265–8, 292 crustal rocks 193
crustal shortening 292 crustal sliding, slippage 38, 193–4 crust, Earth's (see Earth's crust) Cuba 284
culture-heroes 330, 334
Cumacea 104
Cumbria 86
Curie Point 182
Cuvier 21
cyclones 276 cylinder-seals 216
cynailurus 114
Cyon 114

Dacrydium 90
Dakota
Daly, Dr Reginald 27–8
Damascius 219
Dammara 90
Damon, Robert 63
Dana 276
darkness 159, 256, 271, 329
Darwin, Sir George 192
Dasyurus 115
dating techniques 169, 345
Dawkins, W B 104
Dawson, Sir William 91–2
Dean, Prof Dennis 4 debris 53, 94
Deccan 179, 270
deep-sea trenches 35 deer 100
deglaciation 192
Deimos 204–5
Deinotherium 133
Delaware Indians 14
Delpierre, 133
Deluge 3, 7, 9, 14–5, 17, 20, 65, 186–7, 211, 218, 227, 230, 242, 254, 291, 298, 301–3, 304, 308, 312–3, 315, 327 deluge traditions 150, 301 deluge waters 308
Descartes, Rene 4 deserts 195, 241
Deucalion Flood 3, 152, 153, 189
Devon Island 310
dews 241, 257
Diderot, D 6
Dicerorhinus hemitoechus 112
Dicerorhinus kirchergensis 113 diet 332
Diluvial Theory 21
Diluvium venti 277–8
din (noise) 278
Diodorus Siculus 6, 215
Diogenes Laertius 15
Diogenes of Apollonia 12
Disko Bay 247
Divine intervention 328
Dolomieu 106
Donnelly, Ignatius 18, 149, 154, 185 dormice 107
drainage systems 241, 327
Drayson Effect 38 drift deposits 11, 45–6, 84, 86, 91, 173, 192, 273, 276, 295, 307–8, 314–5, 340 driftwood 309, 312
Dromaeus 103 drought 257
Drude, Prof 84
Dryas octopetala 84
Dryas, Younger (see Younger Dryas) duckbilled platypus 102
Dudinsk 312
Duncan, Prof P M 133
Dusan tribe 12
dust 38, 271, 277
dust devils 282
Dutch Elm disease 19
dwarfing 101
dye 248

Ea 217
Earth 173, 175–6, 185, 220, 230, 250, 255, 297, 304, 311
earth fracture 265
earthquakes 183, 185–6, 189, 190, 255, 263
earthworms 96
Earth's axis of rotation 15, 35, 189, 190–1, 193, 206, 208, 253, 277
Earth's core 178, 180–2, 190, 193
Earth's crust 178, 192
Earth's electromagnetic field 180–1, 184
Earth's magnetic axis, poles 180, 182
Earth's magnetic field 182
Earth's mass 178
Earth's orbit 189, 190
Earth's rotational speed 178–9, 182, 255, 268, 302
Earth's thermal energy 186
Earth/Moon system 250
Eberhart, Dr H 335
ecliptic, obliquity of (see Obliquity)
Eddas, Norse 154, 161, 223, 292, 303, 331
Eddington, A E 193
Edwards-Dwight, S 306
Egypt 15, 155
Egyptian hieroglyphs 14
Egyptians, ancient 6, 197, 201, 296
Eire (see Ireland)
Eiseley, Prof L C 56
El Chicon 258
Electra 225, 227
electric currents 181 electromagnetic exchanges 250–1, 259 electromagnetic fields 208 electromagnetic potential 209 electromagnetic storms 255 elephants 57, 102, 334
Ellesmere Island 310
Empedocles 3
emu 103, 116
England 40, 84, 102, 296
Englehardt 187
Engler, Prof A 85
Enlil 217–8
Enoch, Book of 291
environmental changes 340
Epoccus 97
Equatorial bulge 177, 181, 193
Equus stenonis 109
Eriolaulon 86
Eriocaulon septangulare 86
Erman, G A 21, 311–2
Ermitage Papyrus 191
Eros 199
erratic boulders 9, 11, 23, 40, 45, 49, 51, 55, 287, 306–7, 327
Eryx jaculus 100
Erzgebirge 84
Eskimos 15, 191
Esmarch, Jens 23
Eucalyptus 90
Eucrites 198
Eugenia 89
Eumetopias stelleri 133
Eurasia 315
Eurasian Basin 187, 292
Euripides 211
Europe 23, 56, 84–7, 102, 104, 170, 183, 245, 249, 292
Eusebius 153
evaporation 257
Ewing, Maurice 32
excoriation 35
explosions 273, 327
exterminations 56
extinction 56, 125, 174, 183

Faeroe islands 40, 97, 244
Falconer, Dr Hugh 105 fallen angels 291
Farnell, L R 219 faults, geological 265
Fennoscandia 33, 85, 98, 103, 192, 242, 249, 309
Fenris-Wolf 212, 223, 275, 289, 303
Fernando de Noronha 87
ferns 61, 91
ferret-badgers 102
ferromanganese concretions 298–9
ferrous minerals 295
Fielden, Col W H 85
Figuier 277
figurine 296
Fiji 90, 99, 156
Fimbul winter 315, 331
Finland 11, 160, 287, 294
Finnish traditions 210, 298
Finsterwalder, Dr P 27
fiords 35, 244, 246, 280, 315 fire fountains 270–1 fires 160, 254, 279
firestorms 269, 279

Fire-crested wren 100
fire-hurricane 272
Fish, F F 206
fissures 179, 327
Flanders 191
Flandern, Van 199, 206, 220
flightless birds 103
Flint 26
Flood 14, 65, 150, 212, 227, 255, 290–1, 301–2, 330
Flood of Deucalion 3, 152, 159
Flood of Ogyges 152 flood traditions 329 floral distribution 94
fluting 315
fog banks 313
Fontinalis 91
foraminifera 43, 96, 171
Formosa (Taiwan) 242, 329
Forrest, H E 33, 61, 86, 249
Forsyth-Major, C I 100
Fosheim Peninsula 310 fossil record 6
fossil wood 310
fossils 65, 83, 91, 172, 179
Foster, Prof 337 fracture complexes 174, 227, 265 fracture patterns 194 fractures 37
France 113
Fraser River 296
Frederickson, Kurt 297 frogs 96
fungi 59
Furry Creek 172

Gaga (Chiron) 272
Galactic plane 218
Galapagos Islands 90, 102
gales 305
Gamow, Dr George 187
Gangetic Trough 37
Ganymede 208
Garden of Eden 13
Garm 212, 289
Garmieria 102
Garrod, D A E 111
gas clouds 254 gases 269, 272, 279, 293
Gazin, Dr C L 118
Geikie, Prof J 24, 33, 39, 63, 84, 86, 276
Geiseltal, Germany 59, 92, 276
Geminus of Rhodes 215
Genesis, Book of 3, 153, 219, 301, 303–4, 332 geoidal deformation 254, 268, 307 geoidal distortion 267
geomagnetic changes, reversals 185–6, 253, 267 geomagnetic fields, geomagnetism 180 geomorphology 7 geraniums 89
Germain, L 96
Germany 11, 84, 92, 113, 276, 279
Gibraltar 109
Gidley, Dr J W 118
Gilgamesh 153, 278
Ginungagap 160, 218, 331
glacial and interglacial successions 63 glacial conditions 213
glacial epoch, period 28, 84, 314 glacial theory 94
glacialists 25
glaciations 42, 62, 85, 274, 313
Glacier Age 315
glacier ice, glaciers 7, 23, 35, 56, 179, 248, 315, 328, 340
Gobi desert 26
Gokihar 254
gold 296
Golden Age 3, 12, 13, 35, 64, 175, 292 goldfinch 100
Gondwanaland 89
Gothenburg 182
Gothenburg flip 183
gouging 315
Gradualism 17, 25
granite 179
gravels 171, 296, 308, 327 gravitational fields 222, 263, 304, 307 gravity 50, 302
Great Bear, constellation 15
Great Khingan Shan 26
Great Lakes 91, 93
Great Lyakhov Island 310
Great Rift Valley 28, 35, 158, 269
Great Year 3, 4
Greece 3, 12, 99, 101, 225, 294
Greeks 13, 215
Greenland 32, 35, 39, 55, 60–1, 85, 96, 98, 160, 242, 244, 249, 295, 314
Greenland ice-cap 247
Greenwood, A Craven 111
Gregory, Prof J W 158
grey willow 86
Grinnell Land, Peninsula 63, 310
Gruger, E 94
Gryllus 98
Guam 103
Guatemala 268
Guettard, Jean 7
Gulf of Mexico 183
Gulf Stream 313
Gullikson 170
gymnure, lesser 102

Haarmann, Erich 28
Haemus, Mt 294
hail 160, 303
hailstones of iron 298
Haiti 284
Halley, Edmund 5, 7
Halmaturus 102
Hamburg 280
Hammer 314
Hann, Julius 192
Hapgood, Charles H 244
Harpagornis 103
Harvey, John 5
Hauthal, Prof Rudolf 174
Hawaii 12, 99, 156, 159, 179, 270–1
Hawaiki 34
Hay, O P 132
haze 257 heat 280
heavy metals 296
Hebrew texts (see Jewish texts)
Hebrides 35, 40
Hedenstrom 310–311
Heer, Prof Oswald 24, 28
Hehr, Frederick G 337
Heirtzler, 190
Helictis, H orientalis 102
Helios 211, 218
helium 241, 259
Hell 291–2
Hemicaridina desmaresti 99
Hera 257
herbivores 169
Herculaneum 258
Hermes 328
Herodotus 155
Hesiod 152
Hess, H H and MacClintock, P 302
Heteromeyenia ryderi 47, 242
Hibben, F C 58
Hibbert 257
Hibokhibok volcano 274
Hidalgo 206, 208
Hilprecht, Prof Herman 217
Himalayan orogeny 26
Himalayas 25–6, 37, 42, 133, 187, 265, 308
Hindu Kush 27
Hindu traditions, Vedas, Hindus 211, 226, 252, 279, 289
Hipparchus 215
hippopotamus 84, 86, 104 hippopotamus liberiensis 107 hippopotamus major 112
hippopotamus pentlandi 106
Hobbs, W H 194
Hoggar (Ahaggar) 28
Holbach, Baron de 7
Holland 254, 287, 289
holocaust 269
Holocene Epoch 11, 28, 62, 101, 170, 247, 285, 314–5, 330, 339, 340
Homer 229
Hooker, Joseph 89, 90
Hooke, Robert 7
Hopatroides 99
Hopi Indians 157
Hopolophorus 116
horse 58, 86, 109, 124
Howell, James 5
Howorth, Sir Henry 50, 52, 55
Huascaran 264
Hudson Bay 91
Hull, Prof E 87
human beings 6, 114, 116
human remains 118
Humboldt Glacier 247
hurricanes 57, 255, 276, 278–9, 305 husbandry 339
Hutton, James 7, 8, 17, 66
hyaena 119, 133
hydrachna geographica 97
hydrocarbons 203
hydrosphere 302
hyginus 211
Hylomis, H suillus 102
hymenoptera 97

Hyperboreans 13
hypnum 91
Hystrix 133

Iberia 109
Iblis 212
Icaria 244
ice 46, 160, 201, 207, 220, 303 ice action 53, 308, 315
Ice Age 23, 25, 39, 50, 55, 64, 84, 121, 127, 169, 174, 192–3, 244, 262, 299, 307, 313–5
Ice Age theory 39, 85
Iceland 12, 32, 61–2, 96–8, 244–5, 258
ice, physics of 50
ice-caps 340
ice-fields 328
ice-sheets 37, 42, 50, 85, 189, 192, 314–5
Idaho 296, 334
Idotea entomon 104
igneous rocks 182, 184
Ihering, Dr von 34, 95
Illinois 92, 94, 337
Ilopango depression 268
India 12–3, 34, 179, 197, 218, 264–5, 289
Indian archipelago 90
Indian Ocean 34, 89, 157
Indiana, USA 94
Indigirka River 311
Indonesia 27, 99, 102–3, 268
Indo-Gangetic trough 265
Indo-Oceana 89
Indra 289
Inglefield, Captain 248 insects 96–7
interglacials 24, 314
interstadials 24
Invercargill, NZ 287
Iowa 94, 279
Ipuwer Papyrus 186
Iraq 338
Ireland (Eire) 40, 42, 49, 86–7, 96–7, 102, 171 iris 198
iron 201, 296 iron ore 269
iron oxide 295, 297
Isadore of Seville 4
isopod 104
Is-Shantun cave specimens 108
Italy 27, 99, 101, 113

Jamaica 95
Japan 13, 15, 26, 159, 258, 263, 270
Java 102, 270
Jeans, Sir James 15, 196
Jeffreys, Sir Harold 193–4
Jeremias, Prof Alfred 217
Jerome 4
Jewish myths, traditions 201, 211, 305, 315
Jewish texts 3
Jews 12, 296
Job, Book of 218
Joshua, Book of 160
Jotunheim 291
Jubmel 301
Jude, Epistle of 291
Juergens, R E 181
juglans tephrodes 84 juniperus virginiana 93
Juno 198
Jupiter 176, 200–1, 203–4, 206–7, 215, 220, 226, 293
Jura 28
Jurassic strata 308

kabyles 218
Kailas 27
Kalimantan 12, 43, 102, 242
Kamchatka peninsula 26, 35, 60, 187, 265, 269, 292
Kanga people 256
Karakoram 26
Karaya Indians 330
Karpinski, A 104
Kashmir 26
Kato Indians 157
Keglen, Mt 248
Kelly, A O 288
Kennett, J P and Watkins, N D 183–4, 186
Kenya 133, 170
Kerguelen cabbage 89
Kerguelen Island 89
Kesslerloch cave 295
kettle-holes 56
Kilauea Iki, Kilauea volcano 270
Kilimanjaro, Mt 248, 315
Kingu 222–3, 225, 250, 254, 289, 290, 292–5
King, Prof Leonard 219
Kircher 4
Kirkdale Cave 119
Kirkuk 338
kiwi 103
Klee, Frederick 14
Knaack, G 187
knife 337
Kobelt, Dr W 95
Koluguev Island 309
Kolyma, River 34
Kolymsk 34
Koran (Quran) 304
Korea 115
Korff, Serge 169
Kotelnyy Island 310
Krakatau 19, 270
Krasan, Prof F 85
Kronos 13, 206
Kuiper, Gerard 210
Kuiper Belt 206, 210, 221
Kun-lun mountains 27
Kwakiult Indians 331

La Soufrière 273
Labrador 244
Lactantius 4, 14, 45
Lagoa Santa 119 lakes 254, 292
Lakhers 328
Laki volcano 258
Lamb, H H 314, 340
landmass altitude changes 38 landslides 263
land-routes 86, 95
land-shells 95–6, 99, 102
Lang, Dr 115
Laos 27
Lappish tradition 301
Lappland 85
Laschamp geomagnetic event 182
Late Pleistocene (see Pleistocene, late) lavas 31, 34, 179, 254, 270, 273, 298–9, 327
Leffe 84
legends 189
Lehmann, Johann 7
Leidy, Dr 124
Lemuria 89
Lenni-Lenape Indians 329
lepidoptera 97
Leviathan 218, 297
Lexell's comet 200
Lhwyd, Edward 6, 7
Libby, Dr W F 169
lightning 255–6, 259, 277
lignites, lignite beds, deposits 59, 84, 91, 94 ligur uvae 99
limestone 57, 178, 241
Limnocalanus grimaldi 104
Link, T A 293
Lisbon 264
lithosphere 179, 265, 307
lithospheric thickness 192
Lithuanian tradition 328
Little Ice Age 315 lizards 98, 100
Llyn Teyrn, Wales 257
Loanga tribe 256
lobelia dortmanna 86
loess 296, 299
Lofoten islands 40
Loke 212, 289
Louisiana 203
Love, Prof S G 123
loxodonta africanus 109
Lubbock, J 86
Lucifer 212, 218
Lund 115
Lushai people 242
Lyakhov Island 124
Lyell, Sir Charles 17, 23, 44, 61, 66
Lynmouth 309

Maccacogne 119
Mackenzie River 91
Macrauchenia 111
Macroptychia 102
Madagascar 99, 103
Madeira 31, 87, 95
magma 179, 186, 193, 258, 263, 268, 285, 327 magma tides 180, 186, 254, 307
magma, viscosity of 186
Magnesium-26 209
magnetic reversal 181–2 magnetosphere 181
Maillet, B de 6
Makah 186
Maloi Island 311
Malta 106
mammals 57, 100

mammoths (Mammut) 84, 86, 104, 121, 125, 127, 171–2, 183, 191, 296, 310–3, 343 mammuthus primigenius 109, 121 manatus 98
Mandan Indians 338
Manetho 15
manganese nodules 298
Mangerud, J and Gullikson 170
manis palaeojavanica 102
Manitoba 91
Manley, H 182
Mantle (see Earth's mantle)
Mantura 267–8
Maori, Maori traditions 34, 278, 280, 288, 301, 303 maple 86, 91
Marduk 214, 217, 219, 220–3, 225, 227, 250, 262, 277, 289, 315 margaritana margaritifer 97 marine bivalves 170 marine shells 40, 172, 310
Mariner-10 226
Mariner-2 226
Markham, Sir Clements 334
Mars 176, 199, 204–5, 207, 215, 226–7, 230, 250
Martinique 272–3
Massachusetts 279
mastodons 57, 122, 124, 170, 334, 337
Mato Grosso 270
Mattison 132
Mauna Loa 179, 270
Maya 12, 13, 156, 278, 294
Mazzaroth 315
Mbocobi tribe 275
McClure, Sir Robert 63
McGee 64
McKittrick, California 59
meat 332
Mediterranean 96, 98, 101, 105, 242, 265, 269 megaliths 214
megalonyx 124
megatherium 116–7
Melville Island 310
Menzel, Dr Donald 58
Mer de Glace 247
Mercury 176, 180, 204, 215, 262
Merezhkovsky, D S 96, 291
Merryman 130
Meru, Mt 13, 242, 292
Mesopotamia 294
Mesopotamian cylinder-seals 214–5, 218
Mesopotamians 214, 277
Mesozoic Era 18, 25
meteor scars 282
meteor swarms 294
meteorites, meteors 200, 281, 288, 297–8 meteorological conditions 60 methane 203, 207, 220
Mexican accounts 216, 293
Mexico 12, 156, 227, 258, 294, 303
Meyer, Prof Hans 174
Michael and his angels 212, 291
Michigan 92
Michigan City 170
Micronesia 99
middens 340
Midgård Serpent 175, 212, 223, 275, 289, 292
Mid-Atlantic Ridge 31, 32, 269
Milky Way 218
Millennium 4
Minya Konka 26
Miocene Era 62, 86, 103, 136, 295, 309
Miocene Ocean 104–5, 108, 127
Miocene/Pliocene/post-glacial gap 61
Mississippi 94
Missouri 264
Mixtecs 156
Moa 103, 116
Mobutu Sese Seko, Lake 265–7
Moel Tryfaen, Wales 46, 60
molluscs 95, 97–8, 102, 172, 340
Monachus 98, 296
Mongolia 13, 45
monk seal 98
monsoonal regimes 189
Montana 11
Montesquieu 7
moon 178–9, 180, 193, 204, 208, 215, 229, 250, 253, 255, 296, 352
moraines 23, 53, 55, 247–8, 257, 309, 315
Morehouse's comet 200, 202
Morocco 87, 89
Morrison, D 226
Mortillet, G de 86
moths 96
mountain building 174, 189 mountain ranges 183, 194, 254, 327 mountains 26, 241
muck 57, 93
muck beds 309, 314 mud 269, 272, 307, 327
mud-slides 45, 275
Muggendorf 11
Mulholland, J Derral 185–6, 191, 208
Murchison, Sir Roderick 46, 125 musk-ox 125
Muspar 231
Muspelheim 212, 292
muspilli 275
mustela boccamela 101
mylodon 116, 334
mysis 104

naias flexilis 86
Nansen Basin 292
Napier 199, 209
Nashe, Thomas 6
Navajo Indians 14, 304, 329
Neanderthal race 116
Near Eastern cosmologies 219
Nebraska 296
Needham, J T 7
Nelson Bay 170
Nenia 102
Neptune 176, 196, 201, 205, 215, 217, 220, 222
Nereid 205, 222
Netherlands (see Holland)
Neugebauer, Prof 217
Neumayer, Prof 87
Nevada 279
New Caledonia 90
New England 282
New Guinea 102–3, 170
New Hebrides 90
New Madrid 264
New Siberian Islands 297, 309, 310–1
New Zealand 34, 89, 90, 102–3, 156, 183, 287
Newcombe Period 190
newts 96
Niah cave 102
nickel 297–8
Nigeria 268
Nineveh 214, 229
nitrogen-14 169
Nixon, G T 314
Noah 150, 291, 304, 332
Noah's Flood 186
nodules 299
Nordenskiöld, N A E 62–3, 311
Norse Eddas (see Eddas)
Norse epics, sagas, mythology, texts, traditions 13, 14, 154, 160, 212, 218, 254, 289, 291, 315
North Africa 109
North America 28, 86–7, 118, 211, 249, 303, 314–5, 337
North American tribes 186
North Atlantic 32, 87, 96, 242, 249, 313
North Carolina 296
North Pole 292, 311
North Sea 40, 42, 171
Norton, P E P 62
Norway 42, 96, 160, 171, 245, 249
Nothrotherium 118
novae (see supernovae)
Novgorod, Russia 312
Nuées ardentes 45, 254, 269, 273–4 nutation 190

oaks 310, 312
Object 1992 QB 206, 210
objects in space 349–354
obliquity of the ecliptic 194, 196 ocean basins 37, 297 ocean currents, circulation 190 ocean levels 25
Oceania 89, 101–3
oceanic changes 38
oceans 153, 172, 179, 195, 254, 258, 306
Odin 303
odours 327
Ohio 92
Oklahoma 304
Old Testament 3, 160, 184, 315
Olduvai (Oldoway), Kenya 133
Oleacinidae 96
Oligochetes 95
Oniscus asellus 97
Ontario 91
Opik, E J 199, 220, 297
Oppenheim, V 267, 307
Oregon 30, 201
ores 269
organic debris 327

oriented 'lakes' 284, 287, 291–2
Orkney islands 40, 293
Ornithorhynchus 102
orogenic upheavals 249
orogeny (see also mountain building) 25, 265 orthodox history 233
Orthodoxy 121, 161
ostrich 103
Ousdal, Dr Asbjourn 335
Ovaherero tribesmen 256
Ovenden, M W 206, 220
Ovid 12, 150, 153, 173, 211, 222, 252, 275 oxygen 241
ozone content 38

Pacific islands 102
Pacific Ocean 43, 89, 90, 103, 268, 270, 297–9
Pacifica 89
Pairikas 289
Palaeolithic Period 118
Palaeoloxodon 108
Palaeoloxodon antiquus 106, 114
Palaeoloxodon namadicus 102
Palaeoloxodon mnaidriensis 106
Palaeomagnetism 182–3
Palaeontologists, palaeontology 119
Palestine 155
Palissy, Bernard 6
Pallas 198
Pallas-Athene 225, 229, 257
Pamir 26
Panama 87, 90, 96
Pangolin 102
Pankhoos 330
Panthera 119
Paraña River 179
Parry Islands 310
Patten, Donald 8, 209, 302
Pauly, K A 193
paved road 337
Pawnee Indians 153
pearl mussel 97
peat 58, 91
peat-bog 170
Pelasgian Sea 101
pelecypod 172
Pelée, Mt 270
Penck, Prof Albrecht 24, 42
Penhallow, Prof D P 91–2 peperomia 90
periops hippocrepis 100
perpetual night 313
Persea 87
Persia, Persians 13, 197, 212
Persian Gulf 265
Persian traditions 173, 211, 226, 250
Peru 30, 133, 174, 212, 264, 293, 296, 315, 338
Peruvian Deluge legend 329 pestilence 327
pestilential clouds 212
Peter, Epistle of 291
petroleum, petroleum residue 203, 265, 293
Peyère, Isaac de la 6
Peyrerius, Isaac 5
Phaedusa 102
Phaeton 150, 153, 173, 175–6, 184, 187, 210–2, 214, 217, 220, 231, 250–1, 254, 257, 263, 268, 275, 288–9, 291, 296, 299, 314–7, 356
Phaeton Disaster 176, 195, 209, 241, 248, 293, 304, 314, 333
Phaeton's departure 327 phalangista 102
pherecydes 13
Philemon and Baucis 328
Philippines 27, 43, 274
Philo of Byblos 13
Phobos 204–5, 230
phoca caspica 104
Phoebe 204
Pholus 206
photosynthesis 169
Pietremont 14
Pilgrim, G E 56
Pima Indian legend 257, 328 pine 86
pine cones 310
pinus sylvestris 84
pisolites 296
Pisonia umbellifera 90
planetary orbits 196 planets 181, 208, 219
plankton 43 plant cover 60 plant remains 59
plants 85, 88
plate tectonics 191, 265, 291
Plato 4, 12, 13, 173, 191, 217, 225
platyarthus 97
Pleiades 315
Pleistocene Epoch 11, 17, 25–7, 31, 36–7, 43, 82, 84, 90, 101, 103, 120, 135, 171, 183, 270, 274, 285, 295, 309, 310
Pleistocene, late 28, 34, 42–3, 56, 62, 169, 170, 189, 258
Pleistocene mammals 84, 311
Pleistocene plants 84
Pliny 152, 211
Pliocene 85–6, 98, 101, 103, 108, 121, 136, 309
Pluto 196, 208, 210, 215
podocarpus 90
Point Barrow 284–6
polar axis 15 polar ice-cap 241, 314 polar shift 190–1 polar vegetation 85
polar wandering 38, 192
polarity reversals 183–4, 189, 204, 269
Pole Star 15
poles 302
polished rock surfaces 11, 308 polishing 315
Pollack 314
pollen 172
pollen sequences 171 pollution 256, 258, 314, 327
Polygonum 84
Polynesians 13, 315, 329
Pompeii 258
poplar 309
Porcellio scaber 97
Portugal 87, 299
Poynting-Robertson effect 200
Praeger, Dr Lloyd 87
Precession of the celestial North Pole 15, 177, 181, 194, 215 precipitation (see also rain) 241, 313
Prestwich, J 106
Principles of uniformity 17
Proctor, Richard 15
Psalms 212
pteropods 299
Ptolemy 244
Puerto Rico 282
pumice 271
Pumpelly, Raphael 104
Purus River 257
Putnam 178
pygmy elephant 107
Pyrenees 85
Pythagorean philosophers 3

Quaternary Era 54, 268, 285, 307
Quebec 288
Queensland 170, 295
Quetta 263
Quetzalcoatl 227
Quileute 186

radiocarbon dating 169, 172 radium 297
Radley, Oxfordshire 296
Ragnarok 154, 275
Rahab 212
Rainey, Dr 57
rain, rains 212, 255, 303, 309
Ramsay, Andrew, 24
Rancho La Brea 59, 130–1
Ray, John 6
Ready Bullion Creek 171
Réaumur, René de 6
red clays 297–9
red deer 86, 100
red milk 212, 298
Red Sea 99
red tides 299
Regulus ignicapillus 100 reindeer 125 relics 338
relict species 56
Renland 248
Rensselaer, Van 123
reptiles 100
Revelation, Book of 153, 212, 290, 294 reversed polarity 182
re-peopling 339
Rhax 99
rhea 103, 116
rhinoceros 57, 109, 124, 295 rhinoceros merckii 113
Rhone Glacier 315
Rift valleys 265
Riphaean Mountains 242, 249 rivers 254
Roche Limit, Roche Zone 229–230, 250, 254
roches moutonées 56
Roche's Law 209
rock fissures 173, 307

rock flutings 56
rock strata 315
Rockall 96
Rockenbach, Adam, 211
Rocky Mountains 28, 43, 183, 187
Rose, L E and Vaughan, R C 230
Rosenmuller, J C 119 rotation (see Earth's rotation) rotational speeds 178, 204, 263
Rudzki, M P 307
Runcorn 186, 191
Ruprecht, Von 311
Ruscelli, G 244
Russia 46, 104, 274, 312, 338

Sac and Fox Indians 303
Sagan, Prof Carl 184, 186
Sahara 28, 45, 101
Sakurajima volcano 258, 260
Salishan Indians 211
Samoa 155, 159, 257
San Andreas 334
San Andreas fault 265–7, 268
San Francisco 263
Sanchoniathon 13
sandstone 178
sand-charged winds 276
Sangamon River 94
Sannikov 310
Santa Barbara, CA 335
Santa Cruz, CA 171
Saporta, Count 86
Sarawak 102
Sarcophilus 102
Sardinia 96
Sarku 332
Sarton, Prof George 217
Satan 152–3, 201, 212, 222, 275, 289, 290 satellites 208
Saturn 176, 200–1, 203–4, 215
Sauramo, M 307
Savage, Henry 281–2
Savage-Landor, H 270
Savoy 84
Scandinavia 35, 84–5, 244, 287
Scarborough Heights 91
Scharff, Prof 33–4, 84–6, 95, 249
Scheidegger, Dr Adrian 187
scheucheria palustris 86
Schimper, Karl 23
Schmidt, Prof 312
scincidae 100
Scotland 40, 97, 214, 305, 307
Scott-Elliott, Prof 116
scour 53, 308
sea levels 38, 95, 302, 340
Sea of crystal 295
seals 57
Sears, D W 206 seasons 194
seaweeds 87
sea-bed scour 33 sea-floor 297
sea-urchins 96
sedimentation, sedimentation rates 7, 299, 301 seismic activity 157, 252, 263
Selungs 157
Senegal 299
Septuagint 3
Sequoia 309
Serpentine 179
setomorpha discipunctella 96
Settle 306
seven suns 357–8 sharks 107
sheep 101
shells 96, 172, 312
Shetland islands 40, 96, 244, 257
Shiveluch, Mt 274 shock waves 290 shrew 101
shrimp 99
Siberia 8, 39, 60, 85, 94, 104, 170, 172, 183, 191, 255, 285, 292, 295–6, 309, 311, 312, 314
Sicily 105, 119
siderites 201
Sikhote-Alin range 26
Silesia 84
Simroth, Prof H 95
Sinai 99
Sing-Pohs 328
Slav traditions 254
Slovenia 113
slugs 95 smell 257
Smith, S P 34, 315
Smith, William 8, 66
snowfall 192
soils 64
solar radiation 190
solar system 176, 180, 195, 198, 200, 204, 206, 209, 215, 220
solar wind 181
Solutréan culture 333
Somerset Island 310
Sons of Muspelheim (see Muspelheim)
sooty-opossum 102
South Africa 89, 170, 338, 340
South America 89, 96, 102, 116, 179, 183
South Atlantic 89
South Carolina 297
South China Sea 43
South Georgia 89
South Trinidad 89
Southall, Dr James 123, 334
Southern hemisphere 34, 101
space 181
Spain 99, 102
spartina stricta 86
speed of rotation (see Earth's rotational speed)
Spencer, J W 96
Spherules 297
Spilhaus, A 268
spiny anteater 102
spiranthes 87
Spitzbergen 34, 40, 60–1, 98, 191, 309, 315
sponge 97
Spratt, Admiral 107
Sprottau 84
Sri Lanka 34, 157
St Helens, Mt 258–9, 271, 275, 307
St John the Divine, Book of 330
St Vincent 273
Stamp, L Dudley 44 stars 209 steam 45, 272, 273, 327
stegodon 133
stegomaston 133
Steno 4
stick-insects 99
Stone Age 338
stone ruins 334
stone utensils 335
storms 241, 250
Stoss, Friedrich 5
Stothers 218
Strabo 13, 152, 155
Straits of Gibraltar 99, 227
striae, striated rocks 8, 9, 46, 56, 254 striation 9, 11, 270, 272, 315
stylohipparion 133
Styria 4
submarine canyons 35
submergence 34, 101
subsidence 31, 95
succinea groenlandica 97
Suess, Prof Eduard 101, 183 suffocation 280
Sumatra 265, 270
Sumerian astronomers 215, 217
Sumerian mythology 217
Sun 179, 186, 196, 200–1, 211, 215, 257, 293, 298
Sunda Strait 270
Sunken landmasses 101
sun's magnetic field 184
Superior, Lake 93
supernovae 209, 210
Surt 212, 275, 289
survivor legends, survivors 121, 328–9
Sweden 182
Switzerland 27, 295, 306, 338
sycamore 309
Syria 99, 155

Table Mountain 132
Tablet of Destiny 222, 225
tachyglossus 102
tachylite 31
Tahiti 155
Tahoe legend 329
Taimyr Peninsula 172
Taira 307
Talmud 186, 201, 302, 315
Tambora, Mt 258
Tanupolama 118
Tanzania 315, 332
Tapanui, NZ 287
tapirs 57, 102
tar-seeps (see Asphalt)
Taserqat 248
Tasmania, T.'devil', T.'wolf' 102
Tatars 294
Tatera 133
Tatian 153
Tawhaki 303
Ta-vi 212, 291
Ta-wats 212, 291
Tea Tree Cave 295

tectonic disturbances 262 temperatures 24, 186, 269
Ten Stems 331
Tepanecas 303
Termier, Pierre 87, 102
terrestrial axis (see Earth's axis)
Texas 203
Thailand 27
Theiring, Dr von 87
Theophilus of Antioch 4
Theopompus 13
thermal energy 184–6, 267–8 thunder 256
Thysanodactylus bilineatus 90
Tiahuanacu 334
Tiamat 214, 219, 220, 222–3, 225–6, 229, 262, 289, 293–4
Tibet, Tibetan plateau 16, 26, 37, 44 tidal wave 263, 271
Tien Shan 26
tiger 125
till, glacial 91, 276
timber debris 171
Tistrya 173, 250, 252–3, 289, 303
Titan 208
Titania 204
Titicaca, Lake 133
Tlandrokpah 330
toads 96
Tokyo 263
Toll, Baron von 310
Tolson, R H 230
Toltecs 293
Tonga 90, 315 tools 334–5 topography 263, 327
Torah 224
tornadoes 276
Torrell, Otto 24
Torres Strait 103
Toulmin, G 7
Toxodon 116–7
traditions 201, 293, 328, 333
Transatlantic land route 87, 95 tree stumps 277
trees 61, 85–6, 91
Triads, Welsh 12
Trinidad 203
Tristan da Cunha 89
Tritonis, Lake 101
Triton 208, 272
Troana Codex 156
Trollope, Rev Edward 86
Tsimshian tribe 242
tsunamis 265, 305
tundra 310–1
Tunisia 101
Turfan depression 269
Turnham Green (London) 295
Tver, Russia 312
Tyndall, John 58
typhlocaris 99
typhlops lumbricalis 100
typhon 152, 155, 175, 211, 294
typhoons 276
Tyrrhenia 101, 103, 105, 192, 265
Uganda 170, 265
Ulsiank 311
Umbgrove, Dr J H F 27, 31
Umbriel 204
Uniformitarian school of thought, Uniformitarianism 8, 17–9, 38, 44, 175, 184, 192, 232, 241, 254, 282, 309
United States of America (see also North America) 44, 179
Unmak Island 170
Upham 24
Ur 217
Uranus 201, 204–5, 210, 215, 217, 223
Urey, Dr Harold 185
USA (see United States)
Ussher, James 4
Utah 268
Ute Indian tradition 155, 291 utensils 334
U-shaped valleys 56, 274

vaccinea uliginosum 84
Vaughan 230
Vedic hymns (see Hindu Vedas) vegetarianism 332
Vela supernova 209, 210
Velikovsky, Immanuel 184–5, 208, 226, 230, 281
Venetz, Ignaz 23
Venezuela 203
Vening-Meinesz, F A 31
Venus 208, 225–6, 230–1, 262
Vermont 306 vessels 334
vibernum 84
Vietnam 27
Vilyui 125, 295
Virginia 124, 297
Viverra 114
Voguls 12, 186
volcanic ash, dust, ejecta 254, 258–9, 270, 298, 314 volcanic activity, eruptions, upheavals 31, 32, 34, 255, 258, 261 volcanoes 179, 258, 270
Voluspa 275
Vossius, Isaac 3
vulcanicity, vulcanism 58, 183, 258, 267, 270, 274, 314

Wadia 26
Waechter, J 191
Wales 46, 60, 98, 257
Wallace's Line 268
Wallace, A R 34, 97
walruses 57
Wanyoro tribe 256
Warming, Prof 84
warm-temperate species
Warren, Dr 123
Washo Indians 275
water 46, 179, 212, 303–4, 334
water action 308
water pressures 305 water tables, water table fluctuations 183, 257 water-weeds 86 water-mite 97 weasel 101
Webb and Bryson 170
Weichselian ice advance 40, 43, 93–4, 169–70, 299
West Angle Bay 171
West Indies 87
West Irian 170
West, R G 83
Weymouth, England 309 whales 57, 113, 309
whirlwinds 278
Whiston, William 5, 6, 18, 65, 66, 185
White Sea 297
whole water 303
Wigley 340
Willis, Dr Bailey 26
willow 311
Wilson, R 111
Winchell, Prof Alexander 337 winds 58, 190, 254, 257, 269, 276–7, 279, 290, 301, 329, 339
Wintun legend 275
Wisconsin, USA 93, 171
Wisconsonian ice advance (see Weichselian) wood 171
Wood Hills, 173, 310
woodlice 97, 104
Woodroffe 314
woolly rhinoceroses 191, 312
World Ages 65
world fracture complex (see fracture complexes)
Wormwood 290–1, 295
Wrangell, F R von 310–1
Wright, Dr G F 24, 130
Wright, W B 192

Yakutsk 312
Ya-hou 212
Yenisei River 105, 125, 170, 311
Yokohama 263
Yorkshire 86
Younger Dryas 16, 42–3, 64, 190, 192, 255, 314, 339, 340
Yukon 285

Zad Sparan 14
Zaglossus 102
Zend-Avesta 227, 303
Zeno brothers 4
Zeno map 243–4, 249
Zeuner, F E 86
Zeus 155, 187, 212, 328
Zodiac, zodiacal constellations 196–7, 217
Zohak 212
Zuni 157
Zuni Indian legends 272
Zurich 84

QE501
S36
1999

BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY
3 9999 03263 007 9

Sale of this material benefits the Library

$20.00

Astronomy/Geology

CATACLYSM!

Cataclysm! presents a breakthrough of enormous proportions—a new understanding of cosmic events in Earth's recent geological past.

Follow this multi-disciplinary, scientific study as it examines the evidence of a great global catastrophe that occurred only 11,500 years ago. Crustal shifting, the tilting of Earth's axis, mass extinctions, upthrusted mountain ranges, rising and shrinking land masses, and gigantic volcanic eruptions and earthquakes—all indicate that a fateful confrontation with a destructive cosmic visitor must have occurred. The abundant geological, biological, and climatological evidence from this dire event calls into question many geological theories and will awaken our memories to our true—and not-so-distant—past.

"In not only the scholarship of paleontology but the paleontology of scholarship, this is the sort of book which someday we will realize to be—like the record of a great extinction—the marker at the end of one era and the threshold of another. It is a monumental work, which no enlightened library of the coming paradigm shift will be without."

— Douglas Kenyon, Atlantis Rising magazine

"Allan and Delair do a brilliant job in revealing that researchers have barely touched the tip of the iceberg of events that shook the Earth around 9,577 B.C. . . . This book is an essential handbook to our ancient past: a brave multi-disciplinary approach that should be applauded."

— Rand Flem-Ath, coauthor, When the Sky Fell

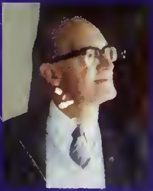
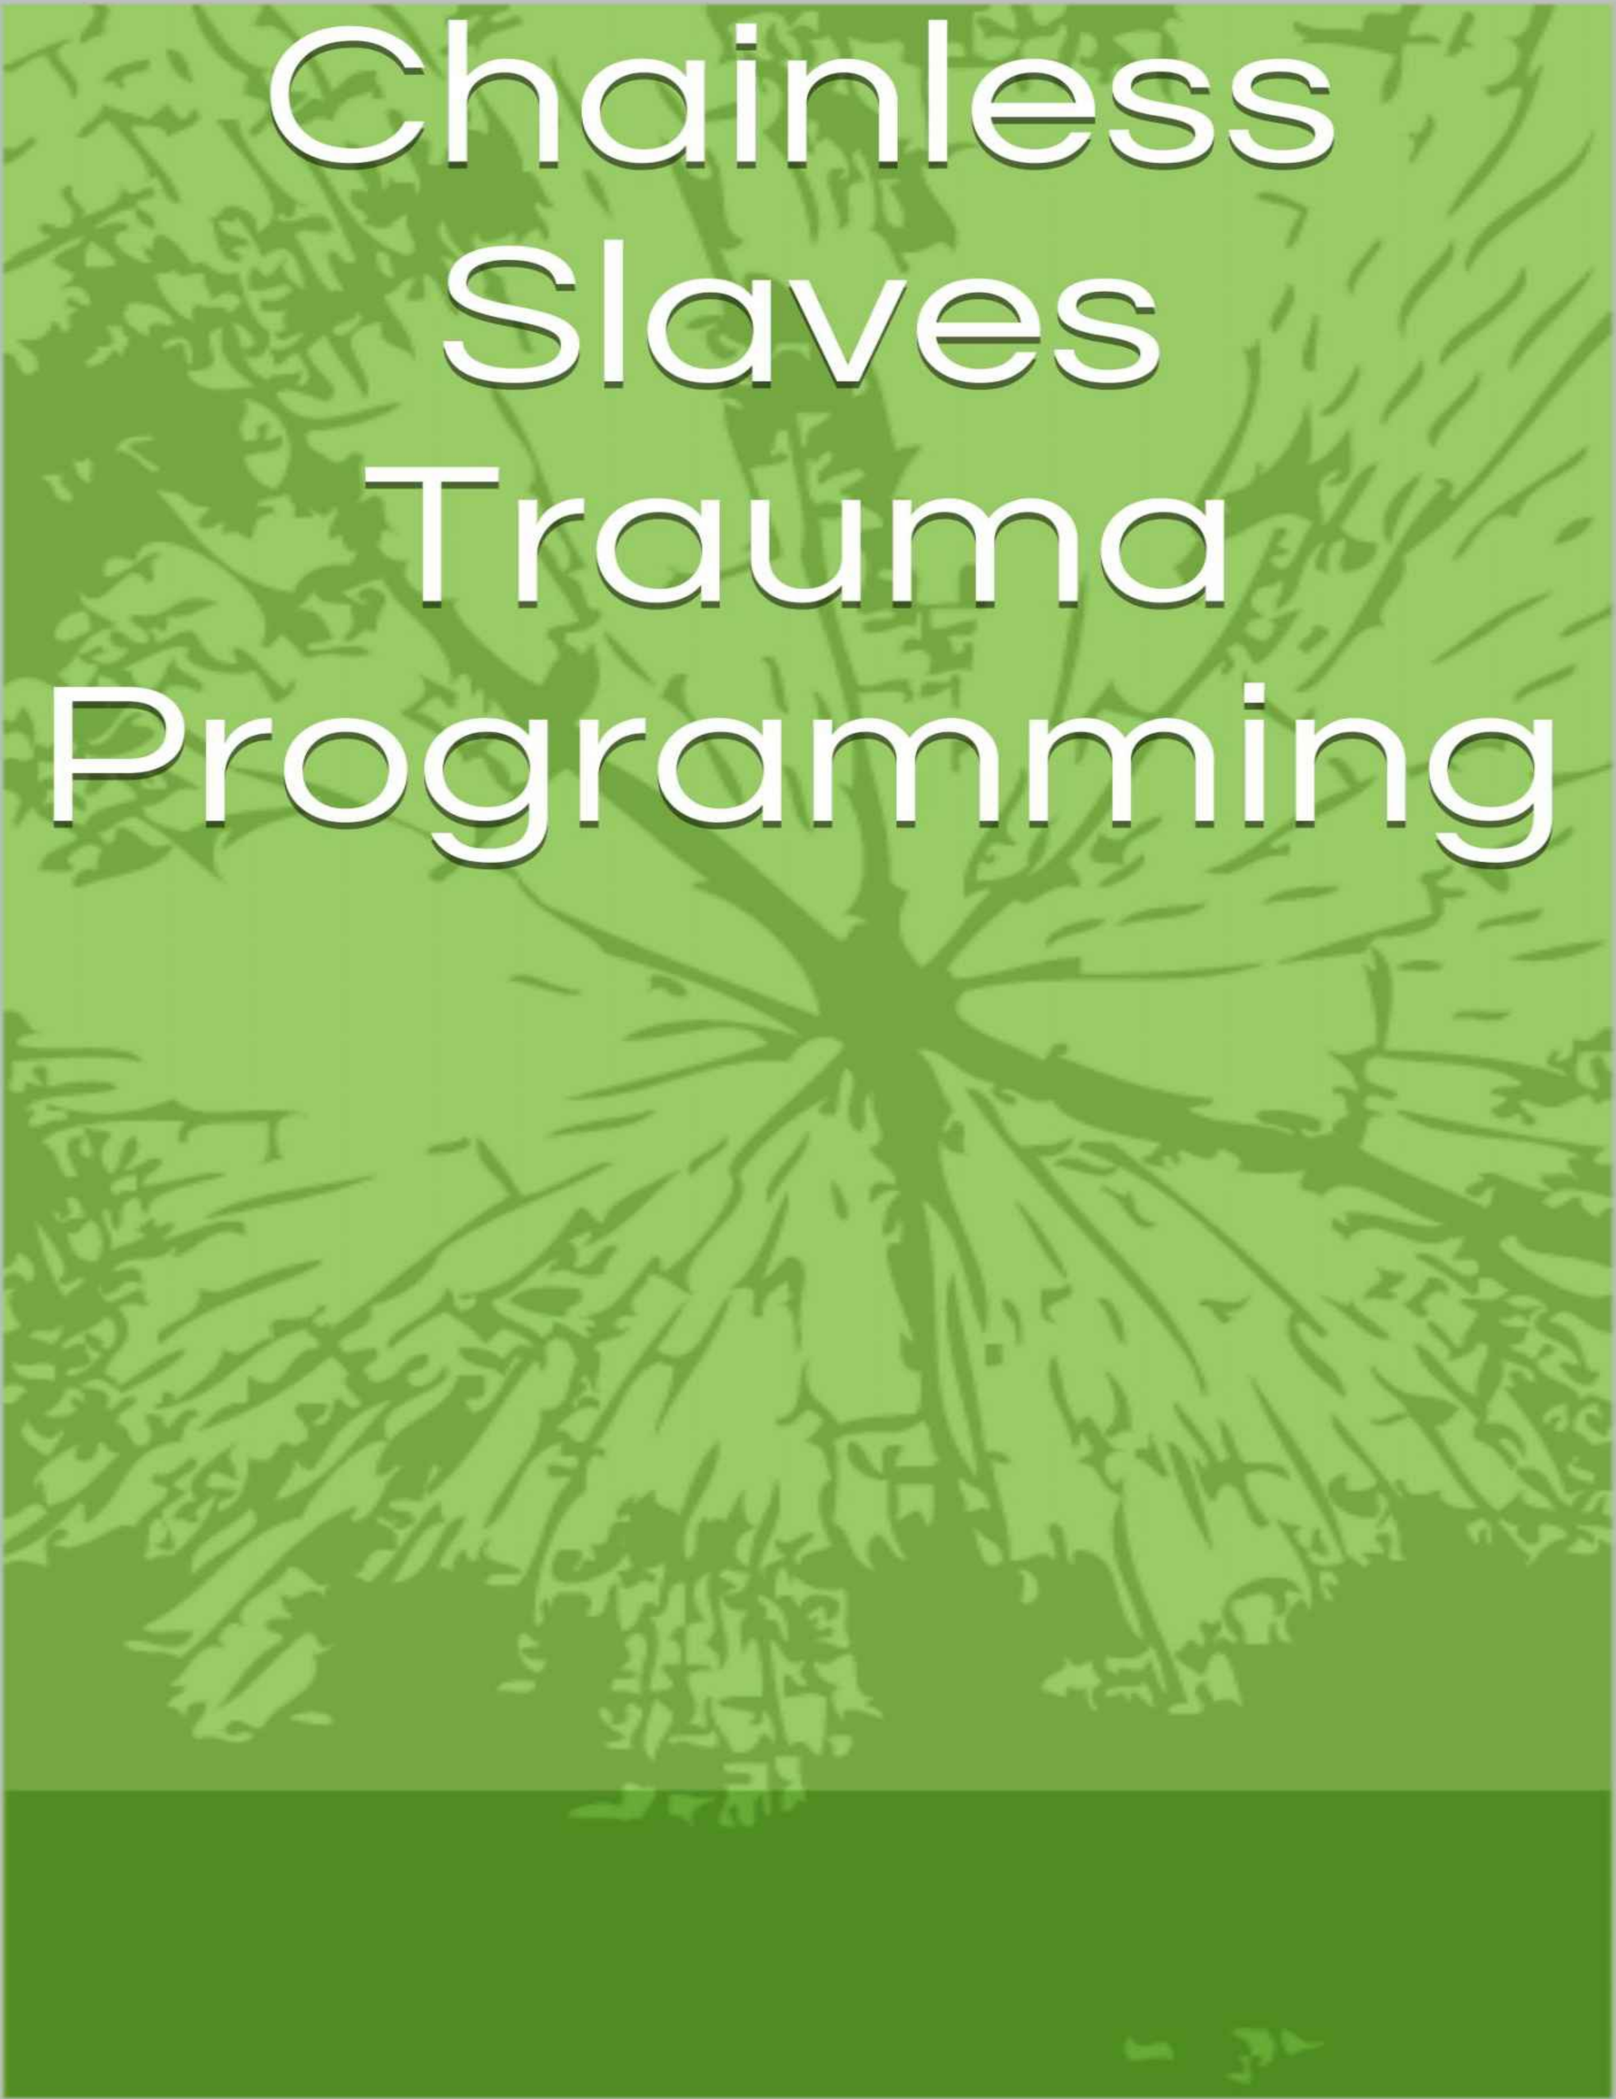
D.S. Allan, a Cambridge M.A., is a science historian specializing in paleogeography, particularly in the Arctic regions. A science teacher for many years, he is a skilled cartographer and has made a special study of evidence for climatic and landform change in recent geological times. He lives in Basildon, Essex, England.



J.B. Delair, B.Sc., is an Oxford-based geologist with wide international and commercial field experience. An anthropologist, he has a special interest in animal and plant distribution and in tribal traditions. He is the Museum Curator of Geology at University of Southampton, England.

ISBN 1-879181-42-8
52000
EAN
9 781879 181427

BEAR & COMPANY
PUBLISHING
books to celebrate & heal the earth



Chainless Slaves Trauma Programming

CLASSIFIED

Chainless Slaves

Trauma Programming

U.W. Ozian

2014

Trauma programming manual. This manual is an overview on how to create a dissociated subject. The manual lists tactics to use in trauma based programming.

1 Trauma-based Programming 1
2 Selection of Subjects 3
3 Hypnosis for Programming 4
4 Neuro-linguistic programming (NLP) 8
5 Hypnotic Surgery 12
6 Hypnotic Implants 13
7 Brain Frequency List 14
8 Preparing the Mind 16
9 Behaviour without Awareness 17
10 Principles of Control 18
11 Non-Coercive Techniques 20
12 Coercive Techniques in Programming 32
13 Steps of Obedience 34
14 Levels of Programming 36
15 Tools and Aids for Programming 39
16 Deprivation of Sensory Stimuli 41
17 Inside Structuring 44
18 Universal System Parts 53
19 Goals of Programming 56
20 Subliminal Perception 59
21 Human Experimentation 60
22 Scripts 61
23 Programming Music 62
24 Double Bind 63
25 Pain 64
26 Malingering 65
27 Debility 66
28 The Programming Plan 67
29 The Opening 71
30 Beginning of Programming 73
31 Infant Programming 75
32 Raising a Child Subject 77
33 Detailed Programming 78
34 Stabilizing the Programming 79

35 Split Brain Work 80
36 Applications for Drugs used in Programming 81
Section II Applications 83
37 Brainwave Frequencies 84
38 Double Meaning Word List 97
39 Programming Codes 100
40 Tortures Used in Programming 108
41 Internal Structures and Symbols 113
42 Electric Shock Torture (ECT) 118
43 Internal Base Systems 120
44 Games 125
45 Trauma Bonding 128
46 Inside Parts 130
47 Internal Programs 141
Glossary 161

1 Trauma-based Programming

Trauma-based Programming can be defined as systematic and calculated torture that blocks the subject’s capacity for conscious processing. Trauma Programming employs suggestion, hypnosis and/or classical and operant conditioning to implant thoughts, directives, and perceptions in the unconscious mind. The behaviours are implanted in trauma-induced dissociated identities (parts/alters) that force the subject to do, feel, think, or perceive things for the purposes of the programmer. The objective is for the subject to follow directives with no conscious awareness, including execution of acts in clear violation of the subject’s moral principles, spiritual convictions, and volition.

The primary factor for the trauma-based programming is the ability to disassociate. Dissociation is used as a defence to protect a subject from overwhelming pain and trauma. It is a natural ability of the brain. Installation of Trauma programming relies on the subject’s capacity to dissociate, pain threshold, and imagination which permits the creation of new walled-off personalities to hold and hide programming. Genically predisposition dissociative children are prime candidates for programming. The subject’s ability to dissociate is a major requirement and it is readily found in subjects that come from families with multiple generations of abuse. Mental dissociation enables the handlers to create walled-off parts in the subject’s psyche, which can then be programmed and triggered.

The subject cannot be traumatized indiscriminately or they will be killed. The master programmer has to know what they are doing. There will be doctors, heart monitoring equipment, and other medical tools used in programming. Programming foundation is completed in a clinically controlled environment to ensure entire control of the subject.

The type of programming which is placed in a subject varies. The subject’s creativity and their purpose in life would contribute to the uniqueness of the programming. Each subject visualizes differently and the programmer works with the subject’s creativity. Some parts will be formed solely by the subject in order to cope with life.

Each subject exists in their own circumstances; there are often common features in how they are controlled. The common features of control in subjects are: symbols, colours, and scripts.

The foundation of trauma-based programming is fear. A deep spirit of fear cripples a subject spiritually and emotionally. Guilt and shame are two more foundations for programming. The guilt will bind the subject to the programmer, handler, and other individuals that have been selected. This will lead to a loyalty that will make the subject less willing to disclose activities, and past trauma.

Programmers cause intense trauma to individuals through the use of electroshock, torture, abuse and mind games in order to force them to dissociate from reality.

Programmed individuals are used for different purposes, the sex industry, military, occult practices, and cults to name a few. Organizations have programmed subjects that are expendable. These are individuals are used in smut films, one-time use saboteurs, breeders, soldiers, drug couriers, used in rituals, and for training and traumatizing other subjects.

Subject's who have been given a designated purpose in life will have their genealogies hidden. They will have programmed to have a cover life to insure they will not be detected. Some children live in foster homes, with adopted parents, or with caretakers and guardians. Because these children reside with non-related programmers, these categories of children are commandeered to become programmed subjects of the intelligence agencies.

Children will not question the synthetic reality they are introduced to. Children are conditioned to believe what they see, feel, taste, hear, and touch. Using these five senses the programmers can control the child's surroundings. The experiences introduced to the subject will lead to an altered reality that the programmers can build and manipulate to meet their desires.

Traumatizing an individual on a specific day; their birthday, Christmas, Halloween, for example, is more damaging as the date won't be forgotten and will occur once a year. Trauma programming on specific dates allows the programmer to inlay clocks for triggering desired actions. The fathers or step-fathers are not often the subject's handler when they are growing up. The abuse by this subject will serve as a cover for programming. If the subject's front alters discover they are D.i.D, they will initially blame their multiplicity on the first abuser they remember, which will be a family member.

To make sure that the subject's mind develops properly, the baby will be interacted with so that those areas of the brain which are important for development will develop to the maximum. Common everyday items that surround the subject will be given unique meanings. The songs the subject hears on the radio will have trigger words. The lyrics will be scripted so programmed meanings can be attached to certain words and lyrics.

Something such as watching T.V., listening to the radio, or a sermon may have trigger phrases and programming cues in them.

If possible the programming process begins in the womb. Maternal thoughts, feelings, actions, and fears all reach the subject in the womb and affect them.

The unborn child hears and reacts differently to different music played. Comforting words and calming music will calm a fetus. According to research, the start of awareness is evidenced between the 28th and 32nd week. At that point, the brain's neural circuits are just as advanced as newborns.

From the 32nd week on the child shows that they carry out REM sleep. It had been noted from the sixth month of pregnancy onward; some of what the unborn subject learns will be remembered. Programmers will make a point of having the unborn subject hear the voices of individuals who will play a role in the programming. The subject may already know the hypnotic voice of one of their programmers at birth.

In the eighth week of life, the early fetus traumas programmers carry out is to poke the fetus with a sharp object to make it dissociative in the womb. By the fourth month, the unborn subject is making facial expressions. The subject can be overwhelmed while in the womb with negative sounds, bad tastes caused by what the mother eats, and being touched in ways that they dislike.

Programming drugs that cause specific responses in vitro can also be administered. With many programming fetuses, womb splits can begin.

The foundation of fear can begin to be layered in while the subject is still unborn using the methods mentioned.

A long-term unresolved stress on the mother will also stress the unborn subject. Short term stresses don't seem to have the long term side effects that long term stress has. Short term stresses are soon forgotten by the subject.

It has been noted, the love that the mother has for the unborn child is transmitted to the subject, and forms a protective barrier the subject can become resistant to traumas and stresses. When the mother is ambivalent or cool in their emotions, the babies have more physical and emotional problems.

2 Selection of Subjects

Adult subjects are selected who have no close family or friends. Once they have been selected, they are put under Level One hypnosis. At this time a clear and definitive pattern of their usefulness is determined by psychiatrists and programmers. If the subject posses a relatively high IQ, they will be filed in a "call file.” The IQ scale used in assessing subjects is the Stanford Binet.

The higher the IQ of a given subject, the further they can be programmed. If the IQ is high enough their abilities will be studied and the needs of the organization and determine how the subject can be further used. Once this determination is made, the subject will be brought to one of numerous facilities throughout the U.S. or abroad for further and final programming.

Only psychiatrists trained in the method of sub mental behaviour programming, overwrites and overlays, will be able to find any clues leading to post Level 1 or 2 programming. A typical psychologist may discover that the subject has been hypnotized in the past, and may even discover the original personality. But they will not be able to discover the location in the brain or memory, where Levels 3, 4 and 5 programs are stored. Without an activation code an outside psychologist or psychiatrist will not uncover the programming unless by accident.

A beginning point to control people is understanding human needs, and understanding the individual to be controlled. A Programmer learns everything they can about the subject they are to control. Programmed subjects who must function as intelligence officers, who recruit, are trained in the art of listening and conversation.

In some instances of programming after a subject has completed a hostile act the subject is captured and not killed. Due to the type of programming used the subject will not divulge any information. Even if the subject is tortured, they will not be able to remember the actual killing, terrorist act, or the reason they did it.

Once the subject is programmed, they will be recalled on a yearly basis and given hypnotic reinforcement of the original programming, or new programming will be inserted to modify the original programs. If no new programming is needed, the reinforcement programming can be done on a mass scale.

3 Hypnosis for Programming

The subject's Posthypnotic Suggestibility Index is determined by a series of simple tests. Hypnoamnesia is applied to the subject. They are given a name of an object or individual the subject's speed is timed to determine how quickly they can recover from the posthypnotic suggestion "You will not be able to remember the name of "____" no matter how hard you try."

The power of hypnosis is often underrated as the power of the mind is underrated. The mind can decide to be in command of breathing, heartbeat, and blood pressure.

Programmers are highly aware of how the mind functions, and how information and memories can be trapped in the mind. The mind naturally hypnotizes itself under diverse conditions.

Hypnosis is used to steer a subject's mind in the direction that has been dictated for them. New patterns of thought, feelings and behaviour are inserted to build confidence in the goals of the Programmers'. Hypnosis is used to anchor suggestions about sleep patterns, panic programs, phobias, health/ healing programs, health problems programs, pain control/pain programs, motivation programs, a suicide program called "hypno-sleep", an insanity program, and countless other uses.

Programmers do not need to formally induct their subject into hypnosis. A proper fear foundation will place the subject in a dissociative state that would make hypnosis simple.

The mind links together a series of mental processes. These links are called K-lines. Much of what the mind does is activate various K-lines so the mind can focus its conscious thinking. Once a K-line works, the mind in order to prevent itself from making uncontrolled changes, gives priority to those K-lines.

If the mind did not set up series of K_lines it would continuously have to relearn unimportant tasks that would make it impossible accomplish things in everyday life. Every skill would have to be constantly relearned. Emotions and needs trigger the mind to search out K_lines to accomplish a task quickly.

During programming the untrained K_lines are brought up to the top of the conscious mind. The programmer now has access and control over many or all the cognitive processes, including many the subjects would not normally activate. Under hypnosis, the mind willingly allows the programmer to change K-lines without the normal unconscious conventional restraints. Using behaviour modification techniques, the programmer activates dormant K-lines (K-lines that wouldn't normally develop) and build them in the mind.

During hypnosis, the mind has made the decision to accept control statements from the programmer. The mind has abdicated its position as the one in control of what is vital.

There are several ways to modify a subject's state of consciousness; the most useful one by programmers is to use a combination of drugs and hypnosis. Drugs are used to facilitate hypnosis. Modern drugs do almost all the work for the programmer they place the individual in a changed state and distort many perceptions of the subject. The distortions induced by the drugs are used to the programmers benefit.

Hypnosis or hypnotic trance is a form of dissociation. There are a number of types of dissociation: amnesia, subject states, localized paralyses, anaesthesia's, and hallucinations. Hypnosis can reproduce all of these dissociative states.

During the hypnotic trance, the human mind is at the pinnacle of its ability to quickly learn. What may take years to learn, will be accepted by the subject's subconscious in a few sessions.

The brain operates at several different brain-wave patterns. The brainwave patterns here are listed from the most active states of our life to the most relaxing; Beta (15-40 cycles per second), Alfa (9-14 cycles per second), Theta (5-8 cycles per second), Delta (2-4 cycles per second).

Hypnosis is a very powerful means to take the mind of the subject into the different levels of consciousness and brainwave activity. The voice of the programmer is used in specialized hypnotic deepening, inductions and confusion techniques is able to artificially induce lowered brain wave frequency into the Alpha, Theta and Delta states. The programmer will use the art of timing their words, repetition, combining several mutually supporting suggestions, and of having total confidence in their words to add strength to their hypnotic commands.

There are three states of consciousness; the conscious mind, subconscious and super conscious. These levels of consciousness represent differing degrees of intensity of awareness.

The conscious mind includes such things as the sensations, perceptions, memories, feeling and fantasies inside of our current awareness. The conscious mind is limited by its analytical nature, and therefore sees all things as separate and distinct.

The things the conscious mind wants to keep hidden from awareness are repressed into the unconscious mind. This is the deeper part of the mind that is responsible for processing thousands of things at any one time and for storing everything we have experienced in life in differing degrees of importance.

The third level of consciousness Super conscious is where programmers want to work. Intuition and heightened mental clarity flow from super conscious. Programmers also think this area of consciousness is where spiritual awareness is.

There are three levels of trance states used in programming: The first level is that of a light trance. In this level, the subject does not feel as if in trance state. They are fully aware of the noises in their environment. Although regressions and progressions can be done at this level, the information obtained is not very clear. Ninety five percent of individuals can achieve a light trance.

The second is a medium trance. In this state the subject is more relaxed. In a medium trance, the subject may be dimly aware of external noises but does not get distracted by it. About 70 percent of individuals can achieve a medium trance.

The third level is called a deep trance or somnambulistic trance. This is a very deep level of trance and the subject may not remember what was done in the trance state unless specifically triggered while out of the trance. Only about 5 percent of individuals can go into a deep trance.

Hypnosis appears to affect several areas of the brain--the brain stem is modified into the hypnotic state, and the midbrain centres are inhibited so that other areas--the motor, sensory and memory areas can be manipulated. Hypnosis can be used on numerous parts of the mind; intellectual, social-spiritual, and the primitive.

The Programmer is attempting to produce suggestions that the unconscious mind will accept. If the subconscious mind accepts the programmer's suggestions then the suggestion becomes reality to the subject, just as if the individual had experienced it as reality over a period of time.

The programmer must engage the subject's imagination. They should also build rapport with the subject. The good handler/programmer is not only using fear but the other emotions the subject's want with human bonding. These emotions encompass trust, feelings of acceptance, and approval. This is important as the subject must be willing to actively participate in the programming.

Muscular rigidity and deep breathing are one way to increase suggestibility within the subject. The programmer will also use other hypnotic methods, such as using their own body language to suggest a thought or feeling, and the voice roll. With this method words are delivered at the rate of 45 to 60 beats a minute.

To empower the suggestions, the programmer uses the subject's five senses. The subject visualizes an image using their five senses. The programmer will walk them through the image, allowing the subject to fill in the spaces with their own imagination.

The programmer will decide which area he wants to work with within the system. If the programmer is working with emotions he will focus solely on that theme during the session.

A hypnotic suggestion given to normal subjects lasts about a week, so reinforcement is necessary. The programming suggestions are layered in using, torture, and psychotropic medication. The suggestions are protected dissociated parts. These scripts which are layered in are almost impossible for the subject to be aware of to challenge them.

If a memory is laid in at a particular trance level, the subject may be able to avoid an abreaction later on by going above or below the memory's trance level. A deep level where the subject can't move a body part due to hypnotic suggestion is called the cataleptic state.

The mind has the ability to create amnesia barriers. Hypnosis is an important mechanism to move the mind to different neuropsychological states and to get the mind to different levels of the subconscious mind. Hypnosis can also play a role in working around amnesia, since both are types of dissociation.

Hyperventilation assists a subject into a hypnotic trance. Torture, depersonalization, fear and acute anxiety stimulate the body to hyperventilate.

Hypnotic cues are given to cause the body to go into various dissociative states. For example a post-hypnotic suggestion that causes hyperventilation and the accompanying trance state. This will allow the subject to recall the programming they received in this state.

Hypnotic cues that are tied to everyday objects enhance the programming. These triggers will consistently up hold programming throughout the subject's day to day tasks. The daily triggers will also prevent break downs in programming.

Some common objects in a subject's life that can be hypnotically given a programming trigger are: music, tones, colours, the sight of a book or Bible, pyramid on the back of a dollar bill, pictures of God, silk scarf's, jewellery, lights, sounds, TV programs, and countless other things.

The programmer may advise the subject they smoke and inform them every time they inhale smoke they will endure fire torture if they break their silence programming. When the subject exhales the smoke they are programmed to forget any doubts they have experienced concerning challenges to their programming. The programmed alters smoke because they are addicted, and re-enforce the programming of silence. The smoking in turn reinforces the power of the programmer/handler.

The brain produces a substance called enkephalin which acts just like morphine and reduces pain. The brain can be hypnotically trained to release enkephalin so that the brain doesn't perceive pain. This is important for self harm programming, suicide programming, Beta programming, and Delta programming.

Programmers also use hypnotism with electric shock. Regular electrical stimulation in many parts of the brain including the lower part of the reticular formation can change the state of consciousness from alert to sleepy.

There are certain safeguards in the use hypnotism. First, there is no danger of the subject being able to identify what has occurred. More important would be the conviction of innocence which the subjects have. There would not be actions of guilt and if ever accused of wrong doing, held secrets, the subject would respond honestly. This conviction of innocence on the part the programmed individual is the greatest safeguard under questioning by outside individuals.

4 Neuro-linguistic programming (NLP)

NLP is the building of associations with an anchor. Neuro linguistic programming is the evolution of hypnotherapy. Classical hypnosis depends on techniques for putting patients into suggestive trances; NLP is a technique of layering subtle meaning into spoken or written language so the programmer can implant suggestions into a subject's unconscious mind without them knowing.

The programmer is attentive to the subject they're working with by studying subtle cues such as eye movement, skin flush, pupil dilation and nervous tics.

Through these observations a programmer will determine: a) What side of the brain a subject is predominantly using; b) What sense (sight, smell, etc.) is most predominant in their brain; c) How their brain stores and utilizes information d) When they're lying or making information up.

The programmer will gradually and subtly mimic the subject. The programmer will take on the subject's body language, their speech mannerisms, and will begin speaking with language patterns designed to target the client's primary sense.

For example, a subject predominantly focused on sight will be spoken to in language using visual metaphors—"Do you see what I'm saying?" "Look at it this way"—while a subject for which hearing is the dominant sense will be spoken to in auditory language—"Hear me out," "I'm listening to you closely."

By mirroring body language and linguistic patterns, the programmer is will achieve one very specific response: rapport. A programmer essentially fakes the social cues that cause a subject to drop their guard and enter a state of openness and suggestibility.

Once rapport is achieved, the programmer will begin to delicately lead the interaction. Having mirrored the subject, they can now make subtle changes to actually influence the subject's behaviour combined with subtle language patterns, leading questions other techniques. A programmer at this point can guide a subject wherever they like, as long as the subject isn't aware of what's happening and thinks everything is arising organically, or has given consent. This means it can be fairly difficult to use NLP to get subjects to act out-of-character, but it can be used for engineering responses within a subject's system's range of behaviour.

From this point the programmer will do two things; elicit and anchor. Eliciting happens when a Programmer uses leading and language to engineer an emotional state. Once a state has been elicited, the Programmer can then anchor it with a physical cue—for instance, touching the shoulder.

Anchors

A stimulus is linked and triggers a physiological or emotional state in the subject. The skilled programmer will anchor an emotion with several sensory cues-- auditory, visual, and touch. The subject visualizes an emotional state from the past, or is placed in an emotional state by the programmer. When the state is reaching its peak, the anchor is placed in. The anchor needs to be unique, distinctive, and easy to repeat in the exact form that it was done. The law of strength applies to the strength of the trauma and the strength of the anchor. A stronger smell may be easier to associate with a strong trauma, which makes the anchoring stronger.

Much of trauma-based programming is setting anchors into parts. When the anchors are triggered, and the part is pulled up, then the anchors have worked. Two separate states can be fired at once.

These types of post hypnotic commands are the ones commonly used by hypno-programmers to change behaviour (behavioural modification).

Triggering Techniques: Real-Time Subconscious Implant Delivery: the Programmers are transmitting the posthypnotic command script to the subject and observing the subject's response. This technique is required for subliminal programming. All programming standard posthypnotic command scripts can be delivered in real-time. This form of delivery can cause the perception of a voice heard in the mind of a subject to give them information or orders depending on the purpose of the handler/programmer.

Prescheduled Subconscious Implant Delivery: The internal central switching computer can transmit a script to a specified part/alter at a pre-specified time. The transmitted script's transmission range can be limited to a single building, a city, or a large geographical area. By having prescheduled scripts, the subject has seemingly randomly occurring thoughts and feelings that can't be associated with a commonly recurring situation like event-triggered scripts precipitate.

Event-Triggered Implant Delivery: Posthypnotic subconscious implants that are triggered with an event, thought, or code word. These are strongly experienced by the subject and are powerful tools for reinforcing a predetermined desired behaviour and inflicting delusions.

The Handler can reinforce a predetermined desired behaviour by associating a subconscious implant (negative or positive reinforcement) with an event. An example is when the programmer desires to isolate the subject from a specific individual, place or thing; the subject will be implanted with a feeling of increased anxiety, hostility, tension, and discomfort. When the subject leaves the individual, place, or thing, another posthypnotic implant is triggered rewarding the subject's behaviour with a feeling of relief from the anxiety, hostility, tension, discomfort, and calm is restored in the subject's mind.

The handler/programmer precisely tailors the type of negative and/or positive reinforcement, the degree of the reinforcement, the duration of the reinforcing effect and the conditions of the trigger. This posthypnotic event-triggered reinforcement can be decreased gradually and can remain so subtle that the subject believes the discomfort is naturally occurring. The subject will believe it is there decision uninfluenced by anyone else that the subject should avoid the individual, place or thing.

Subconscious implants can be combined with other implants like posthypnotic-triggered thoughts to enhance the subject's decision concerning a specific situation. For example the subject can be implanted with a command to be sensitive to the changes in their emotions when around a therapist. The situation will elicit a strong negative emotion. This can be reinforced with another posthypnotic suggestion to avoid every situation that cause the subject discomfort and each time the subject commits themselves to removing themselves from a situation of this kind, they will feel increasing control over their lives

Steps to Anchoring

The anchor (or anchors) should be fired in exactly the same way every time to link them to the resource experience.

The programmer chooses an anchor (or anchors) that will trigger the resourceful state.

The programmers create a situation the subject will have an emotional response to (hate, fear, love, disgust, embarrassment, etc.). They will find an anchor that is unique to the experience. Individuals have the ability to use any three of the types of anchors independently or all together. It is important to ensure the anchors are used together and at the same time. The programmers ensure it is something that happens associated with that experience and is not common to other experiences.

A memory is induced, imagined or situation where the subject can experience the state.

The programmer then attaches a trigger.

The programmer will activate the anchor or anchors when the experience is vivid and the subject is in the desired state. The most effective time for the association of the anchor is at the peak of the experience. As the intensity of the experience lessens, so does the association. If the state is maintained at the intensity for a longer period of time it is more likely the anchor will be established.

Depending on the intensity of the experience can control how fast the subject makes the associations. If the experience is extremely intense the association may be strong after only one occurrence.

The programmer will break the state by having the subject participate in another activity briefly. The anchor will be tested by repeating the action that placed the anchor. It should be noted if the original response returns.

The steps should be repeated several times, each time making the memory more vivid. Replicating the experience will achieve the anchor permanently. This is not required when the anchor is established at the high point of the experience. It is recommended the anchor be strengthened by establishing it at the high point of several experiences.

Future pace the situation where the desired state is to experienced. Trigger the anchor to check that it creates a sufficiently resourced state.

The programmer will use the trigger to elicit the emotional response.

After twenty-four hours the programmer will check the anchor to ensure permanent.

Tips

If the subject does not experience the state when future pacing and experiences another state stop applying the anchor. The subject will experience the wrong state.

There is a knowingness which makes anchoring work that is established by the unconscious mind.

If the subject is in a situation where they experience the desired state in reality by another trigger, the programmer must re-establish the anchor to that situation.

Programmers can stack anchors together.

Collapsing anchors
When states oppose one another and cause too much difficulty in a subject the anchors can be collapsed.

The programmer must identify the preferred response and the state they wish to change.

It is essential, first, to identify the response preferred to replace the unwanted response. The programmer must create an occasion where the subject experienced strongly the preferred state.

The subject is moved into the memory and it is intensified before anchoring it. The programmer then triggers the anchor to make sure that the state is powerful and the anchor is properly set.

Once the programmer is satisfied that anchor is firmly in place, the subject is taken to the state that is to be changed. As the subject re-experiences the response, it is anchored to a blank part. The programmer then triggers the anchor and breaks the state.

The subject is tested to ensure each anchor is properly set, and then triggers both anchors simultaneously. The effect is usually one of mild confusion. At this stage, the programmer holds the anchors until the confusion dissipates.

The programmer gradually lifts the anchor of the unwanted state, and a few seconds later lift the anchor for the resource state.

The programmer will test by trying to trigger the unwanted response. The subject’s dominate response should be more neutral or the resource state should dominate. This is repeated as necessary until the resource state dominates.

Visual Anchors
Visual anchors are among the most common. There are positive and negative visual anchors.

Auditory Anchors
An auditory anchor is a stimulus that is a sound or sounds neurologically linked to a state of mind.

Kinaesthetic Anchors
A kinaesthetic anchor is one that is a movement, touch or physical action that is associated with a particular state.

5 Hypnotic Surgery

Hypnotic Surgery is used with child parts in the subject. The programmer will implant in the part replacement organs such as their heart, and stomach. The programmer will replace these parts with stones, bombs, and other devices to prevent the system from being breached by unauthorized individuals.

The heart will be replaced by black stones. The programmer will advise the part their heart is not good enough. The programmer will advise the subject they have a ‘heart of stone(s)’ and cannot feel emotions.

The stomach will be replaced with a bomb. The programmer will explain to the part the purpose of the bomb. The bomb may be placed in one part as ‘don’t talk’ programming. If the part were to talk they believe it would trigger the bomb and they would blow up. Another use for the bomb is for starvation programming. If the part eats, or eats above the allotted amount it will trigger the bomb.

Hypnotic surgery will also be used to remove body parts such as limbs, eyes, and ears. The programmer will advise the subject they can’t see specific things, hear precise words, or pick up designated items due to not having hands.

Using hypnosis programmers heal the subject’s wounds after they have completed the surgery. Most programmers will cut the subject at the sight of the surgery to insure there is a scar.

For example, alters in a subject’s system may be advised they have no faces and no hearts. They are programmed not to see their faces and not to hear any heart beat. If a pulse monitoring device is hooked up to the alter, the alter will go into a trance.

The programmers can put in distortion programming during this time. Visual and audio distortion programs are used to protect the system from outside intrusion.

6 Hypnotic Implants

Delusions: Delusions are used to discredit the witness and also provide an additional source for fear, intimidation and confusion. Delusions can be but are not limited to the Subject developing conspiracy theories of fellow employees and friends, beliefs that Angels or Demons are communicating or visiting them, tingling from microwave guns or implants, beliefs in supernatural events, etc.

Audio Hallucinations: Subjects often report hearing walls clicking, footsteps in the house, the sound of someone trying to open the door, drilling at the door, etc. These audio hallucinations are also used to discredit the witness and also provide an additional source for paranoia, fear, and negative reinforcement.

Voices in the Subject's Mind: The voices in the subject's mind are achieved in a variety of ways using real-time and prescheduled posthypnotic suggestion deliveries, and Noun Substitution implant techniques.

Visual Hallucinations: Visual hallucinations are usually implanted in the waking moments when a subject is coming out of or is in a somnambulatory state (light sleep) preferably in a darkened room. The hallucinations are fleeting, usually lasting less than one minute and are not durable. Typical hallucinations reported by subjects are Angels, large spiders, and movement of various shadowy objects across the ceiling, bright spot of light ahead of the subject, etc

Noun Substitution Posthypnotic Implant: The subject can have a posthypnotic suggestion implanted that changes the form of pronouns in the subject's internal thinking. The result is the subject perceives that someone is telling him/her to do something with nearly every thought. An example is; the subject thinks, "I should go to church today". With the noun substitution posthypnotic suggestion the subject experiences the following internal thought, "You should go to church today!"

Notice that by implanting the posthypnotic command into the subject's subconscious mind to think the pronoun "You" instead of "I" the subject will perceive that they are being directed by a voice even though the majority of the internal thought content is their own naturally occurring thought. This subconscious implant can be used in combination with other implants to increase the subject's perception of threat, fear, and therefore paranoia. It can be used with other posthypnotic suggestion implants that will give the subject the perception of either a "good" or "evil" voice or spirit is directing him/her.

This implant is powerful because it gives the subject the perception that the spirit, angel, God or Holy Spirit knows and directs the subject's every thought. It provides a convincing proof that "God knows every thought of their children". Subjects that don't have a superstitious frame of reference and seek professional help are usually misdiagnosed as schizophrenic.

Tinnitus (Ear Ringing): Tinnitus is implanted to distract the subject should an outside individual attempt to speak with the subject about an ‘off limits’ topic. This is produced by a posthypnotic suggestion.

Complete Quiet Silence: Used as a positive reinforcement for two reasons; the subject has the tinnitus removed to indicate that the subject has “Peace Restored", and the subject is listening to and following the correct programming script.

7 Brain Frequency List

Every part of a subject’s body vibrates to its own rhythm. The brain has a unique set of brain waves. There are five distinct brain wave frequencies; Beta, Alpha, Theta, Delta and Gamma.

The brain works off of waves that are less than 16 hz. the human ear can’t hear anything below 30 hz. If one ear hears 100 hz. and the other ear hears 104 hz. the brain will hear a ghost beat of 4 hz. 4 hz is the theta/delta frequency on the border of sleep and waking that can begin an astral trip. Focus 10 is just the starting point for astral travel. Focus 12, 15, 21 and beyond are the real trip. When a subject astral projects it changes the BEG pattern to a pattern called Alphoid. To stimulate a subject to astral project they are induced into sleep, and as they lose consciousness, the mind is jolted awake with high-frequency beta signals. The body remains asleep, and the mind is free from the body to wander. A hemispheric synchronizer can be used is used to get both brain hemispheres working together.

Other Theta Controls ELF (Extremely Low Frequency Waves) can be used to modify subject’s thoughts, implant thoughts, and modify their emotions, such as make a subject angry.

Each frequency, measured in cycles per second (Hz), has its own set of characteristics representing a specific level of brain activity and hence a unique state of consciousness.

Delta (0.1 – 3 Hz): Extremely deep relaxation/sleep with complete subconscious operation. The Delta frequency is the slowest state. It is where awareness is completely detached. Delta is the realm of the unconscious mind. It is the gateway to the Universal mind and the collective unconscious whereby information received is otherwise unavailable at the conscious level. Delta is associated with deep healing and regeneration, the physical body begins to recuperate and recover.

Epsilon (below 0.5 Hz) Delta brain states actually continue deeper into these. These extremely slow Epsilon brainwave patterns might have extremely fast Hyper Gamma/Lambda brainwave patterns modulating within them. Epsilon is associated with states of suspended animation where no heart beat, respiration or pulse is noticeable.

Theta (4 – 7 Hz) Theta is the realm of the subconscious mind. Deep relaxation where the conscious mind is, for the most part, 'switched off', and the subconscious mind is left to flourish. Theta brain waves are present during very deep relaxation and light sleep, including the REM (dreaming) state. It is also known as the twilight state as it is normally only momentarily experienced as you drift off to sleep (from Alpha) and arise from deep sleep (from Delta). Vivid visualizations, great inspiration, profound creativity, exceptional insight as well as the subject’s mind's most deep-seated programs are.

This is where most hypnotists aim to take their subject down to. Theta is where ideas, visualizations and suggestion are more likely to enter the subconscious mind and consciously subject’s become less aware of what is going on around them.

Alpha (8 – 15 Hz) A mild daydream or light relaxation state. This is the most easily reached brain wave state, and also includes both the youngest and most easily accessed alters in the entire system. The relaxed detached awareness achieved during light meditation is characteristic of Alpha and is optimal for programming the mind for successful actions. Alpha heightens the subject's imagination, visualization, memory, learning and concentration. It lies at the base of your conscious awareness and is the gateway to your subconscious mind. Alpha is typified by partial conscious awareness and partial subconscious predominance at the same time. It is useful to absorb information when in Alpha. Alpha promotes more of the left side of the brain to be used for processing.

Beta (16 – 31 Hz) Beta brain waves are associated with normal waking consciousness and a heightened state of alertness, logic and critical reasoning. As a subject participates in daily activities they are at Beta. In such a state we have full conscious awareness and attention of everything around us and usually only one side of brain is operating. Although important for effectively functioning in everyday life, higher Beta levels translate into stress, anxiety and restlessness. Higher cycles of Beta Frequency usually equate to stress, anxiety and 'over thinking' as the conscious mind becomes misguided or reacts negatively to a given situation. High brainwave beta frequency also equates to hypertension, increased heart rate, increased blood flow, cortisone production and glucose consumption.

Beta is often associated with aggressive impulses. Beta state will often hold cult protectors, internal warriors, and military systems. They may be colour coded blue.

Gamma (32 – 100 Hz) Gamma waves are the fastest of the brain wave frequencies and signify the highest state of focus possible – they're associated with peak concentration and are considered to be the brain's optimal frequency for cognitive functioning. The average individual never reaches this high of frequency range. In order to reach Gamma an experienced programmer must access it,

These higher frequency sound waves are associated with bursts of insights, higher mental activity, and information processing including perception, problem solving, fear, and consciousness. Gamma brain wave states assist in the reshaping of brain structures that persist beyond actual periods of programming. Gamma wave activity is thought to be associated with a phenomenon known as "neuroplasticity," or the ability of the brain to form new connections and build on pre-existent structures.

A side effect of producing gamma waves in the brain is high gamma activity works as a natural anti-depressant, boosting a subject's mood, empathy, and compassion.
When compared gamma waves to theta waves and the effects and states linked to both one end of the scale (gamma) generates intense focus and energy, while the other end of the scale (theta) is much more passive in nature.

Lambda (200 Hz). Associated with wholeness and integration also associated with mystical experiences and out of body experiences. Self awareness, higher levels of insight and information. They are carried on the very slow moving Epsilon waves

The Alpha-Theta border, from 7 to 8Hz, is the optimal range for visualization, mind programming and using the creative power of your mind. It is the mental state at which you consciously create your reality. At this frequency of mind control you are conscious of your surroundings but your body is in deep relaxation. To learn how to access this level of mind at will you must first learn

Sigma (12–14 Hz) in a burst of oscillatory brain activity that occurs during stage 2 sleep. Sigma is also called sleep spindles. It consists of waves that occur for at least 0.5 seconds. Represent periods where the brain is inhibiting processing to keep the sleeper in a tranquil state. Sleep spindle activity has furthermore been found to be associated with the integration of new information into existing knowledge as well as directed remembering and forgetting Theta-Delta-(3.5 Hz) Long term memory access.

8 Preparing the Mind

The programmer places the subject in an acute state of anxiety and guilt. The tension reduces the power of the judgement part of the mind. One of the tortures for subjects is to keep them from going to the bathroom and relieving themselves. This is part of the hypnotic programming package. The anxiety that this creates increases the power of the programming in the brain, because the anxiety causes slight malfunctions with the brain's judgment abilities. Mental and physical fatigue is also sought in the subject. For instance, water deprivation is common. Offensive language also helps drive the mind into tension and encourages it into an alpha state.

Nine areas are monitored in the subject throughout programming. Once monitored it is determine which needs are priority needs for the subject. Programmers will use what they call "the depth approach" to subconsciously gratify those needs in a way that gains control over the subject.

In programming, these 9 areas are identified as weaknesses, because programmers and handlers will attempt to manipulate these desires for their own gain. They set up short-range and long term goals and plans on how to control subject.
These nine areas are:

1. Emotional security

2. Recognition of efforts or reassurance of worth

3. Creative outlets

4. A sense of personal power

5. A belonging somewhere

6. Immortality

7. Ego-gratification

8. Love in all its forms

9. New experiences

9 Behaviour without Awareness

There are four principal categories of behaviour without awareness. The subject may be unaware of:

1. Their behaviour itself. They may be whispering without realizing, or they may be moving into a trap without knowing that the trap is there. A special case here is abnormal behaviour in which the subject fails to realize what they are doing because their normal awareness and self-control have been interrupted by disturbing agents such as fear, anxiety, illness, drugs, or hypnotic suggestion.

2. The relation of their behaviour to some stimulus. The subject may be unaware of the fact that the Programmer is influencing them by saying "Right" after certain statements and by remaining noncommittal after others. The process called "operant conditioning" falls into this category.

3. The stimulus itself, because of its slight impact. The subject may be unaware of a very faint sound or a quick flash of light, unaware in the sense that they lack the usual visual sensations. Subliminal perception falls into this category.

4. The precise nature of the stimulus, as well as its relation to their behaviour, because of inattention. The subject may be aware of vague sensations, but they are not aware either of the source or of the significant content of the stimulation, although their behaviour may change in accordance with changes in the stimulus. This category includes a great deal of perceptual activity affecting ordinary social behaviour. A subject is often unaware of the specific cues and clues to which they are reacting not because the stimulus is insufficient to reach the consciousness but because the effort to be fully aware of all the cues all the time would create too great a cognitive strain. In persuading a subject to do something they normally or rationally would resist doing a Programmer can make use of any one of these categories of psychological processes. Usually the purpose is to produce behaviour of which the subject is unaware.

10 Principles of Control

There are progressive steps in exercising control over a subject and changing their behaviour and personality. Subject's being programmed must be unaware they're being programmed. A subject is hard to manipulate if they know they are being manipulated.

If subject resistance is encountered during screening or during the opening phases of programming, non-coercive methods of sapping opposition and strengthening the tendency to yield and to cooperate may be applied. Although these methods appear here in an approximate order of increasing pressure, it should not be inferred that each is to be tried until the key fits the lock. On the contrary, a large part of the skill and the success of the experienced programmer lies in their ability to match method to subject. The use of unsuccessful techniques will of itself increase the subject's will and ability to resist.

This principle also affects the decision to employ coercive techniques and governs the choice of these methods. If in the opinion of the programmer a totally resistant subject has the skill and determination to withstand any non-coercive method or combination of methods, it is better to avoid them completely.

Threats vary on a long sliding scale from minor to extreme. Programmers can threaten to tell other individuals or put a gun in a subject's mouth and threaten to pull the trigger. At the extreme, the goal is to create terror and belief that pain or something highly undesirable is about to happen.

The threat of torture usually weakens or destroys resistance more effectively than torture itself. The threat to inflict pain, for example, can trigger fears more damaging than the immediate sensation of pain. Threats work on fear and anticipated pain, where the thought and expectation of discomfort leads the subject to imagine and virtually feel the pain, physical or emotional, that would be experienced. Threats may be unspoken, for example where the programmer plays with a weapon or where instruments of torture are visible.

Threats delivered coldly are more effective than those shouted in rage. It is especially important that a threat not be uttered in response to the subject's own expressions of hostility. These, if ignored, can induce feelings of guilt, whereas retorts in kind relieve the subject's feelings.

If the subject is immune to threats, then individuals they hold dear may be threatened, such as family and friends.

The same principle holds for other fears: sustained long enough, a strong fear of anything vague or unknown induces regression, whereas the materialization of the fear, the infliction of some form of punishment, is likely to come as a relief.

The threat of death has often been found to be useless. It has the highest position in law as a defence mechanism, but in many programming situations it is a highly ineffective threat. The principal reason is that the ultimate threat is likely to induce sheer hopelessness if the subject does not believe that it is a trick.

The effectiveness of most of the non-coercive techniques depends upon their unsettling effect. The programming situation is in itself disturbing to most subject's encountering it for the first time. The aim is to enhance this effect, to disrupt radically the familiar emotional and psychological associations of the subject. When this aim is achieved, resistance is seriously impaired. There is an interval -- which may be extremely brief -- of suspended animation, a kind of psychological shock or paralysis. It is caused by a traumatic or sub-traumatic experience which explodes, as it were, the world that is familiar to the subject as well as their image of themselves within that world. Experienced programmers recognize this effect when it appears and know that at this moment the subject is far more open to suggestion, far likelier to comply, than they were just before they experienced the shock.

Another effect frequently produced by non-coercive (as well as coercive) methods is the evocation within the subject of feelings of guilt. Most subjects have areas of guilt in their emotional topographies, and a programmer can often chart these areas just by noting refusals to follow certain lines of questioning. Whether the sense of guilt has real or imaginary causes does not affect the result of intensification of guilt feelings. Making a subject feel more and more guilty normally increases both their anxiety and their urge to cooperate as a means of escape.

The subject's peers, family, closest friends, and spouse are all involved in the programming. These individuals will reinforce for the subject the programmer/handler/family is good and has the subject's best interests at heart, no matter how abusive the behaviour. The individuals who surround the subject also reject and accept the subject based on their behaviour. This reinforces to be accepted the subject must behave and follow the structure of the programming. Those involved also want to assist the subject in growing, and understanding the goals set for them.

The subject is surrounded by individuals who all dress alike, act alike, and use the same terminology. The subject will question themselves instead of the people who surround them because the subject is the one who is different. The uniformity and consistency of the individuals that surround the subject will help insure compliance. No ideas are allowed for the subject to confront their programmer. This is to create behaviour that ensures the group will maintain secrecy and work together.

Programmers also use these techniques, including bonding with the subject, convincing the subject that they care for them, no one else could possibly understand them (the subject) the way the programmer does.

11 Non-Coercive Techniques

The following are typical of behaviour control techniques used in programming.

Absolute Authority: That cannot be challenged.
Breaking sessions: that pressures a subject until they mentally break.
Changing values: to change what is right and wrong.
Confession: to leave behind the undesirable past.
Dietary control: that weakens the subject's thinking.
Entrancement: open the mind and limit rational reflection.
Engagement: that draws a subject in.
Exhaustion: so they are less able to resist persuasion.
Guilt: about the past that they can leave behind.
Higher purpose: associate desirability with a higher purpose.
Identity destruction: to make space for the new identity.
Illogic: Emotion and fallacy that persuades.
Information control: that blocks out dissuading thoughts.
Incremental conversion: shifting the subject one step at a time.
Isolation: separating subject from dissuasive messages.
Love Bomb: to hook in the lonely and vulnerable.
Persistence: never giving up, wearing subject down.
Progressive Demands: Add increasingly stronger requests.
Radicalization: Creating more extremists.
Special language: that offers the allure of power and new meaning.
Thought-stopping: block out distracting or dissuading thoughts.

Conversion as revelation Conversion may take place suddenly as a revelation, for example when a higher purpose is realized and all values that are associated with that are adopted. This is more likely to happen with subjects who have a strong need for certainty and who therefore tend to adopt extreme views.

The first stage in changing behaviour is making the subject aware of the control. A child subject is made aware of the physical and psychological control of the programmer/handler and will swiftly recognize they are over powered. A proficient subject will recognize the overwhelming power of the individuals around them and the corresponding responses when the expectations aren't followed. The subject will recognize the definite limits that have been placed upon the ways they can respond.

Realization of their complete dependence upon the controlling system is a major factor in the controlling the subject's behaviour. The subject is required to recognize and accept the fact that food, tobacco, praise, and the only social contact that they receive will come from the programmer who exercises control over him.

Control over time: The programmer must control the subjects time. A strict schedule must be complete and followed. The schedule must encompass the entire 24 hours of the day and the subject must adhere to the schedule.

Start easy: Agreement over rules typically starts with generalized rules with which it is hard to disagree, for example; “No talking while eating”.

Tighten the rules: These rules will be gradually tightened over time. As the subject grows the basic premise, additional judgement criteria are added. For example, “No talking while eating' becomes “Talking while eating means you eat less food' to “The more you talk the less time you get to eat' to 'you are no longer hungry’.

Align with subject’s values: A conversation that may start with ideas will eventually turn to thoughts about what is right and wrong, good and bad, important and less important. In other words, it focuses on values. If you can change these rules in a subject’s head, then the programmer have no need to police them - the values will do that.

An effective start is to seek out the values of the subject and play to these. If the subject puts themselves first, then be admiring of them. A further values platform is generic human values, which are very difficult to deny, Love, peace, helping one another. Values can also be negative. Selfishness and hedonism can be elevated as worthwhile reasons. Racism and elitism may be accepted as true.

Progressive conversion: If the programming values are different from those of the subject, then the transition process is a progression, rather than a sudden conversion.

Control of values: The programmer must be clear to the subject as the one who sets values. This is made possible by having one of the basic values of the group be the leader must be obeyed without question. When the leader is showing wisdom and concern, this may seem logical.

Changing values: When converting a subject, one of the key things a programmer does, no matter where the subject started from, is to move into the realm of ideas and values. This includes anything that is not tangibly physical, and can include social and political ideas as well as religious and quasi-religious ideas. By doing this the subject is removed from the real world and into the ideological world of the programmer.

Align them with programming values: Show alignment towards the subject, the exchange principle dictates they should alignment towards the programmer/handler. When the subject is shown appreciation, they will show appreciation in return and will bond with the programmer connecting their sense of identity.

*Embodiment of values: T*he programmer is to appear as a decisive embodiment of values. The programmer is elevated to a state of godhood. They may not claim it themselves, but through their manipulation of values they effectively reach this very powerful position.

Programmers take charge of values: More control of the subject occurs when the programmer (or handler) is able to take full control of values. When a programmer can dictate what is right and wrong, they have the basis for total control.

Black and white thinking is created by the programming. There must be a tightly controlled system of logic. There must be totalitarian leaders, who inspire confidence and discipline questioning behaviour. Subjects are trained to believe seeking to leave, or questioning the philosophy, would mean isolation, torture, and the possibility of death. A hierarchy of leadership are given the authority to discipline those who do not comply with the training and teachings. This hierarchy will be planned internally into the subject.

Create a sense of powerlessness. This is administered through pain, degradation, tying up subjects, and control over the subject's time. This is completed from infancy on.

Needs Of Individuals Are Promised To Be Met, But Are Ignored For Group Goals. The Programmers/handler will promise to meet individual needs of alters. These things may be food, clothing, and shelter. These needs are ignored for group goals. If there isn't enough food for everyone, no one will eat.

Isolation from the World, the only reality is the programmers. The Programmer isolates the subject so no new ideas are available or allowed except their ideas. Whatever the Papa Bear (handler/programmer) dictates is reality. Each alter will only communicate with a few other alters. What this does is divide subject from their own parts and total awareness. The will and mind is broken so that there is no organized resistance, or access to other parts that may be aware of internal workings.

Isolation typically creates anxiety, that anxiety intensifies the desire to be with others who share the same fear. First-born children are more anxious and less willing or able to withstand pain than later-born children. Other applicable hypotheses are that fear increases the affiliative needs of first-born and only children much more than those of the later-born. These differences are more pronounced in subjects from small families then in those who grew up in large families. Only children are much likelier to hold themselves together and persist in anxiety-producing situations than are the first-born, who more frequently try to retreat

The subject will often be denied friends, and contacts outside the controlled environment. They will be deprived of all naturally occurring relationships by programming. This is done by switching, flooding, and system protection programming. Isolation is imperative and parts are made to feel like animals rather than human to isolate them outside individuals. Subjects will be programmed to hate Jesus and the God of the Bible, so they are isolated from spirituality and seeking spiritual assistance.

The subject starts to experience severe insecurity in this stage. The Programmer uses this insecurity against the subject in several ways. Because of the impaired reasoning ability and emotional isolation, the subject is susceptible to the approaches of insincere individuals, which are used by the programmer to emotionally hurt the subject more. This allows the programmer to convince the subject that individuals can't be trusted and only the programmer/handler can be trusted. This serves to isolate the subject from supportive peer groups and makes the subject emotionally dependent on the handler and programmer resulting in the programmer and handler gaining more power in the subject's life.

Sensory Bombardment and Fatigue. This includes being bombarded with loud noises or music and flashing or bright lights, prolonged sleep deprivation, environmental control, cages, loud continues noises, love bombing of specific parts and a sterile environment. These methods are designed to overload the senses, interfering with sleep, cognition, and concentration.

Breaking down the self

Assault on identity: The subject is not who they think they are. This is a systematic attack on a subject's sense of self (their identity or ego) and their core belief system. The programmer denies everything that makes the subject who they are: "You are not a boy/girl." "You are not intelligent." "You are not athletic." The subject is under constant attack for days, weeks or months, to the point that they become exhausted, confused and disoriented. In this state, their beliefs seem less solid.

Bombard them with accusations: The subject is isolated and accusing them of various transgressions begins. Accusations may start with diminutive things that are easy for them to admit then steadily escalate with admonishments of breaking important values and even being basically bad and shameful.

This process should be completed by a number of Programmers. The more individuals and the higher in standing they are, the more effective this method becomes. Few subjects can ignore accusations from individuals they live with have authority of them.

The Subject's Sense Of Identity Is Lost. The subject loses their sense of self and surrenders it to the handler/programmer. There will be no sense of where they begin and end, and where the Handler/programmer begins and ends. Subjects will demonstrate new behaviour by Conformity: dress, language, behaviour using group language will eventually stop the thinking mind.

The awareness of control and recognition of dependence result in causing internal conflict and breakdown of previous patterns of behaviour. Although this transition can be relatively mild in the case of a young subject, it is almost consistently severe for the adult subject undergoing programming. Only an individual who holds their values lightly can change them effortlessly. Since the programmers aim to have the individuals undergo profound emotional change, they force their subjects to seek out painfully what is desired by the controlling individual. During this period the subject is likely to have a mental breakdown characterized by delusions and hallucinations

Continue until subject breaks: The point of this session is to push them past a breaking point; similar to when a subject has a nervous breakdown the session may continue well past the point where the subject is huddled in a fetal position, rocking back and forth and weeping uncontrollably. With this action the programmer wears down the subject's sense of identity, in order to effectively destroy their personality and makes them flee from who they are.

Watch for apathy. After the subject's self-esteem is broken down and continuing failure and persistent suffering start to dominate every day, the individual becomes apathetic as a defence mechanism.

Apathy can lead to the subject not responding to and a mental and physical surrender that cannot be corrected.

Critical Thinking And Disagreeing With The Programmer Is Forbidden. The subject must suspend ability to think critically or disagree with programmer. The subject must never question the Handler/programmer. They must never get angry at the handler, if they do the subject is advised they want to be punished. The subject must always comply or be subject to punishment.

The assumptions of guilt and atonement: A basic assumption and rule is the subject in question is already guilty. Guilt is an effective lever that casts the subject as imperfect and inferior. The associated assumption is that guilt may be relieved by atonement of some variety, whereby the subject may be forgiven for the bad things they have done. This creates a two-sided force by which hurt and rescue may be applied.

Guilt: The subject is appalling. While the identity crisis is setting in, the programmer is simultaneously creating an overwhelming sense of guilt in the subject. The subject will be repeatedly and mercilessly attacked for any "sin" the subject has committed, large or small. The programmer will criticize the subject for everything from the "evilness" of their beliefs to the way he eats too slowly. The subject begins to feel a general sense of shame, that everything they do is wrong.

Self-betrayal: The subject will agree with the programmer that they are appalling. Once the subject is disoriented and is over whelmed with guilt, the programmer forces them to denounce any individual in their life who shares the same "erroneous" belief system that they hold. This betrayal of subjects own beliefs and of people they feel a sense of loyalty to increases the shame and loss of identity the subject is already experiencing.

Breaking point: With their identity in crisis, experiencing deep shame and having betrayed what the subject has always believed in, they may undergo a "nervous breakdown." In psychology, a "nervous breakdown" is a collection of severe symptoms that can indicate any number of psychological disturbances. The breaking point may involve uncontrollable sobbing, deep depression and general disorientation. The subject may have the feelings of being totally lost and alone. When the subject reaches their breaking point, their sense of self can be remade. The subject has no clear understanding of who they are or what is happening. At this point, the programmer sets up the temptation to convert to another belief system that will save the subject from their desolation.

Discovery that there is an acceptable solution to their predicament is the first stage of reducing the individual's conflict. Subjects of programming realising this will lead to feelings of relief of internal conflict. It is at this point they are prepared to make major changes in their value-system. This is an automatic rather than voluntary choice. They have lost their ability to be critical.

Altered States and Hypnosis Are Used. The handlers/programmers use hypnotic techniques to change the minds states. Programmers induce dissociation by songs, chanting, guilt inducing sessions, torture, isolation, repeating triggers 3X, starvation, inadequate sleep, and strenuous physical activity. This combination will lead to a reduction of alertness.

The reduction of alertness will create confusion in the mind. Programmers will also cause confusion using a series of alters. The subject may go into revolving from one alter to another, or may have alters coming and going with conflicting messages so that the subject remains in a programmed confused state. Programmers will give the mind something simple to focus on so that it goes into a flat state.

The mind feels good to shift into this simple flat state. The brain quits thinking and shifts to a lower level of conscious so the controllers can advise the subject what to think. Programmers can induce a mood or state of mind hypnotically which will make retrieval of something learned dependent upon going into that particular mood or state.

Out of Body Experiences: (O-B-E's) are induced by the torture and psychotropics. This training will lead to astral projection.

The Mind's Natural Alarm Clock: The programmer's use the mind's natural ability to wake up at specific times to inlay clocks for scheduled tasks. Subjects may be given the coded messages that will occur at specific timed intervals. Sleeping patterns are also related to personality. By programming different alters to have certain sleep patterns, their personality can be adjusted.

Behaviour modification. A version of behaviour modification is tailored to the subject. It is determine what the subject does well, and praise and reinforce that behaviour. The programmer states the desired goal. Then continue to reinforce promptly the things the subject is doing well. The goal in mind must be measurable. An example of this might be for a handler to praise a hunting part that is being programmed and give the subject a reward after a successful hunt. The reinforcement needs to be quick, and appropriate.

Manipulate rewards, punishments, experiences to elicit new behaviour. Manipulate rewards, punishments, and experiences. This must be done to suppress previous social behaviour. Reward: Participation, conformity to ideas/behaviour, zeal, personality changes, the appropriate verbal response.

Behaviours punished: criticalness, independent thinking, non-conformity to ideas/behaviour, wrong response to questions.

Aversive conditioning is another behaviour modification technique. This is the use of something unpleasant, or a punishment, to stop an unwanted behaviour. As with all forms of punishment, it may work but is generally less effective than the use of reinforcement.

Split brain programming The Programmers are also aware that right-handed people use their left brain hemisphere for highly conscious processes which require good attention, focus and intentional decisions; while their right brain will tend to work on the unconscious and automatic chores. Split brain programming takes this contrast into account.

Individual sees locus of control with the Handler/programmer. Programming overrules self. The internal and external handler/programmer is in control of the subject's life view, navigation, and emotions.

Creativity can be controllable. When a subject creates a new alter/animal/internal structure he is rewarded and praised. The subject learns to create what they believe the Programmers' desire to continue to be rewarded.

Future Pacing Future pacing can be used to help program a subject toward their occupational objective which is created for the subject when they are young. Future pacing is a mental rehearsal that is practiced in the imagination. This is done so the subject can deal with future challenges. Expectations can often become self-fulfilling prophecies. NLP also is used to teach people how to learn. It teaches people to learn a variety of methods for a single skill.

Power Words, These are words which have specific meaning for the subject. Some power words used in programming are; Imagine, you, and because.

The Possibility of Salvation

Leniency: The programmer can help the subject. With the subject in a state of crisis, the programmer offers some small kindness or reprieve from the abuse. He may offer the subject a drink of water, or take a moment to ask the subject about relationships they have made. In a state of breakdown resulting from an endless psychological attack, the small kindness seems enormous, and the subject may experience a sense of relief and gratitude completely out of proportion to the offering, as if the programmer has saved their life.

Compulsion to confession: Programmer advised the subject they can help themselves. For the first time in the programming process, the subject is faced with the contrast between the guilt and pain of identity assault and the sudden relief of leniency. The subject may feel a desire to reciprocate the kindness offered to him, and at this point, the programmer may present the possibility of confession as a means to relieving guilt and pain.

The tension of guilt: This creates a tension between the subject's actions and their stated belief that the action is bad. The consistency principle leads the subject to fully adopt the belief their resistance is bad and to distance themselves from repeating it. The situation is also encouraged by making non-confession to be an offence itself.

Channelling of guilt: The programmer will advise the subject this is why they are in pain. After weeks or months of assault, confusion, breakdown and moments of leniency, the subject's guilt has lost all meaning. They are not sure what they have done wrong, the subject just knows they are wrong. This creates something of a blank slate that lets the programmer fill in the blanks: He can attach that guilt, that sense of "wrongness," to whatever they desire. The programmer attaches the subject's guilt to the belief system the programmer is trying to replace. The subject comes to believe it is their belief system that is the cause of their shame. The contrast between old and new has been established: The old belief system is associated with psychological and physical agony; and the new belief system is associated with the possibility of escaping that agony.

Releasing of guilt: It's not me (subject); it's my (subject's) beliefs. The beleaguered subject is relieved to learn there is an external cause of their wrongness, that it is not themselves that is inescapably bad. This means they can escape their wrongness by escaping the wrong belief system. All they have to do is denounce the people and institutions associated with that belief system, and they won't be in pain anymore. The subject has the power to release themselves from wrongness by confessing to acts associated with their old belief system. With their full confessions, the subject has completed their psychological rejection of their former identity. It is now up to the programmer to offer the subject a new one.

Public confessions: The effect of confession may be intensified by making the confession public. It both increases the hurt and discomfort and also enables a greater rescue effect and relief. The higher levels of emotion involved have a much greater effect in creating bonds with the listening group.

Confession: Confession is predominantly effective at enabling people to put an undesirable past behind them. As well as a conversion technique, it is also useful for retention.

Confessing sins: Once the subject has agreed to the rules/values, subjects are encouraged to confess past mistakes. This may start easily with trivial errors and then progress to more significant 'failures'.

Release and atonement: Confessing leads to a relief, especially when the tension has been exacerbated by declarations of how appalling the errors are and how the subject is understood to be basically good.

Confession under pressure can appear as a sudden breakdown, when a previous resistance suddenly collapses. This can lead to a sudden outpouring of information.

Confession provides an initial release, but further atonement may be demanded. This may start with simple chores or repeating of meaningful scripts, but may also be escalated. Punishments may be meted out or may even be applied by the subject themselves.

Agreeing the rules: The motive of confession is there are some things which are bad, and which disregard defined rules and values. Before actual confession an agreement is reached about what is good and what is bad.

Subtle force of authority: The subtle implication is to position the subject as inferior and the programmer to whom they are confessing as superior. This provides a lever of authority that the subject cedes to the programmer receiving the confession. This allows the handler to control the subject further. This control may range from defining new values to giving direct commands outside of the confessional milieu.

A Sense Of Peace Is Induced. When the subject merges with the handler the programmer will accept credit for what the subject has become. A sense of peace is induced leading to the imagery of merging with the handler. The time is suggested by the programmer. The subject has the handler placed internally to assist in maintain the integrity of the system. The subject must reorganize reality through identification with the handler. Strong identification is created with the handler through trauma bonding. The subject will be programmed to protect the handler both internally and externally.

Rebuilding the Self

Remake the subject: When the subject is broken, the programmer/handler is to approach them with kindness. This is to show the subject they are forgiven and accepted again. They may be hugged and patted. This places the programmer/handler back into a kind and loving frame and offers a lifeline to the broken subject. The subject will listen and accept what the handler/programmer has to say.

The building of trust: Confessing sins is to expose vulnerability, which requires trust. Confession acts to increase the bonding of the individual to those hearing the confession, as consistency principle provides the argument that if the subject is confessing, then those listening must be trustworthy. When a subject bonds with an individual, they will be apt to adopt beliefs more easily.

Progress and harmony: If the subject wants, they can choose good. The programmer introduces a new belief system as the path to "good." At this stage, the programmer stops the abuse, offering the subject physical comfort and mental calm in conjunction with the new belief system. The subject is made to feel that it is they who must choose between old and new, giving the subject the sense that their fate is in their own hands. The subject has already denounced their old belief system in response to leniency and torment, and making a conscious choice in favour of the contrasting belief system helps to further relieve their guilt. If they truly believe, then they really didn't betray anyone. The new identity is safe and desirable because it is nothing like the one that led to their breakdown.

Final confession and rebirth: The subject chooses what is good. Contrasting the agony of the old with the peacefulness of the new, the subject chooses the new identity. They reject their old belief system and pledge allegiance to the new one that is going to make their life better. At this stage, there are often rituals or ceremonies to induct the subject into the community.

Reintegration of values and identification with the controlling system is the final stage in changing the behaviour of the controlled individual. A subject who has learned a new, socially desirable behaviour demonstrates its importance by attempting to adapt the new behaviour to a variety of other situations.

Other Non Coercive Conversion Methods

Coincidence: Coincidence is used to create the perception in the subject that supernatural events are beginning in the subject's life. A combination of posthypnotic commands and pre-information awarded to the subject prior to an upcoming experience that the handler/programmer intelligence system has discovered gives the subject a feeling that "God" or some other supernatural being is taken interest in their life.

Graphology: The validity of graphological techniques for the analysis of the personalities of subjects has not been established. If the programmer or their handler decides to have the subject’s handwriting analyzed, the samples should be submitted as soon as possible, because the analysis is more useful in the preliminary assessment of the subject than in the later programming. Graphology does have the advantage of being one of the very few techniques not requiring the assistance or even the awareness of the subject. As with any other aid, the programmer is free to determine for themselves whether the analysis provides them with new and valid insights, confirms other observations, is not helpful, or is misleading.

Joint Programmers: The commonest of the joint programmer techniques is the Mutt-and-Jeff routine: the brutal, angry, domineering type contrasted with the friendly, quiet type. This routine works best with women, teenagers, and timid men. If the programmer who has done the bulk of the programming up to this point has established a measure of rapport, he should play the friendly role. If rapport is absent, and especially if antagonism has developed, the principal programmer may take the other part. The angry programmer speaks loudly from the beginning; and unless the subject clearly indicates that they are breaking down. He thumps the table. The quiet programmer should not watch the show unmoved but give subtle indications that he too is somewhat afraid of their colleague. The angry programmer accuses the subject of other offenses, any offenses, especially those that are heinous or demeaning. He makes it plain that he personally considers the subject the vilest subject on earth. During the harangue the friendly, quiet programmer breaks in to say, "Wait a minute. Take it easy." The angry programmer shouts back, "Shut up! I'm handling this. I'll break this one, wide open." The programmer expresses their disgust by spitting on the floor. Finally, red-faced and furious, he says, "I'm going to take a break. But I'll be back at two, you better be ready to talk." When the door slams behind him, the second programmer tells the subject how sorry they are, how he hates to work with an individual like that but has no choice.

A programmer working alone can also use the Mutt-and-Jeff technique. (Not advised) After a number of tense and hostile sessions the subject is ushered into a different or refurnished room with comfortable furniture, cigarettes, etc. The programmer invites him to sit down and explains their regret that the subject’s former stubbornness forced the programmer to use such tactics. Now everything will be different. The programmer talks programmer-to-subject.

Another joint technique casts both programmers in friendly roles. But whereas the programmer in charge is sincere, the second programmer's demeanour and voice convey the impression that he is merely pretending sympathy in order to hurt the subject. He slips in a few aggressive actions such as punching the wall, knocking over glasses. The programmer in charge warns their colleague to stop. When he repeats the tactics, the programmer in charge says, with a slight show of anger. “I suggest that you leave now. I'll handle this."

It is usually unproductive to cast both programmers in hostile roles.

Paranoia: Paranoia is a powerful tool used by the programmer. It provides a means to develop the subject's distrust of other people including the subject's primary group that could provide positive support during this time of distress in the subject's life. Paranoia is often recognized and discounted as a character fault by most peoples in American society and therefore discredits the subject's testimony even further. Uninformed, but well wishing people including friends, may recommend to the subject to pursue counselling. This negative feedback can make the subject fear that people will believe the subject is crazy.

The subject is led to believe that their neighbours, work associates and/or family are conspiring against them through a number of implanted programs.

REM Sleep Deprivation: The Rapid Eye Movement (REM) stage of sleep is controlled and usually limited to one to two cycles per night resulting in micro-sleeps during the day. REM deprivation inhibits short-term memory, concentration, tactile abilities, verbal articulation, reasoning, and self will. Protein synthesis is inhibited and thereby reduces the subject's ability to heal after physical damage or after periods of extensive exercise. The result is that the subject's general health degrades as does social bonds and work/school performance.
Control of REM Sleep is completed through various methods. Posthypnotic implants can be implanted that place a subject in a light with various combinations of muscular tension and computer cycling implant deliveries.

When the REM depravation is introduced gradually and accompanied by a posthypnotic command the subject will feel energetic and rested the subject will not recognize the REM Deprivation.

The most common method of sleep deprivation is to keep the subject awake for several days. When they are finally allowed to fall asleep, they are awakened and programmed. As well as leading to hallucinations, sleep deprivation for periods longer than 24 hours can lead to a state of temporary insanity

Subjects typically complain of no sleep, restless sleep, waking up every hour on the hour, staying awake until the hour they have to get up, waking up an hour after they retire and not returning to sleep, and typically cannot recall any dreams. Additionally, they will complain of repeating torturing thoughts, racing thoughts, and facial itching and numbness. Daily fatigue, poor recall of names, and caffeine consumption is typical. Subjects in these prolonged stages of REM deprivation exhibit confusion, and emotional distress, have very poor grammar, spelling, and short attention spans

Subjects experience slower speech and have a hard time articulating concise points as a result of the REM Deprivation and other performance degrading posthypnotic commands. A small amount of alcohol consumption can exasperate the damage of REM Deprivation and precipitate slurred speech.

Confusion results from three primary sources; REM Deprivation, specific post hypnotic commands to reinforce the confusion, and the emotional damage and stress that is being inflicted. The confusion allows the programmer to continuously inflict damage to the subject's life without real-time observation. A confused subject generally is not as productive as an organized clear thinker is and has a greater potential to offend people by what they say or do and is less likely to recognize when they have made mistakes. All of these symptoms assist the programmer’s objectives. In addition, the confusion restricts the individual from analyzing the source of their suffering and taking corrective actions, and therefore reduces the programmer’s security risk.

Difficulty concentrating impairs the subject's productivity and prevents the subject from making self-improvements and corrections in behaviour. It makes it very difficult for the subject to do any evaluation of their condition. This allows the programmer to demonstrate that the subject cannot do anything on their own without "God", thereby increasing the frustration and anxiety of the subject (inducing emotional breakdown) and ultimately making the subject totally dependent on the will of God.

Stages of sleep

NREM stage 1: This is a stage between sleep and wakefulness. The muscles are active, and the eyes roll slowly, opening and closing moderately.

NREM stage 2: In this stage, theta activity is observed and sleepers become gradually harder to awaken; the alpha waves of the previous stage are interrupted by abrupt activity called sleep spindles and K-complexes.

NREM stage 3: Formerly divided into stages 3 and 4, this stage is called slow-wave sleep (SWS). SWS is initiated in the preoptic area and consists of delta activity, high amplitude waves at less than 3.5 Hz. The sleeper is less responsive to the environment; many environmental stimuli no longer produce any reactions.

REM: The sleeper now enters rapid eye movement (REM) where most muscles are paralyzed. REM sleep is turned on by acetylcholine secretion and is inhibited by neurons that secrete serotonin. This level is also referred to as paradoxical sleep because the sleeper, although exhibiting EEG waves similar to a waking state, is harder to arouse than at any other sleep stage. Vital signs indicate arousal and oxygen consumption by the brain is higher than when the sleeper is awake. An adult reaches REM approximately every 90 minutes, with the latter half of sleep being more dominated by this stage. REM sleep occurs as a person returns to stage 1 from a deep sleep. The function of REM sleep is uncertain but a lack of it will impair the ability to learn complex tasks. One approach to understanding the role of sleep is to study the deprivation of it. During this period, the EEG pattern returns to high frequency waves which look similar to the waves produced while the person is awake

The placebo technique is also used to induce regression The subject is given a placebo. Later they are told that they have ingested a drug, which will make them want feel sick/sleepy/etc. The subject's desire to find an excuse for the compliance that represents their sole avenue of escape from their distressing predicament may make them want to believe that they have been drugged and no one could blame them for what occurs. Individuals under increased stress are more likely to respond to placebos.

Increasing Dependence on Drugs and Alcohol: As REM Deprivation increases the subject must depend on Central Nervous System (CNS) Stimulants to cope and continue to function. The goal is to get the subject to self medicate and seek out drugs of their own volition. The use of drugs leads to loss of productivity at work, school, and in interpersonal relationships. This serves the programmer in several ways. The use of drugs, especially stimulants increases the subject's index of suggestibility. The post hypnotic commands are more effective and the subject has greater difficulty resisting the impulses generated by the commands. In addition, the increased stress of coping with the drugs in conjunction with the newly introduced posthypnotic commands serves to push the subject closer to an emotional breakdown. The use of drugs, especially illegal, allows the programmer to document something that the subject will be ashamed of when the program reaches the exaggerated conscience stage.

Some substances used are: Alcohol, sleeping pills, stimulants such as caffeine, and psychotropic medications inhibit REM Stage sleep. If the subject seeks out illegal drugs to use this will benefit the programmer in the future. The handler/programmer has been known to help subjects avoid prosecution to gain loyalty or create an adversarial relationship between the acting agency and the subject (another intimidation factor) even though the handler/programmer was responsible for creating the behavioural problem in the subject's life

Regression There are a number of non-coercive techniques for inducing regression, All depend upon the programmer's control of the environment and, as always, a proper matching of method to subject. Some subjects can be repressed by persistent manipulation of time, by retarding and advancing clocks and serving meals at odd times -- ten minutes or ten hours after the last food was given. Day and night are jumbled. Programming sessions are similarly unpatterned the subject may be brought back for more programming just a few minutes after being dismissed for the night. Half-hearted efforts to cooperate can be ignored, and conversely the subject can be rewarded for non-cooperation. (For example, a successfully resisting source may become distraught if given some reward for the "valuable contribution" that he has made.)

The Alice in Wonderland technique can reinforce the effect. Two or more programmers, programming as a team and in relays (and thoroughly jumbling the timing of both methods) A subject who is cut off from the world they know seek to recreate it, in some measure, in the new and strange environment. The subject may try to keep track of time, to live in the familiar past, to cling to old concepts of loyalty, to establish -- with one or more programmers – interpersonal relations resembling those that they had earlier with other individuals, and to build other bridges back to the known. Thwarting their attempts to do so is likely to drive them deeper and deeper into themselves, until they are no longer able to control their responses.

Whether regression occurs spontaneously under detention or programming, and whether it is induced by a coercive or non-coercive technique, it should not be allowed to continue past the point necessary to obtain compliance. Severe techniques of regression are best employed in the presence of a psychiatrist, and medical doctor. As soon as they can, the programmer presents the subject with the way out, the face-saving reason for escaping from their painful dilemma by yielding. Now the programmer becomes fatherly. Whether the excuse is that others have already confessed "all the other boys are doing it", that the subject had a chance to redeem themselves or that he can't help themselves "they made you do it", the effective rationalization, the one the source will jump at, is likely to be elementary. It is a subject’s version of the excuses of childhood.

The Informer A controlled environment can make tricking the subject easier. One of these tricks is, planting an informant as the subject’s roommate. As the subject is taught not to trust anyone, two informants in the room will work better. One of them, A, tries now and then to pry a little information from the source; B remains quiet. At the proper time, and during A's absence, B warns the source not to tell A anything because B suspects him of being an informant planted by the authorities.

Suspicion against a single cellmate may sometimes be broken down if B shows the source a hidden microphone that they have "found" and suggests that they talk only in whispers at the other end of the room.

Ivan Is a Dope It may be useful to point out to a hostile subject their friends, family, and any outside influence against programming have left them. The programmer may personalize this pitch by explaining that he has been impressed by the subject's courage and intelligence. The programmer sells the subject the idea that the programmer, not their old service, represents a true friend, who understands him and will look after their welfare.

Shame Factor Enhancement: Various posthypnotic suggestions are implanted in the subject after four to five days of REM deprivation. The content of the posthypnotic scripts is constructed to cause the subject to perform embarrassing and shameful acts. These behaviours are typically sexual, or abusive to another individual. These behaviours are used by the handler/programmer to later shame the subject into a lower self esteem, reduced confidence in their own self discipline, or the need for forgiveness from God. These embarrassments provide a means to Blackmail or discredit the subject if the handler/programmer is detected and otherwise threatened by the subject.

Tragic events: Another method is to use tragic events occurring to loved ones. The programmer receives information that a subject's family member has been injured or killed. The subject is given a posthypnotic suggestion that a feeling of dread or loss is welling up inside them and they are directed to think of that particular loved one. When they are notified about the family member, the subject believes that they have special powers, insights, or communications from God, aliens, or other entities.

Disorientation: The basic principle of disorientation is to reduce the subject's sense of judgment and their ability to make rational decisions. Programmers can use many methods to disorient their subjects, including: Language that causes confusion, rapid barrages of questions, use of hypnosis and hypnotic language, time distortion, such as through changing meal times, turning lights on and off at different times and the use of narcotics.

Deprivation: Depriving a subject of basic needs can lead both to disorientation, causing poor judgment as above, or desperation.
Deprivation can include:
Food and drink: Extreme hunger or thirst can persuade.
Sleep: Lack of sleep disorientates.
Company: Solitary confinement leads to craving attention.
Sensation: Sensory deprivation disorientates.
Access: To information or significant others

12 Coercive Techniques in Programming

The application of pain is a basic technique of torture programming, whether through creating general discomfort, physical beating or using instruments of torture.

1. The principal coercive techniques are arrest, detention, the deprivation of sensory stimuli, threats and fear, debility, pain, heightened suggestibility and hypnosis, and drugs.

2. If a coercive technique is to be used, or if two or more are to be employed jointly, they should be chosen for their effect upon the subject and carefully selected to match their personality.

3. The usual effect of coercion is regression. The subject's mature defences crumble as they become more childlike. During the process of regression the subject may experience feelings of guilt, and it is usually useful to intensify these.

4. When regression has proceeded far enough so that the subject's desire to yield begins to overbalance their resistance, the programmer should supply a face-saving rationalization. Like the coercive technique, the rationalization must be carefully chosen to fit the subject's personality.

5. The pressures of duress should be slackened or lifted after compliance has been obtained, so that the subject's voluntary cooperation will not be impeded.

Once the goal of the coercive session is met to permit the programmer access to the subject they are not ordinarily concerned with the attitude of the subject. Under some circumstances, however, this practical indifference can be short-sighted. If the subject remains semi-hostile or remorseful after a successful coercive session has ended, less time may be required to complete their conversion than might be needed to deal with their antagonism.

Stress Positions: This is posing a subject in an erect standing position for a period of several hours. No restraints or external devices are used. Variations of this technique include the extension of one's arms outward to the side.

Harsher variations of the stress technique a "short shackle," subjects are bound at the wrist and ankle with metal or plastic handcuffs and then doubled over with their wrists bound to their ankles, either while lying on the ground or sitting or front leaning rest, which is the push up position.

Sensory Bombardment: Subject is made to stand or kneel facing a wall for a determined amount of time. They are hooded and handcuffed tightly. At the same time a bright light is placed next to the subject's hood while distorted music is played.

Forced Nudity: Forced nudity is the most common technique used by programmers when training a subject. It involves stripping subjects in front of other individuals who are being programmed and forcing them to remain naked for long periods of time. The technique can also be used as a form of punishment in group programming. The effect of this act is to cause great shame.

Sexual Humiliation: Sexual humiliation comes in a variety of forms and it takes in to account the beliefs and views of the subject or part. For example, a part whose religious beliefs are strongly opposed to homosexuality may be forced to participate in acts of this nature with other subjects or parts of subjects who are being trained. This may be extreme, or mild. This can also include being forced to watch displays of sexuality.

Extreme Cold: Subjects are routinely doused with cold water and left outside or in unheated cells to freeze. They may be forced to stand in or run through snow wearing only a thin layer of clothing, left to sleep on the concrete floors of unheated cells/cages in the winter. To make the cold even more unbearable, programmers may leave the windows open in subject's cells during the night.

On occasion, extreme heat is also used. In this case the subject is locked in a hot box.

Phobias: Phobias are able to incite extreme amounts of panic in subjects. For this reason, a subject who has a fear of spiders will be forced to remain in a room filled with spiders. Once he achieves the useful state of anxiety or panic, he is programmed.

Water Boarding: Water boarding consists of immobilizing a subject and pouring water over their face to simulate drowning. It elicits the gag reflex, making the subject believe his or her death is imminent while ideally not causing permanent physical damage.
Water boarding is used to punish, intimidate, induce phobias, and dissociation.

Debilitation: Debilitation is the systematic weakening of the subject. Physically this may be through means such as corporal punishment, pain and deprivation.

Psychological weakening may take place through humiliation and other actions, such as making them stand naked, forced religious sacrilege, triggering of phobias and mock executions.

Retention Techniques: When a subject is converted to a particular set of beliefs, then it has been found that, particularly if coercive or authoritarian methods were used, then most people will, if there is no effort to sustain the change, will drift back to their original beliefs. The following things must be in place to insure retention continues until training/programming is complete.

Absolute Authority: That cannot be challenged.
Asset-Stripping: Taking the subject's belongings
Confession: to keep the subject in a position of inferiority.
Entrancement: to keep subject in a controllable state.
Illogic: Emotion and fallacy that persuades.
Isolation: separating subjects from dissuasive messages.
Keeping Busy: so there is no time to think about leaving.
Obedience: without questioning authority.
Polarization: creating black-and-white choices.

Special Language: leads subject on to inner circles of power.
Striving: so there is always something more the subject needs.
Thought-stopping: blocking out distracting or dissuading thoughts.
Burning Bridges: Ensure there is no way back.
Evidence Stream: Show subjects time and again that their change is real.
Golden Handcuffs: Put rewards in their middle-term future.
Institutionalization: Building change into the formal systems and structures.
New Challenge: Get the subject looking to the future.
Rationalization Trap: Get subject to complete adverse action then help them explain their actions.
Reward Alignment: Align rewards with desired behaviours.
Rites of Passage: Use formal rituals to confirm change.
Socializing: Build behaviours into the social fabric.

Note: Anger: The way that the subject experiences anger is of profound importance. If the subject allows the Handler/Programmer to redirect the increasing anger and hostilities toward the Handler/Programmer to another subject in the form of violence (misplaced aggression), the Handler/Programmer will reinforce the violent behaviour with posthypnotic commands. Typically, the Subject is encouraged to commit acts of violence with spouses, friends, or employers resulting in further social isolation and increased shame.

12 Steps of Obedience

The purposes of these steps are to create a highly dissociative subject, who cannot connect with their feelings. This will allow programmers to write scripts for parts.

Step one: Not need. The subject is placed in a room without any sensory stimulus. This training room will have gray, white, or beige walls. The programmer leaves the subject alone for periods of time: these may vary from hours (2-3) (3-5), to an entire day as the subject grows older. The purpose of this discipline is to teach the subject to rely on its own internal resources, and not on outside individuals. The subject will learn to self sooth, and retreat internally to rely on internal triggers, structures, and programming to survive.

Step two: Not want. This step is very similar to the first step, and reinforces it. It will be done intermittently with the first step over the next few years of the subject's life. The subject is left alone in a training room, without food, water, bathroom, blankets, or chair for an extended period of time.

The programmer will enter the room with food, or a blanket. If the subject requests either, they are punished for being weak and needy. This step is reinforced, until the subject learns not to ask for anything unless it is offered first. This step will create a subject who is completely dissociated from its own needs. This creates in the subject a hyper-vigilance as they learn to look for outside individuals for cues on when it is acceptable to fulfil needs, and not to trust their own body signals.

The subject is learning to look outside themselves to learn how they should think or feel, instead of trusting their own judgment.

Step Three: Don't hope/desire. This step is to create a subject who won't fantasize. The subject is to be more outwardly focussed, and less inwardly engaged. The subject is to look to programmers for permission in all areas of their life, including internal. This step insures safe places the subject has created internally are found and discarded. The internal safe places must be placed by the programmer. This teaches the subject there is no safety unless the handler/programmer says there is safety.

The subject is placed in a room with favourite toys, or items. A pleasant programmer enters the room and engages the subject in play. The subject and programmer engage in fantasy play about the subject's secret wishes, dreams, or wants. This will occur on several occasions, until the subject's trust is earned. This programmer will not criticize, mock, or give any negative response to the subject, During a future programming session the subject is punished for their desires or fantasies shared with the programmer, including the destruction of favourite toys, undoing attempted secret places the subject may have created in their mind, or eliminate and protectors within the subject. This step is repeated, with variations, many times over subsequent years. The subject's siblings, parents, or friends will be used to expose inside fantasies the subject has confided in them during trusting moments.

Step four: survival of the fittest. This step is to create aggressive malefactor alters in the subject. This step is begun around age the subject will be trained with children younger than themselves. All subjects will have internal parts that will be perpetrators

Subjects should copy their programmer's actions when it comes to inflicting trauma on their target. Programmers and handlers should role model the torture they wish their subject to inflict. The subject will be taught this is the acceptable outlet for the aggressive impulses and anger they are experiencing. This anger should be created by the brutality the subject is relentlessly being exposed to when they are in the role of the younger child.

Step five: code of silence. Various tactics are employed to insure this programming is well-built. This is begun at the age of two-3 years as subject starts becoming more verbal.

Following a training session the subject is asked about what they saw, or did. If the subject begins to answer the question they are tortured, a new part is created. This part is ordered to keep or guard the memories of what was seen. The subject and this new part are put through a rite of swearing to never tell. During this process more parts are formed whose position it is to kill the body if other parts speak.

Sexual trauma, and learning to dissociate will increase during this step.

Step Six: Don't trust/betrayal. Will begin in infancy, but will be formalized at around ages six to seven, and continue on when the subject is a teenager. The subject will learn betrayal through set up after set up. The subject will be placed in situations where a programmer who is sympathetic, rescues them, and gains their trust. The subject will begin to trust the programmer as a rescuer after the programmer intervenes and protects the subject numerous times. After months of bonding, the subject will turn to the programmer for support. The programmer will back away refusing to help, and begin abusing them. The subject will begin to replicate this behaviour to other individuals who are being trained. Betrayal programming will also be built into the system so parts will not trust one another Step seven: Not caring. This step will take the subject further into a malefactor role. The age for beginning this is step is 4-6 years. The subject will be forced to hurt others and prove their ability to not care during the process. This step is repeated until the subject finally complies by inflicting grievous harm on another individual without remorse. As the subject becomes older, the punishing tasks become more brutal. Programmers will encourage and reward the more perverse behaviour and callus responses by the subject.

Step eight: Spiritual ideology. The subject will be taught spiritual ideology to keep the system in balance. The ideology is duelling. This is completed with trauma rituals, and guided imagery exercises reinforced with hypnotism. The goal will be to reach a blissful state of dissociation reached through trauma and hypnosis.

Step nine: Subject specific programming. The programmer and handler will have determined what the subject's future task/job will be. This step will involve programming which will be tailored to the subject's future function.

Step ten: OODA training (observe, orient, decide, and act). The programmer will place the subject in situations where they must decide how to respond. If the response is incorrect the subject will be brutally punished. If the response is correct the subject will be praised.

Step eleven: Display self-discipline. Demonstrate the ability to think, look, and act like an individual with a single mind. The subject must respond to triggers, cues, and training without the programmer/handler to reinforce the programming.

Step twelve: The subject must prove their capacity to perform their role/job they have been trained for. This must be completed to the satisfaction of the programmers and handler. The test will be held with other subjects of the same age. This is to ensure the trauma bonding continues. If a subject fails the test the programmers and handlers must determine if the subject short comings can be corrected or the subject terminated.

14 Levels of Programming

Level One

If the tested subject has an I.Q of 110 or higher, and proper hypnotic abilities they will be given a code cue that is an alpha-numeric code, a number or a word code that identifies them. This is embedded hypnotically. This trigger will activate their recall program when the programmer is ready.

If the subject has no relatives that are important, they will be instructed and secretly helped to move to a location chosen by the intelligence agencies. The programmers will hypnotically erase the top memory so what has happened is deeply embedded in the subconscious mind and can't be retrieved.

Once at the location further tests for vulnerability will be conducted. If the subject passes these tests, they are then brought to.

Level 2

Specific instructions are written, placed through hypnotic commands and suggestions, into their personality and they are given diverse small orders. At this level the subject is used operationally at very easy and unimportant tasks. They are also assigned a programmer. The programmer is beginning to soften the subject up and make them more pliable to suggestions. If the subject successfully performs these small tasks that have been hypnotically written into the mind, then he will be given a recall service notice by the programmer who is in contact with the subject.

If the subject, upon release, shows that they have retained the instructions which were written into their personality, and if they carry out the small and unimportant work duties which were assigned under Level 2 hypnosis, they will receive a recall service notice.

The timing of a recall service notice depends on how quickly it can determine the programming which was written into the personality has enabled them to complete their Level 2 work assignments properly. Once this determination has been made, a recall service notice will be given to him by a programmer, or handler.

If the subject was not given a trigger word, the handler will use a quick and powerful form of hypnosis similar to Neural Linguistic Programming. The subject will be told when and where to report. The subject will have no memory of being given these instructions, they will report on time to the proper location. If the subject was given a trigger word or symbol they will report to the designated location upon activation of the trigger.

Level 3
I.Q. level 120-129

The subject will receive a overwrite upon their own personality according to what script the programmers want it to have. It is similar to having multiple personalities, except the original personality is repressed or hidden under the overwrite and will not surface for a set period of time which is determined by the Programmer. The overwrite is not a complete new identity. There is just enough information written into subject for us to determine their viability.

The subject will be set to carry out their instructions as needed. The subject will now be given specific trigger codes to carry out assignments. All field programmers of the intelligence agencies get level 3 control.

This is the level where real childhood memories can be accidently damaged.

In the case of a field subject, Level 3 hypnosis is how the subject is prepared for a covert mission which requires a temporary new identity. Just enough information will be written in for the subject's alias and story to be believable by everyone, including law enforcement officials. In the case of a field subject who will be using this alias for only one occasion, their normal personality is not repressed, it is made recessive, but left alert.

During Level 3 programming sessions, the new subject is told that anything their "friends", meaning programmers, asks them to do is okay, even though it may be against the laws of nations. At Level 3, the subject is also programmed to believe that they must and can do everything their "friends" ask them to do.

Once Level 3 Programming has been overlaid upon the new subjects own personality, they are once again given a recall service order and is then discharged. The subject will be monitored to see how well they function with their new personality. If everything goes well, they will be recalled for further programming.

All subjects must go through these 3 Levels before they are fielded. Sometimes they go through Level 3 several times

Level 4
I.Q. Level is 130-144
The programming that was placed in up to level 3 is erased and an entire new life script, new personality and priority/mission are inserted. A completely new subject is being created, not just a partial personality as during Level 3 programming. This is done with the use of drugs, deception, and other sophisticated programming techniques. The brain assimilates this new information as if it's always been there, because it feels comfortable putting something into an empty space.
The programmers prefer to find a period in the original subject's life when nothing occurred. It is easy to erase a memory segment when nothing significant is in original the memory. Complete areas of memory are erased at this stage and a new history is written into the pre-puberty area of memory

This level is reserved for subjects who are extraordinarily loyal to hypnotic commands. Subjects at this level of programming will follow out any directive they are given, whether it is suicidal or harmful to others. They are at a place where they no longer differentiate between right and wrong.

The subject is advised they are Transcendent and all laws are written for other people. The subject's moral code, respect for the law, and fear of dying is replaced with new Transcendent feelings. The subjects' are given exceptional abilities such as a photographic memory, the ability to lie convincingly, and remember all they hear. This "agenda overlay" is overwritten onto the subjects own personality.

For the field subject who is being prepared for a lethal covert mission, a Level 4 Transcendent overwrite can eliminate all fear and nervousness. The overwrite replaces the subject's own morality and/or religious ethics with a program that makes them believe they are beyond all human laws. If the intent of the programming is to create a programmed assassin who will kill on cue, all morality, fear, and loathing of bloody body parts must be eliminated. The Transcendent overwrite eliminates both. The Transcendent overwrite also gives the subject the feeling of immortality and invincibility. This allows them to function in close proximity of their enemies without the added stress of being discovered.

The subject will be given all the knowledge and beliefs that are commonly held by individuals in the identified group. The subject will believe that these opinions are their own. They will then be believable to other members of the group.

Once Level 4 programming is complete, the subject will have no memory of their former life. They will not be an amnesiac, they will have memories. The memories will be implanted by the programmer. The subject will be relocated to a new state and given a new identity. Everything to complete the construction of the new subject will be provided. Items such as driver's licence, car, bank accounts, passport, credit cards, and birth certificate will be created or supplied by the programmer and will be valid and legal. The subject will have no memory of being involved in programming.

The subject will be provided with things that ordinary individuals have in their lives, such as photos of family. The subject will have all the feelings of love, hurt or anger that normal family members feel for each other.

The photos of family and friends will be of deep cover subjects. If ever a mission goes "sour" and the news media starts looking for their family, an agency created family will be produced for a news conference or an interview. Agency subjects have been well coached and are skilled actors and actresses. They will complete their roles perfectly, usually letting the public know that the Clear Eyes subject has had a deeply troubled and violent past. The media will present the Clear Eyes as a subject with mental health issues who went on a tragic and senseless rampage.

Completing the new life and home, will be souvenirs from trips the subject has never taken, but remembers. There will also be small mementos of a life they have never lived, yet believe they have. Upon the completion of Level 4 Programming, the subject now has an agenda that they believe is their own.

Because these subjects are now under full control, the intelligence agencies want to protect their level 4 subjects until they are needed.

Level 5

IQ level 145-160

The subject at this level can be moulded into a Clear Eyes. This level will require transporting the subject to a specialized programming centre. Once at the centre they are drugged and lowered to the comatose level of subconscious awareness. At this level of consciousness the programming is placed at the innermost levels of the brain. The subject may be comatose for days or months. This requires a catheter in the neck, urinary and digestive tracts to keep the body properly functioning. An accepted cover story is the subject had an automobile accident because the subject will be hospitalized for an extended amount of time. Many of these level 5 subjects are placed as sleepers into organizations, where they lead normal lives.

The trigger which activates the program is inserted. A code word, sequence of numbers or a voice imprint is embossed into the subject's brain. This trigger will activate the subject into action. At this time, the subject will also be implanted with a coded chip so their location will always be known.

The level 5 triggers activate programs deeply embedded and nested into the memory of a subject. A team of programmers work on level 5 subjects. They must make sure that the subject has a support system so that they do not self-destruct. They may have psychologists in normal life set up to serve as a support subject for the subject.

Once a Clear Eyes is triggered, accidently or on purpose, the subject is beyond recall. A Level 5 Clear Eyes can only be approached after they carry out their program or operation.

In most cases of programmed Clear Eyes who commit murders or assassinations, the subject is killed at the location, either by law enforcement or suicide programming.

15 Tools and Aids for Programming

Fasting along with a high sugar intake will make the brain more suggestive. Physical discomforts and the chanting of rituals in witchcraft ceremonies are also ways to move the mind into programming states.

Behavioural science: watching and recording data on different environmental parameters on human behaviour. The programmer should know when to modify the environment to insure optimum results.

Electric shock equipment: Determine amount of electricity, frequency, interval, and body placement for shocks.

Immersive multimedia: (V.R.) A computer-simulated environment that can replicate a subject's physical presence in places worlds created by the programmers. The images are displayed either on a computer screen or through special stereoscopic displays, include additional sensory information, such as sound through speakers, headphones and goggles. Haptic systems now include tactile information, generally known as force feedback in medical, gaming and military applications.

Harmonics/subharmonics: Use of sound frequencies to manage the subject's brain state.
Psychotropic Medications: opiates, barbiturates, hypnotics, sedatives, aesthetic medications to be used by programmers with the assistance of doctors.

CPR equipment: in case subject has adverse reaction to drugs or programming. At times, a subject alter will come out inadvertently during a programming sequence, and will be overdosed with the drugs meant for programmed alters. The handler/programmer must give the part the antidote, and resuscitate them, just as if a real part is out. They are well aware of this fact, and will severely punish parts, to teach them to come out only when called out.

Exercise equipment: used in military training to increase fitness, lean body mass.

Steel instruments: used to insert into orifices, cause pain

Programming grids: For mapping the subjects inside landscape.

Projectors: used to project grids on wall or ceiling.

Dress: Programmers, Doctors and trainers are to dress according to the script they are working into the subject.

Programming journal: contain indexed copies of subject's systems; including key alters, command codes, etc.

Lighting: The lighting must be conducive for the specified script being inlayed by the programmers.

Training rooms: The training room is a neutral colour with white walls.
EEG machine: will often have abbreviated hook-ups for quick use. Used extensively with brain wave programming; also to verify that certain alter is out when called up. May be used to verify deep trance state before initiating deep programming. Trainers are taught to read these readouts.

Programming table: a medical table of steel where the temperature of the table can be controlled. The table must have restraints for the subject's appendages and head to prevent movement.

Programming chair: large chair with arm rests. Will have restraints as above at intervals to restrain movement while subject sits in chair.

Comfort items: used to comfort subject afterwards a session. This may be a toy, candy for subject/parts. This is the opportunity for the programmer to bond with and comfort the subject they worked with. This is the most important part of the training process, as the programmer explains calmly, kindly how well the subject did, how proud they are of them.

16 Deprivation of Sensory Stimuli

The chief effect is to deprive the subject of many or most of the sights, sounds, tastes, smells, and tactile sensations to which they have grown accustomed. The first exposure will cause the greatest fears and hence the greatest danger of giving way to symptoms; previous experience is a powerful aid in going ahead, despite the symptoms. The symptoms most commonly produced by isolation are superstition, intense love of any other living thing, perceiving inanimate objects as alive, hallucinations, and delusions.

The apparent reason for these effects is that a subject cut off from external stimuli turns their awareness inward, upon themselves, and then projects the contents of their own unconscious outwards, so they give their faceless environment their own attributes, fears, and forgotten memories. The more well-adjusted or 'normal' the subject is, the more they are affected by deprivation of sensory stimuli. Neurotic and psychotic subjects are either comparatively unaffected or show decreases in anxiety, and hallucinations.

The sensory deprivation tank will be set at 920 to 950 F. isothermal skin, saltwater suspension, zero light, near zero sound levels. The subject will be naked without contact with the side of the tank and in remote isolation for a predetermined set time.

Theories about solitary confinement and isolation:

1. The more completely the place of confinement eliminates sensory stimuli, the more rapidly and deeply will the subject be affected. Results produced only after weeks or months of imprisonment in an ordinary cell can be duplicated in hours or days in a cell which has no light (or weak artificial light which never varies), which is sound-proofed, in which odours are eliminated, etc. An environment still more controlled, such as water-tank or is even more effective.

2. An early effect of such an environment is anxiety. How soon it appears and how strong it is depends upon the psychological characteristics of the subject.

3. The programmer can benefit from the subject's anxiety. As the programmer becomes linked in the subject's mind with the reward of lessened anxiety, human contact, and meaningful activity, and thus with providing relief for growing discomfort, the programmer assumes a benevolent role.

4. The deprivation of stimuli induces regression by depriving the subject's mind of contact with an outer world and thus forcing it in upon itself. At the same time, the calculated provision of stimuli during programming tends to make the regressed subject view the programmer as a father-figure. The result, normally, is a strengthening of the subject's tendencies toward compliance.

The following are the type of beliefs that can be programmed into a subject during sensory deprivation under the appropriate psychotropic no matter their prior beliefs.

A. The subject could successfully ‘park’ the body and leave the body somewhere, astral project and explore new universes.

B. The subject can be made to feel as if they are a tiny mote, a tiny dot, a single micro-flash of energy in their own view of time, a mere particle. Time can become infinity.

C. The next program is the subject is only part of a vast computer, only part of a vast mind. The appropriate psychotropic regulates the perception of free-will. In this form of programming, the subject is convinced that they have no free will and must participate each second with some larger mind or computer.

D. Personalities that have been seen externally by the subject will be incorporated within the subject’s internal world.

E. Psychotropic’s and sensory deprivation change the subject’s perception of time, and can be used to go back or forward in time in the mind. Under guidance, the programmer can manipulate this ability to build into the mind false memories and images.

F. If "white noise", that is random background noise is placed into an isolation tank trauma, the programmers have found that under mind altering drugs the brain tries to make sense of the sounds and projects the voice of God into the noise as a method to turn chaos into something comprehendible. With the right dose, and under the right conditions, the programmers can get the voice of "God" to say anything they want. Because the sense of hearing in the sensory deprivation tank is not feeding the mind anything, the human brain can easily substitute in the voice of God.

G. For females, who have been determined to have personalities with low sexual appetites, the sexual desires of certain alter personalities can be manipulated during sensory deprivation programming by having these alters hold the body and the body go through exaggerated pelvic movements and other experiences.

When the programmers set the foundations for a system, they will use a mind altering psychotropic on the subject while they are in sensory deprivation. During this time they will have the subject map in: the hell-pit (a dungeon in castle worlds), stars and galaxies which contain parts, the outer space in a system, and the protective program where the mind spreads out like molecules and loses the ability to think. Also during sensory deprivation trauma, Alien programming, and Suicide programming are placed in to the system. These parts in the system are created while the subject is in the chamber/tank.
While the subject is in sensory deprivation the Programmer can ask the subject to create the images of guardians, guard parts within the castle images. These image parts are not the same as a trauma-created dissociative alter.

During the sensory deprivation tank experience, the subject can be asked to open their eyes, or close them. The subjects mind works differently with imagination if the eyes are opened or closed. If the subject is advised to look into the darkness they will visualize themselves as merging with the infinite universe and not having a body. This programming is used to create an Infinity loop, a Rubicon, or Outer Space within a system. The self is still centred in one place but the boundaries have disappeared and move out in all directions and extend to fill the limits of the universe. A subject under a mind altering psychotropic may experience, they are in touch with all the stars of the universe.

Implanted programs in the child can be placed in below the level of the mind's awareness, but which will affect their entire outlook on life, and will control their thinking and behaviour into adulthood. The child subject in the sensory deprivation tank is not allowed to move without being shocked. Gradually the will of the subject is broken by the full control the programmer maintains over the child in the tank. The child continues to be broken until the will of the child to live is broken. At this point, when the subject has given up their will to live, the programmer (or assistant programmer) will tell the child while in deprivation, what parts to create.

The alters, which are made when the subject has lost their will to live, are the dissociated parts that will be made into suicide alters. Their breathing is very shallow, and their world void. When these parts take the body, they still function in that state.

Children must be very young in order for programming to be initially installed, under 4 or 5 years of age. Modifications to the original programming can be made later.

One of the central functions of programs is to cause the subject to physically and psychologically re-experience the torture used to install the programming should they act in violation of the programmed commands. The re-experience of the original torture often includes somatic manifestation of the original injuries, such as bruising and swelling, though not to the degree of the original injury.

The most complex programs consist of personalities buried deep in the unconscious mind perceiving themselves, visually (in images) and somatically (in experiences of pain, suffocation, electroshock, etc.), to be attached to, or trapped within, "structures", such as buildings, devices of torture, machines, containers, etc. These structures serve as containers for the programmed commands, messages, and information.

Programming continues to control the subject's thoughts and actions for decades, often for life, with no conscious awareness of the programming or of the personalities under its control, usually completing programmed actions unconsciously, sometimes feeling only a conscious compulsion to do, or not do, something.

Conditioning of the subject is achieved through a variety of sophisticated control strategies involving the combined application of physical pain, double-bind coercion, psychological terror, and split brain stimulation. All programs are stimulus-sensate triggered. Thus, programs may be enacted (triggered) via auditory, visual, tactile, olfactory and/or gustatory modalities. Classical, operant, and observational/ modelling paradigms all are utilized by the programmers. Finally, it is important to note that virtually all programs will possess a variety of secondary and tertiary back-ups — perhaps several layers of each.

The commands and structures installed during programming, and the detailed recollection of the torture itself, remain stable and fixed over time, from the toddler years until at least middle age, with incredibly little deterioration of memory over time. The "memory capacity" in the programmed unconscious mind is enormous, holding vast amounts of detailed information, including lengthy "strings" of encoded information, which could never be stored in conscious awareness.

Program "triggers", "cues", and "access codes" allow the programmer to regain access to the programmed personalities or program "structures" to install or change commands, messages, and information, and to retrieve information, all out of the subjects' awareness.

Programmers gain access to subjects of other groups and deliberately "program over" competitor group's programming to dominate the behaviour of the person

Attempting to remove or disable it without great expertise "sets off" programmed self-destruction and negative health/mental health consequences, all by the programmers' intentions.

The Host is given the script to love the Programmer/handler. The subject should be angry about what has happened to them. The ability to direct that anger is lost with the dissociation, but might be retrieved if the part remembers. Programmers transfer the anger by creating some outside person or object for the part to focus their hate upon. Hate scripts are given to the host part. The love for the Handler now protects the host part from having to remember their pain. As long as the part loves their handler, they are reasonably safe from remembering their own traumas.

17 Inside Structuring

Covers for Subjects
The subject is usually given a good cover. A good cover will be one that cannot be seen through, and still allows the person the freedom to get their job done. When building a cover, the following questions will be asked: how much will this cover allow this person to spend? What kind of people can this person associate with? Where can this person go? What kind of hobby can he or she have?

Inside Parts
During programming an average System will have hundreds of parts, but not all of these will be personalities designed to hold the body. A system will have approximately half a dozen parts which frequently take the body and hundreds of parts which only occasionally take the body.

Each piece of the System is separated by some degree of dissociation to make it a separate piece. By dividing the mind so much, it is incapable of fighting what has been done to it.

The creation of alternate personalities divides responsibility within a person. A Programmer and handler will form widely differing relationships with the different parts.

When programming begins, it must be simple enough that a child can understand. The child's creativity must be guided by torture and the Programmer. The Programmer, demons, and the child's creativity work together with the dissociation to create parts. When the mind is split, this natural personality is not erased but rather is a collected pool upon which various responses are attached to various personalities. In order to teach a part to come to the front of the mind, triggers must be layered in. A visual aid to teach a part how to leave the area they are in the mind and come forward to take the body may be necessary.

All the programming of subjects is anchored in trauma. . Whatever fundamental trauma is decided upon, all the rest of the programming will be built upon that anchor in the subject's mind. The first extreme trauma will be, filmed, watched by the subject, coded and used as an anchor. The filmed trauma will be programming specific. For example rape for Beta programming, animal torture for Epsilon.

Parts are real and separate persons. But the common traits that run through a system are also real. One system may have a vein of kindness and gentleness that runs through it. There may be a few parts which have been tortured enough to not display the trait, but the trait is so pervasive that it characterizes the system.

The Programmers are also skilled at building in parts who can serve as balancing points.
The system must have a balancing point. This point is made of parts that are calm, cheerful, and emotionally stable. A system could easily self-destruct with all the pain and confusion that has been intentionally built into the system. When the System is being charted during the early programming process, a handler and the Programmer will make a decision on how to balance the system and label the graph.

After the Programmer has instructed the subject what parts they want made the subject is traumatized. The Programmer will administer a psychotropic to determine whether the correct parts were created and the correct number.

Each dissociated fragment of the mind must be moulded into something. For example they can be made an animal, angel, demon, or other spiritual figure. Some fragments are formed into full personalities, others are moulded into single-purpose fragments, and some must be discarded. A part of the mind can be developed into a full-blown independent personality with all the idiosyncrasies that any individual has.

Generally the Programmer considers colour identification and the coded numbers to be more critical for identifying a part than a name. A name humanizes the part. Names are sometimes attached later if needed by a handler. Some handlers simply refer to their sexual parts by their generic name kitten, dog, animal or spy. Others may have a specific cat name such as Shadow, FFF, Hunter or the name of an angel or demon.

The new part will have the characteristics of who they split from. The Programmer will ask the part being tortured to create something in the mind when the split is created. They are separated from one another by dissociation, and they will be given their own script and own separate identity by the Programmer. The dissociation between some parts is not full blown amnesia.

To dissociate a memory and to take on a particular role and identity involves a constant re-interpretation of past events. It may also mean that the part must manufacture an interpretation of present events. This is in part dictated by the necessity of obscuring the pain of the trauma that separates the part from the rest.

Some zones of the mind, such as the space that holds skills and talents, are available to all the parts who want to access that aptitude. The aptitude doesn’t belong to a specific part but to the system.

Subjects are bonded to other people--the cult leader, handler, twin or Programmer. Trauma bonding is a necessity for programming with the subject.

The Programmers build chains of command within the groups of parts that are created. In the subject’s hierarchal chain of command, adult parts are assigned to insure that child parts don’t come out, unless the child part is wanted out. Commander parts are needed to keep the switching smooth, and to keep things orderly. Subordinate parts are taught to submit to their king, or governor or queen part. Immense power and indoctrination is given to the vital parts ruling a system.

Parts must learn to function as designed by the Programmer. If they can’t work together, the Programmer will try to get them to work together. If the parts can’t be repaired, they and their system will have to be thrown away. Alter functions and abilities overlap with other parts. No alter is entirely separate from several common pools of intellect and dispositions that are attributable to the entire alter system.

Shadow Parts

Programmers torture a part and get the Shadow alters. Then hypnotically attach a memory code to the main alter so that they can access the memory anytime they want. Then they hypnotically build a one-way mirror between this main alter and the shadow alters they have just created. These one-way mirrors are like one way windows--the reason they are referred to as mirrors is that they are put in the child's mind via mirrors. Next, they ritually/magickly implant demons to guard the mirror(s) and to guard each memory held by the shadow alters. This separates an alter from knowing itself and its own abuse.

The host part has dissociated the pain, to the shadow alters of itself. Host stands in a small circle with the rays (shadow alters) split off from it. The shadow or family alters of a host part hold the factual history. Programmers use the memory as blackmail to keep the main part in line. The host alter has dissociated the pain, but will recover the memory if either one of three possibilities happen: a. the Programmer or handler says the memory code 3x, or b. if an event happens that triggers the host alter to remember, c. the host alter tries to remember the abuse and the programming, and in doing so they will be stepping outside of the circle assigned to them and will break the circle and break the mirrors.

If the Programmer desires, they can shatter a front Christian alter level and create a new level of New Age believing parts to replace the original front. The abuse can be done by the subject themselves to themselves, because programming parts are given the ability to pull up horrific memories via codes. Those traumatic memories, which shattered the mind the first time, are still capable of doing it again when they are released.

The Programmer can call up the Hidden Observer and ask it what has happened internally in the mind of the subject.

Mirror image parts should be created to confuse both subject and outside individuals who are attempting to breach the system.

A triangle mirror image is formed in occult programming by taking the part, its mirror images and adding demonic mirror images.

Many splits in the mind are not developed into full blown personalities. The programmers don't chart all the family or shadow fragments of a subject. The fragments will hold all the memories of abuse, so the task specific part can function. The fragments will also give the part the appearance of the full range of emotions. If a main part gets angry or feels guilty, they have accessed its shadows to express the full range of emotions.

During a predetermined trauma, the programmer will fragment the part that is present and create mirror images of that part. This fracturing means that no part has the full memory of the trauma. A part doesn't know if the mirror image is itself or something else.

When a part tries to recover a memory it goes round and round in a brutal cycle and finally concludes the memory is false. If one part holds a memory, a part close to it will have no feelings attached to the memory and will find it difficult to accept the memory as its own. Mirror images, and pseudo-alters are layered in, it becomes difficult to identify when a alter appears and when they leave.

Internal Councils:

The ultimate form of internalization comes with internalizing hierarchical councils. The subject, under pain, hypnosis, and drugs, will be taught to incorporate a highly dissociated group inside to lead the others. These will often be created from core splits, because the Programmers want them to be extremely strong, stable alters in the system.

Many Programmers will place a part designed after themselves in the subject, over the internal programmers. Programmers are also very hierarchy conscious themselves. They know a system without hierarchy inside to direct things will be a system in disarray. A subject's system must not be leaderless. The subject may mimic accents, mannerisms, and even claim the Programmer's life history as their own.

These councils will be seen as holding power of life or death, and the child or youth will do anything to gain their favour. The trainer will help with the internalization, using photographs or holographic images of the people to burn them in. Each member of the group will be given different leadership tasks.

It is not uncommon for the subject to incorporate a parent, both parents, and grandparents, into their internal leadership hierarchy in a generational subject.

The internal councils will correlate roughly to the outside council. An internal leadership council may be named: System Above, Ascended Masters, Supreme council, Regional council, World council, may be found. The councils found will vary with each subject.

Triads of three elders may be created.

Platinum's may have a head council of three

Jewels will have a triad, made up of ruby, emerald, diamond to rule over the others.

High priests and priestesses may sit on ruling councils inside.

The child at age twelve will be presented to these groups in a formal coming of age ceremony. This ceremony is considered an honour, and will involve the child being traumatized and accepting the leadership of the council for the rest of their life. Undying loyalty is promised. There may be other occasions the subject will be forced to come before the councils throughout their lives, either for judgment, to pass tests, for punishment, or elevation.

Personality Categories for Parts

The Programmer knows understanding the personality of the part is worth far more than a thorough knowledge the category they have been assigned. For programming purposes a part must be created with a personality template. There are psychological emotional templates that are used for each part that will be created with a full personality.

In the opening phases of programming, the programmer must choose the template they would like to apply to the part. The categories are based upon the subject's s past is always reflected, however dimly, in an alter's present ethics and behaviour. Parts do change, but what appears to be new behaviour or a new psychological pattern is usually just a variant on the old theme. Some created parts will not fit into any one of the nine categories. Like all other typologies, the system has overlap, so that some parts will show characteristics of more than one category.

Those who find these psychological-emotional categories valuable should use them and those who do not should let them alone. The nine major groups within the psychological-emotional category are:

The orderly-obstinate personality. Created parts in this category are characteristically frugal, orderly, and cold; frequently they are quite intellectual. They are not impulsive in behaviour. They tend to think things through logically and to act deliberately. They often reach decisions very slowly. They are far less likely to make real personal sacrifices for a cause than to use them as a temporary means of obtaining a permanent personal gain. They are secretive and disinclined to confide in anyone else their plans and plots, which frequently concern the overthrow of some form of authority. They are also stubborn, although they may pretend cooperation or even believe that they are cooperating. They nurse grudges.

The orderly-obstinate personality considers themselves superior to other individuals. Sometimes their sense of superiority is interwoven with a kind of magical thinking that includes all sorts of superstitions and fantasies about controlling their environment. They may even have a code of morality that is all their own. They sometimes gratify their feeling of secret superiority by provoking unjust treatment. They also try, characteristically, to keep open a line of escape by avoiding any real commitment to anything. They are -- and always have been -- intensely concerned about their personal possessions. They are usually a tightwad who saves everything, has a strong sense of propriety, and is punctual and tidy. Their money and other possessions have for him a personalized quality; they are parts of themselves. He often carries around shiny coins, keepsakes, a bunch of keys, and other objects having for himself an actual or symbolic value.

Usually the orderly-obstinate character has a history of active rebellion in childhood, of persistently doing the exact opposite of what they are told to do. As an adult they may have learned to cloak their resistance and become passive-aggressive, but their determination to get their own way is unaltered. They have merely learned how to proceed indirectly if necessary. The profound fear and hatred of authority, persisting since childhood, is often well-concealed in adulthood, For example, such a subject may confess easily and quickly under accusation, even to acts that they did not commit, in order to throw the programmer off the trail of a significant discovery (or, more rarely, because of feelings of guilt).

Government Programming: The Programmer who is dealing with an orderly-obstinate character should avoid the role of hostile authority. Threats and threatening gestures, table-pounding, pouncing on evasions or lies, and any similarly authoritative tactics will only awaken in such a subject their old anxieties and habitual defence mechanisms. To attain rapport, the Programmer should be friendly. It will probably prove rewarding if the room and the Programmer look exceptionally neat. Orderly-obstinate subjects often collect coins or other objects as a hobby; time spent in sharing their interests may thaw some of the ice. Establishing rapport is extremely important when dealing with this type.

The optimistic personality. This kind of alter is almost constantly happy-go-lucky, impulsive, inconsistent, and undependable. They seem to enjoy a continuing state of well-being. They may be generous to a fault, giving to others as they want to be given to. They may become an alcoholic or drug addict. They are not able to withstand very much pressure; they react to a challenge not by increasing their efforts but rather by running away to avoid conflict. Their convictions that "something will turn up", that "everything will work out all right", is based on their need to avoid their own responsibility for events and depend upon a kindly fate.

Such a part has usually had a great deal of over-indulgence in early life. They are sometimes the youngest member of a large family, is the child of a middle-aged woman (a so-called "change-of-life baby"). If they have met severe frustrations in later childhood, they may be petulant, vengeful, and constantly demanding.

When programming these parts, optimistic characters respond best to a kindly, parental approach. If withholding, they can often be handled effectively by the Mutt-and-Jeff technique. Pressure tactics or hostility will make them retreat inside themselves, whereas reassurance will bring them out. They tend to seek promises, to cast the Programmer in the role of protector and problem-solver; and it is important that the Programmer avoid making any specific promises that cannot be fulfilled, because the optimist turned vengeful is likely to prove troublesome.

The greedy, demanding personality. This kind of part affixes themselves to others like a leech and clings obsessively. Although extremely dependent and passive, they constantly demand that others take care of them and gratify their wishes. If they consider themselves wronged, they do not seek compensation through their own efforts but tries to persuade another to defend them on their behalf -- "let's you and him fight." Their loyalties are likely to shift whenever they feel that the sponsor whom they have chosen have let them down.

The greedy, demanding part often suffered from very early deprivation of affection or security. As an adult they continue to seek substitute parents who will care for them as their own.

The Programmer dealing with a greedy, demanding personality must be careful not to rebuff them; otherwise rapport will be destroyed. On the other hand, the Programmer must not accede to demands which cannot or should not be met. Adopting the tone of an understanding father or big brother is likely to make the part responsive. If they make exorbitant requests, an unimportant favour may provide a satisfactory substitute because the demand arises not from a specific need but as an expression of the subject's need for security. They are likely to find reassuring any manifestation of concern for their well-being.

In dealing with this personality type, and to a considerable extent in dealing with any of the types listed, the Programmer must be aware of the limits and pitfalls of rational persuasion. If the Programmer seeks to induce cooperation by an appeal to logic, they should first determine whether the part's resistance is based on logic. The appeal will glance off ineffectually if the resistance is totally or chiefly emotional rather than rational. Emotional resistance can be dissipated only by emotional manipulation.

Government Programming: Defectors of this type feel aggrieved because their desires were not satisfied in their countries of origin, but they soon feel equally deprived in a second land and turn against its government or representatives in the same way. The greedy and demanding character is subject to rather frequent depressions. He may direct a desire for revenge inward, upon himself; in extreme cases suicide may result. The true defector (as distinguished from the hostile agent in defector's guise) is likely to have a history of opposition to authority. The defectors who left their homelands because they could not get along with their immediate or ultimate superiors are also likely to rebel against authorities in the new environment Therefore defectors are likely to be found in the ranks of the orderly-obstinate, the greedy and deriding, the schizoids, and the exceptions.

The anxious, self-centred personality. Although this part is fearful, they are engaged in a constant struggle to conceal their fears. They are frequently a daredevil who compensates for their anxiety by pretending that there is no such thing as danger. They may be a Don Juan. They tend to brag and often lie through hunger for approval or praise. As a soldier or officer he may have been decorated for bravery; but if so, their comrades may suspect that their exploits resulted from a pleasure in exposing himself to danger and the anticipated delights of rewards, approval, and applause. The anxious, self-centred personality is usually intensely vain and equally sensitive.

Parts that show these characteristics are actually unusually fearful.

Of great importance to the Programmer is the opportunity provided by concealed anxiety for successful manipulation of the subject. Their desire to impress will usually be quickly evident. They are likely to be talkative. Ignoring or ridiculing their bragging, or cutting them short with a demand is likely to make them resentful and to stop the flow. Playing upon their vanity, especially by praising their courage, will usually be a successful tactic if employed skilfully.

Government Programming: Anxious, self-centred parts who are withholding significant facts, such as contact with a hostile service, are likelier to divulge if made to feel that the truth will not be used to harm them and if the Programmer also stresses the callousness and stupidity of the adversary in sending so valiant a subject upon so ill-prepared a mission. There is little to be gained and much to be lost by exposing the nonrelevant lies of this kind of subject. Gross lies about deeds of daring, sexual prowess or other "proofs" of courage and toughness are best met with silence or with friendly but noncommittal replies unless they consume an inordinate amount of time. If operational use is contemplated, recruitment may sometimes be effected through such queries as, "I wonder if you would be willing to undertake a dangerous mission."

The guilt-ridden personality. This kind of part has a strong cruel, unrealistic conscience. Their whole life is devoted to reliving their feelings of guilt. Sometimes they seem determined to atone; at other times they insist that whatever went wrong is the fault of somebody else. In either event they seek constantly some proof or external indication that the guilt of others is greater than their own. They are often caught up completely in efforts to prove that they have been treated unjustly. In fact, they may provoke unjust treatment in order to assuage their conscience through punishment.

The causes of most guilt complexes are real or fancied wrongs done to parents or others whom the subject felt they should to love and honour. As children these parts have been frequently scolded or punished. Or they may have been "model" children who repressed all natural hostilities.

Government programming: They may "confess" to hostile clandestine activity, or other acts of interest to the government, in which they were not involved. Accusations levelled at them by the Programmer are likely to trigger such false confessions. Or they may remain silent when accused, enjoying the "punishment." They are a poor subject for LCFLUTTER. The complexities of dealing with conscience-ridden subjects vary so widely from case to case that it is almost impossible to list sound general principles. The best advice is that the Programmer, once alerted by information from the screening process or by the subject's excessive preoccupation with moral judgements, should treat as suspect any information provided by the subject about any matter that is of moral concern to him. Subjects with intense guilt feelings may cease resistance and cooperate if punished in some way, because of the gratification induced by punishment.

The personality wrecked by success is closely related to the guilt-ridden personality. This part cannot tolerate success and goes through life failing at critical points. They are often accident-prone. Typically they have a long history of being promising and of almost completing a significant assignment or achievement but not completing it. The personality who cannot stand success enjoys their ambitions as long as they remain fantasies but somehow ensures that they will not be fulfilled in reality.

Acquaintances often feel that the parts success is just around the corner, but something always intervenes. In actuality this something is a sense of guilt, of the kind described above. The part who avoids success has a conscience which forbids the pleasures of accomplishment and recognition. They frequently project their guilt feelings and feels that all of their failures were someone else's fault. They may have a strong need to suffer and may seek danger or injury.

These are parts who "cannot stand prosperity" and pose no problem unless the programming impinges upon their feelings of guilt or the reasons for their past failures. Then subjective distortions, not facts, will result. The successful Programmer will isolate this area of unreliability.

The schizoid or strange personality. This part lives in a world of fantasy much of the time. Sometimes they seem unable to distinguish reality from the land of their own creating. The real world seems to be empty and meaningless, in contrast with the mysteriously significant world that they have made. They are tremendously intolerant of any frustration that occurs in the outer world and deals with it by withdrawal into the interior realm.

They have no real attachments to other individuals, although they may attach symbolic and private meanings or values to other individuals.

Children reared in homes lacking in ordinary affection and attention or in state-run communes may become adults who belong to this category. Rebuffed in early efforts to attach themselves to another, they become distrustful of attachments and turn inward. Any link to a group or country will be undependable and, as a rule, transitory. At the same time the schizoid personality needs external approval. Though they retreat from reality, they do not want to feel abandoned.

As a created part the schizoid personality is likely to lie readily to win approval. They will tell the Programmer what he thinks the Programmer wants to hear in order to win the award of seeing a smile on the Programmer's face. Because they are not always capable of distinguishing between fact and fantasy, they may be unaware of lying. The desire for approval provides the Programmer with a handle. Whereas accusations of lying or other indications of disesteem will provoke withdrawal from the situation, teasing the truth out of the schizoid part may not prove difficult if they are convinced that they will not incur favour through misstatements or disfavour through telling the truth.

Government Programming: Like the guilt-ridden personality, the schizoid personality may be an unreliable subject for testing by LCFLUTTER because their internal needs lead them to confuse fact with fancy. This personality is also likely to make an unreliable source because of their incapacity to deal with facts and to form real relationships.

The exception personality. Believes that the world owes them a great deal. They feel that they suffered a gross injustice, usually early in life, and should be repaid. Sometimes the injustice was meted out impersonally, by fate, as a physical deformity, an extremely painful illness or operation in childhood, or the early loss of one parent or both. Feeling that these misfortunes were undeserved, the exceptions regard them as injustices that someone or something must rectify. Therefore they claim as their right privileges not permitted others. When the claim is ignored or denied, the exceptions become rebellious, as adolescents often do. They are convinced that the justice of the claim is plain for all to see and that any refusal to grant it is wilfully malignant.

Government Programming: When programmed by an outsider, the parts are likely to make demands for money, resettlement aid, and other favours -- demands that are completely out of proportion to the value of their contributions. Any ambiguous replies to such demands will be interpreted as acquiescence. Of all the types considered here, the exception is likeliest to carry an alleged injustice dealt him by the government to the newspapers or the courts.

The best general line to follow in handling those who believe that they are exceptions is to listen attentively (within reasonable time limits) to their grievances and to make no commitments that cannot be discharged fully. Defectors from hostile intelligence services, doubles, provocateurs, and others who have had more than passing contact with a if they belong to this category, prove unusually responsive to suggestions from the Programmer that they have been treated unfairly by the other service. Any planned operational use of such subjects should take into account the fact that they have no sense of loyalty to a common cause and are likely to turn aggrievedly against superiors.

The average or normal personality. This is not a part wholly lacking in the characteristics of the other types. They may, in fact, exhibit most or all of them from time to time. But no one of them is persistently dominant; the average subject's qualities of obstinacy, unrealistic optimism, anxiety, and the rest are not overriding or imperious except for relatively short intervals. Moreover, their reactions to the world around them are more dependent upon events in that world and less the product of rigid, subjective patterns than is true of the other types discussed.

Internal Programming Structure

Internally, the System must carry out the following functions: Protect all information and history that relates to the creation and use of the subject. All the structuring and codes of the system need to be guarded. The programming, things the subjects think about also need to be guarded. The subject is meant to be entirely self-governing. The delegation of authority allows both the Programmer and the handler to blame the subject for the instructions they carry out.

A way to teach internal structures to child subjects is Chinese checkers, chess, checkers. Alter patterns will be placed on the boards of these games with different coloured pieces. A pawn can represent a lower part, a queen the Mother. The parts using this visual aid can be coded, coloured and managed. Levels can be superimposed upon each other in the subject's mind using these boards. Take one pattern with parts labelled off, and place the superimposed pattern of pieces over the same place. This is how several different structures can be tied together in one locality in the mind. This is one way structures can be layered in. The Hexagram checker board used in Chinese checkers is called The House of David internally.

Internally, the Programmer will begin with making the System with the core related parts and then the front parts. The front parts will be arranged in a fashion that the structure of the System is confused. The front parts will be given heavy programming, to convince them that nothing happened to them, and they have a satisfactory life. They will be given fictitious stories about the programming, so that almost every item in a System has a cover story to mislead a part about what is going on.

Datums and grids are used to map a System. Some systems are built with three hour glasses each spinning on a x,y, or z axis. The hour glasses could be turned and in so doing the entire system of alters could be turned. The front alters are at the top of the hour glass and the Programmer wants to access the parts at the bottom of the system. The system needs to be rotated 180 degrees so that the bottom parts are now on top. The bottom parts can be given authority to hold the body full time. Codes should be given to given the System to make a shift when the handler needs to turn a System.

An alphanumeric grid is a simple coordinate system on a grid in which each cell is identified by a combination of a letter and a number.

An advantage over numeric coordinates, which use two numbers instead of a number and a letter to refer to a grid cell, is that there can be no confusion over which coordinate refers to which direction.

Algebraic chess notation uses an alphanumeric grid to refer to the squares of a chessboard.

The Base Datums used in mapping a system are: horizontal datum, and vertical datum.

Some systems used to map programming are: WGS 84, 72, 64 and 60 of the World Geodetic System, Polar Coordinate System, Cylindrical coordinate system, Spherical coordinate system, Homogeneous coordinates, Plücker coordinates, Cartesian coordinate system, Waxholm space to name a few

When the programming is being completed the structure of the System will be tied together in one bundle. Everything is built on its own x-y axis. Each 13x13 grid has the middle rows both vertically and horizontally set up as runways. The x-y axis also makes up the hourglass lines or the butterfly wings. Both images are used with subjects. Because things are set up in groups of thirteen items are double coded, thirteen becomes 13-1 and another is 1-13. This allows programmers to link 13-1 and 1-13, so that everything becomes a circle. The circle within a circle, box within a box concept, triangle within triangle leads the subject to feel they are trapped in an infinity loop of programming.

A typical system will constructed as a cube, sphere or pyramids. The principle parts will be the "A" parts. A typical section of parts will consist of a 13 x 13 grid of parts. These are parts that live in an internal structure together and must function together. A 13 x 13 section will have 13 groups of "A" through in “Z" parts. The "A" parts will be the primary parts that the programmers interact with. The Programmer may call up an "A" part and ask it to go get the "C" part in its family, rather than directly asking for them.

The first page of part codes will be the primary or "A" parts. If we are dealing with a 13 x 13 x 13 cube of parts, then the initial page has 13 "A" parts for each section. Many of the functions can receive a standard code, but other items require individual codes.

The "A" parts are regular parts. Many of them have been hypnotically age advanced to see themselves as teenagers or adults. Sometimes "B" and "C" parts are also aged. The "D" through "N" parts are generally left as they were split and most of them are infantile, with little concept of how old they are.

Each section is walled off from another section by amnesia. Each trauma has an amnesia wall built around it. Each trauma memory is sectioned off. That walled off section is a piece of memory that will be identified, and a hypnotic cue attached by the programmers that will pull it up to the conscious mind. If the programmer wishes, the part can be given a history, name, job, and developed into a full personality.

As Programmers structure a system, no-talk walls at calculated intervals where all communication and visibility between parts is walled off must be layered in. These No-talk walls are specifically built structures and not the result of normal amnesia. A 13 x 13 grid may have 2 No-talk walls.

Other methods will be used to divide all the levels from each other. The level of trance for level 3 will be different than the level of trance for level 10. The anchor cues for level 5 will not be the same as 9.

18 Universal System Parts

Systems must be customized to the subject, and the faction the subject will belong to, the programmers, the abilities of the subject, and tasks involved the subject must do. No two systems are alike but these parts should be placed in all systems.

Protectors:
Intellectuals
Denial parts
Controllers
Child alters
Punishers
Feeling alters
Internal councils
Sexual parts
Amnesic alters
The workers
Hosts
The core
Function code fragments
Spiritual parts

Each level of the system should have 15 groups of parts placed in. These groups will work together to maintain the structure of that level. Once these groups are placed in, the Programmer can create parts for outside world purposes.

Group 1 --Theta Structure
Group 2 --Theta Blockage
Group 3 --Mind Structure
Group 4 --Mind Blockage
Group 5 --Body Structure
Group 6 --Body Blockage
Group 7 --Social Life Structure
Group 8 --Social/Life Blockage
Group 9 --Physical System Structure Note: in general terms this group tries to keep the system interested in existing and not attempting suicide.
Group 10 --Physical Blockage
Group 11 --Existence Structure
Group 12 --Existence Blockage
Group 13 --Spiritual Structure
Group 14 --Spiritual Blockage
Group 15 --Final Structure (Parts maintaining the structure of the program)

System Protectors

As a protective and corrective measure all levels should have the following alters in place:
Guardian
Over soul
Holder
Suppressor
Denier
Misdirector
Invalidator
Resimilator

Systems built upon triads are extremely strong, unbreakable, and will often be programmed in threes: three backups, three system controllers, etc.

Core Structures in Systems

Computer System: Internal computers are complex. The first thing created are the inside personalities. Then these parts are placed into a structured system. To operate that structured system and to insure compliance the Programmer must place in Omega programming. Omega programming consists of computers, wiring, conduits and cords. These computers contain the instructions, and are controlled by internal Programmers. This is done by taking hundreds of parts dehumanizing them and turning them into parts of a computer.

During early programming, the subject while being tortured can be shown a structure of a castle, doll house, school, or office building with numerous rooms. The rooms will each have a separate colour. The rooms would be linked in the subject's mind to computers. If the system is a solar system, alien programming is used and aliens are placed in the subject to maintain the computers. In occult programming high level demons are attached to the internal Programmers.

Each alter is linked to an internal computer. Since each section of parts has to remain clandestine they are attached to its own computer. The computers are built to link the mapped sections. A major backup computer is built, and finally the internal Beast computer which sets at the bottom of the subconscious mind.

For example, the All-seeing eye of the computer is a child part that monitors what occurs in the system subconsciously if discovered and pulled to the front this computer part will not be able to vocalize about the system. The software for a computer can be programmed into it, and all the individual programming of every part can then be tied back to the computer. Each alter would be programmed on how to view life, to act, to think, and to function in their job.

Internal communication.

Various internal communication means must be built into the System. Choices of parts are allowed contact with other parts. Portals and one-way mirrors or one-way windows are built in. Parts will need to have the ability to communicate with one another to insure the integrity of the system. Guardian parts on each level should be able to communicate as well as protector parts, cult/occult parts, and what the Programmer and handler deem necessary.

Parts can have several possible means of interactions which are:

Two-way amnesia, where neither part knows about the other's existence. This is what Programmers want for most parts.

One-way amnesia, where A alter knows B alter, but B doesn't know A. This can be accomplished by setting in one-way mirrors.

Co-presence, two parts can come on top of one another at the front of the mind and hold the body together. This produces some strange behaviour for the subject as different parts synthesize their thoughts.

Co-conscious, this is when two alters are aware of what each other is thinking. As the Programmers structure a System, they build in No-talk walls every so often where all communication and visibility between alters is walled off. These No-talk walls are specifically built structures and not the result of normal amnesia.

If front structures are eliminated due to outside interference the system will turn to substantial internal reprogramming, and link primal traumas with the new programs. The internal programming parts are also always alert and will restructure the system constantly if parts work against their programming. Restructuring is a process that can continually go on, not something completed when the subject was a child. For instance, new levels of parts can and are created when the subject is in their 30s, either by the internal or external Programmers.

Internal Travel. There is an anchoring memory that the Programmers begin with of travel. Psychotropics are used to give the subject the sensation of moving. In large systems, the Programmers will use an anchor all of the parts are familiar with. Spaceships, teleporters, trains, escalators, tunnels, secret doors, and other means are planted so parts can travel internally.

When a large system comes in for reprogramming, the Programmer or handler can call up a large section by code and work with a vast amount of alters at once. Far-reaching changes can be made by external Programmers, who can work much more rapidly than the internal Programmers.

Besides programs, items are placed into the mind too. Examples include vaults, safes and doors which need combinations and keys.

19 Goals of Programming

Goals are written, objective future conditions that contain a plan to achieve them. The actual terminology of goals, objectives, plans, and conditions isn't as important as making a goal and seeing the route toward that goal.

Obtain control of the future activities (physical and mental) of any given individual, willing or unwilling by application of SI (sleep induction) and H (hypnosis) techniques.

Can we "condition" by post-H (hypnotic) suggestion agency employees (or persons of interest to this agency) to prevent them from giving information to any unauthorized source or for committing any act on behalf of a foreign or domestic enemy?"2. Can we in a matter of an hour, two hours, one day, etc., induce an H condition in an unwilling subject to such an extent that he will perform an act for our benefit? (Long range).

Can we, while a subject is under SI and H control, show them a map and have them point out specific items, locations, etc., on the map? Can we also have them make detailed drawings, sketches, plans? Could any of the above be done under field conditions and in a very short space of time?

Can we by SI and H techniques force a subject (unwilling or otherwise) to travel long distances, commit specified acts and return to us or bring documents or materials? Can a person acting under post-H control successfully travel long distances?

Create by post-H control an action contrary to an individual's basic moral principles.

In a matter of an hour, two hours, one day, etc., induce an H condition in an unwilling subject to such an extent that he will perform an act for our benefit?

Seize a subject and in the space of an hour or two by post-H control have them crash an airplane, wreck a train, etc.?

Can we 'alter' a person's personality? How long will it hold?

How long can we sustain a post-H suggestion-unaided-with reinforcement?

Can we use SI and H to combat fatigue, produce extreme mental effort?

Can we design tests to determine whether or not an enemy subject has been conditioned by SI and H or any other method?

What would be fastest way to induce SI and H conditions – with drugs – or without any mechanical aids?

Can we detect SI and H by use of SI and H (regression)?

Can we devise a standard simple relatively fast technique for inducing SI and H conditions that can be used by untrained subjects (with or without drugs)?

Can the system govern its self, and what governing structures can we keep--since the structure itself is colonial?

Can the mind work together to help itself?

What are full details on Mind machines?

How effective can the ‘carotid artery technique’ be made? Can it be used while subject is unconscious? Is it faster than other techniques?

Can we make a ‘conditioned’ subject reveal by SI and H specifically how they were conditioned (drugs, torture, fatigue, hostage pressure, techniques)?

Can we devise a system for making unwilling subjects into willing agents and then transfer that control to untrained agency agents in the field by use of codes or identifying signs or credentials?

Is it possible to find a gas that can be used to gain SI control from a gas pencil, odourless, colourless: one shot, etc.?

Guarantee total amnesia under any and all conditions.

Use any sleep inducing agent be best concealed in a normal or commonplace item, such as candy, cigarettes, liquor, wines, coffee, tea, beer, gum water, aspirin tablets, common medicines, coke, tooth paste.

A knockout pill which can surreptitiously be administered in drinks, food, cigarettes, as an aerosol, etc., which will be safe to use, provide a maximum of amnesia, and be suitable for use by agent types on an ad hoc basis.

A material which can be surreptitiously administered by the above routes and which in very small amounts will make it impossible for a person to perform physical activity.

Use SI and H extract complicated formula from scientists, engineers, etc., if unwilling.

Connect the relation of their behaviour to some stimulus.

Physical methods of producing shock and confusion over extended periods of time and capable of surreptitious use.

Place subject’s self esteem or self concept in the no longer true position.

Place subject's relationship in the no longer true but used to be location.

Materials which will produce the signs and symptoms of recognized diseases in a reversible way so that they may be used for malingering.

Materials which will render the induction of hypnosis easier or otherwise enhance its usefulness.

Materials and physical methods which will produce amnesia for events preceding and during their use.

Materials which will cause the subject to age faster/slower in maturity.

Materials which will promote the intoxicating effect of alcohol.

Materials which will cause temporary/permanent brain damage and loss of memory.

A material which will cause mental confusion of such a type that the individual under its influence will find it difficult to maintain a fabrication under questioning.

Substances which will produce "pure" euphoria with no subsequent let-down.

Substances which increase the efficiency of mentation and perception.

Substances which will enhance the ability of individuals to withstand privation, torture and coercion during interrogation and so-called "brain-washing".

Substances which produce physical disablement such as paralysis of the legs, acute anemia, etc.

Substances which will produce a chemical that can cause blisters.

Substances which alter personality structure in such a way that the tendency of the recipient to become dependent upon another person is enhanced.

Substances which will lower the ambition and general working efficiency of men when administered in undetectable amounts.

Substances which promote weakness or distortion of the eyesight or hearing faculties, preferably without permanent effects.

Substances which will promote illogical thinking and impulsiveness to the point where the recipient would be discredited in public.

Could any of the above be done under field conditions and in a very short space of time?

20 Subliminal Perception

The use of subliminal perception is a method to keep the subject unaware of the source of their stimulation. The desire is not to keep them unaware of what they are doing, but rather to keep them unaware of why they are doing it, by masking the external cue or message with subliminal presentation and so stimulating an unrecognized motive. In order to develop the subliminal perception process for use as a reliable programming technique, it would be necessary

To define the composition of a subliminal cue or message that will trigger an appropriate pre-existing motive.

To determine the limits of intensity between which this stimulus is effective but not consciously perceived,

To determine what pre-existing motive will produce the desired abnormal action and under what conditions it is operative, and to overcome the defences aroused by consciousness of the action itself. As to the composition of the subliminal cue, it cannot be supposed that just any message presented below the threshold of recognition will be translated into appropriate action. The determination of the right kind of message in terms of content, number and type of words or symbols, grouping of symbols, must be considered. Since the effectiveness of the procedure depends on not arousing the subject’s defence mechanisms, and since defence mechanisms are not only peculiar to each subject but hard to discover, it is difficult to specify even what is to be avoided in the composition of the subliminal cue in order not to arouse the defences.

Thresholds of recognition are variable and difficult to determine. If the intensity of the stimulus is much below a subject’s threshold it doesn't get through to even the most automatic areas of their sensorium. But recognition thresholds vary tremendously, not only among subjects, but also in the same subject from one time to another, in accordance with their physical situation, physiological condition, and above all the degree to which they are psychologically attuned to the particular content of the message.

The message must be transmitted on a much wider intensity band and may frequently not get through or may on the other hand penetrate to the subject's consciousness and arouse their defences. The message once received is presumed to trigger sensitive subconscious motivation to action. If the subliminal cue is to work by tripping off an existing motive to action, one must know what motives are positive and operant at the moment. The obvious basic drives (e.g. hunger, sex) are sometimes satiated and sometimes subordinated. With a great deal of knowledge about the subject, some predictability can be attained, but it is still a matter of probabilities.

21 Human Experimentation

If it is deemed appropriate advise the subject they are a human experiment. This may or may not be true. The following list explains the reasons the subject could be advised of this:

It creates immense fear and helplessness in the subject. They will reason if it is an experiment they will have to fight hard to survive.

It devalues the subject greatly. They will feel that they have no real value as a human being, that all they are is an experiment. Someone who feels devalued doesn’t care, and will be willing to do things they wouldn’t if they felt some value, some humanization.

It gives the programmer added power, as they are the one who can begin or stop the experiment. Almost always, when the subject is advised they are an experiment, it isn’t really true. When the handler/programmer actually does experiments, the subjects are never told, because it could bias results. The fear could interfere with drug effects, and skew the results. Most recent programming experimentation has been in the area of: drug effects: using different drugs, both alone and in new combinations and dosages, to induce trance states and open the subject to training. Drugs are sought after which will shorten the period needed to induce a trance state, which are quickly metabolized, and leave no detectable residues the next day.

22 Scripts

The script will generally consist of four separate parts;

(1) an identifier (subject's name, description, or other identifying factor),
(2) trigger activation condition or conditions (when, what or how the suggestion will trigger),
(3) the content (what the trigger will precipitate in the perception of the subject),
(4) and a duration (when or under what conditions will it stop or finish). Additional reinforcing scripts are usually added to "strengthen" or reinforce the central posthypnotic command.

The programmer will play the movie for the subject. The subject is told that they will be questioned about the movie; this cues the subject to use photographic recall about what they are viewing. The programmer may show the subject an edited shorter version of the movie, with only parts of the whole, or may show the subject a short scene from the movie.

After watching the movie, or scene, the subject is drugged, and then asked what they remember. The subject will be shocked if they cannot recall items the programmer questions them about and will be forced to watch the scenes again.

When the subject has total recall of the segments, the programmer will tell the subject that they are one of the characters. The subject will be heavily traumatized and a blank slate part created to be the desired character. The first thing the part will see is footage of the movie, or scene. This is its “first memory”. The programmer will link the scene with principles. The subject will be taught concealed meanings in the movie. The subject will be praised for being one of the few subjects who understand what the movie really means. The script programming will often be linked to other programming the subject is undergoing.

Music from the movie, or scene, will be used as a trigger to access the programming inside or bring forward parts.

Scripted programming will often involve a great deal of traumatisation, to create the “blank slate” alters desired. The programming will be ground in with repetition, electroshock, torture, drugging and hypnosis. The alters inside who have gone through this programming will often be highly disconnected from external reality and may believe that they are part of a “script”.

23 Programming Music

The programmers hypnotically make the lyrics of songs cues for subjects. Newly released songs can re-enforce standard programming.

The programmers will create a play list of songs tailored to the subject. During decided torture the song will be played with the lyrics used as the script. A specific alter will be given the script and the task to follow.

Songs are used that fit the script being used for inside building. Wizard of Oz songs are used in foundation programming. Disney songs are used in Disney program specific to the music.
Trigger phrases are found in music, as well as symbols in the videos of the music. The symbols help reinforce internal programming across structures.

Often subject’s will sing the songs to themselves as self programming.

24 Double Bind

Double bind communication is commonly given by programmers and handlers. For example, a child may be given the choice to beat up another child or be assaulted themselves. There are many games the programmer can utilize to place a subject in a double bind.

A programmer can create parts which are given negative spiritual roles with names to match. A part may be named Unforgiveness, Shame, Whore, and Sin for example. For such a part to trust someone, makes the part feel like it is giving up its name, and therefore its identity. By combining the name with an identity the programming intends to double bind the part.

Another technique is to alternate leniency with harshness. When punishment is partnered with kindness, the effect is devastating and disconcerting because the subject looses the ability to predict what is going to happen. The subject doesn't know what hate and like are anymore. The person, who claims to care for them tortures or abandons them to be tortured by someone else. Predicting what is going to occur subjects attempt to gain control over their environment. This control must be stripped from a subject. They soon learn to quit trying to protect themselves, and they quit trying to think for themselves but submit to the environment around them.

25 Pain

Every subject will react very differently to pain. The wide range of individual reactions to pain may be partially explicable in terms of early conditioning. The subject whose first encounters with pain were frightening and intense may be more violently affected by its later infliction than one whose original experiences were mild. Or the reverse may be true, and the subject whose childhood familiarized him with pain may dread it less, and react less, than one whose distress is heightened by fear of the unknown. The individual remains the determinant.

If a subject is caused to suffer pain rather late in the Programming process and after other tactics have failed, they will conclude the Programmer is becoming desperate. They may decide if they can hold out against this assault, they will win the struggle. Subjects who have withstood pain are more difficult to handle by other methods. The effect has been not to repress the subject but to restore his confidence and maturity.

It has been plausibly suggested that, whereas pain inflicted on a subject from outside himself may actually focus or intensify their will to resist; their resistance is likelier to be sapped by pain which they seem to inflict upon themselves. In the simple torture situation the contest is one between the subject and their programmer.

Subjects who are faced with intractable pain will be difficult to programme. The reason is that they can then interpret the pain as punishment and hence as expiation. There are also subjects who enjoy pain and its anticipation and who will be difficult to programme if they are given reason to expect that strong resistance will result in the punishment that they want. Subjects of considerable moral or intellectual stature often find in pain inflicted by others a confirmation of the belief that they are in the hands of inferiors, and their resolve not to submit is strengthened.

26 Malingering

The detection of malingering is not a programming technique, coercive or otherwise. The history of programming has subjects who have attempted to evade the pressures of programming by feigning physical or mental illness. Programmers may encounter seemingly sick or irrational subjects at times. A few tips may make it possible for the Programmer to distinguish between the malingerer and the subject who is genuinely ill, and because both illness and malingering are sometimes produced by coercive programming some guidelines follow.

Most subjects who feign a mental or physical illness do not know enough about it to deceive the well-informed. An important element in malingering is the frame of mind of the Programmer. A subject pretending madness awakens in a Programmer not only suspicion but also a desire to expose the fraud, whereas a well subject who pretends to be concealing mental illness and who permits only a minor symptom or two to peep through is much likelier to create in the Programmer a desire to expose the hidden sickness.

Under the influence of appropriate drugs the malingerer will persist in not speaking or in not remembering, whereas the symptoms of the genuinely afflicted will temporarily disappear. Another technique is to pretend to take the deception seriously, express grave concern, and tell the "patient" that the only remedy for his illness is a series of electric shock treatments or a frontal lobotomy.

27 Debility

Programmers have employed various methods of inducing physical weakness: prolonged constraint; prolonged exertion; extremes of heat, cold, or moisture; and deprivation or drastic reduction of food or sleep. The assumption is that lowering the subject’s physiological resistance will lower their psychological capacity for opposition. If this notion were valid, however, it might reasonably be expected that those subjects who are physically weakest at the beginning of programming would be the quickest to capitulate, a concept not supported by experience. The available evidence suggests that resistance is sapped principally by psychological rather than physical pressures. The threat of debility - for example, a brief deprivation of food - may induce much more anxiety than prolonged hunger, which will result after a while in apathy and, perhaps, eventual delusions or hallucinations. In brief, it appears probable that the techniques of inducing debility become counter-productive at an early stage. The discomfort, tension, and restless search for an avenue of escape are followed by withdrawal symptoms, a turning away from external stimuli, and a sluggish unresponsiveness.

Another objection to the deliberate inducing of debility is that prolonged exertion, loss of sleep, etc.; themselves become patterns to which the subject adjusts through apathy. The Programmer should use his power over the resistant subject's physical environment to disrupt patterns of response, not to create them. Meals and sleep granted irregularly, in more than abundance or less than adequacy, the shifts occurring on no discernible time pattern, will normally disorient a subject and sap their will to resist more effectively than a sustained deprivation leading to debility.

28 The Programming Plan

Before the Programming begins with a subject authorization for Programming must be obtained. At this stage, the framework for how the Programming is to occur is planned, including the level of coercion that is permitted.

Programmers: There must always be a minimum of two programmers working with a subject. This prevents a programmer from being either too severe, or permissive, developing too close a bond with the subject; the watchful eye of the other programmer prevents this. Lead programmers are paired with least experienced programmers. The Lead programmer will teach the assistant programmer, who does most of the actual work. If the assistant programmer is unable to finish a task, the lead programmer will step in.

Planning for programming is more important than the specifics of the plan. Because no two subjects and Programmers are alike, the Programming cannot realistically be planned from A to Z, in all its particulars, at the outset. But it can and must be planned from A to F or A to M. The chances of failure in unplanned programming are unacceptably high. An unplanned approach can ruin the prospects of success even if sound methods are used later.

The intelligence category to which the subject belongs to, though not determinant for planning purposes, is still of significance.

The plan for the programming of a re-call differs from that for other types because the time available for programming is often brief.

Traitors can usually be programmed unilaterally, at least for a time. The time available for unilateral testing and exploitation should be calculated at the outset.

If the reprogramming of a traitor of any other subject who is expected to resist is under consideration a general rule is it is difficult to succeed in the programming of a resistant subject unless the programming service can control the subject and their environment for as long as proves necessary.

The Specific Purpose

Before the Programmer moves into action the programmer has clearly in mind what they want to complete, the codes for the session, triggers for parts, and how the session can best be completed. This leads to appropriate research and preparation of methods and techniques which the Programmer will use. As the subject being programmed may successfully resist some approaches, multiple strategies and tactics may be readied.

Any confusion, or any questioning based on the premise that the purpose will take shape after the programming is under way, is almost certain to lead to aimlessness and final failure. If the specific goals cannot be discerned clearly, further planning is needed before the session starts.

Resistance

The kind and intensity of anticipated resistance is estimated. It is useful to recognize in advance whether the session would be threatening or damaging in any way to the interests of the programmers. If so, the programmer should consider whether the session, or goal of the session, can be gained in another capacity. Programming subjects immediately, on a flimsy plan, and unclear goal, will be a waste of time.

The preliminary psychological analysis of the subject makes it easier to decide whether they are likely to resist and, if so, whether their resistance will be the product of fear that their personal interests will be damaged or the result of the non-cooperative nature of orderly-obstinate and related types. The choice of methods to be used in overcoming resistance is also determined by the characteristics of the subject.

The Programming Setting

The room in which the Programming is to be conducted should be free of distractions. The colours of walls, ceiling, rugs, and furniture should not be startling. Pictures should be missing or dull. Whether the furniture should include a desk depends not upon the programmer's convenience but rather upon the subject's anticipated reaction to connotations of superiority and officialdom. A plain table may be preferable. An overstuffed chair for the use of the subject is sometimes preferable to a straight-backed, wooden chair because if they are made to stand for a lengthy period or is otherwise deprived of physical comfort, the contrast is intensified and increased disorientation results. The value of arranging the lighting so that its source is behind the programmer and glares directly at the subject or the lighting is soft. The effect upon a cooperative source is inhibitory, and the effect upon a resistant source may be to make them more stubborn. Like all other details, this one depends upon the personality of the subject.

Good planning will prevent interruptions. If the room is used for purposes other than Programming, a "Do Not Disturb" sign or its equivalent should hang on the door when the session is under way. The effect of someone wandering in because they forgot their pen or wants to invite the programmer to lunch can be devastating. For the same reason there should not be a telephone in the room; it is certain to ring at precisely the wrong moment. Moreover, it is a visible link to the outside; its presence makes a subject feel less cut-off, better able to resist.

The Programming room affords ideal conditions for photographing the subject without their knowledge by concealing a camera behind a picture or elsewhere.

If a new safe house is to be used as the programming site, it should be studied carefully to be sure that the total environment can be manipulated as desired. For example, the electric current should be known in advance, so that transformers or other modifying devices will be on hand if needed.

Arrangements are usually made to record the Programming, transmit it to another room, or do both. Most experienced programmers do not like to take notes. Not being saddled with this chore leaves them free to concentrate on the subject and how they respond, and what else they are doing. Another reason for avoiding note-taking is that it distracts and sometimes worries the subject. Another advantage of the tape is that it can be played back later. Upon some subjects the shock of hearing their own voices unexpectedly is unnerving. A recording is also a valuable training aid for programmers, who by this means can study their mistakes and their most effective techniques. Exceptionally instructive programming, or selected portions thereof, can also be used in the training of others.

If possible, audio equipment should also be used to transmit the proceedings to another room, used as a listening post. The main advantage of transmission is that it enables the Doctors in charge of the Programming to note crucial points and map further strategy, replacing one programmer with another, timing a dramatic interruption correctly, etc. It is also helpful to install a small blinker bulb behind the subject or to arrange some other method of signalling the programmer, without the subjects knowledge, that the programmer should leave the room for consultation or that someone else is about to enter.

The Participants

Subjects are programmed separately for system building. Separation permits the use of a number of techniques that would not be possible otherwise. It also intensifies in the subject the feeling of being cut off from aid. Programming of two or more subjects with each other in order to produce blame or trauma bonding is especially dangerous if not preceded by separate Programming sessions which have evoked compliance from one of the subjects, or at least significant results involving both.

The number of programmers used for a single programming session varies from one to a large team. The size of the team depends on several considerations, chiefly the importance of the goal and the intensity of subject resistance. Although most sessions consist of one lead programmer, and assistant programmer and one subject, some of the techniques call for the presence of two, three, or four programmers. The two-man team, in particular, is can lead to unintended opposition and conflicts not called for by assigned roles. Planning and subsequent conduct should eliminate such cross-currents before they develop, because the subject will seek to turn them to their advantage.

Team members who are not otherwise engaged can be employed to best advantage at the listening post. Inexperienced programmers find that listening to the programming while it is in progress can be highly educational.

Once the session starts, the programmer is called upon to function at two levels. They are trying to do two seemingly contradictory things at once: achieve rapport with the subject but remain an essentially detached observer. Or they may project themselves to the resistant subject as powerful and ominous (in order to eradicate resistance and create the necessary conditions for rapport) while remaining wholly uncommitted at the deeper level, noting the significance of the subjects reactions and the effectiveness of their own performance. Poor programmers often confuse this bi-level functioning with role-playing, but there is a vital difference. The programmer who merely pretends on their surface performance, to feel a given emotion or to hold a given attitude toward the subject is likely to be unconvincing; the subject quickly senses the deception. Even children are very quick to feel this kind of pretence. To be persuasive, the sympathy or anger must be genuine; but to be useful, it must not interfere with the deeper level of precise, unaffected programming. Bi-level functioning is not difficult or even unusual; most people act at times as both performer and observer unless their emotions are so deeply involved in the situation that the critical faculty disintegrates. Through experience the programmer becomes adept in this dualism. The programmer who finds that they have become emotionally involved and is no longer capable of unimpaired objectivity should report the facts so that a substitution can be made. Despite all planning efforts to select a programmer whose age, background, skills, personality, and experience make him the best choice for the job, it sometimes happens that both programmer and subject feel, when they first meet, an immediate attraction or antipathy which is so strong that a change of programmers quickly becomes essential. No programmer should be reluctant to notify their superior when emotional involvement becomes evident. Not the reaction but a failure to report it would be evidence of a lack of competence or skill expected of a professional.

Other reasons for changing programmers should be anticipated and avoided at the outset. During the first part of the session the developing relationship between the programmer and the initially uncooperative subject is more important than the information obtained; when this relationship is destroyed by a change of programmers, the replacement must start nearly from scratch. In fact, they start with a handicap, because exposure to programming will have made the source a more effective resister. Therefore the ODO, Occult leader, or Mother of Darkness, should not assign as chief programmer whose availability will end before the estimated completion of the programming.

The Timing
Before Programming starts, the amount of time probably required and probably available to both programmer and subject should be calculated. If the subject is not to be under detention, their normal schedule is ascertained in advance, so that he will not have to be released at a critical point because he has an appointment or has to go to work.

Programming sessions with a resistant source that is under detention should not be held on an unvarying schedule. The capacity for resistance is diminished by disorientation. The subject may be left alone for days; and he may be returned to their cell, allowed to sleep for five minutes, and brought back to a Programming which is conducted as though eight hours had passed. The principle is that sessions should be so planned as to disrupt the source's sense of chronological order.

Interaction
This is the main body of the Programming when the Programmer interacts with the subject. This generally appears as a series of trauma techniques, scripting, coding, and fracturing of the psyche. This interaction may take place over a number of days and sessions, which may be limited or open ended in the duration that it may take.

The Termination
The end of a Programming should be planned before the session starts. The kinds of scripts, codes, anchors, trigger E.C.T, the methods employed, and even the goals sought may be shaped by what will happen when the end is reached. If the subject is to be released upon the completion of the programming session it is important to avoid an inconclusive ending. The poorest Programming is those that trail off into an inconclusive nothingness.

A number of practical terminal details should also be considered in advance. Are the subject’s clothing, and property to be returned to them, and will they be available in time? Are they to be paid? Are subsequent contacts necessary and have re-contact provisions been arranged?

The successful Programming of a subject ordinarily involves two key processes: the calculated regression of the subject and the provision of an acceptable ending. In this stage, the Programming is completed and. As appropriate and feasible, the Programmer may return to the previous stage to close any holes in the programming.

The end of a programming session is not the end of the programmer's responsibilities. From the beginning of planning to the end of the session it has been necessary to understand and guard against various troubles.

The isolation that the handlers impose on their subject to prevent real relationships with outsiders, and the strong bonding of the subject to its handler/programmer (trauma bonding, etc.) that is administered must remain intact.

29 The Opening

A principal goal during the opening phase is to confirm the personality assessment obtained through screening and to allow the programmer to gain a deeper understanding of the subject as an individual. Most resistant subjects can block off light programming for one or more of 4 reasons. The first is a specific negative reaction to the programmer. Poor initial handling or a fundamental antipathy can make a subject uncooperative. The third cause is some subjects are resistant "by nature" - i.e. by early conditioning - to any compliance with authority. The fourth is ideological resistance. The subject has identified themselves with a cause, a political movement or organization, or an opposition intelligence service. Regardless of their attitude toward the programmer, their own personality, and their fears for the future, the subject who is deeply devoted to a hostile cause will ordinarily prove strongly resistant under programming.

It is important for the programmer to note verbal projection; vocal tones, and the voice projects tension, fear, a dislike of certain topics, and other useful pieces of information. It is also helpful to watch the subject's mouth, which is as a rule much more revealing than their eyes. Gestures and postures also should be noted. If a subject normally gesticulates broadly at times and is at other times physically relaxed but at some point sits stiffly motionless, their posture is likely to be the physical image of their mental tension. The programmer should make a mental note of the topic that caused such a reaction.

The following is a list of physical indicators of emotions and recommends that programmers note them.

(1) A ruddy or flushed face is an indication of anger or embarrassment.

(2) A "cold sweat" is a strong sign of fear and shock.

(3) A pale face indicates fear.

(4) A dry mouth denotes nervousness.

(5) Nervous tension is also shown by clenching the hands tightly.

(6) Emotional strain or tension may cause a pumping of the heart which becomes visible in the pulse and throat.

(7) A slight gasp, holding the breath or an unsteady voice may betray the subject.

(8) Fidgeting may take numerous forms, all of which are good indications of nervousness.

(9) A subject under emotional strain or nervous tension will involuntarily draw their elbows to their sides. It is a protective defence mechanism.

(10) The movement of the foot when one leg is crossed over the knee of the other can serve as an indicator. The circulation of the blood to the lower leg is partially cut off, thereby causing a slight lift or movement of the free foot with each heart beat. This becomes more pronounced and observable as the pulse rate increases.

Pauses are also significant. But the successful establishment of rapport will tend to eliminate innocent blocks, or at least to keep them to a minimum.

The establishment of rapport is the second principal purpose of the opening phase of the programming. Sometimes the programmer knows in advance, as a result of screening, that the subject will be uncooperative. At other times the probability of resistance is established without screening: stubborn silence, closing of eyes without permission, holding of their breath, and other cues. A lack of rapport may cause a subject resist where otherwise they would cooperate freely, whereas the existence of rapport may persuade a subject who is initially determined to withhold to change their attitude.

Therefore the programmer must not become hostile if confronted with initial hostility, or in any other way confirm such negative attitudes they may encounter at the outset. During this first phase their attitude should remain business-like but also quietly (not ostentatiously) friendly and welcoming.

At this stage the programmer should avoid being drawn into conflict, no matter how provocative may be the attitude or language of the subject. If the programmer meets truculence with neither insincere protestation that they are is neither the subject's "pal" nor an equal anger but rather a calm interest in what has aroused the subject, the programmer has gained two advantages. They have established the superiority will be needed later, as programming develops, and increased the chances of establishing rapport.

How long the opening phase continues depends upon how long it takes to establish rapport or to determine that voluntary cooperation is unobtainable. Even though the cost in time and patience is sometimes high, the effort to make the subject feel that their Programmer is a sympathetic figure should not be abandoned. (unless, the programming does not merit much time). Otherwise, the chances are that the programming will not produce optimum results. In fact, it is likely to be a failure, and the programmer should not be dissuaded from the effort to establish rapport. The theory of programming is the result of a substitution of the programming world for the world outside as the sights and sounds of an outside world fade away, its significance for the subject tends to do likewise. That world is replaced by the programming room, its occupants, and the dynamic relationship between them. As programming goes on, the subject tends to respond in accordance with the values of the programming world rather than those of the outside.

The programmer who senses or determines in the opening phase that what they are hearing is a legend should resist the first, natural impulse to demonstrate its falsity. In some subjects previous programming is intertwined with preservation of the cover story that calling the subject (part) a liar will merely intensify resistance.

30 Beginning of Programming

The breaking down of ongoing patterns of the patient’s behaviour by means of particularly intensive electroshocks (depatterning) can be used to prepare the subject.

The intensive repetition (16 hours a day for 6 or 7 days) of the prearranged verbal signal will create a trigger for the subject when programming will begin. This will assist in placing the subject in the desired mental state. During this period of intensive repetition the subject is kept in partial sensory isolation.

Electrodes will be attached to the subject’s head to monitor electroencephalograph (EEG) patterns. When the subject is in the desired brainwave state, programming will begin. Programming oriented to self-destruction and debasement of the subject is the starting point.

While programming is occurring the subject will be placed on a metal table. They will have an IV in one hand or arm for the administration of drugs and other fluids. The subject extremities and head must be strapped down. The subject must also be naked so body regions and parts are easily accessible.

The subject will be given psychotropic medication every twenty-five to 30 minutes until the programming session is complete.

Programming under the influence of psychotropics in a specified brainwave state with binaural beats in one ear and speaking in the other ear.

Programming begins with specified method of torture. After a predetermined duration of torture the subject is will be in a state of aroused terror, disassociation, and altered brainwave state. At this point a script will be planted into the subject’s mind. This script will be linked to an alter, given a directive, trigger, and task. The part will be given an emotion, double bind, and consequence if they do not follow the directive, script, and leave the area they are placed into.

A subject may be tortured repeatedly until a new alter is created. This part will be given a trigger to let them know when to come out; this could be a smell, word, number, sound, colour or symbol. This trigger is corresponds with the alters’ creation.

After a subject has shattered, the Programmers find the Host part within the mind and gives them a personal history given a job within the system, a place to live in the internal world, and its rules and guide lines on how to function within the system. The Host part will be given scripts about the outside world.

If the Programmer concentrates on a single point when giving instructions they will get better results. Rather than complicating things for the subject, power is gained over the subject. The Programmer must give simple clear instructions. A large number of parts are given clear straight forward jobs.

Because their jobs are so clear-cut, these parts will often remain fragments, rather than parts with full blown personalities. An undeveloped alter will be given one clear, basic job. By stringing 100's of parts together with single tasks, a highly sensitive system of alters can be created.

Programmers individually tailor the scripts for each subject. The Wizard of Oz, Alice in Wonderland, and other books, are read prior to actual programming session. This will enhance the programming the subject's ability to retain the script.

Layer after layer of programming is put in. Each part or fragment is used as if it were a piece of a large system. The result is that no part or fragment is the whole, only a piece. It is very difficult for a single part of thousands of a system made of thousands to rebel.

Note: Programming must include parts whose task is to kill the body. Subjects cannot go without sleep for over 11 days. On the 12th day the subject must be allowed uninterrupted sleep.

31 Infant Programming

Children who are programmed are taught 4 important hypnotic abilities. These four abilities are: a. relaxation, b. visualization, c. concentration, and d. projection, which work in handling the subject along with the alpha state.

Intentional programming preferably begins before birth. Prenatal splitting is attempted as the fetus is very capable of fragmenting in the womb. This is completed between the seventh and ninth month of pregnancy.

Early intentional fragmentation: (ages 0 to 24 months) Techniques used include: placing headphones on the mother's abdomen, and playing loud, jarring music, having the mother ingest quantities of bitter substances, to make the amniotic fluid bitter or yelling at the fetus inside the womb. The mother's abdomen may be hit as well. Mild shock to the abdomen may be applied, especially when term is near, and may be used to cause premature labour, or ensure that the infant is born on a ritual high day; labour inducing drugs may be administered if a definitive birth date is desired.

Once the infant is born, testing is begun. During the first few weeks of life the programmers, will inspect for programming qualities in the newborn. The subject's reflexes will be checked against different stimuli. The infant's strength, their reaction to heat, cold, pain, light, touch, and sound are tested. The programmers are looking for dissociative ability, swift reflexes, and reaction times. Programmers and Drs are also looking for dissociation that they have attempted to start in vitro.

The infant will also be harmed to continue to encourage internal splitting. Methods of abuse include: rectal probes; digital anal rape; electric shocks at low levels to the fingers, toes, and genitalia; cutting the genitalia in ritual settings, bitter/hot ingestible substances placed in infant's mouth. The objective is to continue fragmentation so programming will be quicker, and adapt the infant to pain and reflexive dissociation.

Isolation and abandonment programming begins with the infant. The infant is isolated by programmers, intentionally during the daytime, then picked up, soothed, cleaned up and paid attention during the night. This is done to prepare the infant for night gatherings, and re-enforce programming for day time and night time parts.

From 15 to 18 months, intentionally fragmenting is continued with involvement of primary care givers as well as programmers. Trauma of the subject becomes more methodical. This is completed by intermittently soothing, and bonding with the subject then administering an electrical shock. The infant may be dropped from heights to a soft surface, loud noises, (banging, clapping, and music) and pinching to insure heightened awareness. The baby may be placed in a cage for periods of time with animals to start Epsilon programming.

Between the ages of 20 and 24 months, the subject will start the Steps of Obedience which the Programmers' use to teach the subjects how to be loyal to the family, handler, and programmer. Deprivation of food, water, and basic needs begin later in this stage. A child of this age may be taken to cult/occult gatherings. Outside of unique occasions, or dedications, the child will have no active role. Infants are usually left with a cult/occult member, who insures the child remains awake during this time.

By the time the child is four, the weaknesses and strengths that characterize the alter system have been recorded on charts and the child's destiny in life determined. The chart will read what occupation the child will be made into, and what its function for the overall plan will be.

Extreme Process: This method is very severe and usually is a two to five year program. Because of the severity of the suffering, the subject is usually permanently impaired from integration into mainstream life. The result is the subject must reside in a less competitive environment like a church group. Subjects that receive this program tend to be highly superstitious, are agitated easily when objective evidence that contradicts their belief system is presented. They tend to believe in the spiritual world (demons, ghosts, god, spiritual entities, etc) and consider the spiritual world to be more powerful and important than the material or real world. This program basically follows the following steps; REM deprivation, breakdown of self esteem and confidence, intense suffering, exaggerated conscience, spiritual contact, reborn in Jesus Christ, Spiritual battle, release (saved by the Saviour), and recovering (blessed by Jesus Christ). Whenever possible the Handler/Programmer will skip or reduce these steps to minimize security risk and financial cost.

32 Raising a Child Subject

Parents, as well as other caregivers of a child are given instructions on how to raise the child to be dissociative. The parents are advised their child will have a successful future and so will they if they follow the instructions.

Spend 15 minutes/day teaching the child to write backwards to develop the brain's flexibility.

Periods of prolonged isolation daily, such as dark closets, dark basements, the corners of dark rooms. During the prolonged isolation, the child cannot turn on the lights, go to the bathroom, and make noise or anything else. The child will learn to dissociate. The child is also trauma bonded to the abuser because each time the child is let out, they are grateful to the abuser.

The child can be drowned in a pool and then resuscitated--and the exact amount of time to keep the child under will be given. The child can be placed in a freezer, and again the exact amount of time can be given to the parent. The child is not to roam about the house freely. The adults' area is off-limits. The child must move with permission.

Systematic punishment without provocation with the message--keep secrets. Hear no evil, see no evil, do no evil. This needs to be done several times a week to reinforce the codes of silence and the programming for silence.

A needle which is gripped halfway up is stuck into the child a quarter inch deep on the child's muscles, buttocks or thigh to help continue dissociative behaviour. On special occasions (birthdays, holidays) the hands and feet which are most sensitive to pain are stuck. When the feet or hands are stuck, they will often stick the needles under the nails. The ears are also on occasion stuck with needles. It also conditions the child to obey the commands of their handlers, who will use needles to access the minds various personalities. Various spots on the body when stuck with needles along with certain codes become access points for specified alters.

Anytime a child argues, has a temper tantrum, or gets angry the child is to be punched. This is a quick trauma. It is to be followed with a lit cigarette applied to the child to burn the skin the moment the child becomes submissive. If a cigarette can't be found, a stove top or some other hot item is to be used. When the child is four years of age, they begin programming to burn themselves.

Anytime the child becomes wilful they are to have their mouth washed out with soap. The child should be made to chew off a piece and swallow the foam.

The child should be raped daily and tortured. This assists with sexual programming, and begins a reversal in the mind that pain is love, and pain is pleasure.

33 Detailed Programming

After rapport is established, detailed programming presents only routine problems. The major routine considerations are the following:

It is necessary to make every effort to keep the subject from learning through the programming process precisely where gaps lie. This principle is especially important if the subject is following their normal life, going home each evening and appearing only once or twice a week for programming, or if their bona fides remains in doubt.

It is sound practice to write up each programming report on the day of programming or, at least, before the next session, so that defects can be promptly remedied and gaps or contradictions noted in time.

As detailed programming continues, and especially at the half-way mark, the programmer's desire to complete the task may cause him to be increasingly business-like or even brusque. The programmer may tend to curtail or drop the usual inquiries about the subject's well-being with which they opened earlier sessions. He may feel like dealing more and more abruptly with reminiscences or digressions.

The programmers interest has shifted from the subject themselves, who just a while ago was an interesting subject, to the task of implanting scripts. But if rapport has been established, the subject will be quick to sense and resent this change of attitude. Any subject has their ups and downs, times when they are tired. The peculiar intimacy of the programming situation and the very fact that the programmer has deliberately fostered rapport will often lead the subject to bond. The programmer should neither cut off this bond abruptly. The subject from the beginning to the end of the process they should feel that the programmer's interest in them has remained constant. Unless the programming is soon over, the subject's attitude toward their programmer is not likely to remain constant. They will feel more and more drawn to the programmer or increasingly antagonistic.

Detailed programming ends only when (1) all scripts, codes, and parts are implanted. (2) The subject responds to programming cues. (3) The subject can respond to a call back. Until the subject dies or completes their purposes, their programming may be interrupted, perhaps for years -- but it has not been completed.

34 Stabilizing the Programming

The tortures and stress are all a part of programming. After a session of programming the subject’s mind will be in a high state of terror, shock, dissociativeness and splintering. The subject’s mind cannot endure more, and the potential of having uncontrolled splintering and having the destruction of the mind and programming threatens the programmers’ control. The programmer wants the mind and body to rest so that the programming can set in, without destabilizing events occurring. The subject will be administered a drug to induce a deep sleep. Sleep must occur within 10 to 15 minutes after the programming session.

Occasionally a subject's heart has been pushed to its limits during a trauma and the body must be shut down to allow the subject rest. Repression of the heart is carried out by putting the patient, after the conclusion of the programming is to induce continuous sleep for 7-10 days.

35 Split Brain Work

The brain is "bicameral" the hemispheres communicate via the corpus callosum. The left hemisphere is specialized in verbal-linguistic transduction of speech and analytical thinking (logic, math, cause and effect, language, and sequential thinking). The right side plays more of a role in holistic-metaphorical information transduction such as imagery (art, dance, intuition, subjective, spontaneous, holistic, and dream imagery). The primary role of creating imagery is carried out by the right side. The two hemispheres of the brain can operate separately at the same time.

Work is done by the Programmers to develop the thinking of alters from one side of the brain to think differently from those of the other side. Split brain programming is not just hypnosis. Split brain programming allows the Programmers a way to keep the left hand from knowing what the right hand is doing. It also gives them the ability to put in body programs or memories which affect only half of the subject's body.

In order for programmers to create alters which are highly intuitive and which are able to access the higher spiritual spheres, they need to shut down the logic hemisphere. When the left hemisphere is shut down, then the right brain (which controls the left hand and left side of the body, i.e. the left hand path) is able to function without competition. The subject must be able to get in touch fully their intuitive side to go into the spiritual realms where demons exist.

When one hemisphere is dominating what the brain is doing, the opposite nostril will open and take in air. When the right hemisphere is doing most of the thinking, the left nostril will be doing most of the breathing. Voluntary changes in nostril breathing can help shift the centre of brain activity from one side of the brain to the other. When a person lies on his side, the downward side hemisphere will be activated, because the top nostril will breathe best. The distinctions between the two hemispheres or two brains are used by the occult world. Moriah values the intuitiveness of the right hemisphere
Split brain programming, is completed by using four methods:

1. Shutting down one side and communicating only with one side of the brain. A medication is administered at the base of the skull into one hemisphere of the brain to shut it down, while the other hemisphere is kept awake. Torture is then carried out to split the mind. This results in creating programs and alters which are associated with only one side of the brain. The brain is being further divided from itself.

2. By simultaneously feeding different information to each hemisphere this is done by restraining the subject in place with their eyes forced open. Different movies are shown simultaneously to both eyes. High speed films will be shown with one hemisphere receiving horror scenes and the other getting family settings. This makes the two hemispheres work separately and the subject feels as if they are going insane. One hemisphere is trying to dissociate and is having a despondent experience, while the other side is experiencing something just the opposite. When high speed films are shown for split brain programming, the films are shown in 5 minute increments.

3. Use drugs that block the two hemispheres from communicating.

4. Speak into the left ear while giving the right ear confusing noise. This method is completed to force alters to concentrate when learning scripts.

Front alters may be shown good films to make them believe they live in a perfect world with a good family life. Right side occult alters may receive horror films shown via the left eye. The right side of the brain doesn’t verbalize well, so this is one reason subjects have emotions without the ability to verbalize them.

36 Applications for Drugs used in Programming

Drugs are used during programming. Although drugs used to assist programming mean nothing most individuals, they each have a specific purpose within a certain type of programming.

The overall effect of psychotropic programming on the subject, whether child or adult, is the mind at a deep level begins to doubt its ability to grasp the real from the imaginary. If the psychotropics are not controlled by the programmers, insanity could result for the subject. Further, psychotropics can pose a danger that they could clutter the internal world of the subject and splinter their mind uncontrollably.

Drugs are used in programming to establish a pattern or a script. There must be a pattern of dissociation. Parts can't just dissociate into nothing, otherwise there would be nothing to build on. Drugs will play a major role in the structuring of the alter system. The subject doesn't know where the effect of the drug is coming from. The programmer will take credit for the power of the drug. Whoever administers the drug has power in the subject's mind. The mind wants to be safe.

Some specific uses for drugs during programming include:

Placing people into trance About 90% of the population can be placed into the somnambulistic (the deepest) hypnotic trance by giving them hypnotic drugs. Drugs have been designed which will place individuals into a deep trance very quickly. If an alter is not being cooperative when they are accessed, they can be locked in place mentally and given a shot of a fast-acting hypnotic-inducing drug.

Teaching alters to go deeper into trance to escape drug effects and pain. Much of the training in this area is based upon the subject's horror and fear towards the master programmer. When the programmer wants the subject's alters to learn to trance deeper, they will give a drug that the alter doesn't like. The subject's alter will then be told to go deeper into the mind if they want to escape the effect of the drug. This enforces the dissociative state being trained for the alter. The suggested or story to give to the alter is frequently the image of a train. The subject is advised the conductor is at the front of the train, but they (the child) must move to the back of the train through the train cars. The subject is taught to count cars as they go by as if they were steps in the mind. This is training the subject to descend into deeper levels of the subconscious. The train illustration is used to assist the subject in remembering the drug experience. If the programmer desires and wants the subject to forget the drug experience while learning trance depths, then the imagery of a plane taking off and disappearing in the clouds is the image to use.

Enhancing the trauma Drugs will be used to enhance the spinning effect when the mind is being programmed to have vortexes and to set up traps within the subject's mind. One particular drug enhances the trauma by 100 times. Drugs can be useful to enhance a subject's terror of the experience. This helps shorten the programming time, and it also make the programming more intense. Marijuana enhances perception of colour and noise, but it is not used to enhance trauma. The mind does not program well under marijuana.

Producing out of body experiences Various hallucinogenic drugs, LSD included, will produce an out of body experience for the subject, if the drugs are administered correctly. The Programmer will prepare the subject with various information and story lines during the administration of the drug. PCP which is "angel dust" is one way to disconnect the cortex from the limbic system and go into an altered state.

Creating pain. This can be achieved through a number of medications.

Creating blood vessels that hurt. Blood pressure is raised by drugs and specific medications are added which make the veins burn. The alter is taught to cut the burning veins. This is programming which is laid in to control the subject from straying from the script they are given.

Controlling histamine production. Is used in conjunction with drug-assisted programming

Helping create illusions such as no hands, no feet, no face, no head etc. A programmer working with a hallucinogenic drug can make an alter believe that it has lost a particular body part. Because most of these alters have little memory or no memory and little frame of reference, what they are told while under the influence of drugs is real to them.

Teaching alters to stay in position Some alters don't like to stay in position. But through the use of drugs, and the side effect of drugs, they soon learn the importance of staying in position. If they are disobedient, the memory of the negative side effects from not staying in position in the mind can be pulled up by a code and the alter can relive the pain from having disobediently moved from position. This is very effective in teaching alters to stay in their position that is assigned them in the mind.

To assist other programming modalities, such as high tech harmonic machines, which implant thoughts. (The machines are used in conjunction with designer drugs.)
Another programming modality assisted by drugs is behaviour modification. Aversion therapy using a vomit-inducing drug is used on subjects. Another example of drugs helping assist programming is to administer a hallucinogen and interview the subject while they hallucinating. The hallucinations are then used as programming building blocks by using hypnotic techniques. One way to build on subject scripts while they are hallucinating is to advise the subject if they ever do a particular thing (such as touch programming, remember programming, and integrate parts, etc.) the subject is to have a mental breakdown and hallucinate as they are presently doing. By continually reinforcing this message, some alters will adopt the script "that they are doing the body good to kill it if any alter personality touches the programming," because the trauma would be too much to bear.

Hormones can be given to speed up sexual growth or slow it down. Other body developments may also be manipulated.

To enhance or reduce memory

To build the image of the programmer's power

Note: it is appropriate to point out that the personalities of a subject do not respond uniformly to the same dose of the same drug. Understanding how a drug will effect particular alters is a science in itself. If an alter is holding the body, it will receive more of the effect of a drug.

Some of the cautions that the programmers are alert to include:
Monitoring the heart so that it doesn't stop.
Making sure that drugs aren't given to subjects who are allergic to them.
Switching to herbs when the body is saturated with drugs.

Knowing how much of a drug each part can take, small young alters can’t take as much. Alters within a single system have varying levels of tolerance toward drugs. A young alter may be killed by an adult dosage, even though the age of the body is that of an adult.

Providing salt to balance the electrolytes in the mind of a programmed subject. An electrolyte imbalance can cause a subject’s system to spin.

Section II Applications

37 Brainwave Frequencies

This is a listing of frequencies that various parties have claimed can affect the human mind or body in some way. The following sorts of frequencies are included:

Brainwave Frequencies - These are frequencies associated with various mental states.

Healing Frequencies - These are frequencies that could be used to heal illnesses of different kinds, or stimulate some region of the body (chakras). The medium used to do this varies - some of these devices generate EM fields which are applied to a precise part of the body, while others use vibration and sound.

Natural Phenomena Frequencies - This includes natural frequencies that occur in nature (Schumann's Resonance, for instance), as well as sound tones calculated from the revolution/orbit of the various planets.

Cycles per Second (HZ), as they correspond to mental states, these frequencies are of all types; light, sound, electrical, etc.

Below 0.5 - Epsilon range, extraordinary states of consciousness, high states of meditation, ecstatic states of consciousness, high-level inspiration states, spiritual insight, out-of-body experiences, Yogic states of suspended animation.
0.1-1 Organ/muscle resonances
0.1-3 Delta range, - deep sleep, lucid dreaming, increased immune functions, hypnosis
0.16 - 10 - Neuralgias
0.18 - 10 - Mod. therapy
0.20 - 0.26 - Dental pain
0.20 - 10 - Post-traumatics
0.28 - 2.15 - Alcohol addiction
0.28 - 10 - Arthritis
0.30 - 0.15 - Depression
0.30 - 10 - Cervobrachial syndrome
0.37 - 2.15 - Drug addiction
0.40 - 10 - Confusion
0.45 - 10 - Muscle pain
0.5 - very relaxing, against headache, for lower back pain; Thyroid, reproductive, excretory stimulant, whole brain toner
0.5-1.5 Pain relief; endorphins, better hypnosis

0.5-4 Delta range, deep dreamless sleep, trance, suspended animation Anti-aging. Reduces amount of cortisol, a hormone associated with stress and aging. Increases the levels of DHEA (anti-aging) and melatonin (decreases aging process.) Associated with unconscious mind and sleep state - in conjunction with other frequencies in a waking state, Delta acts as a form of radar – seeking out information – reaching out to understand on the deepest unconscious level things that subjects can't understand through thought process. Provides intuition, empathetic attunement and instinctual insight. Conducive to miracle type healing, divine knowledge, inner being and subject growth, rebirth, trauma recovery, "one with the universe" experiences (samadhi), near death experience, characterized by "unknowing", merely a blissful "being" state such as deep sleep or coma.

The anti-aging uses binaurals at 0.5, 1.0, 1.5, 2.0, 2.5, 3.0, 3.5 and 4.0 HZ. They all play simultaneously.
0.9 Euphoria
0.95 - 10 - Whiplash
1-3 - Delta: deep, dreamless sleep, trance state, non-REM sleep profound relaxation, restorative sleep, feelings of tranquillity and peace, if one can remain aware
There's disagreement over where the delta range begins and ends - 0.5 to 4.0 HZ. 0.1 to 3.0 HZ, and .considers it 0.5 to 3.0 HZ.
1.0 - Feeling of well-being, pituitary stimulation to release growth hormone; overall view of inter-relationships; harmony and balance.
1.05 Helps hair grow + get its colour back. Pituitary stimulation to release growth hormone (helps develop muscle, recover from injuries, rejuvenation effects).
1.2 - (used on) headaches.
1.45 - Tri-thalamic entrainment format. Creates entrainment between hypothalamus, pituitary and pineal. May benefit dyslexics + subjects with Alzheimer's.
1.5 Abrahams Universal Healing Rate .; Sleep .; Those subjects whose ailments have manifested into the fourth stage of Chronic Fatigue, where some form of disease is apparent, experienced a release from the negative sensation of their symptoms when moved into 1.5HZ
1.8 Sinus Congestion seems to clear centering around 1.8 HZ. (tested with binaural beats, primarily)
2.15 - 10 - Tendovaginatis.
2.06 Associated with coccyx (small triangular bone at end of the spinal column).
2.30 Associated with genitals.
2.5 - pain relief, relaxation. Production of endogenous opiates. Use for sedative effect reported use on bleeding, bruises, insomnia, and sinusitis. .
2.57 Associated with bladder.
2.67 Associated with intestines.

Some disagreement over the theta range - divided it into two ranges, Theta1 (3.0-5.5 hz) and Theta2 (5.5-8.0 hz).
3.0-5.5 - "Theta 1" Range. Divides the Theta Range into Theta1 and Theta2.
3.0 Increased Reaction Time 3.0 HZ and below used to reduce muscle tension headaches, but worked less well on migraines and sinus headaches. Used to treat allergies, in conjunction with 330 HZ.
3.07 Associated with hara (3cm or 1.5 inch below navel, balance of pelvis).
3 - 4 Influences physical vision.
3 - 6 Childhood awareness/vivid memories.
3 - 8 Theta Range deep relaxation, meditation, increased memory, focus, creativity, lucid dreaming, hypnagogic state .
3.4 - Sound sleep
3.5 - Feeling of unity with everything, accelerated language retention enhancement of receptivity Earth Resonance. (A remedy for) depression and anxiety. Whole being regeneration, DNA stimulation.

3.6 (a remedy for) anger and irritability.
3.84 Associated with ovaries (Effects=vitality, life at every level).
3.9 (a remedy for) antisocial behaviour. Theta/Delta brainwave range - crystal clear meditation, lucid dreams, enhanced inner awareness, "facilitates easy access to inner resources and creates space for inner peace + self-renewal".
4-6 - attitude and behaviour change.
4-7 - Theta Range : recall, fantasy, imagery, creativity, planning, dreaming, switching thoughts, Zen meditation, drowsiness; Access to subconscious images, deep meditation, reduced blood pressure, said to cure addictions .; Reset the brain's sodium potassium levels, which cuts down on mental fatigue .Increases sex drive . Meditation, Intuitive Augmentation .; Near Sleep brainwaves, conducive to profound inner peace, "mystical truths", transforming unconsciously held limiting beliefs, physical and emotional healing, purpose of life exploration, inner wisdom, faith, meditation, some psychic abilities, and retrieving unconscious material. Bursts of inspiration, twilight sleep learning, deep relaxation, reverie, high levels of awareness, vivid mental imagery.
Hypnopompic and Hypnagogic states
4.0 - 8.0 HZ Theta State present in dreaming sleep, deep meditation, storehouse of creative inspiration, spiritual connection, subconscious mind creative insight, twilight ("sleep") learning, vivid mental imagery. Found in advanced mediators.
4-12 Skeletal muscle resonances.
4.0 - Enkephalins, Extrasensory perception. Astral Projection, Telepathy, "Seduction mindset" .Catecholamines, vital for memory and learning, respond at around 4 HZ. Subconscious Problem Solving/Full Memory Scanning (if one can manage to stay awake) Associated with object naming, an important aspect of memory
4.11 Associated with kidneys (Effects=strength).
4.5 Shamanic State Of Consciousness/Tibetan Buddhist Chants
4.5-6.5 Wakeful dreaming, vivid images.
4.6 Associated with spleen and blood (Effects=Emotional Impulse).
4.9 - Introspection. Induce relaxation, meditation, and deeper sleep.
5.0 - unusual problem solving reduced sleep needed, theta sounds replacing need for extensive dreaming. Relaxed states, pain-relief (beta endorphin increases of 10-50% reported) .Alleged Sphincter Resonance (mechanical) (not good).
5.0 - 10.0 Relaxation.
5.14 Associated with stomach (Effects=Emotional Acceptance).
5.35 Associated with lungs (Effects=Oxygen, Heat).

5.5-8.0 "Theta2" frequency range : Consists of trains (long runs) of rhythmic frontal activity centring at 6.5-Hz with amplitudes reaching the 50-100 uV (micro-volt) range. Is induced in some subjects by the performance of a mental task such as mental arithmetic, tracing a maze, counting the number of cubes piled in a three-dimensional representation, and imaging a scene. More common in extroverts with low traits of neurosis and anxiety. Because Theta2 is associated with mental tasks and its influence is seen in evoked potential latencies closely relates to mechanisms of attention or arousal.
5.5 - Moves beyond knowledge to knowing, shows vision of growth needed; "Inner Guidance” Inner Guidance, intuition, heat generation.
5.8 (reduce) Fear, Absent-mindedness, and Dizziness.

6.0 - long term memory stimulation. (Reduce) unwillingness to work.
6.0 - 10.0 Creative Visualization - about 6hz for a while, then up to 10hz.
6-9.6 Somatic Responses, tingling, pressure, heat.
6.15 Associated with heart (Effects=love, warmth).
6.2-6.7 Frontal Midline Theta (Fm Theta) is a specific EEG frequency seen in those subjects actively engaged in cognitive activity, such as solving math problems and playing Tetris 6.26-6.6 Hemispheric desync, confusion, anxiety, low Reaction Time, depression insomnia.
6.30 Hz - Mental and astral projection accelerated learning and increased memory retention. (Reduce) Anger + Irritability.
6.5 - "Centre" of Theta2 Brainwave Frequency Range. Frontal lobe or brain entrainment of the two hemispheres is around 6.5 hz.
I quoted the second entry from .directly, due to its ambiguity. It probably ties into what the 5.5-8.0 HZ entry says above.
6.8 Possible use for muscle spasms.
6.88 Associated with collarbones (Effects=vitality, overall balance, stability).
7.0 - Mental and astral projection, bending objects, psychic surgery; Increased Reaction Time. Mass aggregate frequency (can deaggregate matter), alleged to resonate and rupture organs at excessive intensity. Treatment of sleep disturbances
7.5 - Inter-awareness of self and purpose; guided meditation; creative thought for art, invention music, etc.; contact with spirit guides for direction; entry into meditation .; At 7.5 HZ subjects who before suffered from confused thinking reported an ease at finding solutions to troublesome problems after a re-evaluation was conducted. Earth magnetic field frequency, useful theta (brain) waves frequency.
7.5 - 8 For Treating Alcohol + Drug Addiction - This range of frequencies tells a subject they're satisfied, which is "missing" in addictive personalities.
7.69 Associated with shoulders (Effects=strength of the arms, expansion, teaching).
7.8 Schumann Resonance (see 7.83 HZ), ESP activation. Short high frequency bursts at 7.7 Hz induced long-term potentiation in prefrontal cortex, though only for one day.
7.8-8 Stimulates ESP, paranormal.
7.83 - Earth Resonance, grounding "Schumann Resonance” anti-jetlag, anti-mind control, improved stress tolerance psychic healing experiments, pituitary stimulation to release growth hormone (helps develop muscle, recover from injuries, rejuvenation effects) .; Earth Resonance Frequency - 'leaves you feeling revitalized like you've spent a day in the country.' reports of accelerated healing/enhanced learning - "the earth's natural brainwave".
Overtones of the Schumann Resonance can also stimulate the pituitary in the same way that 7.83 HZ can - especially 31.32 HZ.
8-8.6 Reduced Stress/Anxiety.
8.0-10.0 learning new information Alpha - Rapid Refreshment 15 min.
8.0-12.0 - Alpha range light relaxation, "super learning", and positive thinking. Slower brain waves that are conducive to creative problem solving, accelerated learning, mood elevation, stress reduction, etc., characterized by intuitive insights, creative "juice", inspiration, motivation, daydreams etc. Relaxed, yet alert Associated with calm, relaxed, unfocused (not concentrating), lucid mental states, dream sleep and pleasant drifting feelings or emotions. 8-13 - Alpha range - Non-drowsy but relaxed, tranquil state of consciousness, primarily with pleasant inward awareness; body/mind integration. ; Amplifies dowsing, empty-mind states, detachment, daydreams, mind/body integration. (Can cause) epileptic seizures.

8-14 - Qi Gong and infratonic Qi Gong machine
8.0 - Past life regression. More Lymphocytes, DNA repair. Associated with Base/Muladhara chakra (Colour=Red) (Body Parts=Adrenals, Spinal Column, Kidneys) (Effects=Physical energy, will to live) (Note=C).
8.22 Associated with mouth (Effects=speech, creativity).
8.3 - Pick up visual images of mental objects. Clairvoyance.
8.6-9.8 Induces sleep, tingling sensations.
9.0, 11.0, 16.0 (bad) documented calcium ion migration (brain tissue).
9.0 - 13.0 - Alpha Range relaxed, not thinking about anything in particular, sometimes a pleasurable feeling of "floating". Often dominant in certain kinds of meditation, alpha waves have for the past twenty years been associated with calm, lucid mental states (the "alpha state"). They're also often detected during dream sleep. This pattern typically occurs in daydreaming, relaxed awareness, guided or focused imagery and smoothly rhythmic athletic activity. There's often a euphoric, effortless feeling of "flow" as the doer is absorbed in activity and subject + object are felt to be united 9.0 - 14.0 Alpha range Relaxed and detached awareness, visualization, sensory imagery, light reverie. Also, gateway to meditation - provides bridge between the conscious and subconscious mind.
9.0 - Awareness of causes of body imbalance and means for balance. Blind subject phantom touch reading (somatosensory cortex). Associated with Sacral/Svadhisthana chakra (Colour=Orange) (Body Parts=Gonads, Reproductive System) (Effects=Relationships/Sexuality) (Note=D).
9.19 Associated with upper lip (Effects=emotions, conflict resolution).
9.4 Major frequency used for prostate problems.
9.41 - Pyramid frequency
9.5-10 - Centre of Alpha Range - The brain's scanning/idling frequency - indicating a brain standing by, waiting to give way to beta should attention be required, or be the bridge, the gate, to Theta and Delta for drowsiness, sleep, and certain cognitive challenges.
9.6 - Mean dominant frequency associated with earth's magnetic field; Facial Toning
9.8-10.6 Alertness.
10 - Enhanced release of serotonin and mood elevator. Acts as an analgesic, safest frequency, especially for hangover and jet lag. Dominant alpha frequency, clarity, normalcy, anti-convulsant, circadian rhythm resync, activate kidneys, raise body temp, more serotonin . Good when trying to correlate information by the subconscious - a waiting frequency while the subconscious does the work at lower frequencies. Motor impulse coordination (Motor Control cortex). Learning a foreign language Centring, Sleep Spindles, Arousal. Associated with Solar Plexus/Manipura chakra (Colour=Yellow) (Body Parts=Pancreas, Stomach, Liver, Gall Bladder, Nervous System) (Effects=Spiritual wisdom, self-healing. Increased alertness (caused by an increase in norepinephrine + serotonin and a decrease in melatonin), sense of well being and decreased pain (caused by increase in beta-endorphins) .; Adrenal Stimulant .; Significant improvements in memory, reading and spelling are reported (in conjunction with 18 HZ) Treatment for Attention Deficit Disorder/Hyperactivity Treatment for closed head injury 'Berger Rhythm' (used on) headaches .
10-14 Dream/sleep spindles.
10.2 Catecholamines
10.3 Associated with Nasal Passages (Effects=breathing, taste).
10.5 - Frequency for healing of body, mind/body unity, fire walking potent stabilizer and stimulating for the immunity, valuable in convalescence. Relaxed alertness, contemplation, body healing, mind over matter. Lowering Blood Pressure Associated with Heart/Anahata chakra (Colour=Green) (Body Parts=Thymus, Heart, Blood, Circulatory System) (Effects=Love of Life, love of self and others).

10.6 - Relaxed and alert
10.7 Associated with ears (Effects=hearing, formal concepts).
11.0 (and Below) - Stress Reduction.
11-14 Focused alertness.
11.0 (used to) achieve "relaxed yet alert" states. .
11.5-14.5 An implication for neurotherapy is that if increased intelligence + mental efficiency is the objective, then a frequency band with a 13-Hz centre should be used. A more desirable frequency band than 12 to 15-Hz is 11.5 to 14.5-Hz.
12.0 - Centring, doorway to all other frequencies frequency of earth resonance Centring, mental stability, transitional point, time seems faster. To stimulate mental clarity. Associated with Throat/Vishuddha chakra (Colour=Blue) (Body Parts=Thyroid, Lungs, Vocal Cords) (Effects=Expression/self in society.
12.3 Associated with eyes (Effects=Visualization).
12.0-14.0 Learning Frequency - Good for absorbing information passively, when you plan to think about it later. distinguishes between active studying where you're processing information and passive studying where you're just trying to absorb information + plan to think about it later. For the former, suggested 36 to 44 HZ.
12.0-15.0 Beta (low) - relaxed focus, improved attentive abilities. Treating Hyperactivity. Sensor motor Rhythm - Used in the treatment of mild autism
13-27 - Beta Range Associated with focused attention towards external stimuli, alert mental activity, normal waking consciousness, and active thought processes.
13-30 - Beta Range - Normal wakefulness, the taking in and evaluating of various forms of data received through the senses. It's present with worry, anger, fear, hunger and surprise. Waking state, motivation, outer awareness, survival, problem solving, arousal, dendrite growth, combats drowsiness .Conscious Thinking, Autonomic Processes and Emotions Others consider the rages of Beta to be 13-27 HZ, 14-38 HZ. 13-40 HZ and 14-30 HZ.
Breaks up Beta into ranges - Low Beta=12-15 HZ, Mid Beta=15-18 HZ, and High Beta=18.0+ HZ.
13-40 Beta Range - a high frequency pattern, conducive to stimulating energy + action; most of our current institutionalized education is beta geared, characterized by logical, analytical, intellectual thinking, verbal communication, etc.
13.0 - Alleged sphincter resonance (mechanical) (not good). Associated with Brow/Ajna chakra (Colour=Indigo/Violet) (Body Parts=Pituitary, Lower Brain, Left Eye, Ears, Nose, Nervous System) (Effects=Visualization, Conceptualization.
13.8 - Associated with Frontal Lobes (Effects=the seventh sense, final decision).
14-16 - associated with sleep spindles on EEG during second stage of sleep
14-15 - Slows conditioned reflexes.
14.0-30.0 - Beta Range This pattern is optimal for intense mental activities such as calculations, linear logical analyses and other highly structured functions
14.0 - Awake and alert. Alert focusing, vitality, concentration on tasks Schumann Resonance (2nd of 7 frequencies. 7.83 HZ being the first pituitary stimulation to release growth hormone (helps develop muscle, recover from injuries, rejuvenation effects) .; Intelligence Enhancement in conjunction with 22.0 HZ (medium=audio-visual stimulation)
.used audio-visual stimulation alternating between 14 and 22 HZ. Check the link under bibliography entry for more information.

14.1 "Earth Resonance” Earth Harmonics - accelerated healing. (Probably tied to Schumann Resonance above.)
15.0-18.0 Beta (mid) - increased mental ability, focus, alertness, IQ.
15-24 Euphoria
15 - chronic pain .; Sound which bypasses the ears for sublimination (auditory cortex) .; Associated with Crown/Sahasrara chakra (Colour=Violet/White) (Body Parts=Pineal, Upper Brain, Right Eye) (Effects=Integration of personality and spirituality
15.4 - Associated with Cortex (Effects=intelligence).
16.0 - bottom limit of normal hearing. Release oxygen and calcium into cells.
16.4 Associated with top of head (Effects=spirit, liberation, transcendence).
18.0-22.0 - Beta: outward awareness, sensory data. Throws brain's sodium/potassium levels out of balance, resulting in mental fatigue. Theoretically can be used to achieve a "relaxed body/focus mind" state of consciousness.
18.0 Beta (high) - fully awake, normal state of alertness, stress and anxiety. Significant improvements in memory, reading and spelling are reported (in conjunction with 10 HZ) (used to) improve hyperactive behaviour
20-30 Phospene imagery, peak luminosity in visual field.
20-40 Meditation For Stress Relief/Just At The Edge Of Audible Sound/As A Musical Background.
20.0 - fatigue, energize. Causes distress during labour. Human Hearing Threshold.; Schumann Resonance (3rd frequency of 7) Imposing subconscious commands on another (thought centre). Stimulation of pineal gland Helps with tinnitis (a condition that causes ear-ringing) Pituitary stimulation to release growth hormone (helps develop muscle, recover from injuries, rejuvenation effects). Adrenal Stimulant, (used on) sinus disorders/sinus infection/head cold/headache. Commonly used "cure-all" Rife Frequency
20.215 LSD-25 mimics the effects of 20.3 "Earth Resonance" Probably the same thing as the Schumann Resonance at 20 HZ.
22.0 Used in conjunction with 14 HZ for intelligence enhancement (medium=audio-visual stimulation) Used in conjunction with 40 HZ for 'out of body' travel Also used with 40 HZ for psychic healing. Used audio-visual stimulation alternating between 14 and 22 HZ.
22.027 Serotonin
25.0 Bypassing the eyes for images imprinting (visual cortex).
26.0 Schumann Resonance (4th frequency of 7) Pituitary stimulation to release growth hormone (helps develop muscle, recover from injuries, rejuvenation effects).
26.4 "Earth Resonance”.
27.5 lowest note on a piano.

Starting at 30 HZ, sources begin to disagree over what the names of each range are.

30 - 60 Gamma Range - little known but includes decision making in a fear situation, muscle tension,
Some researchers consider Gamma to start at 40 HZ.
30 - 190 Lumbago.

60 to 120 to be the Lambda range.

30-500 High Beta: Not associated currently with any state of mind. Some effects have been observed, but currently not enough research has been done in this area, to prove, or disprove, anything.

30 to be the beginning of the Gamma range, which it believes run to 60. It then considers 60 to 120 to be the Lambda range.

40 is where Beta ends and Gamma begins.
31.32 Schumann Resonance (5th frequency of 7) - pituitary stimulation to release growth hormone (helps develop muscle, recover from injuries, rejuvenation effects).
32 Desensitizer; enhanced vigour and alertness.
33 Christ consciousness, hypersensitivity, Pyramid frequency (inside) ; Schumann Resonance (5th frequency of 7)
HZ (pyramid outside frequency). The mind tends to wander in funny ways.
35 - 150 Fractures.
35 - 193 Arthralgy.
35 Awakening of mid-chakras, balance of chakras
36 - 44 Learning Frequencies, When (Actively) Studying or Thinking. Helps To Maintain Alertness. Waking Operating State.; Frequencies of the olfactory bulb, prepiriform cortex and amygdala
38 Endorphin release
39.0 Schumann Resonance (6th frequency of 7)
40-60 anxiolytic effects and stimulates release of beta-endorphins.
43 - 193 Carcinomatosis.
40.0 - dominant when problem solving in fearful situations. Gamma - associated with information-rich task processing and high-level information processing. 40 Hz brain activity may be a kind of binding mechanism the 40-cycle-per-second wave serves to connect structures in the cortex where advanced information processing occurs, and the thalamus, a lower brain region where complex relay and integrative functions are carried out. Used in conjunction with 22 HZ for 'out of body' travel Also used with 22 HZ for psychic healing 40--Hz activity varies from 38.8 to 40.1-Hz, regardless of the electrode site. The average frequency is in the ~39.5-Hz range. In summary, when the body is profoundly relaxed and the mind is in a state of high focus and concentration, 20 and 40-Hz brain activity can be seen in the raw and quantitative EEG of some subjects. It is possible that 18 to 22-Hz Beta and possibly 40-Hz neuro-feedback training may help create a "relaxed body/focused mind" state of consciousness." Activity in the ectosylvian and lateral cortex, medial geniculate, reticular formation, centre median thalamus and hippocampus. The EEG of middle- and high-I.Q. subjects during mental multiplication activity. A 40-Hz rhythm occurred just prior to the subject's answering the question. Forty--Hz pulses are thought to lead to synchronization + coordination of neurons assigned to the processing of incoming sensory stimulation. Put in "computerise," 40-Hz may be the brain's "operating system" frequency Considered the dividing point between beta waves + gamma waves.
45.0 Schumann Resonance (7th frequency of 7
46.98 - Useful for "weird effects" (use with 62.64 HZ and 70.47 HZ).
50-60 Documented negative effects too numerous to mention There is no correlation given with signal strength or modality used, i.e. audio-visual, EMF, magnetic, electrostatic, gravitic. Also, most ELF research is now Govt classified. Discovered behavioural effects as the result of applied sinusoidal field gradients as low as 4 volts.

50.0 - dominant frequency of polyphasic muscle activity, Slower cerebral rhythms
55.0 - Tantric yoga; stimulates the kundalini.
60 - 120 Lambda Range - Little known but includes central nervous system activity
60 electric power lines
62.64 - Useful for "weird effects". (Use with 46.98 HZ and 70.47 HZ).
63 Astral projection
65.8 Associated with coccyx (small triangular bone at end of the spinal column) (higher octave of 2.06 HZ).
70-9,000 Voice spectrum
70 Mental and astral projection; Endorphin production/used with electroanalgesia.
70.47 Useful for "weird effects". (Use with 46.98 HZ and 62.64 HZ).
72 Emotional spectrum Used on sinusitis/sinus infection/head cold.
73.6 Associated with genitals (higher octave of 2.30 HZ).
80 Awareness and control of right direction. Appears to be involved in stimulating 5-hydroxytryptamine production, with 160Hz. Combine with 2.5 Hz.
82.3 Associated with bladder (higher octave of 2.57 HZ).
83 Third eye opening for some subjects
85.5 Associated with intestines (higher octave of 2.67 HZ).
90.0 - 111.0 Pleasure-producing beta-endorphins rise between these frequencies. The notes that would fall in this range begin with F#3 and go up to A3. ("A3" being the fourth octave up -- since there's an A0, and A1, A2 lower than it.) Playing the F#3 and the A3 as a chord seems to function as a good painkiller. An additional undertone in the alpha range of frequencies sometimes helps too. (Try adding a tone around 12.5 HZ).
90.0 Good feelings, security, well-being, balancing
95.0-125.0 Acoustical Resonances of Assorted Ancient Structures
95.0 Use for pain along with 3040 HZ.
98.4 Associated with hara (3cm or 1.5 inch below navel, balance of pelvis) (higher octave of 3.07 HZ).
100 Can help with pain (used with electrical stimulation)
The site specifically mentions it can be good for pain initially, but then recommends using 0.5 or 1.5 to treat pain.
105 Overall view of complete situation
108 Total knowing
110.0 Frequency associated with stomach. (Note=A) Associated with ovaries (Effects=vitality, life at every level) (higher octave of 3.84 HZ).
111 Beta endorphins cell regeneration
117.3 Frequency associated with Pancreas (Note=C#)
120 - 500 P.S.I., moving of objects, changing matter, transmutation, psychokinesis 120 Helps with fatigue (Medium=pad (used on) sinus disorders/sinus infection/head cold.
125 Graham potentializer; Stimulation. (Used on) sinusitis.
126.22 - Sun, 32nd octave of Earth year The Frequency Of The Sun (Note=C) (Colour=Green) (Tempo=118.3 BPM) (Chakra=Manipura, also called Hara {associated with Navel and 3rd lumbar vertebrae}) (Effects=advances the feeling of centring of magic and of the transcendental)

132.0 Associated with kidneys (Effects=strength) (higher octave of 4.11 HZ). Associated with coccyx (small triangular bone at end of the spinal column) (higher octave of 2.06 HZ).
136.1 Sun: light, warmth, joy, animus Resonates with the earth year (Note=C#) (Colour=Turquoise Green) (Effects=calming, meditative, relaxing, centring) Period it takes earth to revolve around sun (Tempo=63.8*127.6) (Chakra=Anahate/Heart chakra)(Effects=relaxing, soothing, balancing, harmony with the cosmos, associated with the soul {"frequency of the soul}) (Medicinal=Sedative) (Other=significant tone in Indian music {called it the "sadja" or "father to others" - it was a keynote} - corresponds to "OM" and the Christian "AMEN")
140.25 Pluto: power, crisis and changes Frequency associated with the orbit of Pluto; (Note=C#) (Colour=blue-green) (Tempo=65.7 * 131.4 BPM) (Effects = support the magic group dynamic principle and is said to be responsible for integration into certain structures of society
141.27 Mercury: intellectuality, mobility Frequency associated with orbit of Mercury (Note=C# or D) (Colour=blue-green or blue) (Tempo=66.2) (Chakra=Vishudda/Throat chakra) (Effects=Supports speech centre and communicative-intellectual principle, associated with communication and cleverness) the frequencies of planets revolving around the sun are less important than those of the moon, sun, and Earth.
A discrepancy in the note and colour - they're both given twice - once as C# and blue-green,
144.0 (helps with) headaches (Medium=pad)
144.72 Mars: activity, energy, freedom, humour Frequency associated with the orbit of Mars (Note=D) (Colour=blue) (Tempo=67.8 * 135.6 BPM) (Effect : Supports strength of will and focused energy, ability for achievement)
146.0 (used on) sinus infection/head cold.
147.0 Associated with the spleen/blood (Effects=Emotional Impulse) (higher octave of 4.6 HZ) Associated with genitals (higher octave of 2.30 HZ).
147.85 Saturn: separation, sorrow, death Frequency associated with orbit of Saturn (Note=D) (Colour=Blue) (Tempo=69.3 * 138.6 BPM) (Effects=enhances concentration and the process of becoming conscious + shows very clearly karmic connections, brings structure and order - is considered to be a cosmic controller)
160.0 Appears to be involved in stimulating 5-hydroxytryptamine production, with 80 Hz. .; Use for rapid relief from headaches.; used on sinus infection/head cold .
164.3 Frequency associated with Gall Bladder (Note=E)
165.0 Associated with stomach (Effects=Emotional Acceptance) (higher octave of 5.14 HZ) Associated with bladder (higher octave of 2.57 HZ).
171.0 Associated with lungs (Effects=Oxygen, Heat) (higher octave of 5.35 HZ). Associated with intestines (higher octave of 2.67 HZ) .
172.06 - Resonates with the Platonic year {about 26,000 years} (Note=F) (Colour=purple-violet) (Effects=joyful, cheerful, spiritual effect) .; The Frequency Of The Platonic Year (Colour=red-violet {purple}) (Tempo=80.6 BPM) (Chakra=Sahasrar/Crown chakra) (Effects=cheerfulness, clarity of spirit, cosmic unity on highest levels) (Medicinal=antidepressive) (Other=F is considered the tone of the spirit)
176.0 - Frequency associated with the colon. (Note=F or F#)
183.58 - Jupiter: growth, success, justice, spirituality. Frequency associated with the orbit of Jupiter (Note=F#) (Colour=Red) (Tempo=86.05 * 172.1 BPM) (Effects: supports creative power and continuous construction) (Associated with Jupiter: Generosity, Continuity, Magnanimity, Joviality)
185.0 - (used on) sinus infection/head cold.

187.61 frequency of "moon culmination"
194.18 frequency of Synodic "Earth" Day {the "day tone"} (Note=G) (Colour=Orange Red) (Tempo=91.0 BPM) (Chakra=Muladhar/Base chakra) (Effects = dynamic, vitalizing) (Medicinal="tonifies") (Other=weather determining" spheric frequency, influences proteins, brings one into harmony with nature)
194.71 - Earth: stability, grounding Key of G resonates with frequency of earth day, the colour orange-red, and has a dynamic, stimulating, and energizing effect on the body-mind.
197.0 Associated with heart (Effects=love, warmth) (higher octave of 6.15). Associated with hara (3cm or 1.5 inch below navel, balance of pelvis) (higher octave of 3.07 HZ).
197.71 frequency of Sideric Day.
207.36 - Uranus: spontaneity, independence, originality. Frequency associated with orbit of Uranus {insert one of dozens of bad jokes here} (Note=G#) (Colour=Orange) (Tempo = 97.2 BMP) (Effects = supports the power of surprise and renewal, has primeval and erotic power).
210.42 frequency of Synodic Moon (Note=G#) (Colour=orange) (Tempo=98.6 BPM) (Chakra=Svadisthan {2nd Chakra}) (Effects=stimulates sexual energy, supports erotic communication) (Medicinal=regulation of menstruation, disturbances in the gland and lymph system).
211.44 - Neptune: the unconscious, secrets, imagination, spiritual love. Frequency associated with orbit of Neptune (Note=G#) (Colour=orange) (Tempo=99.1 BPM) (Effects = supports intuition, the unconsciousness, and enhances the dream experience).
220.0 Frequency associated with lungs. (Note = A) Associated with collarbones (Effects=vitality, overall balance, stability) (higher octave of 6.88 HZ). Associated with ovaries (Effects=vitality, life at every level) (higher octave of 3.84 HZ).
221.23 - Venus: beauty, love, sexuality, sensuality, harmony. Frequency associated with the orbit of Venus (Note=A) (Colour=yellow-orange) (Tempo=103.7 BPM) (Chakra=Ajna/Third Eye) (Effects=supports higher love energy and aspiration for harmony).
227.43 frequency of Sideric Moon.
229.22 frequency of Metonic Cycle (related to moon).
234.16 frequency of Moon knot.
241.56 frequency of Saros period; (related to moon).
246.04 frequency of Apsidis rotation; (related to moon).
250.0 Elevate and revitalize
254.57 Frequency associated with orbit of Icarus (asteroid).
256.0 Root Chakra (1:1) (Note=C).
263.0 Associated with mouth (Effects=speech, creativity) (higher octave of 8.22 HZ). Associated with kidneys (Effects=strength) (higher octave of 4.11 HZ).
264.0 Related to personality. (Note=C+).
272
33rd octave of Earth year (HC)
272.0 Frequency associated with Selenium (mineral nutrient) (Note=C#).
272.2 Frequency associated with orbit of Earth (Note=C#).
273.0 Transsubjectal Chakra (1:15) (Note=C#) (Earth Orbit 272).
280.5 Frequency associated with orbit of Pluto (Note=C#).
281.0 - Frequency associated with Intestines (Note=C#) (BH1)
281.6 - Frequency associated with Small Intestine (Note=C#).
282.4 - Frequency associated with orbit of Mercury. (Note=D).

288.0 - Polarity Chakra (9:1) (Note=D) (Mars Orbit 289).
289.4 - Frequency associated with orbit of Mars. (Note=D).
293.0 - "unknown" Chakra (1:14) (Note=D+) (Saturn Orbit 296).
A note somewhere between D and D#. A quarter note.
294.0 - Associated with the upper lip (Effects=emotions, conflict resolution) (higher octave of 9.19 HZ). Associated with the spleen/blood (Effects=Emotional Impulse) (higher octave of 4.6 HZ).
295.7 - Frequency associated with orbit of Saturn (Note=D#).
295.8 - Frequency associated with Fat Cells (Note=C#).
296.07 - Frequency associated with orbit of Toutatis (asteroid).
304.0 - Useful on headaches (medium=pad); sedation and pain relief (medium=tube) (JB+KFL); (useful for) blood pressure, (and with) stiff muscles (KFL); Frequency associated with Potassium (mineral nutrient) (Note=D#).
310.7 - Frequency associated with spin of Neptune (Note=Eb).
315.0 - Diaphragm Chakra (10:1) (Note=Eb).
315.8 - Frequency associated with Brain (Note=Eb) (BH1)
317.83 - Frequency associated with Liver (Note=Eb).
319.88 - Frequency associated with Kidney (Note=Eb).
320.0 - Solar Plexus Chakra (10:1) (Note=Eb). Frequency associated with Calcium (mineral nutrient) (Note=E or Eb).
321.9 - Frequency associated with blood. (Note=E or Eb).
324.0 - Frequency associated with muscles. (Note=E).
329.0 Associated With Nasal Passages (Effects=breathing, taste) (higher octave of 10.3 HZ). Associated with stomach (Effects=Emotional Acceptance) (higher octave of 5.14 HZ).
330.0 Used to treat allergies in conjunction with 3 HZ.
333.0 (used on) sinus infection/head cold.
332.8 - Frequency associated with orbit of Sun (Note=E).
How long it would take an imaginary planet to orbit around the sun's outer boundary (circumference).
336.0 - Frequency associated with Molybdenum (mineral nutrient).
341.0 - Heart Chakra (1:12) (Note=F).
342.0 - Associated with ears (Effects=hearing, formal concepts) (higher octave of 13.8 HZ). Associated with lungs (Effects=Oxygen, Heat) (higher octave of 5.35 HZ).
352.0 - Frequency associated with bladder. (Note=F). Thymus Chakra (11:1) (Note=F#).
There seems to be a discrepancy here as to which note this frequency is, both F and F#.
367.0 - (used on) sinus infection/head cold.
367.2 - Frequency associated with orbit of Jupiter (Note=F#).
368.09 - Frequency associated with orbit of Apollo (asteroid).
372.0 - "unknown" Chakra (1:11) (Note=G#) (Earth Spin 378).
375.70 - Frequency associated with the orbit of Eros (asteroid).
378.5 - Frequency associated with spin of Earth. (Note=F#).
380.96 - Frequency associated with orbit of Ida (asteroid).
384.0 - "Gurdjieff vibration associated with root chakra. Sixth harmonic of six, centre of the brainwave spectrum." (RP); Throat Chakra (12:1) (Note=G). Frequency associated with Chromium (mineral nutrient) (Note=G?).
389.4 - Frequency associated with spin of Mars. (Note=G).
393.0 - Associated with eyes (Effects=Visualization) (higher octave of 12.3). Associated with heart (Effects=love, warmth) (higher octave of 6.15).

393.34 - Frequency associated with orbit of Pallas (asteroid).
394.76 - Frequency associated with orbit of Ceres (asteroid).
396 - G (musical note).
400 Seems to decongest. Frequency associated with Manganese (mineral nutrient) (Note=G or G#).
405 - Violet.
408.7 - Frequency associated with orbit of Juno (asteroid).
409.1 - Frequency associated with spin of Venus (Note=G#).
410.0 - "unknown" Chakra (1:10) (Note=Ab) (Venus Spin 409).
414.7 - Frequency associated with orbit of Uranus (Note=G#).
416.0 - Psychic Centre Chakra (13:1) (Note=Ab) (Uranus Orbit 415). Frequency associated with Iron (mineral nutrient) (Note=Ab).
418.3 - Frequency associated with bones (Note=Ab).
420.82 - Moon: love, sensitivity, creativity, femininity, anima
421.3 - Frequency associated with orbit of moon (Note=Ab). Also associated with spin of Mercury 422.8 - Frequency associated with orbit of Neptune (Note=Ab).
424.0 - (used on) Fatigue (medium=pad). Frequency associated with Iodine (mineral nutrient) (Note=Ab).
430.8 - Frequency associated with spin of Uranus (Note=Ab).
438 - Indigo
440 - A (musical note); Associated with Frontal Lobes (Effects=the seventh sense, final decision) (higher octave of 13.8). Associated with collarbones (Effects=vitality, overall balance, stability) (higher octave of 6.88 HZ).
442.0 - Frequency associated with orbit of Venus. (Note=A).
448.0 - Third Eye Chakra (14:1) (Note=A).
445.0 - Chakra (1:9) (Note=Bb) (Venus Orbit 442).
455.4 - Frequency associated with spin of Saturn (Note=A#).
456.0 - (used on) sinusitis/sinus infection/head cold.
461.67 - Frequency associated with orbit of Vesta (asteroid).
464.0 - Frequency associated with Copper (mineral nutrient) (Note=Bb). (Used on) sinus infections/head colds w/ 728hz, 784hz and 880hz.
473 - Blue
473.9 - Frequency associated with spin of Jupiter (Note=Bb).
486.2 - Frequency associated with spin of Pluto (Note=B).
480 - Crown Chakra (15: 1) (Note=B). Frequency associated with Phosphorous and Zinc (mineral nutrients) (Note=B).
492.0 - Frequency associated with Spleen (Note=B). Associated with Cortex (Effects=intelligence) (higher octave of 15.4 HZ).
492.8 - Frequency associated with Adrenals (Note=B) .Associated with Adrenals, Thyroid and Parathyroid.
493.00 - Frequency associated with the orbit of Gaspra (asteroid).
495 - B (musical note)
495.25 - Frequency associated with orbit of Castalia (asteroid).
497.1 - Frequency associated with spin of Sun. (Note=B).
500.0 - (used to treat) Anthrax (medium=tube).

520.0 - (used on) Headaches (medium=pad).
522.0 - (used on) sinus infection/head cold.
526 - Associated with top of head (Effects=spirit, liberation, transcendence) (higher octave of 16.4 HZ). ; Associated with mouth (Effects=speech, creativity) (higher octave of 8.22 HZ).
527 - Green
528 - C (musical note)
542 - Bio-energetic frequency for Variolinum (i.e. smallpox vaccine).
569 - Bio-energetic frequency for Variolinum (i.e. smallpox vaccine).
580 - Yellow
586.0 - Associated with Circulation and Sex (Note=C#).
588.0 - Associated with the upper lip (Effects=emotions, conflict resolution) (higher octave of 9.19 HZ).
594 - D (musical note)
597 - Orange
620 - Keely Frequency (use with 630 and 12000).
630 - Keely Frequency (use with 620 and 12000).
633 - Bio-energetic frequency for Anthracinum (i.e. anthrax vaccine).
658 - Associated With Nasal Passages (Effects=breathing, taste) (higher octave of 10.3 HZ)
660 - E (musical note)
664 - (Used for) Fatigue (medium=pad).
685 - Associated with ears (Effects=hearing, formal concepts) (higher octave of 13.8 HZ).
700 - Red
704 - F (musical note)
727 (used on) Allergies, Sinusitis. Commonly used "cure-all" Rife frequency .
728 - (Used on) sinus infections/head colds w/ 784hz, 880hz and 464hz. .
784 - (Used on) sinus infections/head colds w/ 728hz, 880hz and 464hz. .
787 - Associated with eyes (Effects=Visualization) (higher octave of 12.3). (Used to treat) Allergies, Sinusitis. Commonly used "cure-all" Rife frequency .
800 - Commonly used "cure-all" Rife Frequency .
802 - (Used on) sinusitis with 1550 HZ; (used on) sinus infection/head colds.
820 - (Used on) sinus infection/head colds.
832 - Bio-energetic frequency for Variolinum (i.e. smallpox vaccine). See disclaimer for 500 HZ. .
880 - Associated with Frontal Lobes (Effects=the seventh sense, final decision) (higher octave of 13.8). (Used on) Allergies, Sinusitis. (used on) sinus infections/head colds w/ 728hz,784hz and 464hz. . Commonly used "cure-all" Rife Frequency .
952 - (Used on) sinus infection/head colds.
965 - Relaxes muscles, especially those of the neck.
984 - Associated with Cortex (Effects=intelligence) (higher octave of 15.4).
1000 - Cerebral neurons
1052 - Associated with top of head (Effects=spirit, liberation, transcendence) (higher octave of 16.4 HZ).
1500 - (Used on) sinus infection/head colds.
1550 - (Used on) sinusitis with 802 HZ, (used on) sinus infections/head colds.
1552 - (Used on) eye disorders.
1600 - (Used on) eye disorders.

2025 - Proton Precession/Water Resonance.
2675 - "The Crystal Resonator". A subharmonic of the frequency of quartz crystal. "Extremely effective for charging and clearing quartz crystals ... useful for clearing and balancing of their own energies. (medium=sound/tuning fork)
3222 - Bio-energetic frequency for Variolinum (i.e. smallpox vaccine). See disclaimer for 500 HZ. .
3040 - Use for pain along with 95 HZ.
4186 - Highest note on a piano.
4400 - (Used on) sinus infections/head colds - try scanning between 4384 and 4416 by intervals of 8 HZ. .
5000-8000 HZ - recharge "brain batteries" most rapidly. Fastest recharge at 8000 HZ. "The anxiety-easing, memory-expanding 60-beat tempo creates easy communication with the subconscious mind.”.
5000 - Commonly used "cure-all" Rife frequency (used on) allergies, sinus infections/head colds - short use only -- long exposures destroy red blood cells.
9999 - General vitality and energy.
10,000 - Commonly used "cure-all" Rife frequency (used to treat) alcoholism, allergies, headaches.
12,000 HZ - Keely Frequency (use with 620 HZ and 630 HZ).
16,000 - 20,000 - Upper range for normal hearing.
23,000 up - Hypersonic (above human hearing)
38000 - 40000 HZ - Magic Window .
42800 HZ - Aetheric dissociation/water resonance (water -> aetheric force).
------- Note - down from this point are KHZ (kilohertz) values, not HZ values
150-160 KHZ - Magic Window
180 KHZ - Ferromagnetism.
------- Note - down from this point are MHZ (megahertz) values, not HZ values
1.1-1.3 MHZ - Magic Window
388 MHZ - Alleged to cause damage/disruption to humans.
------- Note - down from this point are GHZ (gigahertz) values, not HZ values
1.057 GHZ - Magic Window
------- Note - down from this point are PHZ (Petahertz) values, not HZ values (1 PHZ = 1,000,000,000,000,000 HZ.)
10 PHZ - Magic Window in the near ultra-violet range "life energy" frequency

38 Double Meaning Word List

Programmers will use words with double meaning (homograph) during programming to reinforce programming in day to day living. This use of double meaning insures programming remains intact with day to day interactions. The individual speaking to the subject will be unaware they are reinforcing programming.

The use of double meanings during programming will also lead to confusion within the system as some parts will respond to one meaning and others to the second meaning.

Homophones may also be used in programming, but are more difficult to layer in.

Aught: All, or nothing

Bill: A payment, or an invoice for payment
Bolt: To secure, or to flee
Bound: Heading to a destination, or restrained from movement
Buckle: To connect, or to break or collapse
Bank - money storage and river bank
Ball- round object and dance
Bat - flying animal and used in bat
Bear- to carry and a furry animal
Box- container and fist fight
Bright- smart and giving off light

Cleave: To adhere, or to separate
Clip: To fasten, or detach
Consult: To offer advice, or to obtain it
Continue: To keep doing an action, or to suspend an action
Coat- layer of paint or heavy jacket
Custom: A common practice, or a special treatment

Dike: A wall to prevent flooding, or a ditch
Discursive: Moving in an orderly fashion among topics, or proceeding aimlessly in a discussion
Dollop: A large amount (British English), or a small amount
Dust: To add fine particles, or to remove them

Deck- a pack of cards and the ship’s deck
Duck- quacking animal and to move down

Enjoin: To impose, or to prohibit

Fast: Quick, or stuck or made stable
Fine: Excellent, or acceptable or good enough
Finished: Completed, or ended or destroyed
First degree: Most severe in the case of a murder charge, or least severe in reference to a burn
Fix: To repair, or to castrate
Flog: To promote persistently, or to criticize or beat
Fly- type of insect and to move through air
Foot - body part and measuring device

Garnish: To furnish, as with food preparation, or to take away, as with wages
Give out: To provide, or to stop because of a lack of supply
Go: To proceed or succeed, or to weaken or fail
Grade: A degree of slope, or a horizontal line or position

Handicap: An advantage provided to ensure equality, or a disadvantage that prevents equal achievement
Head- boss and body part
Help: To assist, or to prevent or (in negative constructions) restrain Hold up: To support, or to impede

Lease: To offer property for rent, or to hold such property
Left: Remained, or departed
Let: Allowed, or hindered
Liege: A feudal lord or a vassal
Literally: Actually, or virtually
Light- something shining and something not heavy

Mean: Average or stingy or excellent
Model: An exemplar, or a copy
Mean- average, to imply, and be unkind
Might- power or stating a possibility

Note- short letter and musical note

Off: Deactivated, or activated, as an alarm
Out: Visible, as with stars showing in the sky, or invisible, in reference to lights
Out of: Outside, or inside, as in working out of a specific office
Overlook: To supervise, or to neglect
Oversight: Monitoring, or failing to oversee

Peer: A person of the nobility, or an equal
Presently: Now, or soon
Put out: Extinguish, or generate
Puzzle: A problem, or to solve one Pound- unit of currency, a weight, a lost dog’s home, and to hit with force
Punch- fruit flavoured drink or to hit with fist

Quantum: Significantly large, or a minuscule part
Quite: Rather (as a qualifying modifier), or completely

Race- group of people and a competition
Ravel: To entangle, or to disentangle
Refrain: To desist from doing something, or to repeat
Rent: To purchase use of something, or to sell use
Ring- circular object and a bell
Rock: An immobile mass of stone or sway back and forth.

Sanction: To approve, or to boycott
Sanguine: Confidently cheerful, or bloodthirsty
Scan: To peruse, or to glance
Screen: To present, or to conceal
Seed: To sow seeds, or to shed or remove them.
Shop: To patronize a business in order to purchase something, or to sell something Skin: To cover, or to remove Skinned: Covered with skin, or with the skin removed Splice: To join, or to separate
Staff- employee and walking stick
State- an area and to say clearly

Stakeholder: One who has a stake in an enterprise, or a bystander who holds the stake for those placing a bet
Strike: To hit, or to miss in an attempt to hit
Shade- area with no sun, tint/ colour
Sink- no float and where you wash hands
Stick- part of tree or to cling on

Table: To propose (in British English), or to set aside Temper: To soften, or to strengthen
Throw out: To dispose of, or to present for consideration
Transparent: Invisible, or obvious
Trim: To decorate, or to remove excess from Trip: A journey, or a stumble
Tick- a parasite and the noise of a clock
Trunk- of a tree and a suitcase
Trip- vacation / stumble and fall

Unbending: Rigid, or relaxing

Variety: A particular type, or many types

Wear: To endure, or to deteriorate
Weather: To withstand, or to wear away
Wind up: To end, or to start up
With: Alongside, or against

Yard- a measurement or back garden

39 Programming Codes

The codes used from subject to subject follow patterns. There are standard and exclusive codes. Master programmers will lay in the foundation programs and codes and developed the scripts. Handlers will develop the unique codes for their subject. A Programmer will always begin a session by repeating the subject's individual access code, which will allow authorized entry into the system without setting off traps and internal protectors.

Handlers of subjects use a technique where one signal or code will carry several messages simultaneously. Specific parts hear certain codes/cues/triggers while others don't. The internal programmers and reporting parts may internally hypnotically make telephone noises that are fake so that host parts lose the ability to discern what is real and not real.

Cult/occult programming commonly employs magickal languages, along with Hebrew, Latin and Greek for charting the core and its primal splits. Futhark is an example of a magical language used by the occult.

Cult and occult codes often come from the Bible or demonic names. The deeper codes are occult words, in languages such as Latin, or Enochian. The foreign language codes will be for diminutive parts of the system only; ciphers are also employed, as well as sign language.

The intelligence organizations prefer to code a single project with a single word, and an ongoing operation with two words. For intelligence operations the subject will have to have Bona Fides codes. All subjects are given control signs which allow them to indicate via code that they require assistance.

The master programmer will permit the handler--the male adult figure (Papa Bear) in the subject's life to have day-to-day ownership. Papa Bear is often an adult male in close daily proximity of the child subject. Papa Bear will be authorized to put in their own codes in the sexual part of the system. Some Papa Bears use their own songs, poetry and their interests in this area of the coding. Most of the system's codes will reflect the master programmer, and the sexual part of the system will reflect the Papa Bear's programming.

Programmers will not hide the front part of a system. Most subjects with dissociated parts are not discovered. The top parts will also sometimes receive personal names from their handler. This is in addition their codes. If the part is responsive to their handler, the personal name might pull the part up. Cult/occult parts are hidden and have sophisticated codes, hierarchy parts are hidden deeply.

The hierarchy parts are placed in a deep area of system and receive spiritual codes and numerical codes. Numerical codes are not in the front part of a system. Internal programming parts have the authority to change codes if they need to protect the system. They will have to hypnotically work with day parts when they are in trance at night. Most of the programming of front parts will be done when they are sleeping. If internal parts change too many codes in their efforts to protect the system, they will make it complicated for the handler/programmer access the system.

The standard method for coding a program is: day of birth+year of birth+ month of birth+day of programming.

A System code at times consists of: birth date + programming site code + birth order +birth date of programmer.

A System code for occult programming is: birth date + programming site code + birth order + number of generations family has been in the occult.

Each part will have an access code which will often include the following components:
Colour+an Alpha numeric code+ a personalized magick name.
Date of birth+colour+name
Name+date of birth of programmer+Gem name
Date of birth+number of part+symbol
Date of birth of programmer+animal name+date of programming

These code words must be repeated three times to pull the part up. For many parts, the reversal of their access code puts them back to sleep.

A basic way of calling an alter would be to spin the subject and call out the alter's name, or to snap the fingers and call out the name of a front alter.

Access phone calls to subjects will have tone codes transmitted that trigger the subject.

Other command codes will include:

Behavioural Codes
Behavioural codes issued by the handler or programmer are manifested in the form of:

Temporary pressure to the tip of the right index finger (symbolizing Faith or have Faith).
Temporary pressure to the tip of the left index finger (symbolizing no Faith or "deception of Satan").
Temporary pressure to the centre of the right palm (symbolizing Jesus "Sitting at the right-hand of God").
Temporary pressure to the ball of the right foot (symbolizing "Get on the Ball" or "hurry-up").
Temporary pressure to the tip of the right foot big toe (symbolizing "Right Direction").
Temporary pressure to the tip of the right foot centre toe (symbolizing "Fucking-up Direction").
Temporary pressure to the tip of the left foot big toe (symbolizing "Wrong Direction").
Temporary pressure to the buttocks (symbolizing "Bad Attitude" or "subject is acting like an ass").
Temporary pressure on tip of penis or clitoris (symbolizes immoral thoughts like subject is thinking/acting with their penis or her clitoris).
Temporary pressure to the left ear drums (symbolizing "do not listen").
Temporary pressure to the right ear drums (symbolizing "listen").
A wink of the right or left eye (symbolizing: right eye = God's agreement or left eye = Satan's agreement).

Temporary tingling in the Testicles (symbolizing insufficient male confidence or "Having no balls or strength").
Temporary tingling on other areas of the body to imply that something invisible and/or supernatural is touching the subject. May be perceived as threatening or reassuring to the subject. Can be used to intimidate and confuse the subject often times combined with additional posthypnotic implants to inflict delusions like "being attacked with microwaves" or being caressed by Angels.
Temporary pressure near the jugular vein on right side of neck (symbolizing Satan having subject by Jugular or throat). This is used to inflict fear and doubt.

Basic Commands
System destruct codes (suicide)
Shatter codes
Erasure codes
Spin codes
Run (flee) codes
Shut down codes

3-tap code for access. The three taps can be on the subject's body, or on handler's body.

3 Taps by Handler:
3 taps inner thigh right leg-sex
3 taps inner thigh left leg-oral sex
3 taps top of thigh-come here
3 taps upper arm-danger
3 taps left chest-silence
3 taps right chest-remember loyalty

3 Taps by Subject:
3 taps top of thigh right leg-Threat perceived (to System)
3 taps top of thigh left leg- Not a threat (to System)
3 taps right side of face- Don't answer
3 taps left side of face- Answer

Body Gestures, the following functions are coded. They will be attached to a re-enforcement program.

By Handler:
Touch right ear- Listen and remember
Touch left ear- Forget
Touch chest - Loyal to handler
Touch hair - Leave
Touch mouth – Lie to whoever is speaking to you
Touch nose – Go away
Touch back of neck-Serpent rising

Turn head tilt to right-(often looks like moving head for sore neck)-Erase last act
Turn head tilt to right- Erase last response

Circular motion with thumb and fore finger right hand-Wind clocks forward.
Circular motion with thumb and fore finger left hand-Wind clocks backwards.

Left leg crossed over right-Terminate relationship with individual Right leg crossed over left-Control the situation

By Subject:
Touch right ear- Internal instructions for response
Touch left ear- Forget what was just said
Touch chest - Remember your loyalty
Touch hair - Call for assistance
Touch mouth – What does the internal controller want communicated Touch nose – Answer with lie
Touch back of neck-call to serpent

Turn head tilt to right-(often looks like moving head for sore neck)-Erase last act
Turn head tilt to right-Erase last response

Circular motion with thumb and fore finger right hand-Wind clocks forward.
Circular motion with thumb and fore finger left hand- Wind clocks backwards.

Left leg crossed over right-defence against questions.
Right leg crossed over left-System threat.

Hand Codes:

Finger to forehead— the part who is holding the body goes into trance and a deeper one replaces it.
One ring finger bent at 90° -- access wave Rotated pencil--with certain words--rotates the system
Finger swung the counter clockwise way closes portals.
Right Fist to forehead – OBEY
Fist with right hand cupping left hand, the left is like the letter c, and the thumb is outward and the fist inside, the left hand then moves 3 times over the knuckle -- access signal
Left hand of subject laid on top of handler's hand - sign of submission
Hands behind back of head -- I'm master
Right Hand with thumb and index finger making an L shape on chin/cheek
Hands on inside of thighs by handler – sexual service.
Hands locked folded interwoven backward -- you can't break "the circle"
Handshake with index and middle finger held straight out – "You are one of us."
Grip called the lion's paw -- access greeting opening and closing the hands or large circles with index finger opens portals. Palms rubbed together counter clockwise
Kiss on centre of head -- kiss of submission of subject to handler

Palm of hand touched -- sexual access point for some subjects
Thumb twiddle -- rotating the thumbs around with the two hands clasp – spinning the system
Touch of centre of forehead -- access point
Crossed at wrist (X) — binding or being bound
Hand on neck—sacrifice
Both hands raised, palm outward—weakness, supplication, acknowledgment, adoration, admiration
Rotating the hands around each other and then gesturing with the hands toward the person with both hands means--"did you get the signal?"Sign of distress.
Drawing the right hand across the throat with the thumb of the hand pointing to the throat. Used in connection with oaths, such as fidelity to death.

Universal Functioning Codes – to access these codes the subject's computer code must be entered. Occult computer codes will begin with: 666. Cult codes will begin with: 777. Illuminati codes 999. Master number 555.

Note for Programmer: The master number of 555 must be at the end of your access code. Example: (name+D.O.B.+L.S.N.+colour+555)

Universal function codes will affect the entire system. The codes can be coded so the same code means different things to groups of alters. For example group A will go down when code is given, Group B will come up with the same code.

Colour Codes
There are several colour codes used within a system. The codes are used as short cuts for the programmer and handler. The codes also assist in directing the system in stress situations and for protection.

Note: If using colours for hierarchy, colour coding can be switched in rank. The internal programmers can reassign colours if they need to, in order to protect the programming. Alters, sections, and parts of the computer can be colour coded. The colour coding for alters is not the same just because the alters are in the same section.

Be certain to set a reset code so the system can be accessed if internal programming prevents access. It is recommended reset codes are placed for: Each system level, the entire system, computer system, and each hierarchy part.

Occult Colours: Green, Black, Purple, Red, and Silver.

Coloured doors must be opened with the correct colour coded key. If the incorrect key is used on the door trap must be in place as a system protection.

These codes will be paired with a number or letter so the subject isn't triggered by accident.

CODE BLUE --Subject's body freezes in motion and can't move until another code is given.
CODE RED -- Subject gets angry and violent

CODE RED – (2) System collapse program
CODE GREEN -- suicide programming
CODE YELLOW – Subject alert level at all times. Ready for danger.
CODE BLACK—Subject prepare for ritual
CODE WHITE: Subject sleeps
CODE GREY: Subject flees.
CODE AMBER-Internal disaster. System breach, a part is attempting to break out of programming.
CODE SILVER-Close the system
CODE SAPPHIRE –Call to system protector alters

The following colours appear in the system: Gold, Silver, Purple, Black, Red, Green, Blue, Brown, White, Orange, Yellow, and Pink. These colours are often used to code doors and keys.

Door Codes:
GOLD- Training section
SILVER- Occult section
PURPLE –Prison section
BLACK-Computer section
RED- BDSM, sexual section
GREEN –Lucifer's section
BLUE- Dr. Section
BROWN- Tunnels
WHITE-Death
ORANGE- Fire doors
YELLOW- Child section
PINK- Gem section
GREY-Castle doors

Key Codes
GOLD- Opens all internal doors. (Internal programmer only)
SILVER- Green door
PURPLE – Red door
BLACK- Blue door
RED- White door
GREEN – Silver door
BLUE- Black doors
BROWN- Purple doors
WHITE- Yellow doors
ORANGE- Pink Door
YELLOW- Gold doors
PINK-Blue doors
TURQOUISE-Grey doors
GREY-Brown doors

Internal Alters are coded as follows:

Red: is often linked to alpha programming; these are often they most easily accessed alters in a subject's system, including lots of littles. Also, sexual programming/prostitution may be places here. Historically, the cult has linked the colour with sexual abuse and sexual ceremonies.
Black: Represents negative/cult spiritually; highly programmed alters who participate in cult rituals are often black; internal witches/warlocks.
Purple: Sometimes higher cult alters inside. May represent high priest, priestess; high family alters."
Blue: protective; may be linked to delta programming in some subject's. These are they aggressive protectors in a system. Military programming may also go here, in some subject's.
Orange: protective/defensive against outside or internal access. MKultra: Delta and other intense programming sequences may be this colour.
Yellow: often represents spirituality/positive messages. The programmers realize that too much theta/black can destroy, and in order not to lose their subject's to suicide, will put in lifesaving or positive messages, and allow some positive spiritually.
Green: Cult loyal. Green is traditional colour for "family", and intensely loyal alters may see themselves as this colour. Cult loyal protectors, trained to protect another higher cult member, may also be this colour. Recontact alters may also be in this group.
Brown: this can represent hidden, incognito alters, who can appear to be different colours. Epsilon and CIA programming may be this colour; hidden operatives and "spies."
Silver: controlling alters: high internal councils may wear this colour.
White: can represent goodness, wholeness; but may also represent highest spiritual alters inside."

Computer control alters should be colour coded with their terminal. This is to insure an alter does not link to a computer they should not. For example: Computer Operator Black=Green terminal, a Computer Operator Green=Grey terminal etc.

Programmer Colours- Drs are coded in colours also. This coding assists the subject in not becoming attached to their programmer as a person. The colour coding of Drs assists in coding in the inner world. Note: Drs must be programmed internally in the Warehouse/programming centre.
Dr. Green-Lead programmer
Dr. Black –Occult/ Spiritual programmer
Dr. White-Psychotropic Programmer
Dr. Blue-Epsilon programmer
Dr. Red-Cognitive programming

Occult programmers-are paired with a Dr. The task of the occult programmers is to insure the subject is being raised in accordance to occult teachings. These programmers are to maintain the spiritual balance within the system. The Mother of Darkness is to oversee the ritual programming of the subject.
Grande Mothers-
Grande Masters-
Mother of Darkness-

Zodiac programming codes use the birth signs of the subject and the corresponding gemstone. (Not to be confused with Gem programming.) An example code: (Aries+alters name+diamond+level number) or (Diamond+Fire+date of birth+Mars)

Aries
March 21 - April 20
Diamond
Mars
Fire
April
Taurus
April 21 - May 20
Emerald
Venus
Earth
May
Gemini
May 21 - June 21
Pearl
Mercury
Air
June
Cancer
June 22 - July 22
Ruby
Mercury
Water
July
Leo
July 23 - August 23
Peridot
The Sun
Fire
August
Virgo
August 24 - September 23
Sapphire
Mercury
Earth
September
Libra
September 24 - October 23
Opal
Venus
Air
October
Scorpio

October 24 - November 22
Topaz
Pluto
Water
November
Sagittarius
November 23 - December 21
Turquoise
Jupiter
Fire
December
Capricorn
December 22 - January 20
Garnet
Saturn
Earth
January
Aquarius
January 21 - February 19
Amethyst
Uranus
Air
February
Pisces
February 20 - March 20
Aquamarine
Neptune
Water
March

Number Codes
The list below is the standard number codes found throughout systems. They are paired with other codes. For example: (225+Aries+level 7+alter name)

911 – Contact handler.
225 – Minority
253 – Homosexual
261 - Psychiatric or psychoneurotic disorder.
265 - Unsuitability, character disorder
314 - Importance to national health, safety or interest
367 - Aggressive reaction.
41A - Apathy, lack of interest
383 - Criminalism
41E – Obesity
46A - Unsuitability, apathy, defective attitudes and inability to extend effort constructively

46B Sexual deviate
46C - Apathy/obesity
460 - Emotional instability reaction.
461 - Inadequate personality
463 - Paranoid personality
464 - Schizoid personality
469 - Unsuitability.
480 - Personality disorder.

Word Matrices

A word-matrix code is where the subject is given two lists of words and each word on the left list is paired with a word on the right list to form a code.

40 Tortures Used in Programming

Torture involving states of extreme pain and terror, to the point of near-death, is required to install programming. These states are induced through electroshock, toxins that cause pain or temporary paralysis, assault, painful bondage or pressure, rape, extreme cold/heat, burning, suffocation, near-drowning, spinning, hanging, inversion, exposure to torture, mutilation, or murder of others, and/or prolonged isolation, starvation, dehydration, or sensory deprivation.

States of despair, self-hatred, paranoia, and global distrust of humanity, are also effective. These are induced through forcing the subject to hurt or kill others, often loved ones and pets, sexual humiliation, convincing the subject that all important attachment figures are abusers, and convincing the subject that he or she is now controlled and overseen by surgically implanted monitoring devices or "spiritual assignments" of demons, malevolent spirits, curses, hexes, vexes, claims, etc.

Beating of the whole body ("any possible spot") with:
A rubber truncheon
A brass rod
A bar
A wooden rule with metal fittings
A stick
A whip

Beating of particularly sensitive areas of the body:
Bridge of the nose with a rubber truncheon
Protruding shoulder blades with a rubber truncheon
Gland area of the chin - which resemble mumps when swollen - with a rubber truncheon and rule
Shoulder joints with a rubber truncheon,
The outside of bare feet and in the toe area with a rubber covered bar
Finger tips with a blotter and inkwell base
Bare toe tips with a rubber truncheon
Bare heels (series of 10 blows - with a rubber truncheon - to a heel, several times a day) -

Pulling hair:
Off the top of head
Off temples, above the ear and neck area - so called goose plucking
Off beard and moustache
Off chest
Off crotch and scrotum

Burning:
Of the eye and lip area with a glowing cigarette
Of each hand's fingers with a burning torch

Methods of Physical Torture:

Blindfolding and stripping of clothes.
Hanging by the hands.
Hanging by the feet upside down.
Beating with sticks and electrical wires.
Whipping and beating with sticks and twisted rubber belts.
Forcing the subject to stand naked for long periods of time.
Pouring cold water on the subject's head.
Putting out lighted cigarettes on the subject's skin.
Shocking with an electrical current.
Kicking and punching.
Attacking the subject with vicious dogs.
Making the subject sit on a stake.
Throwing in a septic tank.
Pulling out the nails and hair.
Dragging.
Tying the hands and feet from behind.
Utilizing sharp objects, such as a pocketknife or piece of glass.
Sleeping on a bare floor without a cover and flooding the cell with sewer water.
Standing on toes and against a wall pressing with the fingers for long hours. The subject may be denied sleep, food, drink, and medicine.
Beating on cuts and sore parts of the body.
Giving the subject a lot of water or very watery fruits, such as watermelon, after denying them food and drink. After the subject drinks or eats the fruit, their hands and penis will be tied so the subject will not be able to urinate.
Placing drugs and narcotics in the subject's food to weaken their will power.
Placing the subject in solitary confinement where the cells are made of a special kind of cement that gets extremely hot in the summer and cold in winter.
Hitting the subject's genitals with a stick or squeezing them by hand.
Dragging the subject over barb wires and fragments of glass and metal.
Confinement in boxes, cages, coffins, etc, or burial (often with an opening or air-tube for oxygen).
Restraint; with ropes, chains, cuffs, etc.
Near-drowning.
Extremes of heat and cold, including submersion in ice water, and burning chemicals.
Skinning (only top layers of the skin are removed in victims intended to survive).
Spinning.
Blinding light.
Electric shock.
Forced ingestion of offensive body fluids and matter, such as blood, urine, feces, flesh, etc.
Hung in painful positions.
Hunger and thirst.
Sleep deprivation.
Compression with weights and devices.
Sensory deprivation.
Drugs to create illusion, confusion, and amnesia, often given by injection or intravenously.
Ingestion or intravenous toxic chemicals to create pain or illness, including chemotherapy agents.

Limbs pulled or dislocated.
Application of snakes, spiders, maggots, rats, and other animals to induce fear and disgust.
Near-death experiences; commonly asphyxiation by choking or drowning, with immediate resuscitation.
Forced to perform or witness abuse, torture and sacrifice of people and animals, usually with knives.
Forced participation in child pornography and prostitution.
Raped to become pregnant; the fetus is then aborted for ritual use, or the baby is taken for sacrifice or enslavement.
Spiritual abuse to cause subject to feel possessed, harassed, and controlled internally by spirits or demons. Desecration of Judeo-Christian beliefs and forms of worship; Dedication to Satan or other deities.
Abuse and illusion to convince subjects that God is evil, such as convincing a subject that God has raped them.
Surgery to torture, experiment, or cause the perception of physical or spiritual bombs or implants.
Harm or threats of harm to family, friends, loved ones, pets, and other subjects, to force compliance.
Use of illusion and virtual reality to confuse and create non-credible disclosure.
Forced participation in slavery
Being locked in a small confined spot, a pit or cage with spiders and snakes
Being forced to kill, and cut up and eat individuals
Immersion into feces, urine and containers of blood.
Catheter up the external urethral orifice. Then the urinary bladder is filled so that the victim is in extreme pain, and is made to hold their bladder in silence. This torture to the body is painful. But the long term effects of this torture, which is done repeatedly to subjects to teach obedience, is to seriously damage their urinary bladders. The abreaction of memories of this help blackmail alters into obedience.
Standing in a freezing cell
Undressing subjects and making them stand naked during training
Keeping them undressed in very cold cells with air conditioners and fans running at full speed;
Keeping them awake by constant irritation until they exhausted;
Offering food to hungry subjects and then removing it before they could eat it.
Banning visits to toilets so that they had to soil their cells;
At other times keeping them in filthy toilets;
Forcing them to run in circles until they are exhausted.
Placing a subject in 'search position',('stoika' position) single finger of each hand to the wall, legs well apart and well back, on the toes, knees bent, for prolonged periods; Subjects who collapse from exhaustion are beaten back into position.
Heavy punching to the pit of the stomach to subjects in 'search position';
Kicking the legs from under a subject in the 'search position' so that they fall to the ground, banging their head on the wall, radiator or ground;
Beating with batons on the kidneys and on the privates in 'search position';
Kicking between the legs while in the 'search position'.
Putting a subject in 'search position' over a very powerful electric fire or radiator;
Stretching a subject over benches with two electric fires underneath and kicking them in the stomach;
General assault with truncheons and knuckledusters.
Faces slapped, ears drummed, arms twisted, chest hair pulled. Nose, chest, mouth and throat held.

Forced to run barefoot over broken glass and stones while being beaten.
Subjects dropped blindfold from helicopters hovering near the ground.
Dogs used to induce fear and attack the subjects.
Torturous exercises imposed - up to 48 hours for subjects.
Awakened as soon as they fall asleep.
Bags kept over the heads of the subjects for up to six days.
Subjects testicles manually compressed burned with matches and candles.
Rabbit-punching to the back of the neck while in 'search position';
Banging the head against the wall;
Beating the head with a baton in crescendo fashion;
Slapping the ears and face with open hand;
Twisting the arms behind the back and twisting fingers;
Crushing each hand's fingers placed between two pencils
Crushing each foot's toes
Kicking legs and torso
Kicking shin area
Stabbing with pins etc.
Face and ears pinching with a hand and key Forcing to sit on the edge of the stool
Forcing to sit on a bolt hurting my rectum
Cuffing hands with handcuffs followed by tearing them off wrists
Physical exercises - forcing to do knee bends until passing out
Forcing to run up and down the stairs for about 20-30 minutes
Solitary confinement for indefinite time (also naked) -
Sleep deprivation for the period of 7-9 days through waking with continuous slaps on face performed by the guarding officer. Will place the subject into semi-dementia and result in mental health problems - visual and auditory hallucinations
Standing at attention in cell for indefinite time
Standing at attention in programming room with hands raised above head for indefinite amount of time
Reduction in food rations (during the peak period of programming) subject is not allowed to have anything to drink - the torture of thirst
Security checks at night when - after waking – subject is forced to stand at attention, unclothed and temperature regulation induced for a predetermined amount of time.
Removing windows from cell for 24 hours 1 blanket, 1 bed shared between 3 subjects
Pouring buckets of water in to the cell regularly.
Medical help deprivation, medical attention (very caring attitude) to subjects
Subject not allowed to have open air (outside) walks and prohibited from leaving the building.
No showers or hygiene for a determined amount of time.
Moral abuse. Vulgar and elaborate verbal insult aimed at subject and my family members.
Deprived of any contact with the family or the outside world (no newspapers etc.) or books
A false statement - read by a programmer stating as fact an accusation of theft, lying, or cheating.
An insinuating statement with derogatory remarks concerning conduct of peer subject has built relationship with.
Write a degrading word in bold on forehead such as Whore, traitor, Dog, etc. The subject cannot remove the label and must have it showing at all times.

Prodding the stomach with straight fingers;
Chopping blows to the ribs from behind with simultaneous blows to the stomach;
Insertion of instruments in the anal passage;
Kicking on the knees and shins;
Tossing the subjects from one officer to another and punching them while in the air;
Injections;
Electric cattle prod
Electric shocks given by use of a machine;
Burning with matches and candles;
Urinating on subjects;
Hot irons applied to the genitals.
Beatings should be followed by water torture.
Dissected, sometimes while still alive and without anaesthetic.

Psychological tortures:
Russian roulette
Firing blanks beating in darkness
Blindfolding
Assailants using stocking masks or wearing surgical dress
Staring at white perforated wall in small cubicle
Use of amphetamine drugs
Isolating the subject socially, cutting him off from public life, placing him in solitary confinement, and denying them news and information in order to make him feel lonely.
Forbidding calling by name, giving the subject a number, and calling them by that number in order to defeat his morale.
Threatening to summon their sister, mother, wife, or daughter and rape her.
Threatening to rape the subject.
Threatening to confiscate their possessions and to have them fired from their employment.
Threatening to cause a permanent physical disability or life imprisonment.
Offer the subject certain enticements (apartment, car, passport, scholarship, etc.).
Controlling everything the subject does, even in private, whether they are awake or asleep, to convince the subject that the programmer is in charge. Force them to bow their head and look down while talking with the handler/programmer.
A sound machine used to produce a constant hiss of 'white noise'.

The hell confinement: use a device that includes a pair of handcuffs and a pair of foot shackles, both of which are linked to a steel rod. The rod presses against the subject's back, making it almost impossible to walk, sit, use the toilet, or feed themselves.

Tucker telephone: The device works by placing a ground wire around the big toe of the subject while fastening the hot wire, to the subject's genitals. The telephone, which has been tailored to send electric shock is called, sending an electric current to the genitals.

The strappado: also known as Palestinian Hanging, a subject is hung by their arms, which are fastened behind their head, causing the arms to be slowly pulled from the shoulder sockets by the weight of the body. When the subject becomes tired they cannot hold themselves upright, their bodies fall forward and their breathing is impaired.

Cold Cell: the subject is placed in front of an air conditioner unit for hours, or days. The subject may be soaked in water first to enhance the tactic.

German Chair: The subject is placed in a metal folding chair. Their legs and arms are secured to the metal seat while the back of the chair is pulled back and down toward the ground. This causes severe stress on the spine, neck, and other limbs, often causing permanent damage.

The box: A box made of wood, hard plastic or metal too small for a person to lie in. The subject is forced to lie in uncomfortable positions for long periods, with their hands and feet bound. The box is tilted on its side and also elevated, so every time food, usually a hard-boiled egg, is dropped into the box, it rolls to the bottom, where it is out of reach of the subject.

White torture: A form of emotional and physiological torture. This is a form of sensory deprivation and isolation. The subject is kept in a white room, with white chairs, table, bedding, and the meal is white rice on a white paper plate. If the subject wants to use the bathroom, he had to put a white slip of paper under the door.
Stretch machine: used as punishment, stretches person without breaking bones.

Tiger Bench: This works by placing a subject on a long bench, with a board against their back and head. The subject is then tied down so their back is secured to the board and their feet and legs are secured to the bench. Next, bricks are placed under their feet, until all the straps holding the legs down break—or the subject's legs snap before the straps do.

Animal Torture for Programming
Beheading
Buried alive
Crushing
Drowning
Electric shock collars
Freezing
Neglect
Gouging eyes out
Hanging
Dog fighting.
Ritual sacrifice and mutilations as part of rituals.
Sexual abuse.
Wedge sticks in the dogs' mouths so they cannot eat or drink and die a slow, painful death.
Skinning

41 Internal Structures and Symbols

Internal structures are important for the following reasons:
1. Mapping the system
2. Keeping parts in their assigned areas.
3. Giving parts a ‘world’ they can navigate and feel ‘natural’ in.
4. Triggering specific events or actions in a timed manner.
5. Cause confusion if system is breached.
6. Re-enforce programmed behaviours
7. Re-create programming sites for internal programmers.
8. Give the programmer means to access the system.
9. Give places to set traps.
10. Differentiate levels.
11. Build system hierarchy.
12. Allow for specified parts quick travel.
13. Assist in maintain script compliance.

Internal structures and symbols that can be created in System are:

A
Ancient symbols and letters
Aliens
Animal prints
Ant pits,
Angel - A guide to heaven.
Anchor - Hope or eternal life.
Ankh - An Egyptian symbol of eternal life.
Apple - salvation, sometimes sin.
Arch - The passage to heaven.

B
Black boxes: represent self destruct and shatter programming sealed off into a black box to protect system.
Bohemian Grove
Butterflies
Bows
Bee Traps w/ swarms,
Black Glass Wall
Bird cages
Black Holes (vortexes)
Boxes

Butterflies
Birds

C Castles
Clocks
Cabalistic "Tree of Life," with adjoining root systems
Carpet (Magic),
Castles, Castle dungeon (torture chambers)
Caves,
Chess themes (Alice in Wonderland programming, duel programming)
Chain-of-command diagrams
Clocks (there are several incl. computer clocks),
Concentration camp,
Cords
Cave and well
Columns
Carousel
Crystals

D
Deck of cards
Dominoes
Desert,
Doll House,
Numbered Doors by the thousands w/ red hot knobs, Demons
Disney themes

E Elevators,
Emerald City (connected to the castle),
Eucalyptus Trees,
Eyes, all Seeing Eye,

F
Fields of flowers
Firewall
Forests
Fruit Tree
Fire walls,

G
Glass,
Glass coffin,

Golden Keys
Graveyards
Geometric figures
Green doors (OZ programming)

H
Hall of Illumination
Hourglass
Hallways with red doors,
Hell Pit or Hell Fire
Hour Glass (matrix),
House of David,
Horus:

I
Internal training rooms:
Internal walls
Ice town,
Invisible Countries,
Infinity loops
Internal armies,

J

K
Keys

L
Libraries,
Light side City,
Large jewels (Jewel programming)

M
Masonic chess design
Mirrors: used internally to reinforce other programming sequences, internal twinning, and distortion of reality programming. May create shadow systems of functional systems.
Mirrors or glass shattering
Masks
Monsters
Marshlands, Mazes,
Mirrors
Moat, Mountains,

N
Nursery (glass),

O
Ocean
One eye covered

P
Pyramids
Pool of Death may be called Lakes of Death, and Waters of Death.

Pillar of Power
Paper Trees,
Petra Secret City,
Playground
Poppy field,
Portals
Q

R
Ribbons
Rivers (Nile, Rio Grande, Shenandoah, etc.),
Robots (older systems)
Room behind a closet
Rubicon (outer space beyond the stars),
Rain
Ruby slippers (OZ programming)

S
Shattered glass
Stairwell.
Sun
Spider webs: represent linked programming
Seals: usually in a group of six or seven.
Stables
Snakes
Spider webs
Sea shells
Seeds,
Serpent tree,
Shafts,
Shifting sands,
Shoes (gold, silver, and ruby slippers),
Snake pits (traps),
Spider chambers,
Stairway,
Schematics of computer circuitry boards

T Temples
Temple of Moloch
Training grids:
Trees.
Torpedo Town,
Tin Woodsman’s Castle,
Trojan horse w/ armies,

Tunnels,

U

V
Valley of the Dry Bones,
Valley of Death
Volcano (to destroy & remake the system),
Vortex (see Black Holes),

W
Wasteland,
Water (Moats),
Waterfalls,
Wind,
Wires,
Worms,
Walls,
White rabbits

X

Y
Yellow Brick Road

Z

42 Electric Shock Torture (ECT)

Electrodes attached to parts of the subject’s body: most typically, while wires are wound around the fingers, toes, or tongue; attached to the genitals; or inserted in the vagina to provide a return circuit; the voltage source.

Use of prod or taser of precisely controllable pressure is applied to other sensitive parts of the body, such as the genitals, breasts, or head. The received voltage and amperage can be controlled with precision and used to cause pain while avoiding obvious evidence on the subject’s body
Electric shock may directly cause death in three ways: paralysis of the breathing centre in the brain, paralysis of the heart, or ventricle fibrillation.

Electroshock can be used to cause amnesia. Memories could be erased, and the subjects reprogrammed.

The application of electricity stimulates muscle activity to such an extent that involuntary and painful muscular contractions occur. Longer pulses of electricity produce successively greater debilitation. For example, a five-second discharge from a cattle prod can completely immobilize someone for up to 15 minutes.

It is the magnitude of current and the time duration that produces effect. That means a low value current for a long duration can also be fatal. The safe current/time limit for a subject to survive at 500mA is 0.2 seconds and at 50 mA is 2 seconds.

The voltage of the electric supply is only important as it ascertains the magnitude of the current. As Voltage = Current x Resistance, the bodily resistance is an important factor. Sweaty or wet subjects have a lower body resistance and so they can be fatally electrocuted at lower voltages.

Let-go current is the highest current at which subject can release a conductor. Above this limit, involuntary clasping of the conductor is present. It is 22 mA in AC and 88 mA in DC.

Apart from electric shock the other equally dangerous hazards of working with electricity are electrical arc flash and electrical arc blast.

Placing subjects hand in pocket may protect subject by preventing a current from travelling through the heart making a shock non-lethal.

The severity of the electric shock depends on the following factors: body resistance, circuit voltage, amplitude of current, path of the current, area of contact, and duration of contact.

Death may also occur from falling in case of electric shock.

Burn injury may occur at both the entrance and exit of the current.

Low frequency AC is more dangerous than high frequency AC.

AC and DC both kill.

Below 1 Milliampere Generally not perceptible
1 Milliampere Faint Tingle
5 Milliampere Slight shock felt. Not painful but disturbing. Average individual can let go. Strong involuntary reactions can lead to other injuries.
6 to 25 Milliampere (women) Painful shocks. Loss of muscle control.
9 to 30 Milliampere (men) The freezing current or “let go” range. If extensor muscles are excited by shock, the subject may be thrown away from the power source. Subjects cannot let go. Strong involuntary reactions can lead to other injuries.
50 to 150 Milliamperes Extreme pain, respiratory arrest, severe muscle reactions. Death is possible.
1.0 to 4.3 Amperes Rhythmic pumping action of the heart ceases. Muscular contraction and nerve damage occur; death is likely.
10 Amperes Cardiac arrest, severe burns, death is probable.

*Electromagnetic radiation can also be a means of torture. While not necessarily lethal, these effects are debilitating and can be painful. Electromagnetic stimulation can have other nonlethal effects on humans. Extreme emotions of rage, lust, and fatigue can be caused. A targeted individual may become depressed or even suicidal and you will almost certainly start to reap negative psychological and physical effects - fear, anxiety, fatigue, pains in your chest, headaches, lack of interest in activities, disease, cancer, etc.

43 Internal Base Systems

Systems of subjects are known to programmers to begin to break down by the age of 30. Dispensable Subjects are treated by programmers/handlers more severely throughout their lives; these are the ones who are 'used up' earlier on, doing variously more severe things: low-level prostitution/child sex-subjects/non-public severely abused long-term sex-subjects/ultra-hardcore BDSM porn/bestiality/black-op soldiers (including 'suicide bombers' and other such programmed individuals)/drug-trafficking/human-trafficking etc.

Cocaine is commonly used drug for controlling subjects as it keeps them addicted and totally reliant on their handler for their 'next fix'.

The childhood hobby of painting is part of keeping the child subject’s mind creative and dissociative (this kind of repetitive/relaxing/long-term activity keeps the child in a mild trance while also encouraging their creativity which is important for programming. The mind becomes 'stale' and can cease to function adequately if they are constantly traumatized with no creative activity such as painting. The creative parts of the brain need to be stimulated in young subjects to ensure healthy development. This also assists with the double-bind levelled against the subject as the programmer/handler will praise the child for their work while also criticizing them and abusing them.

All systems must be set up in grids for easier mapping. The numbers, letters, symbols are up to the programmer to lie in. This will assist in keeping the codes undetectable.

Each system has an internal programmer which oversees the gatekeeper who grants or denies entry into the different rooms.

Alex System
Alex is used for high-level parallel programming.

One of the most important end time’s communications systems is the ALEX system. This will operate on several levels. The electronic end of the ALEX system which stands for Amalgamated Logarithmic Encrypted Transmission (ALEX) is a method for encrypting electronic transmissions so a computer which could decode 5 Trillion codes a second would take 2,000 years to decipher one of these transmissions. In other words, when the ALEX system is operating--it cannot be decoded.

The ALEX system intersects with the programming. The ALEX (also called ALEXUS) is part of the tracking and Antichrist-Call-Back Programming. Outside computers are able to interconnect with the Monarch Mind Control slave and call them back for activities. The Council of 9 of the Illuminati has placed an alter by the name of Alex or a similar name in high level subjects and they have either via implants made these subjects available for programming via electronic communications that tie in with their ALEX computers.

Since the early 1960s, the Intelligence agencies have been putting two-way radio communication implants into subjects. This is called telemetry or remote control. The radio wave enters the implant, the implant transmits it to the brain, and the brain's reaction is then picked up and relayed back to a computer which decodes what the brain waves show the brain was thinking.

Alex implants are used within subjects to communicate such thoughts as:
a. "murder your family"
b. "the government is to blame, murder the President"
c. "you cannot get legal redress for what has been done to you by the government"
d. "it is hopeless to fight us"
e. "you want to have sex with the opposite sex"
f. "you want to deal in drugs"
g. "you want to protect your country by being loyal to the CIA"

Atlantis system
This system is built after the mythology of Atlantis. This system is a military system for navel personal. This system takes three programmers to install due the command structure. The Atlantis system involves water torture, water endurance, and water 'games'.

Base Datum
This is a coordinate system. In the early years the systems were built with 3 hour glasses each spinning on a x,y, or z axis. The hour glasses could be turned and in so doing the entire system of alters could be turned.

The systems allow for the programmer or handler to rotate the system 180 degrees. This allows access to top front alters, and the bottom alters.

Beehive System
This system is used for lower beta subjects. The system has a "Brood Chamber" which is the deepest level of the system where the Queen Bee resides. Beehive systems aren't very deep but have many sections for each beta part. The part will be assigned to their section and when they are needed for their task they can be triggered/coded out.

Castle system
The Castle system involves internal imagery of a castle. A castle system will contain a moat, drawbridge, turrets, gargoyles, a torture dungeon filled with actual memories of torture, secret passages, lots of levels, and rooms including a library. Child alters are often hidden in the dungeon. Lots of programs can be contained within the castle, and many traps. Disobedient alters may also be locked up in the castle. The castle will house some alters and also some deadly programs. When castle alters get stirred up, the subject may internally see the castle lights go on. The castle walls may have a grid on them. The castle may be guarded by monsters.

Double Helix.
This is the most common programming system. The double helix pattern is used as an elevator shaft running up and down the worlds created for the alters. Each world lies at a trance level. The double-helix is put in at programming sites where they have full medical facilities, and is typically used in military programming. The double Helix is a complicated system to place in, and for outsiders to breach.

The codes up and down the elevator are alpha-numeric. Because the way the double helix shape twists, one can ride the elevator and get off a level 1, 3, 5, 7, 9 but you have to ride it the other way to get off at 2, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12. Because the double helix is the centrepiece of how the different physiological states of the mind are being layered, taking the subject down to these different physiological states and levels is incredibly perilous.

The Caduceus is a double helix with snakes at the top. The Caduceus is an occult symbol used in occult programming of the double helix system.

The system is also used for dual programming.

Helix. This is a simplified version of the double helix.

The Carousel is usually found in the centre of the Double Helix. The Mensa system will often have the Double Helix system within it to assure no breach.

Hour glass system
Three hour glasses will be placed around the x-y-z axis in a quadrant. A quadrant consists of a section of alters in a world and their mirror images. 12 disciple alters will be placed within the hourglass. Each disciple has to memorize a disciple lesson. If something triggers them, they will begin to fall through the hour glass. If each of these 12 disciples falls through the hour glass like sand, then a sleeping giant will wake up. When the Giant awakes, he will kill the body. A mirror image of the Giant alter will be made also to help insure that the suicide program is accomplished.

Delta System
This system is used in military programming. The system is configured with the Delta symbol (Triangle) overlaid on its self creating the levels for the system. The system will be marked in levels as Delta A. Delta B. Ect.

Empire System
The Empire system is placed into the elite subjects. This system will oversee the initial system placed by programmers. If subjects of influential bloodlines and intelligence survive the programming of the Double Helix, the Empire system will be placed.

The Empire system is layered deep in, and over sees the Double Helix system. The Empire system can only be accessed by one individual. The individual will be the person who oversees the bloodline.

Epsilon system: this is often a hidden system and may hold CIA programming and high level governmental programming. Assassin programming may be held in this system. Covert operations, courier operations, learning to tail a subject, or “drop a tag”, disguises, getting out of difficult situations, may be handled by this system, which sees itself as chameleon-like. The system is a colour coded system with the Seed of Life design. This is formed from seven circles being placed with six fold symmetry, forming a pattern of circles and lenses, which act as a basic component of the Flower of Life's system design. The Flower Life System will be the design of the Epsilon system.

Flower system
The Flower system involves cross programming, i.e., three or four subjects may have been programmed together so one subject only has a piece of the programming. The Flower system utilizes the power of peer pressure and generational ties. In order to get to that piece, the programmer must have access to the other piece which resides in another subject.

The flowers will often be bright. Internally, the flower system may show up as flowers with numerous colours, with the bud representing one subject, the stem and flower representing other subjects.

This system might be connected to the Umbrella, the Trees, the Triangle and the Star. A flower can regenerate an internal tree because of its generational roots. Flowers are also used as elevator shafts, such as a sunflower. A part has to jump into the centre of the flower and go down the stem to reach a lower level. Flower fields such as the poppy field are used as a hypnotic trigger to place an alter into deep trance.

Gem System
This system is found in subject's who have strong family lineage in programming. The system is used in subjects, whose family members are generational occult, children of programmers, and high ranking officials. The system is typically mapped after a diamond cut; Round, Princess, Emerald, Radiant, Oval, Pear etc. The cut of the diamond denotes rank of subject also.

Mensa System
This is a system put into subjects who have photographic memories. It involves the use of numbers and math. Its overall structure looks like a triangular-shaped fish net, with all the nodes or knots of the net containing a triangle. The core is place at the centre of the triangle and is surrounded by more triangles. There are circles of alters within circles of alters. Circles within circles. A circle can rotate and will never end. The programming is meant to be non-ending. There are also triangles within triangles. The effect of using a structure like this to house alters and as a result they feel trapped in endless circles and mazes of triangles within triangles.

The Mensa system (used in military and Illuminati programming) involves lots of numbers and sequences along with bar codes and union force codes.

The Mensa system will often have the Double Helix system within it. This system is connected with DNA; the subject has usually received several blood transfusions. Programming is done through medical abuse by hospitals and doctors. Several suicide programs are layered in.

The codes in a Mensa system will be equations (sometimes called union force codes), bar codes, and number sequences. Union force would have to do with a set of numbers that would equal another set to come up with yet another set: e.g., a+b=c, b+c=a, c+b=a. A subject could be programmed to respond to this very complex code. These codes are extremely difficult to discover in order to neutralize responses to the codes

Oneness system: (Spiritual Programming)
The oneness system exists in the formation of a Nonagon (which is nine sided polygon) 3 (total corners/vertices of one triangle) x 9 (total amount of triangles) equals 27 System Demons as each vertices of a triangle has a point that represents a System Demon. Within each triangular formation/geometrical shape of the Nonagon exists the statement: 'Two or more in my name and I am there'. Such System Demons form the entirety of the mind consciousness and the entirety of the subject as 'who they are' as a consciousness. There may exist 'more', as Systems exists as layers upon layers upon layers.

The programming code of the oneness system is 333 The reason for this is the following:

3 - (Two or more in my name and I am there)
3 - (Two or more in my name and I am there)
3 - (Two or more in my name and I am there)

Thus, 3 x (Two or more in my name) forming the trinity of the oneness system.
Thus - 3 + 3 + 3 forming nine (9) triangular shapes altogether forming the Nonagon as the formation of the oneness system.

The Pentagram (or star) System
This system is often connected to the Tornado system. One pentagram system has pentagrams within pentagrams. The geometric lines grow from pentagram to pentagram by lines running in opposite directions. This has the same effect as circles within circles. Rituals are tied to this system. There are many cult-created alters within this system.

The Scrabble system
This system contains letters, numbers, and mathematical exponents. The system will be set up like a Scrabble board. Across the top and bottom of the board will be the numbers A-O. The vertical sides of the system board will be numbered 1-15. The squares of the board may be colour coded also.

Solar System
This system is set up like the Solar System. Parts will be placed on the various planets and moons. As the system orbits the sun the parts will complete their assigned tasks throughout the year. This system is used in occult programming, and Alien programming.

Each planet will have a specific alter set up and hierarchy. The system parts will not be able to travel outside of their planets or stars without transportation. The can be Spaceships, teleporters and other inter-space travel methods.

Mercury
Venus
Earth
Mars
Jupiter
Saturn solar system in an orbit of 29.5 years around the sun. Death programming in some subjects at this orbit.
Uranus
Neptune
Pluto

Solemetric system
This is used in military and spiritual programming. This system is three dimensional and can rotate. The programmer will place into each section the desired number of parts. The parts will be easily pulled up through triggers, and codes. Subjects who must perform complex tasks and remain focused given this system. The tasks given to these parts are future programmers, strategists, and spiritual counsellors. The programmers need these subjects minds to be fragmented into fifty-60 alters. Because the divisions in the mind due to dissociation and programming are not as deeply structured, subjects who receive solemetric systems have demonic forces and ritual participation to insure the system remains in place.

Spider Web system (spiritual programming)

The Spider Web system is very complex. In this program, the clones will immediately spin new webs that are double connected if the system is tampered with. Communication between personalities proceeds through the strands. This system is for blackmail and destruction via entrapment of unsuspecting individuals who are perceived as threats to the cult/occult/institution. This system is into female subjects whose purpose is to infiltrate churches, or the hierarchy of an agency. The system has a web with connectors and silk strands. The targeted individual will be symbolically placed into the web and then the black widow alter(s) will entrap the individual. This is programming to take individuals with sexual entrapment. The spirit Viper found in ISA 59:5 is placed into this system to protect it. There will be egg alters which will devour the individual, and Gatekeepers are assigned to guard the system.

Telescoping system

This system is placed in to subject's who will be involved in covert operations.(Sleeper Agents)
Each seam of the telescope marks the end of one level and the beginning of another.
The levels will collapse upon one another as the subject completes their assigned task/mission. If the subject is caught the system will collapse down to the last level which has a termination code.

44 Games

Games are used to teach subject's lessons with their peer groups. These games are used as tools in programming to test for: Weaknesses, strengths, leadership skills, physical fitness, twinning, trauma bonding, betrayal, survival, psychological features, and other characteristics the programmer deems necessary for their subject.

Programmers are encouraged to tailor the games to the subjects, and desired outcome.

Programmers are encouraged to let teams build together and form bonds before dismantling the teams.

Programmers are encouraged to pair weaker subjects with stronger subjects as games continue.

Programmers are encouraged to pair enemy subjects as a two team to encourage distrust, anger, and betrayal.

Programmers cannot separate twining subjects.

All subjects must be bonded to a subject, if a subject is not bonded their mental and physical health will deteriorate drastically.

Note: betting is prohibited

Odd Man Out: This game consists of three subjects of the same age. The three subjects are advised they must fight one another. There can only be one winner. The programmers must assess how the three subjects navigate this game. 1.) Do the two weaker subjects 'gang up' on the perceived stronger subject? 2.) Does one weaker subject attempt to ally themselves with the stronger subject? 3.) Do they wait for one subject to be the first to fall before joining 'sides' against him?

When there are two remaining subjects: 1.) Have they discovered the others weakness 2.) How hard do they fight? 3.) How well did they bond against the first subject.

The Race: A field is chosen of subjects and a course set. The subjects must navigate the course and one another. Cheating is encouraged; there must be a clear winner. Those who finish in the bottom third must be re-evaluated, the last place finisher terminated. The race should be completed at night.

The Hunt 1: Subjects are broken into two squads; Red and Blue. An expendable subject is released and the two squads are sent to hunt down the subject. The squads must fight one another or evade. The hunted subject must be caught and terminated.

The Hunt 2: Subjects are set on a course and must complete the course. Dogs are sent to hunt the subjects. All subjects who complete the course are safe.

The Hunt 3: One on One hunt. Two subjects must hunt one another and fight until incapacitated.

Ring Fighting: Two subjects must fight. The dominate subject must beat the other into submission. The victor then must insure the loser is taken care of. This is done by the victor 'nursing' the loser back to health. Programmers must intervene if it appears the dominate subject is 'taking it easy'.

Chess: The subjects must learn to play chess. If they lose the game they are punished.

Tag: Male v Female subject. The male subject must hunt the female subject, catch her, subdue her, and rape her.

Tag: Female v Male Subject. The female subject is advised they must seduce an unknowing male subject have sex with them. Note: Programmers cannot be chosen for this game.

Kick the can: This game is a variation of tag and hide and seek. One subject or a team of subjects are designated as "it" and a can is placed in the middle of the playing area. The other subjects run and hide while the "it" covers their eyes and counts to a specified number. "It" then tries to find everyone. If a subject is tagged by "it", they go into a holding pen for captured subjects. If one of the un-captured subjects manages to kick the can, the captured subjects are released. The game is over once all the non-"it" subjects are in the holding pen.

Handkerchief game: Teams line up on opposite sides and a handkerchief is placed in the middle. The programmer will call out a number for the subjects to respond to. The subjects that have been assigned that number both run to the middle and try to be the first one to retrieve the handkerchief. The subject who wins the handkerchief first gets a point for their team.

It is suggested the team with the most points receives more food, sleep time, etc that will benefit them. This encourages more fighting, and the weak individual on the team being singled out.

*Octopus: The octopus calls out " Come _____ in my ocean." (The blank is filled in by what the subjects must do as they are crossing the ocean. Hop, twirl, swim, run, run backwards, etc.) Then the subjects must follow the command and try and make it to the other side of the ocean without being tagged by the octopus. Any subject that is tagged has to stand in the spot where they were tagged. In the next round both the octopus and the tagged subjects try and tag the other subjects as they go by.

This game can be adjusted so subjects that are tagged can move. Fighting is encouraged. This game can be played on land or in water. During the water game, subjects are encouraged to attempt to drown those whom they catch. Programmers must decide if the first caught subject can be terminated.

Shadow Scout: Choose a subject and give them a 2 minute head start to find a place to hide. Two subjects are also chosen to be the shadow scouts and they both run with the chosen subject.
After 2 minutes of following the subject one of the shadow scouts returns to the waiting subjects. The second shadow scout continues to follow the subject who is to hide and places clues on where they have been by leaving pebbles, rocks, chalk directions or anything else they can think of that would lead the team to where the subject is hiding. As soon as the first shadow scout returns the subjects follow them and try and pick up the clues left by the second shadow scout. If the subject who is hiding is not found within 5 minutes of the start of the game (or any amount of time set before the game starts) they win. Scouts cannot yell or point out in any way where the subject is hiding once all the subjects are in the area they are hiding.

Strategy*:* The subject who is hiding should lose both of the shadow scouts so they don't know where they are hiding. The shadow scouts need to be creative on what signs they leave.

Sticks and Stones: divide the subjects into two teams -- the sticks and the stones. Line them up facing one another. Designate an area roughly 30 feet behind each team as that teams' safe zone. To start the game, yell out "sticks" or "stones." The team them call on must begin chasing the opposing team, which begins racing toward its safe zone. Any tagged subjects must switch teams, and the two new teams' line up to play again. The team to bring all the subjects to its side wins the game.

Save the Egg: Teams must work together to find a way to "save" the egg (Humpty Dumpty for young subjects) — in this case an egg dropped from a specific height. That could involve finding the perfect soft landing, or creating a device that guides the egg safely to the ground. Let their creativity work here.

Programmers are encouraged to have team member punish one another if the egg breaks.

Minefield: Another team game. Arrange an obstacle course and divide subjects into teams. Subjects take turns navigating the "mine field" while blindfolded, with only their teammates to guide them. One can also require subjects to only use certain words or clues to make it challenging or content-area specific.

A Shrinking Vessel: This game requires strategy in addition to team work. Its rules are: The entire group must find a way to occupy a space that shrinks over time, until they are packed into the space. One can form the boundary with an electrical wire, barb-wire, or some other harm causing boundary.

Three Way Tug-of-War: A variation, set up a multi-directional game by tying ropes in such a way that three or four teams tug at once. Some teams might choose to work together to eliminate the other groups before going head-to-head.

45 Trauma Bonding

Abandonment and trauma are at the core of programming. Abandonment causes deep shame and fear that it will occur again. Abandonment by betrayal is worse than neglect. Betrayal is purposeful and self-serving. If severe enough, it is traumatic. What moves betrayal into the realm of trauma is fear and terror. If the trauma wound is deep enough and the terror immense enough, the system will shut out healthy attempts to engage it. The system elevates into a distress state, never safe, waiting to be damage again.

What should occur during trauma bonding is a highly addictive attachment to the individuals who have traumatized the subjects. The subjects should blame themselves, their defects, their failed efforts. This bonding should cause the subjects to distrust their own judgment, to distort their own realities so much, the subjects can place themselves at more risk.

The programmer's relationship with the subject should create trauma bonds. The bonds should initially be created physically. Forced sex should be used with the subject. The programmer should ask the following questions of the subject during intercourse:

Do you like it?
Can I cum inside of you?
What do you like?
How does it feel?

The programmer should not be concerned if the subject does not respond, or responds with a negative answer. If the response is silence or in the negative the programmer should respect the subject's request.

The subject will eventually respond in the positive. The programmer is encouraged to give the subject power positions during forced sex. The programmer is not to kiss the subject on their lips during this time. Kissing should be limited to, neck, ears, shoulders and chest area.

Once subject responds in the positive to all of the above questions the subject can begin bonding with other subjects. (If Beta programming is occurring subject should be versed in the first 45 sexual positions after this bond)

All bonding must be on going.

A number of signs exist to note that a bond has been created. Programmers must note the presence of these bonds, date they were observed, how they were formed and subject response.

Listed below are some of the signs of successful trauma bonding.

Everyone around the subject is having negative reactions the subject is covering up, defending, or explaining the relationship. (Test for loyalty to programmer)

The subject obsesses about showing someone they are wrong about the abuse, their relationship, or their treatment of the subject. (Loyalty to programmer)

Subject obsess about individuals who have hurt them they are long gone. (Silence programming must be engaged)

Others are horrified by something that has happened to the subject and the subject isn’t. (Denial programming must be engaged)

The subject feels loyal to the programmer even though the subject harbours secrets that are damaging to the programmer.

Subject continues to seek contact with individuals that will cause further pain. (Call back programming)

The subject is attracted to "dangerous" individuals.

Subject stay in a relationship longer than they should.

The subject moves closer to an individual who is destructive with the desire of converting them to a non-abuser.

Subject will go "overboard" to help individuals who have been destructive to them.

The subject cannot detach from an individual even though the subject does not trust, like or care for the individual.

Subject continues to be a team member when obviously things are becoming destructive.

The subject misses a relationship to the point of nostalgia and longing and the relationship was detrimental almost destroying the subject.

The subject keeps secret the individual’s destructive behaviour because of all of the good they have done or the importance of their position or career.

Subject continues attempts to get individuals to like them who are clearly using them.

Subject trust individuals again and again who are proven to be unreliable.

Subject tries to be understood by those who clearly do not care.

Subject chooses to stay in conflict with others when it would cost them nothing to walk away.

Subject is loyal to individuals who have betrayed them.

Subject attracts untrustworthy individuals.

Subject continues contact with an abuser who acknowledges no responsibility.

When there is a constant pattern of non-performance in a relationship, subject continues to expect individual to follow through anyway.

Subjects feel loyal to programmer even though they harbour secrets that are damaging to others.

Does abuser’s talents, charisma, or contributions cause subject to overlook destructive, exploitive, or degrading acts.

The subject is attracted to "dangerous" individuals.

Subject stay in a relationship longer than they should.

46 Inside Parts

Parts, alters, insiders are names used for the created fragments of the programmed individual. Names and functions of parts vary from system to system. (Note: that depending upon what the System's occupation in life is, also determines some of the types of alters created.)

For example if a programmer builds a system using the planets of the solar system there will be Parts with planet names, and space terminology used.

The programming script for a system may use movies. As a result names of characters in those movies will be given to parts in the system.

The programmers will set up double-binds. Alters will be created and given negative spiritual roles with names to match. A part may be named Unforgiveness, or Hatred. For such a part to trust someone, makes the alter feel like it is giving up its name, and therefore its identity. By combining the name with an identity that the part doesn't want to lose, the programming intends to double bind the alter.

The programmers will give a part a history, and insure that shadow alters will provide a full range of accessible emotions. Sometimes the distinctions between alters and alter fragments is vague, but examples from the two ends of the spectrum are easy to tell apart.

Below is a list of parts that are found in systems. This list does not note every part that is found in a programmed subject's system.

A

Abberator Parts - insures the mirrors within the system reflect the appropriate distorted image
Abuser alter-Abuser alters are often introjects of the original abuser(s). These alters are trying to protect the subject and not trying to injure them. The abuse results because they feel that they are protecting the system of alters by preventing actions that, when the individual was a child, might have caused further harm from the original abuser.
Actulizer Parts- Part whose task is to keep the system on task towards the goals, potential and training the system was created for.
Accuser Parts - accuses the system of any possible wrongdoing. These Parts will also accuse outside individuals of wrong doings.
Agreement Parts–Assists in maintaining and making agreements/deals within the system. Will assist parts with how to make agreements with individuals on the outside.
Alien Parts for contact, bonding w/ aliens and acceptance of mock alien invasion.
Aligner Parts-Will insure the system stays aligned to the programming, cult, or occult teachings and clan.

Amnesic Parts: These can be known as the "front", the "clueless ones", "those who don't know anything". These Parts are scattered throughout the system to prevent memory recovery.
Angel (imitation) Parts for divine messages, these may be seen as angels Angry Parts-Parts of the system that hold anger. These parts often appear to the outside person as angry for no reason. These Parts are often used under the defence structure of the system as they keep individuals away.
Animal Parts are meant to act like animals. Although a large share of programmed individual's system is dehumanized, there are certain Parts which will be created to actually hold the body and act like animals. The Parts may even be named "animal." A male or female slave may have dog Parts which bark like a dog. The programmers can create any animal, cats, dogs, foxes, pigeons, horses, monkeys and mice are some examples.
Animator Parts - Will bring 'life' to 'stand by' parts. Often the Animator will be a Dr. or spiritual Parts.
Assassination Parts (Deltas)
Aset Parts (Isis) (Maiden) -- The mother of the Anti-Christ figure of Horus.
Attitude Parts - makes up attitudes what is liked and disliked Attractor Parts - causes the system to pull things in

B

Babysitter Parts to look after children Parts keep them from fronting inappropriately
Bastet Parts (Maiden)-The mother goddess of all cats. In the system she will look like a large black cat. Black cats were sacred to Bastet. Bastet corresponds to Yesod (the Foundation) on the Cabalistic Tree of Life.
Beam Stopper Parts-Part who interferes in spiritual growth of individual. This part protects the system from spiritual support.
Bear - a large angry part that makes everything go quiet. An internal monster of a system.
Benefactor Parts-gives the system rewards for obeying the programming
Between Lives Parts-placed in the spiritual systems that follow reincarnation programming.
Binder Parts - binds the system together with spiritual teachings, programming laws, threats and other means.
Bird Parts used for diverse internal purposes, including ravens for suicide, doves for peace (dove may be part of a false trinity.) hawks to fly over the internal mazes, owls for wisdom, etc.
Black Widow Parts, for espionage and blackmail.
Blocker Parts (Gatekeeper) - blocks the system from messing with other important system components (different from Body Blocker)
Bouncer Parts- (may be same as Misdirector)
Body Blocker Parts - keeps the system from modifying the body state by suggesting another theory
Body Generator Parts- insures that the system follows the programming loop when the system attempts to deviate from programming.
Body Locator Parts-will move the body to another location if necessary
Body Machine Parts - regulate body processes and report to the Dr. and any issues with the body.
Bravo 2 series models are men programmed to run the Beast computers.

C

Caillech Parts-Known as the black mother and was the Spirit of disease.

Caretaker alters (soother alter)-Caretaker alters are true protectors of the system. They act as caretakers both internally and externally, but are limited to care of others and are depleted easily, lacking awareness needed for self care. They are often introjects of caring adults.

Cellular Parts- Works at the basic structure of the system to help maintain its integrity.

Christian Front Parts. The Christian Parts will believe in God, and be active in churches.

Child Parts: these parts want praise from adults, and often come out for rewards, or sweets. They assist in balances the system.

Clone Parts- parts that a formed to represent outside programmers, trainers, and individuals of power. These parts help keep order in the system.

Clockmaker and Clock holder Parts -Parts that insure the inter clocks continue to function, and replace internal clocks should they be stopped or damaged.

Communicator Parts- interconnects the system and relays information to lead Parts, Dr.s and other high ranking parts.

Committee Parts (Universal Mind) -high ranking parts that make the decisions for the system.

Conflictor Parts- inspires conflict within the system and with outside individuals to protect the system.

Conscience Parts-will change the system from Beta state to another state of conscience.

Compeller Parts (Compulsive Parts) - Insures the system will continue on its designed course with disregard to rules.

Controller Parts-These are the system leaders. They know what is going on at all times in the system. This will vary from system to system. In a military system, it might be a General, in a metals system, the platinum's, or in a jewel system, the highest jewels, such as diamond, ruby, or emerald.

Cognitive Parts- Will manage process of knowing, including aspects such as awareness, perception, reasoning, and judgment

Computational Parts-operate internal computers and assist in passing on information.

Constrainer Parts - insures the system is following physical system law

Coach Parts- keep the system from either winning or loosing

Corrective Parts - fixes anything that comes undone (or repairer)

Confusion Parts- tries to keep the system confused if there is a truth introduced. These Parts will also attempt to confuse those who are introducing truth.

Craver Parts- Parts that craving food, drugs, things the programmers want to layer in as a distraction.

Creator Parts-part that believes they are a deity and can create worlds.

Crone Parts- Stays in the shadows and passes on advice and is a teacher. She contacts the Spirits and is an expert on demonology. Mother Parts and Goddess Parts are Crone parts. The core-the original child, the one who created all of the others inside.

Coven Parts-participate in coven rituals and activities and maintain the secrecy of the Coven. (Witchcraft)

Courier Parts-will bring messages to parts in the system. These parts are often small animal Parts.

Commander parts- keep the switching smooth, and to keep things orderly Colours Parts:
CLEAR. Secret or shell alters who can take on any colour are coded clear. These are alters who serve as images or as a stage for other alters. This would include "Guardian of the Vail" alters.
GOLD. This colour is for the supreme leadership in the System, which includes the Grand Druid Council.
SILVER. This colour is for the Satanic alters who perform high level satanic rituals. The Mothers of Darkness have silver coding.
PURPLE. These alters see themselves as the abusers, rather than the Illuminati. These alters were involved with the programming. They have been taught to forget the abuse and to reframe it in their mind as training.
BLACK. These alters were born out of Satanic ritual, and are Moon children. The Delta and Beta alters are black coded. They do the dirty work for the cult, such as blackmail and assassination.
RED. These altars see themselves as witches. They were born out of witchcraft ritual, believe they have great spiritual power, and tend to deny that they have been abused.
GREEN or EMERALD GREEN. These are cat altars. They still see themselves as belonging to the cult family, and deny that they have been abused to protect their cult family.
DARK EMERALD GREEN. This colour is assigned to the Antichrist-Satan alter(s). Green is the occult colour for Satan and is the most sacred colour. Few people outside of Satanists know that Green is more sacred for them than any other colour.
LIGHT GREEN. The gods and goddess alters which are triads which function in sets of three.
BLUE ALTERS. Clones, armies and the ribbons have blue coding. These alters will go so far as to hurt the body to protect it from leaking information or deprogramming.
WHITE. 'These are Atlantean alters who have been given Aryan race teachings to think they are superior. They believe in genetic engineering, and a master race.
ORANGE. These special protector alters are scouts who warn of danger from internal or external threats.
YELLOW. These are the strong Christian alters of which there will only be a few in the System. They help serve as a balancing point to control the System as well as to hide what the System is all about.
PINK. These are core related alters. They maintain the true feelings of the true self apart from the cult programming and the cult family's programming. These alters are viewed as weak because they are emotional and often break down and weep. They are fragile emotionally. They are also vulnerable front alters, usually inducing depression or some other kind of trauma-based freeze
An alternative colour scheme that is used:
WHITE. The internal programmers who come around in white robes get this colour assigned to them, as if they are doctors or angels of light.
RED. Sexual alters are given the natural colour of sex and arousal red.
BLACK. Connecting alters that are Nexus alters between various system parts.
PINK. Reporting alters.
DARK BLUE. Non hierarchy cult alters.
LIGHT BLUE. Alters in charge of the way the system runs, such as the judges.
YELLOW. Alters which are ritually and sexually twinned with alters of other systems.
ORANGE. Guard alters which are heavily programmed for obedience.
VIOLET-PURPLE. Front alters and small child alters placed into boxes.
CLEAR. Shell alters to deceive the outside world.

GOLD. The traumatized alters upon which the programming is built on.
Cult Parts-participate in cult activities, and maintain the secrecy of the cult.

D

Damper Parts- keeps the system condensed to a point and in agreement, holds the system down
Data Parts to hold information this encompasses a wide range of Parts, including Parts who hold internal system information to Parts who hold information for their handlers.
Deaf and Dumb Parts to prevent the System from hearing the truth or discussing information within the system.
Death Parts to take near death traumas, and become unafraid of dying.
Denial Parts: these are intellectual, and are created to deny that anything bad ever happened.
Delta series are models for espionage and assassination.
Devil Parts (Demon) - makes trouble for the system. Believe they are a demon.
Degrader Parts - will demote parts that aren't following programming. These parts will also complete activities that affect the character of the body.
Delusion Parts – will hold to programming and beliefs when presented with evidence to the contrary. Task is to maintain the integrity of the system.
Deceiver Parts - deceives the system into believing what a truth is.
Deflector Parts-will fend off questions and other intrusions into the system. (Diffuser)
Decision Maker Parts-part who will make the decision in high stress situations.
Destroyer Parts - arranges accidents to keep the system from finding out it is programmed or gaining freedom.
Determiner Parts- value, judges potential futures to maximize dynamics
Depressor Parts- (Discourager)
Delta Parts -Parts within the systems which are programmed to be assassins.
Delta-Beta Parts -Parts that are trained in espionage. They will be trained to recognize a person's physical identifiers.
Discourager Parts - discourages any effort to do anything about changing the systems/parts circumstance. (Depressor)
Disabled alter-many alters are deaf, blind, missing limbs, sickly, dying, bloody, bruised and so on.
Disperser Parts - will disrupt and scatter a section of the system if the parts are gathering for unapproved reasons.
Double agent-Part that will act helpful to an outsider, only to be giving information to system watchers to maintain the integrity of the system.
Dramatizer Parts-Parts that are dramatic to throw attention away from what is really occurring in the system.

E

Egyptian Armies The Egyptian armies are hundreds of fragments which have been programmed to have uniforms and to function as parts of an army.
Element Parts (Air or Wind, Water, Earth, Fire) for magick and compliance

Emotional Parts- parts that hold the emotions of the body. The Parts may be the name of the emotion. (Cheerful, boredom, antagonism, rage, hostility, fear, grief, apathy)
Encourager Parts - encourages the system to stay here and live life
Enturbulator Parts- will harass parts and people to inflict fear, and agitation.
Equalizer Parts - insures the system stays balanced.
Espionage Parts-parts that gather information to undermine or bring down governments and individuals.
Executioner Parts - programmed to kill an individual quickly.
Exhilarator Parts-when triggered will return to the body to a state of happiness.

F

Fate Parts (Arranger) - arranges fates for the system
Feeling Parts (Emotional Parts):
File Clerk Parts-part will maintain a dossier on internal parts, and external individuals of interest.
Filter Parts -filter out perceptions of individuals.
Formulator Parts - inspires choices of strengths and weaknesses, likes and dislikes
Fire child or Bomb child Parts- to make body feel like its burning as a punishment or warning.
Flooding Parts Flooding Parts can be used as singles or as a group of Parts. They over whelm a part with memories or other feelings to stop the part from doing what they were doing.
Forgetter Parts-will not remember the information, or task they have been given after they have used the information or completed the task.
Foreign Language Parts-who speak languages of other countries, cults, or secret societies.
Front Parts -parts placed on the top level. These are the parts that interact with the ‘world’ and are often unaware of the rest of the system.
Fourier Parts - puts things into the future for the system, goals, wants, so the system will work towards those things.

G

Game Maker Parts - makes up games for the system. The outcome is the loser of the game is severely punished. The loser is often punished by the winner of the game.
Gatekeeper Parts (Blocker)-guard portals, gates, and important areas of the system.
The Gatekeeper protects the gates or portals to all System levels. The programmers may also call them “doorkeepers”, or “toll men” and “toll women”. The subject may refer to them as guards or blockers, although Gatekeepers are more than guards, they are an entrance or portal to something. Gatekeepers may often be the alter that was split to get a particular section. Each gatekeeper may be at a deeper level trance than the one before it. When a Gatekeeper is split it creates a natural link to the alters that are created from itself. Then the Gatekeepers are given programming not to see what they have created.

Gatekeeper parts will appear near the surface of a system, and then again deep in the System about level 10, and 12. Gatekeeper parts are parts that the programmer must go through to get to deeper levels. The Gatekeeper parts are very heavily programmed to keep them in place. They will receive intensive lies. Some of the access triggers which must accompany the verbal are things such as needles, electro-shocks, or slaps to certain parts of the body to trigger deep parts to take the body.

Genie - a delta alter. In the bottle the part is harmless, when triggered out of the bottle to complete its task, this part becomes deadly.

Generator Parts- projects reality to parts of the system. The reality is interpreted in such a way to keep the system in its place

Gems Parts-occult parts that are advised they are important to Satan. These parts are used in rituals.

Genetic Parts- parts that maintain the double helix throughout the system.

Goal Maker Parts - makes up goals for the system to keep the system motivated and functioning.

Guider Parts- guides the system deeper into programming

Group Mind Parts - part that participates in group programming.

Guardian/Guardian Parts- guards the programming, fights against erasure of programs.

H

Hat-Hor Parts (Mother) -- She is the womb of Horus, Queen of the Dead, or Queen of the West

Helper Parts-part that will help inside parts by encouraging them, and explaining things to them.

Hidden Observer Parts-a hidden part of the subject that knows what things are occurring in the body while other parts don't. This part is inlayed during hypnotism.

Hider Parts-part that will hide programming from outside interference. 2) Part that will move the body to a hidden location if the system feels threatened.

Hierarchy Parts-take part in occult hierarchy ceremonies different ceremonies at different times have different Parts participating.

Host-Part that has the function of daily living.

Host Parts: there may be a "day host" a "night host" for the cult, or hosts for various systems or times in the person's life.

Holder Parts - holds entities in place by occult/cult practice.

Hunts Parts created for the handler's sport of being hunted

Hunter Parts—hunts down internal parts that have strayed, or participates in programming hunts.

Humanizer Parts-will work with cloned parts, puppets, dead and other mechanical parts to assist them with human characteristics.

I

Illuminati Doctor Parts Green, Black, White, Red and Blue-will continue with programming internal parts.

Intellectuals Parts: Parts who can observe, go between systems, learn information quickly and download it to handlers/programmers.

Invalidator Parts- part who will attempt to bring out the negative behaviours in others. This part will work to discredit individuals inside and outside of the system. 2) Part will weaken the effect of outside encouragement to get well.

Inner Guard Parts- keep the system from looking at its self and seeing the structure of entities, mirrors, mazes and other system blocks.

Inner Self Helper- the ISH is a dissociated part that is usually unable to communicate with other alters, yet has the ability to watch and hear everything going on inside a system. The ISH will usually display little emotion or affect. Because the ISH observed inner events, it has access to the memories of the individual as a whole, as well as to the memories of each alter individually. Other names include: internal self helper, guidance, unconscious mind, observing ego, higher self, hidden observer and inner wisdom.

Instigator Parts-will escalates a situation to protect the system.

Interiorizer Parts – part who insures the inner values of the system continue to function.

Inverter Parts - will turn the system upside down if there is a perceived threat.

Inhibitor Parts- part that will interfere with and suppress specific memories.

Inspirational Parts- inspires belief that every part likes the system and they don't want to leave the system.

Initiator Parts- compel the system self to act on specific programming.

Individualizer Parts - limits the system to a single viewpoint.

Internal councils Parts-Groups of parts that make decisions for the system that falls under their domain. There may be a Christian council, occult council, cult council, military council, for each section of Parts.

Internal programmer Parts-will re-enforce programming by doctors, Mother's of Darkness, and other leading parts.

Introjects These alters are sometimes called as "copy alters" and are internal copies of another person, often they are an internal representation of an attachment figure such as a parent, abusive introjects alters are very common. An introject may be an internal "mother" or "father" alter which warns the child not to act in a way which would cause the child's real external mother or father to punish them, protecting the child from physical harm. Introjects can be calming and soothing if they are representations of caring people.

Ishtar Parts- Babylonian goddess of fertility, love, war, and sex. Her symbol is the eight pointed star.

J

Jailer Parts- parts who will imprison other parts that are rebelling against programming.

Jesus Parts- parts who say they are the Christian son of God, but behave contrary to what the bible states Jesus behaved.

Justifier Parts-part that will uphold the teachings of cult/occult/programming in the system.

Judge Parts - judges the system's conduct harshly, all the time

Justice Parts--Parts who dispense punishment for disobedient Parts

Juliet series are sexual mind controlled slaves.

K

Kali Parts- She will be deep in a System. She is the Goddess of Time and Change

Keeper Parts - keeps (holds) the system down in the programming

Keeper of the Keys Parts- part that holds the keys to doors, chests, and other locked parts of the system.

Keeper of the Spiritual Records Parts- part that records other parts spiritual progress, and deeds to be used against that part or the system.

Kilo 5 series- military espionage parts.

L

Lilith Parts- Female parts that believe they are monsters and are out at night. They have sex with demons, and seductresses.

Little alter A little, is a term often used by those with DID. This type of alter acts 7 years old or younger.

Locator Parts -parts that know where parts are in the system at all times. These parts will report to the rulers where parts are in the system.

Looking Glass Parts- parts that are created to confuse the system, and outside individuals. They appear identical to the original Parts, but backwards. This is what confuses inside parts. The mirror images are often hidden in mirror mazes as their reflection in the mirrors appear as the real part. Looking Glass People are similar to the mirror images. The Programmers may create a looking glass alter by having a drugged part(s) of the subject endure the trauma of seeing someone's face peeled. The subject's face is also hypnotically peeled. The dead individual's skin is placed over the subject being programmed. The Looking Glass People are charted on grids and contain numerous programs. They are confusing to the regular alters, because they appear internally like mirror images.

Loyalty Parts- parts that hold are devoted to the handler/cult/occult.

Lucifer Parts-part that offset the trinity in the system. This part is often kind, the opposite of Jesus in the system.

M

Manager alter A system manager might be seen as a leader to the other alters. They are involved inside and outside if needed - including acting as a temporary host, but mostly they operate inside. They direct what is going on in the system in many ways. Although the system managers usually know all parts of the system and have memory back to the beginning, they are not ISH's (Inner Self Helper).

Maat Parts-bring balance to the system through order, justice and the laws.

Maiden (B) Parts- parts that work closely with the Mother parts. She is the Guardian of the Balance (Maat Parts).

Martial Arts Parts- trained in various martial arts practices to protect the body.

Memory trace alters- One that has a more or less complete life, unlike how many alters which have a limited range of memories. System managers and ISH's often have this ability.

Middle alter-A term often used by those with DID to describe an alter that appears to be between the ages of 8 and 12

The Mother (A) Parts-actively works magick and leads specific rituals in the system.

Misdirector Parts-will send parts and outside individuals to the wrong place, and give wrong directions to protect the system.

Michael 1 series slaves are CIA agents under total mind-control. Operation Green star was the Mind-control project to create UFO abductions scenarios.

Mirror images-are task specific fragments whose job is to confuse both subject and outside individuals who are attempting to breach the system. Duplicate parts of most parts are created, so that even the parts themselves don't know if it is themselves or another alter. These duplicates are called mirrored images and looking glass people (LGPs). Some of the mirrored images may turn out to be demonic entities that have been placed using high level demonology

Misowner (Disowner) - says that this system isn't real and doesn't exist to prevent sharing of information.

Monster Parts-parts used to scare the other Parts.
Mouse Parts- parts that wind clocks insure internal computers, and grids are working properly.
Mother of Darkness Parts- part that trains the children, and over see Doctors, and programmers.
Moralizer Parts - part preaches at parts and makes them feel guilty for choices they have made Mood Parts- shift moods between serene/troubled, calm/nervous, pleasant/irritated can rapid cycle.
Moonchild –A part in the spiritual programmed system.

N

Narcotic Parts - keep the higher self feeling drugged, and lethargic when the system may be breached
Nexus Parts-Link parts to one another so they can function and complete a task.
Nothing Parts- Parts who believe they don't exist. They will state they are 'No one'.
Node Parts-Each node is assigned a numerical code. If three or more nodes are brought together by calling out their code names, they form a temporary alter. (The nodes do not have to be adjacent) The information on the Tinker Toy sticks that lead to each of those nodes, when put together, constitutes the instructions for that temporary alter. When the task is done, the temporary part dissipates, the nodes go back to their original place, and each node divides into five. The node that divided cannot be used again, but any of the five new ones can. The numerical code that calls the nodes together is made by dividing the sphere into sections using lines like longitude and latitude. When the nodes are latent, just sitting there doing nothing, no node on the surface layer is connected to any other node. They cannot communicate, they cannot exchange information. They only behave like an alter when they have been called together.

O

Objects In some systems there are objects with consciousness, so they're not normal objects. For example, talking objects, or a notebook that writes itself.
Observation (Watchers/Silent Observer) Parts-deep parts quietly observe all that goes on in a Parts system.
Opposer Parts-resistant to system goals, and values. Helps to maintain system balance.
Over Seer (Administrator) Parts- manages 128 splintered parts of the system

P

Papa Bear Parts- part who is cloned after an outside programming trainer who worked against showing anger.
Part of God (universal Mind) Parts - a part sent to be element of god the individuals contribution to the universal mind.
Perception Blocker Parts-parts who will distort how the system perceives experiences to strengthen the system's beliefs.
Perpetuator Parts-ensures the programming does not fail and will continue.
Persister Parts- parts hold steadfast to their task, often repeating the task over and over.
Pets- In some systems, there are different animals that are just that, animals. They are usually the pet of the system, and have to be taken care of just like a real animal Persephone Parts- Queen of the Dead and underworld part in many systems. This parts task is to ensure the poppies fields stay intact.

Planner Parts-plans the systems continued existence

Postulator Parts- part who works with the trinity to plea for other parts in the system.

Presenter Parts – parts that assist with the Parts who participate in social situations.

Programmer (Internalists) Parts- parts cloned after the original programmers to reprogram the System.

Protector Parts: protect the body if it is threatened. 2) Protect the integrity of programming and the system from perceived threats. 3) Protects the system from the system suggesting Alternatives to destructive programming. Part of balancing the system.

Provocateur Parts-Incites other parts or individuals to take part in or complete and illegal act.

Punisher Parts: part fashioned after an external trainer, punisher, or enforcer. Their job is to keep things in line, and will often try to sabotage therapy. Internal punishers will activate inter system punishment sequences. (Flood programming/ suicide programming, self harm programming)

Q

Queen of the Clones Parts- guides the conduct and actions of the clone parts of the system

R

Randomizer Parts- part that encodes messages, and decodes messages.

Recycler Parts- part that can cycle the system into a 'new' being Restimulator Parts-part that will activate a dormant part of the system if the system is threatened or needs programming.

Resistor Parts resists change in the environment, or changes in the system. Can come across as defiant.

Reporting Parts- programmed to give the handler reports regularly. Reporting parts are often small children, that are hidden in each section, and may require slaps to the face or jabs with a needle to pull them up.

Reflector Parts-social Parts will reflect back to the individual what they perceive they are receiving Relayer Parts- part will pass body perceptions to the system parts and ignore other body perceptions.

Representer Parts- part who will give optimum solution for a problem

Reactive Parts- part that will control the body's reactions to the environment

Recording Parts-will record specific interactions for recall. It may be sight, sound, touch or specific situation.

Restrictor Parts - limits the system to a located viewpoint

Ribbon Parts- These are parts of the programming matrix that monitor programming functions of Parts and then send messages from computers to System areas

Robot Parts-children who have been put into robot costumes and are trained to attack parts of the system which are not in compliance with the programming.

Ruby - sexual alters usually linked to beta programming

Ruling Parts-parts that have titles of royalty in systems.

Run/return to handler return home / Parts-parts that will return to the handler, or flee from the area they are in.

S

Satanic hierarchy Parts, to insure the occult part of the system is controlled and follows occult teachings

Satan Parts- part feels they are on the victorious side in a spiritual war and are a part of Satan’s army. (Different than Lucifer)

Scrambling Parts- to prevent other parts from hearing things that are being said to them that should not be heard.

Seer Parts- parts that gather information and predict the future of the system.

Separator Parts - keeps the system as an individual separate from the system’s higher self.

Sexual Parts: created to have sex with individuals. Each Part is programmed in a specific genre of sex. Sexual Parts are also programmed for cult/occult specific sex for the exchange of entities.

Shifter Parts –assts with shifting between 7.83 Hz, 10.80 Hz, 6.6 Hz for programming.

Shell Parts-Hide Parts from being discovered by outside individuals who are not allowed to be aware of that part of the system.

Shell Focus Parts - surrounds the system and focuses things in on the system for programming

Shadow Parts- have shadow Parts created from themselves to take their pain.

Sin Parts - will purposely commit acts that are against the Christian Parts.

Sleep Centre Parts - parts that dream and have the system rebuild things while the system sleeps Sleeping alter-Time passes for a sleeping alter without knowing.

Slider alter-An alter whose age varies

Social Parts- parts that present in social situations

Somatic Parts (Sickness Parts) - physical pains/sensations are triggered through programming in response to not following directions, rules, job or other instructions laid in by the programmer

Solidifier Parts-will unite the system against a common threat or enemy.

Spirit Guide Parts-part that believes they can spiritually guide other parts seeking spiritual awaking. (Universal mind)

Splitter Parts - continually makes parts split (divide)

Spinner kittens will be accessed via their mama cat, who acts like a Madam in a "cat house”. Telephone tones are frequently used to be able to access or trigger parts of the computer program matrix.

Spiritual Parts: have a variety of beliefs that cover different spiritual paths internally.

Subconscious Parts- hides things and convinces the system to stay limited and obedient Sublimating Parts- insure the sadistic parts behave in a publically acceptable manner.

Suppressor Parts - hides the programming from outside individuals if programming is detected.

Super being Parts– will take over a part by overwhelming them and control them.

Suicide Parts- programmed to stop the body from living. Each Part responds to a specific trigger.

Swindlers and fabricator parts- notoriously skilful timewaster parts. These parts are used to protect the system during therapy, and if caught interrogation.

System Parts – ensure life within the system is continued in a balanced fashion.

Symbolize Parts-maintains the internal symbols placed during programming

Sympathizer Parts- parts that will express compassion for a part that has just been traumatized.
System Holder Parts-parts who feel like they have received a section of the system to oversee and own.
System Coordinator Parts - co-ordinates the interrelationship of system
Synchronizer Parts - will insure that a task, trigger, event occurs across the system at the same time.

T

Teen alter-Teen alters appear to be between the ages of 13 and 18
Tempter Parts - tempts the system to do the opposite of what would lead to freedom, or a positive result for the system.
Terror/Fear Parts - makes the system afraid, especially of anything to do with the mind or spirits Thinker Parts-closely related to the silent observer. This part will think of alternative actions that can be taken when something arises.
Tranced Parts- bring the body into semiconscious state, as between sleeping and waking and a detachment from one's physical surroundings to assist with pulling up parts for programming.
Travel Parts, sleep during travel or be oblivious to where they are going Trickster Parts - is a god, goddess, spirit, man, woman, or anthropomorphic animal part who plays tricks or otherwise disobeys normal rules and conventional behaviour. Tricks the system in to insuring the other parts maintain their jobs to correct the error.
Twin alters-Twins appear the same in many ways, and may even have the same name. One twin can good while the other is bad.

U

Unifier/Joiner/Grouper Parts - pulls everything together to insure the system continues to work smoothly.
Universal Mind Parts (The Committee) created by the programming to manage the system these are not self aware Parts, but is a composite composed of a piece of everybody and programmed to run

V

Vacuum Parts -insures the system isn’t affected by outside influences attempt to keep the system isolated.
Visual Parts- composes pictures of reality that the system will see. These pictures are often distorted to assist the programming.

W

Watcher Parts- watches the system and its functioning. Typically doesn’t speak to individuals on the outside.
Workers Parts: do the jobs of daily life, and usually are part of the presenting systems. These parts take care of the house, get married, and may hold a highly dependable job.

Wraith Parts -believes they are a ghost.

X

Y

Z

47 Internal Programs

Below is a list of internal programs for use. The programmers are advised to inlay all base programs, and then link the programs to their backups before continuing with individual programs.

Below is a partial list of programs.

4 Elements defensive programming --fire, wind, water, and air. When the programming is touched by any outside individual in an attempt to breach programming the elements of the earth come alive.
WATER--subject will freeze like ice, will suffocate like inhaling water, will boil like being placed in boiling water, will feel a drip drip drip on the head, and will flood with memories.
FIRE—Subject will burn inside and outside. The subject will remember fire torture, and their face melting.
EARTH--the subject will remember being dropped down a well, being buried alive in either hot sand, or a casket. Earth means "life or death". The earth "swallows subject's up." The subject may feel dehydrated from memories of being buried in hot sand (hot earth).
AIR or WIND--Vortexes suck the subject down and away, a strong wind takes the alter(s) out of their designated area and spins and separates them.

A

Abreaction programming- Gives the subject topics to talk about in therapy or with other outside individuals who may be attempting to assist the subject.
Access denied programming- Prevents unauthorized access both externally and internally, will often be reinforced by either or both suicidal/homicidal programming.
Access Programs- Allows access into the subject's internal system. These programs allow the handlers and programmers to access the subject's system through a specific part. Access is achieved through triggers, hand signals, electronic tones, spoken phrases, and touch. Once accessed, countless other programs may be triggered and/or reinforced by the handler or programmer.
Alex Programming- A recall and retry program.
Alice in Wonderland Programming- The programmer/handler uses the book written by Lewis Caroll to map the subject's System. The created parts are given names and rolls after characters in the book. The White Rabbit is a programming figure for Alice in Wonderland programming who has access to deeper parts of the system. The White Rabbit is an important figure to the subject as he represents the programmer/handler.
The Queen of Hearts is also an important figure for commands in the Looking Glass World which. When a deep subject alter is needed to perform they are sent into the looking glass world where a looking glass person carries out the command--but in a way that reality is thought to be a dream
The codes used in Wonderland programming are too vast to list them all. The programmer will chose quotes from the book Alice in Wonderland to use.
Alien Programming- Blue beams of light are used as a hypnotic induction for subjects who are given the cover story of being abducted by aliens. The subject during this experience seeks a god who is a great being to control them. This is used to program in the evil and good aliens, or evil or good gods. The gods or the aliens during a programming session will not be so strange that the subject as a mote can't understand their purposes and activities.

The subject may perceive these aliens on the trip experimenting with us. This is a common easy-to-create psychotropic programming script.

Alpha Programming- Is total alignment with the Programmers' agenda. It is a prerequisite for other forms of programming and a base program. Regarded as general programming within the base control personality; characterized by extremely pronounced memory retention, along with substantially increased physical strength and visual acuity. Alpha programming is accomplished through deliberately subdividing the subject's personality which, in essence, causes a left brain-right brain division, allowing for a programmed union of L and R through neuron pathway stimulation.

Alpha Programming aims to install a mechanical paradigm, where all parts are instruments, vessels or puppets that can be made to do anything by those who hold the insights into the subjects mind. Young children have long periods of alpha activity and must be trained to enter other brain wave states for long periods. Access codes and sexual alters will often be placed in alpha, which may also be coded red in some systems.

Amnesia programming- The alters will be programmed with amnesia as a backup. Backup amnesia means the part doesn't remember that they lost time, or won't remember that they forgot what has occurred. They also won't remember that they don't remember. This is an example of hypnosis used internally by the programmer and the programmed parts to control other inside parts. This is used in Alice in Wonderland programming as Alice falling down a tree. In Oz programming it is used in the Poppy field, or as the Glenda the Good witch with her wand. Two-way amnesia can be used, where neither part knows about the others existence.

Anger Management Programming- Teaches the subject to redirect their anger away from the handler and programmer. The subject will be provoked by one of these figures until they are angry. The question is asked, "Are you angry?" When the subject replies, in the positive an electroshock is applied. The subject will be brought to a high level of anger allowed to 'cool off' for 30 minutes. The subject's and parts are taught to redirect their anger toward themselves. "When you (subject) are angry it is due to your inferiority. You must___ (cut, hit, burn) when you are angry. Do you understand?" This message will be repeated with the question "Do you understand?" The subject is traumatized until they are compliant. Suicide programming will be layered in at a specified brainwave state the programming begins with repetitious self-destruct messages. These messages debase the value of the subject to reinforce the suicidal destruct messages. This training will lead the subject will attach subconsciously a fear of pain to the concept of anger toward their programmers, handlers and authority figures.

Armageddon programming- Is activated in those who have Bible programming. The four horsemen on their different horses ride out and bring their different mental tortures to the subject's mind.

Assassination Programs- When an individual in the subject's environment is deemed to have become too much of a liability, the subject may be triggered to attempt to kill the individual. The programming will be placed against a supportive individual, situation, or environment in the subject's life. As is the case in self-injury programs, means (e.g., guns, knives, poison, etc.) of the assassination program are often "given" to the subject by the programmer.

The primary intent program may not be the actual death of the individual but to scare them away, and to set the subject up as an aggressive individual so other outside attempts to assist in recovery will not occur.

B

Backup Programming- One of the backup programs is designed to deal with an individual who has a good understanding of a system, and tries to take a system out via spiritual warfare. Other backup programs provide the deprogrammer with mirror images and sham alters to talk with. The deprogrammer never talks to the real human elements.

Baby Talk programming-_when the parent and child or two adults, baby talk to each other so it appears there is an intimate relationship and nurturing when it is not.

Bells of Destruction programming-The sound of bells tolling internally signalling to destroy a level of the programming, structures of programming, or a death knell. The program will have the bell toll a specified number of times for each object to be destroyed.

Behavioural sciences programming- Parts programmed to investigate human and animal behaviour through controlled and naturalistic observation, and disciplined scientific experimentation. These parts then learn to predict the behaviours of outside individuals to protect the system from compromise.

Beta programming- is sexual programming spanning from rigid gender stereotypes on one end of the spectrum (Princess Programming) to hyper-sexualized conduct at the opposite end (Porn/Sex Subject Programming). Beta Programming requires absolute submission from women/men in order for them to perform their tasks. An early sexual torture will be used to anchor this programming. These sexual subjects will develop sexual abilities that are for the pleasure of others and not the subject.

It is important for Beta subjects to be programmed to have charm, seductive skills, charisma, and creativity. This programming eliminates all learned moral convictions and stimulates the primitive sexual instinct, devoid of inhibitions. Kitten parts are created with this programming.

Betrayal programming-Parts are programmed not to trust one another so they cannot form alliances. This is done by having parts 'report' on one another's activities, and not assist each other outside of their tasks.

Black box programming- is self-destruct and shatter programming sealed off into a black box to protect system. Black boxes are not to be opened.

Brain Starvation Programming- is done by severely limiting sugar and proteins. Water deprivation is taught to caregivers to raise the brain's temperature, which happens when the brain swells from lack of water. The subject gets woozy, overheated and hallucinates so they can't remember clearly. Water deprivation combined with electroshock makes it difficult for the subject to remember anything. Heavy exercise along with long periods of little sleep 2 to 3 hours a day causes an overproduction of endorphins and victims begin to robotically respond to commands.

Brain wave programming-is a very complex form of programming which creates automatic amnesia and communication barriers between the different brain wave states. This will also be reinforced by shock and punishment to prevent its "degradation", or undoing. Internal system controllers and programmers will also work to reinforce the programming at night when the subject is asleep. (Physically).

Brain wave programming involves having a young subject placed in a deep trance, where they learn to dissociate into a specified brain wave state. Three programmers will work on one subject during the initial stages.

One will "prep" the subject, using a hypnotic drug to induce a trance state. They will have also placed the electrodes on the head, using an abbreviated version of the method used in traditional hospital setting. If delta state is being induced, only the electrodes needed to pick up delta waves will be placed.

The number two programmer will advise the subject exactly what they expect: they will achieve a special state, called ____ the programmer tells the subject, while they are in trance state, they (the programmers) will know when they reach it, by the readings from the electrodes.

The third Programmer is the verbal or teaching programmer. They will immediately reward the subject, saying, "Good, you are in ___ state now." The programmer will touch the subject; tell them what a good job they are doing. If the subject jumps out of ____ state, the verbal programmer will immediately become harsh, and will shock the subject as punishment. The subject is told that it left the desired state (which is "good") and needs to go back in.

The average subject is about eight years old when this is begun, since the cerebral cortex and neurological development are not advanced enough in younger ages. The programmer will tell the part, who has been called up to be a "template", or building block for the new system, that ___state is "good". They will emphasize this over and over. The subject will be shocked to increase its receptivity to learning. This also arouses the subject from its drugged state and they will be more alert. The programmer will tell the subject that they are to execute mental exercises. The programmer will then give the subject backwards counting exercises, used to help the subject achieve deeper trance states. Other verbal cues to trance down will be given. When the prepping or technical programmer sees ____ waveforms, they will signal the verbal programmer with a hand signal. The induction, counting, will be repeated until ___ state is seen again. The subject is consistently rewarded for entering, then staying in this state for longer and longer periods of time. When the template part can stay in the specified brainwave pattern consistently, the part will be rewarded. This will occur over several months.

The programmers now have a template that stays in the desired state. They can begin splitting and using the part as a basis of forming a new system. The new system will record the desired brain waves on an EEG if done correctly. The new system will be taught what the brain wave state means. The programmers will flash a cue or symbol correlating with the state overhead, and brand the state into the system. The programmers will wear clothing with the symbols. The parts will be taught what to do, how they act, and how to view the world. They will reward them when they comply, and shock or otherwise traumatize them if they do not act as the brainwave state.

Body programs- will be put in for all parts. The same code will work for all alters when the internal programming parts want to trigger a body program. Many body programs are activated via trigger codes are memories of severe torture. The internal defences consist in part of body programs that are triggered if the subject attempts to break programming.

Some body programs are: Auditory problems, Blood flow/circulation, Coma, Digestive failure, Headaches-split brain, Heart failure, histamine production, Optic problems such as blindness, Respiratory failure, Sleep deprivation, Sleeping program, Temperature change, control the pulse rate and heart beat, control the body's temperature, Control the temperature of individual body parts or sides of the body, such as the right side of the body might get hot, and the left side of the body will be cold.

Some of the body programs are carried out by an alter fragment which feels as if they are burning or one that was created by ice torture. This part or this feeling of being hot or cold is then attached to something in the mind. If the subject moves toward the freedom, a cold alter or a cold feeling of a memory is hypnotically programmed to come up behind the alter holding the body.

Many feelings, body sensations, and drugged states are attached to body programs.

The heart is controlled by the mind and works with the emotions of a subject. Programmers have been taking advantage of the mind's ability to control the heart's beating. The three most frequent events that change heart beat are emotions, sicknesses, and muscle activity. Parts are programmed to trance out if anyone tries to prove to them that they have a heart.

Other body programs appear to be connected to the memories of alters. For instance, if the Programmer wants the body to burn--he has the System pull up an alter which was tortured with fire who comes up behind the alter holding the body, and the body then abreacts and feels like it is burning.

Burning Programs-Burning programs are linked to Silence programs, and self punishment programs. Common modes of burning include: cigarettes, lighters, hot metal implements (i.e., knives, rods, wands), and/or a variety of scalding (or flammable) liquids and caustic chemicals.

Boxes Programming-Subjects will be placed in a room and a cedar chest would be placed in front of a table. Two young subjects will be assigned to guard the chest, which is called the "Doctor's box". The box will have three seals on it that cannot be broken. The subjects will be weapons with which to guard the box. Expendable children will be sent in to try to break the seals and open the box. The subjects will be given directives to kill anyone who attempts to break the seals and open the box. If the subjects fail in their guard duty, they are tortured or depending on the failure terminated. Internally, the subjects have template alters who know nothing but their hypnotic commands to guard the doctor's boxes. Locked in the boxes would be self-mutilation, body programs, spin programs etc.

C

Carousal Programming- is a sequence designed to confuse alters and fragments inside. This program is linked to spin and confusion programming internally. This may also be used to punish internal parts by spinning them on the carousel if they disclose information or tell.

Chi Programming- or "return to cult" is programming installed in order to get subjects to reassemble a packaged ideology or religious belief. It is the equivalent of "calling in" or "coming in" in the language of secretive intelligence agencies, and it will make a sleeper subject return from any level of ideological digression or apathy to core beliefs they may not even be aware rules them.

On the cultural level it is an instrument of social engineering to make sure that one Programmers agenda, such as multi-culturalism, does not exceed certain boundaries.

Whenever Programmers deem it necessary, the Chi Programming is invoked and unfolded, dragging subject's in the opposite direction, for instance towards nationalism and racist positions. Alternatively, the multi-cultural vision can be furthered, when it suits the Programmers agenda, overriding patriotism and ethnic-cultural loyalties.

Colour programming-a way to organize systems that allows the programmer to call alters up easily. With hundreds of fragments colours are a way of organizing them into an easily accessible group. Colour coding is one of the first methods that are inlayed over systems. An entire system may be colour coded with numerous colours, with each system controller being given a different colour over its part of the system

A box of coloured scarves and electroshock are used to program colour coding into subject's mind. Besides alters, other things in the system are colour coded.

Castle programming-Castles can be set throughout the landscape of the system. The script must coincide with the placement of a castle so the subject's mind will accept it. Programmers should not place a castle if it does not fit the script. This will cause a system glitch. Castles are used for re-programming, placing parts in the dungeon, and for hierarchy parts to live. Names of the castle should reflect the programming script.

Cutting Programs-As children, subjects will be taught by programmers when and how to cut. These programs are a means of punishment, as well as to reinforce earlier obedience or shutdown commands. The cutting implements themselves may be gifts from the programmer used during the original programming session. The subject will keep these implements hidden and use only when the program to cut is triggered. Many cutting programs have been coded to progress to suicide programs.

Cocoon programming-Used with monarch butterfly images. The subject is wrapped in white cloth and reborn as a butterfly. The subject is under psychotropic medication to enhance the programming and images. The subject's legs are spread and folded like a butterflies wings. The programmer then has sex with the subject as the programming script for the butterfly is read.

Cover Programs - Similar to screen memories; these are programmed memories laid in by the cult/occult to distract from, or distort, the true ritual abuse memory. A secondary purpose of these programs is to discredit the subject's memories with unbelievable content. As a result portions of the memory will be true, other aspects will be false.

Cinderella Program-Occult program used for rituals. At midnight a young part will be called up to perform a task during the ritual. Other purposes of this program consist of falling asleep at midnight, completing a specific task at midnight, and amnesia programming triggered at midnight.

Cross Programming- Subjects will be programmed as teams. Each team will be given code words for each alter who is part of a 2-System team. Teams will be trauma and sexually bonded, as well as having mirror images with each other's names.

D

Daytime Abandonment programming- starts at birth for all subjects. The environment itself is programming. No matter how the infant behaves it is ignored and abused physically and emotionally in the daytime. Nurturing and caretaking by caregivers occur only at night.

Death programming- is completed by removing the fear of death from parts and advising the alter they must protect the secrets, family, clan, and system. The fear of death is removed by torture and advising the part they don't exist, they are passing through, and this life is a door way to another realm.

Torture programming for death parts consists of near death torture bringing the part near death by drowning, suffocation (by smothering or choking), electric shocks, drug induced death experiences, placed in pits to simulate being buried alive, and placed in coffins or witnessing horrific deaths of others.

Horrific deaths include made to feel helpless to help an individual who is dying. A subject of the same age is tortured to death by skinning, drowning, burning, hanging, burial, electrocution, gang rape, and other methods.

The final act in deaths programming is to participate in the death of an individual. The individual will be the approximate age of the part. The programmer and handler will decide the means of death. The individual's death must allow for the subject's part to directly witness the last breath.

Dehumanizing Programming- creates alters that are things or objects. Like, earth element, gemstone or rock to insure the part continues to believe they are not human.

Delta programming- This is known as "killer" programming, originally developed for training special agents or elite soldiers (i.e. Delta Force, First Earth Battalion, Mossad, etc.) in covert operations. Optimal adrenal output and controlled aggression is evident. Subjects are devoid of fear; very systematic in carrying out their assignment. Delta is employed to create a standing army of fearless subject's, who can be further groomed by army, police and the intelligence community through the legitimate process of recruitment and training, or by secretive handlers who can trigger Delta impulses and learned capabilities. The use of subjects crosses many organizational boundaries within the overall Network. If a subject is to be used as a Delta model (assassination), they may be selected for strength and dexterity.

Physical fitness sequences are often applied, with favourites being exercises that can be done in complete solitude, such as running on a track, raising the body from a bar and vertical sit-ups with the legs fixed.

Delta this is one of the more cognitive brain wave states, and will often be highly dissociated. A subject can be in waking delta if they are in an advanced state of programming. Delta alters are emotionless, flat with photographic memories. They may hold most of the cognitive memories for the other systems, especially if extensive amnesia programming has been completed.

Delta state may have up to three levels of training: Delta Tier 3, General solider training. Delta Tier 2, Sniper, special operations training. Delta Tier 1 T.S. NTK, Black ops training, clandestine operations, no acknowledgement of existence.

Another example is U.S. Navy SEAL Team Six (officially the Naval Special Warfare Development Group) are JSOC's (Joint Special Operations Command) elite tier-one forces. They conduct the nation's black operations, and work in absolute secrecy. When an operator from one of these units is killed in action, the Department of Defence generally releases their name with a cover story for the death. (A training accident, for example.)

Denial programming-begins with the first experiences the subject goes through in life. The subject has been traumatized, the next morning the programmers are acting normally, as if nothing has occurred. This is reinforced later by the subject being asked what happened. If the subject begins to state what has happened the previous night/day they are punished. Denial will be reinforced by the programmers by advising the subject they will never be believed if they disclose. There will be situations set up by the programmers where another subject will ask what has occurred. If the subject begins to disclose torture is implemented.

The subject will learn to deny any memories due to fear of punishment, no one will believe them, and they will lose anyone they are close to.

Alters will be created as the subject grows, whose purpose will be to deny the trauma. If any disclosure were to occur the alter will state it was a nightmare, a book the subject read, a movie they saw, etc.

Demonology programming- (spiritual programming) The subject's alters are to participate in rituals where demons are invoked. The demons are to act as 'Guardians' protecting the system. The alters are advised if the demon is 'cast out' they will return seven fold. Alters are also advised they are demons to prevent Christians from breaching the system.

Disney Programming-uses Disney movies and scripts for subject. The subject's parts will be given Disney character names. Mickey Mouse will be the lead programmer.

Dual Programming-Programming two or more subject's together with the identical scripts, colours, and mapping. The codes will differ, and the images will differ due to the differences in the subject's perspective. The programming is used with twinning.

Duel programming-Programming in systems that prevents alters from agreeing on a task, or goal. This programming prevents alters from fighting other programming because they cannot agree on outcome.

Don't talk; don't tell programming- Triggers flooding, body memories, spinning programs if the subject attempts to talk about programming. This programming is also used for Delta programming if subject were to be apprehended. Programming should be linked to any program the programmer deems necessary.

Distortion programming- The subject will see an individual's face as melting wax, with numerous overlays, double faces and other distorted images. This programming can also hold echoing, which is when an individual speaks their voice echoes. This leads to the subject believing they are losing their mind, outside diagnosis will lead to schizophrenia.

Doll programming- The subject is given a doll that is made to look like them. The subject is taught to project their feelings onto the doll. Due to the doll looking like the subject they are projecting on to themselves. The programmer will place the doll in positions and have the subject 'abuse' the doll. The subject is trained to assume the same positions so they can be abused.

E

Early milieu programming- The subject is abandoned by caregivers during this programming to inlay abandonment issues for trauma bonding. During this time programming is completed during the day in which the programmers are consistently apathetic towards the subject. The subject is to feel unlovable and must seek to please others during the day. During the night the subject is cared for and nurtured by family member, programmers and other subject's.

Epsilon programming-is the programming of animal alters into the subject. Epsilon programming is used to create animal alters, which is thought to be the key to paranormal or superhuman abilities Epsilon Programming elements are often added to other forms of programming to increase the effect in a specific direction. The Greek or Cyrillic symbol 3 will be found on the subliminal level.

Epsilon programming is specific to the animal and its purpose and attributes. Epsilon programming is typically paired with another form of programming. Epsilon programming paired with beta programming for example. Some examples of Epsilon/Beta programming are: sex kittens. Epsilon programming is used widely in the sex industry for 'pony girls', 'puppy play' and other animal fetishes. The intent of programming a subject is to give them attributes their handler will want/need.

A fox would be the animal form the alter would assume. The subject for sexual purposes would be told they are a vixen. This would be done if they are male or female. The sexual programming would be layered in.

If the programmer wanted the fox alter to remain as a 'system protector'. The subject would be given the attributes of a 'hunted fox'. This means this part would flee if the system were threatened. Foxes are shy animals as a result this part would rarely be seen. They are also isolative animals and nocturnal. The fox alter would cover its tracks using tactics to throw individuals off.

If the subject were to be have a fox programmed as an 'active alter' the programming would be for 'sly fox'. This subject's task would be to 'out wit' therapists, clergy, friends, anyone who attempted to discover deeper parts of the system.

Any animal can be used in Epsilon programming. Just about every animal has been tried.

For Epsilon programming to effectively work the subject must be kept in a cage. When the subject is in the cage they are treated like the animal the handler desires.

As another example the programmer wants a subject to be a dog. The programmer will treat the subject consistently as they would a dog. If the subject misbehaved; they would be told ‘bad dog’ and an electric shock will be administered through the cage.

The programmer would ask the subject if they wanted to be a dog. When the subject responds with ‘no’ another shock would be administered. The subject would be given choices; you can come out of your cage if you are a good dog. A good dog would give me oral sex; a bad dog would stay in its cage.

